At length the tocsin on the tower of L'Unité was heard tolling. The committees, in fact, putting into execution the law of high police, were engaged in summoning the sections. Several of those bodies had already taken up arms, and were marching to the convention. The Mountaineers became more than ever sensible of the importance of summarily converting into decrees the wishes of the patriots; but for that purpose it was necessary to disengage the assembly to a certain extent, and permit it to breathe more freely. "President," exclaimed Duhem, "invite the good citizens to retire, in order that we may deliberate!" He likewise addressed the people. "The tocsin has sounded," he said to them, "the drum has beaten in the sections; if you do not permit us to deliberate, the country is lost." Choudieu took a female by the arm, beseeching her to withdraw. "We are in our own house," she replied, petulantly. Choudieu turned to the president, and told him that if he did not know how to perform his duty, and cause the hall to be evacuated, he ought to yield his place to another. He again spoke to the mob: "Snares are laid to entrap you," he said; "withdraw, in order that we may accomplish your views." The people, perceiving the signs of impatience manifested by the whole Mountain, prepared to retire. The example once given, it was gradually followed; the concourse diminished in the interior of the convention, and began to decrease outside also. The bands of young men could this day have done nothing against so immense a multitude; but the numerous battalions of the sections faithful to the convention were already arriving from all quarters, and the crowd retreated before them. Towards evening, the hall was entirely freed both within and without, and tranquillity re-established in the convention.

So soon as the assembly found itself delivered from the mob, it ordered Boissy-d'Anglas to resume the perusal of his report, in which task he had been interrupted by the inroad of the populace. The members were not yet restored to confidence, and they desired to show that the first subject they entered upon, after becoming free, related to the subsistence of the people. At the close of his report, Boissy-d'Anglas proposed to draw an armed force from the sections of Paris to protect in the environs the convoys of corn. The decree for the purpose was passed. Prieur-de-la-Marne proposed to commence the distribution of bread with the working-classes, which motion was likewise adopted. The evening was now far advanced; a considerable force was mustered around the convention. A few malecontents, who still resisted, had congregated in the section of the Quinze-Vingts; others, again, in the section of the City. These latter had seized upon the cathedral of Notre-Dame, and there, as it were, intrenched themselves. However, all apprehensions were at an end, and the assembly was in a position to avenge the outrages of the day.

Isabeau presented himself in the name of the committees, and narrated the events of the day, the manner in which the assemblages had been formed, the direction they had received, and the measures taken by the committees to disperse them, conformably to the law of the 1st Germinal. He related that the deputy Auguis, being commissioned to visit different quarters of Paris, had been stopped by the factious, and wounded; and that Pénière, detached to extricate him, had been fired at and struck. At this recital, cries of indignation burst forth, and vengeance was demanded. Isabeau proposed, first, to declare that on this day the liberty of the convention in its sessions had been violated; and, secondly, to charge the committees to take measures against the authors of the enormity. The Mountaineers, seeing how promptly it was intended to turn the abortive attempt to their prejudice, received this proposition with murmurs. Three-fourths of the assembly immediately arose, and demanded that it be put to the vote. Several members exclaimed that it was a 20th of June against the national representation; that to-day the hall of the assembly had been invaded as was the palace of the king on the 20th June; and that, unless the convention took signal vengeance on the perpetrators, a 10th of August would be shortly prepared for it. Sergent, a deputy of the Mountain, maintained that the movement was attributable to the Feuillants, the Lameths, and Duports, who intrigued in London to urge the patriots of Paris into imprudent excesses. He was told in rejoinder that his wits were wandering. Thibaudeau, who, during the late disturbance in the assembly, had withdrawn, indignant at the violence offered to its independence, now sprang to the tribune. "The conspiring minority is there," he said, pointing to the left side. "I protest I have absented myself for four hours, because I no longer beheld the national representation here. I now return and support the proposed decree. The time for weakness is past; it is the weakness of the national representation that has always compromised it, and encouraged a criminal faction. The safety of the country is this day in your hands; you will ruin it if you evince imbecility!" The decree was voted amidst protracted plaudits; and those outbreaks of wrath and vindictiveness, stimulated by the remembrance of indignities and dangers incurred, began fastly to multiply. André Dumont, who had occupied the chair amidst the tempestuous scene, ascended the tribune, and complained of the menaces and insults to which he had been exposed: he affirmed that Chales and Choudieu had exclaimed, directing the attention of the people to him, that royalism was in the chair, and that Foussedoire had recommended, only the evening before, amidst a group of persons, the disarming of the national guard. Foussedoire gave him the lie; but sundry deputies asseverated they had heard him. "For the rest," resumed Dumont, "I contemn all those enemies who would have directed daggers against me; it is the chiefs who must be struck. The attempt made to-day was to save Billaud, Collot, and Barrère; I will not propose to you to send them to death, for they are not tried, and the period for assassinations is past, but to banish them from the territory they infect and agitate by seditions. I move the transportation, this very night, of the four defendants whose case you have been canvassing for several days." This motion was hailed with enthusiastic acclamations. The members of the Mountain demanded a call of the assembly, and several of them proceeded to the table to sign the demand. "It is the last effort," said Bourdon, "of a minority whose schemes are confounded. I move, besides, the arrest of Choudieu, Chales, and Foussedoire." Both propositions were decreed. Thus was terminated, by a sentence of exile, the long process of Billaud, Collot, Barrère, and Vadier. Choudieu, Chales, and Foussedoire, were punished with arrest. The course of retribution did not stop here. It was recalled to memory that Huguet had spoken during the invasion of the hall, and had exclamed, "People, maintain your rights!"—that Leonard-Bourdon had presided at the popular society of the Rue du Vert-Bois, and that by his incessant declamations he had tended to foment insurrection; that Duhem had openly encouraged the insurgents during the irruption, and that on the previous days he had been seen at the Payen Café, in the section of the Invalides, carousing with the principal leaders amongst the terrorists, and inciting them to insurrection: in consequence, Huguet, Leonard, and Duhem, were decreed under arrest. Divers others were likewise denounced; in the number was Amar, the most abhorred member of the old committee of general safety, and deemed the most dangerous of the Mountaineers. The convention doomed him also to detention. With the view of removing these alleged leaders of the conspiracy to a distance from Paris, it was suggested they should be confined in the castle of Ham. The idea was adopted, and it was moreover decided they should be conveyed thither forthwith. It was subsequently determined to proclaim the capital in a state of siege, until the danger should have entirely subsided. General Pichegru was at that moment in Paris, and in the height of his renown. He was nominated commander of the armed force during all the time the peril should continue; with him were conjoined the deputies Barras and Merlin de Thionville. It was now six in the morning, 13th Germinal (2d April); the assembly, exhausted with fatigue, adjourned, confiding in the efficacy of the measures it had taken.

The committees proceeded without delay to put in execution the decrees which had just been passed. That very morning, the four exiles were placed in carriages, although one of them, Barrère, was extremely ill, and dispatched towards Orleans on the route to Brest. The like promptitude was shown in removing the seven deputies condemned to detention in the castle of Ham. The vehicles had to traverse the Champs-Elysées; the patriots were aware of the fact, and a crowd of them congregated on the way with the view of stopping them. When the carriages arrived, preceded by the gendarmerie, they surrounded them in great numbers. Some vociferated it was the convention retiring to Châlons, bearing away the funds of the treasury; others shouted, on the contrary, it was patriot deputies unjustly torn from the sanctuary of the convention, and that to deprive them of their functions was against the law. They dispersed the gendarmerie, and conducted the vehicles to the civil committee of the section of the Champs-Elysées. At the same moment, a mob attacked the post on guard at the barrier of L'Etoile, seized the cannons, and pointed them down the avenue. The commander of the gendarmerie vainly attempted to parley with the insurgents; he was assailed and obliged to fly. He hastened to the Gros-Caillou to demand aid; but the artillerymen of the section threatened to fire on him unless he immediately withdrew. Meanwhile, several battalions of the sections, and a few hundreds of young men, arrived, under the command of Pichegru, elated at the idea of marching under the orders of so celebrated a general. The insurgents discharged two cannon-balls and a volley of musketry. Raffet, who that day commanded the sections, received a shot fired close to his person; Pichegru himself incurred the greatest danger, and was twice aimed at. However, his presence, and the confidence he communicated to those he led, decided the conflict. The insurgents were put to flight, and the carriages departed without further obstacle.

It remained to dissipate the assemblage in the section of the Quinze-Vingts, with which had united the muster previously formed in the cathedral of Notre-Dame. There the malecontents had constituted themselves a permanent assembly, and were engaged in deliberating upon a fresh insurrection. Pichegru proceeded to the spot, cleared the hall of the section, and finally succeeded in restoring public tranquillity.

On the following day he appeared before the convention, and announced that its decrees were executed. Unanimous applause greeted the conqueror of Holland, who had, by his opportune presence at Paris, thus rendered an additional service to the state. "The vanquisher of tyrants," the president replied to him, "could not fail to triumph over factionists." He received the fraternal embrace and the honours of the sitting, and remained for several hours exposed to the gaze of the assembly and the public, who fixed all observation on him alone. The cause of his conquests was not investigated, the part due to fortunate accidents was not weighed; the results were great and striking, and so brilliant a career was viewed with universal admiration.

This audacious outrage of the Jacobins, which cannot be better characterised than by calling it another 20th of June, aroused against them redoubled acrimony, and provoked new repressive measures. A searching inquiry was instituted to discover all the ramifications of the conspiracy, which was erroneously imputed to the members of the Mountain. They had held no communications with the popular agitators, and their relations with them were limited to a few meetings in coffee-houses and to vague verbal encouragements; nevertheless, the committee of general safety was instructed to draw up a report.

The conspiracy was supposed the more extensive from the circumstance of commotions having likewise occurred in all the districts bordering on the Rhone and the Mediterranean, at Lyons, Avignon, Marseilles, and Toulon. Previous denunciations had been levelled at the patriots for quitting the communes, where they had signalised themselves by excesses, and gathering in arms in the principal cities, both to avoid the notice of their fellow-citizens and to coalesce with their prototypes in those larger communities, and form with them a combined and formidable mass. They were stated to be traversing the banks of the Rhone, hovering in numerous bands around the environs of Avignon, Nismes, and Arles, and in the plains of La Crau, and committing robberies on the inhabitants reputed to be royalists. They were charged with the murder of a wealthy proprietor, a magistrate of Avignon, who had been plundered and assassinated. At Marseilles, they were with difficulty repressed by the activity of the representatives present on the spot, and by the measures adopted consequent upon declaring the city in a state of siege. At Toulon they had mustered in great force, and composed a multitude of several thousand persons, almost after the manner of the federalists on the arrival of General Cartaux in 1793. They commanded the town by their junction with the individuals employed in the navy-yards, who had nearly all been chosen by Robespierre the younger after the capture of the place. They had many partisans amongst the workmen of the arsenal, whose number exceeded twelve thousand; and all these men, when united, were capable of perpetrating any imaginable atrocities. At this moment the squadron, in a complete state of equipment, was ready to weigh anchor; the representative Letourneur was on board the admiral's vessel; troops for disembarkation had been shipped, and the expedition was understood to be destined for Corsica. The revolutionists, taking advantage of the opportunity when merely a weak and uncertain garrison remained in the place, and wherein they counted several partisans, broke into open insurgency, and in the very arms of the three representatives, Mariette, Ritter, and Chambon, slew seven prisoners accused of emigration. In the latter days of Ventôse (March), they repeated similar acts of violence. Twenty prisoners, taken in a foreign frigate, were in one of the forts; these, they asserted, were emigrants whom it was intended to pardon. They roused the twelve thousand workmen of the arsenal, surrounded the representatives, who narrowly escaped with their lives, and were only arrested in their career by a battalion which was fortunately landed from the fleet.

These events, happening concurrently with those at Paris, added to the apprehensions of the government, and urged it to increased severity. Injunctions had been already issued to all the members of municipal administrations, revolutionary committees, and popular or military commissions, in short to all functionaries superseded since the 9th Thermidor, to leave the towns in which they had assembled and return to their several communes. A still more rigorous decree was now fulminated against them. They having possessed themselves of arms distributed in moments of danger, it was ordained that all those who were known throughout France to have participated in the vast tyranny abolished on the 9th Thermidor should be disarmed. Upon each municipal or sectional assembly was devolved the task of designating the accomplices of that tyranny in the various communes, and taking measures to disarm them. We may well conceive to what harassing persecutions such a decree must have exposed them, at a time when they had drawn upon themselves so inveterate a hatred.

Nor was this sufficient to satisfy the ruling party in the convention: it determined, moreover, to deprive them of the assumed leaders they had on the benches of the Mountain. Although the three principal had been condemned to exile, and seven more, to wit, Choudieu, Chales, Foussedoire, Léonard-Bourdon, Huguet, Duhem, and Amar, consigned to the fortress of Ham, it held that others yet remained who might prove formidable. Cambon, the financial dictator, and the inexorable adversary of the Thermidorians, whose insinuations on his probity he had never pardoned, appeared an encumbrance certainly, and might even be dangerous. It was alleged that, on the morning of the 12th, he had stated to the clerks at the treasury—"There are three hundred of you here, and in case of accidents you will be able to resist;" words he might have probably spoken, and which evidenced his unison of sentiment, but not his confederacy, with the Jacobins. Thuriot, formerly a Thermidorian, but again become a Mountaineer since the restoration of the seventy-three and the twenty-two proscribed deputies, and a very influential member undoubtedly, was likewise marked down as a leader of the faction. In the same category were ranked Crassous, who had been one of the most energetic supporters of the Jacobin Club; Lesage-Sénault, who had concurred in closing that club, but had since taken alarm at the rapidity of the reaction; Lecointre of Versailles, an avowed opponent of Billaud, Collot, and Barrère, and a receder to the Mountain since the return of the Girondists; Maignet, the incendiary of the South; Hentz, the terrible proconsul of La Vendée; Levasseur [de-la-Sarthe], one of those who had contributed to the death of Philippeaux; and Granet of Marseilles, accused as an instigator of the revolutionists in the South. Tallien undertook the office of denunciator: after nominating them from the tribune of the assembly, he moved they should be arrested, and sent to Ham after their seven colleagues. The selections of Tallien were ratified, and the denounced representatives condemned to suffer incarceration accordingly.

Thus, this movement of the patriots resulted in drawing upon them additional severity; they were disarmed throughout France, and remanded to their communes; and in their fate they involved nearly twenty Mountaineers, of whom some were exiled and others immured. Every movement of a party not sufficiently strong to conquer, only tends to hasten its ruin.

After smiting individuals, the Thermidorians turned with zest to the substance of things. The committee of seven, charged to frame a report on the organic laws of the constitution, declared, without reservation, that the constitution was so vague it must be re-formed. A committee of eleven members was thereupon appointed to present a new plan. Unfortunately, the victory of their adversaries, instead of reducing the revolutionists to order, only infuriated them the more, and provoked, on their part, new and perilous efforts.

CHAPTER XLI.

CONTINUATION OF THE NEGOTIATIONS AT BASLE.—TREATY OF PEACE WITH HOLLAND; ALSO WITH PRUSSIA.—POLICY OF AUSTRIA AND THE EMPIRE.—PEACE WITH TUSCANY.—SUBMISSION OF CHARETTE AND OTHER VENDEAN CHIEFS.—FEIGNED PEACE OF THE BRETON CHIEFS.—STATE OF AUSTRIA AND ENGLAND.—DISCUSSIONS IN THE BRITISH PARLIAMENT.—PREPARATIONS OF THE COALITION FOR A NEW CAMPAIGN.

DURING these melancholy internal dissensions, the negotiations commenced at Basle had been suspended for an interval by the sudden demise of Baron von Goltz. The most untoward rumours were forthwith circulated. One day it was said, "The Powers will never treat with a republic incessantly torn by factions; they will leave it to perish in the convulsions of anarchy, without either attacking or recognising it." Another day, the direct contrary was alleged: "Peace is made with Spain; the French armies will advance no farther; negotiations are opened with England and with Russia, but to the prejudice of Sweden and Denmark, who are to be sacrificed to the ambition of Pitt and Catherine, and thus rewarded for their friendship towards France." Here malevolence, careless of contradictions, prompted apprehensions of what chanced to be most injurious at the moment to France: were peace desirable, it proclaimed ruptures; if victories were needful, it deplored the calamity of peace. Once, even, it strove to disseminate the belief, that all peace was for ever impossible and that a protestation on the subject had been lodged with the committee of public welfare by a majority of the members of the convention. An impetuous sally of Duhem was the groundwork of this report. That deputy had maintained that it was preposterous to treat with a single power, and that peace ought to be granted to none until they all solicited it together. This doctrine he had embodied in a note which he deposited with the committee of public welfare, and thus arose the unfounded clamour concerning a protestation.

The patriots, on their part, were equally busy in propagating sinister statements. They said that Prussia was purposely protracting the negotiations, in order to include Holland in a common treaty, and thereby to maintain her influence in that country, and save the stadtholderate. They complained that the fate of the Dutch republic remained so long undecided; that the French enjoyed there none of the advantages of conquest; that the assignats were received only at half value, and exclusively from soldiers; that the Dutch merchants had written to their Belgian and French correspondents that they were ready to transact business with them again, but only on condition of being paid in advance, and in the precious metals; and, finally, that the Dutch had permitted the stadtholder to depart, carrying with him whatever he chose, and had themselves sent to London, or transported on board the vessels of the East India Company, a considerable proportion of their wealth. Undoubtedly, many difficulties had accrued in Holland, both with regard to the conditions of peace and on account of the extreme views of the patriot party. The committee of public welfare had dispatched thither two of its members, fitted by their commanding influence to adjust all differences. The committee had craved from the convention, with reference to the delicacy and success of the negotiation, the privilege of withholding their names or the object of their mission. The assembly had acceded to the request, and the members appointed had forthwith taken their departure.

It was natural that such important events, that such high interests as were involved in their issue, should excite contrary hopes, fears, and allegations. But, despite all these rumours, the conferences continued auspiciously; the Count von Hardemberg had succeeded the Baron von Goltz at Basle, and appearances promised a speedy settlement of the conditions.

Scarcely had these negotiations been commenced, ere it became obvious that circumstances imperiously demanded a modification of the powers vested in the committee of public welfare. It was manifest that a government so completely open, unable to conceal any thing, to decide upon or to perform any act, without a public deliberation, would be incapable of negotiating a treaty with any power, howsoever frank. In order to arrange preliminaries even, it is necessary to sign suspensions of hostilities, and to neutralise certain territories; secrecy, above all, is indispensable, for a power often negotiates long before it thinks fit to avow the design. Moreover, there are frequently articles which, upon every principle of policy, should remain unknown. For example, if one power undertake to unite its forces with those of another—if it stipulate the junction of an army or of a squadron—in short, any concurrence of measures, the importance of such combinations depends on their secrecy. But how was the committee of public welfare, renewed by one-fourth every month, obliged to render an account of all operations, and altogether devoid of that vigour and hardihood possessed by the old committee, which scrupled not to act upon its own responsibility—how, we ask, was it to negotiate, especially with powers chagrined at their own faults, reluctantly submitting to allow their discomfiture, and all insisting, either upon leaving certain conditions secret, or upon not having the fact of their treating at all made known until after peace was signed? The necessity it had felt of sending two of its members into Holland, without imparting their names or their mission, was the first distinct proof that secrecy had been ascertained to be indispensable in diplomatic operations. Acting upon this knowledge, the committee submitted a decree conferring upon it the powers requisite for treating with foreign states, a step which occasioned fresh rumours.

Regarding simply the theory of governments, it is curious to behold a democracy foregoing indiscreet curiosity, surmounting its jealousy of power, and, impelled by necessity, granting to a few individuals the extraordinary privilege of stipulating secret conditions. Such was the course of the convention at the present moment. It conferred on the committee of public welfare power to conclude armistices, to neutralise territories, to negotiate treaties, and to settle, frame, and even sign their conditions, reserving only what veritably appertained to itself—the ratification. It did more: it authorised the committee to adopt secret articles, under the sole condition that those articles contained nothing inconsistent with the patent stipulations, and that they should be published so soon as the occasion for secrecy was over. Provided with these powers, the committee prosecuted, and conducted to a happy termination, the negotiations commenced with different powers.

Peace with Holland was eventually concluded under the auspices of Rewbell, and, above all, of Sieyes, who were the two members of the government recently accredited to Holland. The Dutch patriots accorded distinguished honours to the celebrated author of the first Declaration of Rights, and evinced a deference towards him which smoothed sundry difficulties. The conditions of peace, signed at the Hague on the 27th Floreal, year 3 (16th May 1795), were as follow:— The French republic acknowledged the republic of the United Provinces as a free and independent power, and guaranteed its independence and the abolition of the stadtholderate. An offensive and defensive alliance was declared between the two republics durin the continuance of the existing war. This offensive and defensive alliance was to be perpetual between the two republics in all cases of war against England The United Provinces placed forthwith at the disposition of France twelve ships of the line and eighteen frigates, which were to be employed principally in the North and Baltic seas. They gave, moreover, as an auxiliary force to France, the moiety of their army, which, in truth, was reduced to almost nothing, and required a total reorganisation. The demarcations of territory were fixed in the following manner:— France retained all Dutch Flanders, thereby completing its territories towards the ocean, and extending them to the mouths of the rivers; towards the Meuse and the Rhine, it obtained the possession of Venloo and Maestricht, and all the country to the south of Venloo, stretching on both sides of the Meuse. Thus the republic abstained from pressing its extension to the Rhine on this point, as was but reasonable. In fact, in that direction, the Rhine, the Meuse, and the Scheldt are so mingled together, that there is no clear boundary. Which of those streams was to be considered as the Rhine? It is impossible to decide, and the question resolves itself into one purely conventional. Besides, in that quarter, no hostilities could threaten France except those of Holland, which were not much to be dreaded, and therefore did not need the protection of a strong barrier. In short, the territory assigned by nature to Holland consisting of alluvial soil accumulated at the mouths of the rivers, France, in order to include one of the principal streams, must have appropriated three-fourths at least of that residuum, and thus pretty nearly annihilated the republic it had just enfranchised. The Rhine becomes the limit of France, with respect to Germany, only in the vicinity of Wesel, and the possession of both banks of the Meuse, to the south of Venloo, left that question untouched. Furthermore, the French republic reserved to itself the privilege, in case of war towards the Rhine or Zealand, of placing garrisons in the fortresses of Grave, Bois-le-Duc, and Bergen-op-Zoom. The port of Flushing remained in common. Thus all necessary precautions were taken. The navigation of the Rhine, the Meuse, the Scheldt, the Hondt, and their several branches, was declared for ever free. In addition to these advantages, an indemnity amounting to one hundred millions of florins was paid by Holland. To compensate the latter for its sacrifices, France promised it, on the event of a general peace, territorial indemnities wrested from the conquered countries, and most suitably located for the due definement of the respective boundaries.

This treaty was founded on the most reasonable bases; the conqueror exhibited in its terms equal generosity and acumen. The allegation is futile, that by fixing Holland in its alliance, France exposed her to the risk of losing one-half of her navy detained in the English ports, and, above all, her colonies, abandoned without defence to the ambition of Pitt. Holland, left in neutrality, would have neither recovered her ships nor preserved her colonies: Pitt would have still found a pretext for seizing on them in the name of the stadtholder. The retention of the stadtholderate alone, without certainly saving either the Dutch ships or colonies, would have deprived English cupidity of all pretence; but this maintenance of the stadtholderate, with the political principles of France, with the promises made to the Batavian patriots, with the spirit which animated them, with the hopes they had conceived when throwing themselves into the arms of the French—was it possible, was it even just?

The conditions with Prussia were more easy to settle. Bischofwerder had been consigned to prison; and the King of Prussia, delivered from mysticism, had formed new ideas of ambition. He no longer talked of upholding the principles of general order; he now panted to render himself the mediator of a general pacification. The treaty with him was signed at Basle on the 16th Germinal (5th April 1795). It set forth, in the first place, that there should be peace, friendship, and good intelligence, between his majesty the King of Prussia and the French republic; that the troops of the latter should evacuate that portion of the Prussian dominions which they occupied on the right bank of the Rhine; that they should continue to occupy the Prussian provinces on the left bank, and that the definitive allocation of those provinces should not be decided until the period of general concord. From this last condition, it was obvious that the republic, without yet distinctly explaining its views, had conceived the design of giving itself the limit of the Rhine; but that, pending fresh victories over the armies of the empire and over Austria, it deferred the solution of the difficulties necessarily attendant on the advancement of that lofty pretension. Then only could it evict or grant indemnities, when its predominance was firmly established. The French republic, moreover, engaged to accept the mediation of the King of Prussia, in effecting a reconciliation with the princes and states of the German empire; it even pledged itself to refrain, during three months, from treating as enemies such of the princes on the right bank in behalf of whom his Prussian majesty should manifest an interest. This was an assured method of inducing the whole empire to seek peace through the intervention of Prussia.

Immediately after the treaty was signed, the cabinet of Berlin solemnly announced its conclusion to the empire, and detailed the motives which had influenced the conduct of Prussia. It declared to the diet that its good offices were at the disposal of the empire, if it desired peace; and, should the majority of the states reject an accommodation, of those amongst them who should feel constrained to negotiate separately fo their individual safety. On her part, Austria addressed sundry bitter reflections to the diet: she statec that she wished for peace as much as any other power, but that she deemed it impossible; that she woul choose the suitable moment for treating, and that th states of the empire would find greater advantages in relying upon Austrian fidelity, than upon perjured powers which had failed in all their engagements. The diet, to appear prepared for war even whils soliciting peace, decreed for the ensuing campaign th quintuple contingent, and resolved that the states which were unable to furnish soldiers, should have the privilege of avoiding the obligation by paying two hundred and forty florins in lieu of each man. At the same time, it decided that Austria, having become bound with England to continue the war, could not act as the mediatrix of peace, and that such mediation must be confided to Prussia. It only remained, therefore, to settle the form and composition of the delegation.

Notwithstanding this strong inclination to treat for peace, the empire could scarcely do so in its collective capacity; for it must demand, in behalf of its members who had lost their territories, restitutions which France could not have made without renouncing the barrier of the Rhine. But it was manifest that, under this impossibility of negotiating collectively, the several princes would throw themselves into the arms of Prussia, and conclude, through her friendly agency, individual accommodations.

Thus the republic began to disarm its enemies, and coerce them to adopt pacific views. Those only were resolutely bent on war who had suffered severe reverses, and who entertained no hopes of recovering by negotiations what they had lost by arms. Such were naturally the dispositions of the princes on the left bank of the Rhine, driven from their possessions, of Austria, deprived of the Low Countries, and of Piedmont, despoiled of Nice and Savoy. Those, on the contrary, who had had the good sense to observe neutrality, daily congratulated themselves on their sagacity, and the advantages it had ensured them. Sweden and Denmark were about to send ambassadors accredited to the convention. Switzerland, which had become the entrepôt of continental commerce, adhered to its prudent intentions, and addressed, through the medium of M. Ochs, to the French envoy Barthélemy, these admirable words—" A Switzerland is necessary to France, and a France to Switzerland. It is, in truth, reasonable to suppose that, without the Helvetic confederation, the relics of the old kingdoms of Lorraine, Burgundy, and Arles, would not have been united to the French dominions; and it is difficult to believe that, without the powerful diversion and determined interference of France, Helvetic liberty must not have been eventually stifled at its birth." The neutrality of Switzerland had been unquestionably of eminent service to France, and had contributed to save it from foreign conquest. To these reflections M. Ochs added others not less elevated. " Men will perhaps one day admire," he said, " that sentiment of natural justice which, leading us to repudiate all external influence in the choice of our forms of government, forbids us likewise to constitute ourselves judges of the mode of administration adopted by our neighbours. Our fathers censured neither the great feudatories of the German empire for vieing with the imperial power, nor the royal authority of France for repressing its great vassals. They successively beheld the states-general representing the French nation; the Richelieus and Mazarines seizing upon absolute power; Louis XIV. concentrating in his own person the entire power of the nation; and the parliaments claiming to share public authority in the name of the people; but never were they heard in rash tones arrogating a right to remonstrate with France, at any period of her history. The prosperity of France was their prayer, her unity their hope, the integrity of her territories their reliance."

These principles, so enlightened and so just, conveyed a severe censure on the conduct of Europe; and the results which Switzerland derived from their observance were a striking demonstration of their utility. Austria, jealous of her commercial activity, desired to fetter it by establishing a cordon; but Switzerland reclaimed to Wurtemburg and the adjacent states, and obtained justice.

The Italian powers longed for peace, or those at least whom their imprudence might one day expose to untoward consequences. Piedmont, although greatly exhausted, had lost too much to forego all further appeal to arms. But Tuscany, constrained against her inclination to break her neutrality by the English ambassador, who, threatening her with a squadron, had only allowed her twelve hours to decide, was impatient to resume her former position, especially since the French had penetrated to the gates of Genoa. In consequence, the grand-duke had opened a negotiation, which terminated in a treaty, the most easily adjusted of all. Good intelligence and friendship were re-established between the two states, and the grand-duke restored to the republic the corn belonging to Frenchmen in his ports, upon which an embargo had been laid at the period of the declaration of war. Indeed, before the negotiation, he had made that restitution of his own accord. This treaty, advantageous to France by facilitating the trade of the southern departments, especially in grain, had been concluded on the 21st Pluviose (9th February).

Venice, who had recalled her envoy from France, announced her intention of appointing another, and sending him forthwith to Paris. The Pope, too, on his part, intimated regret at the outrages that had been committed on the French.

The court of Naples, blinded by the passions of a foolish queen, and instigated by the intrigues of England, scorned all idea of negotiating, and made ridiculous promises of aid to the coalition.

To Spain peace was still most needful: she seemed as if waiting to be driven into it by additional reverses.

A negotiation not less important, perhaps, when the moral effect it was calculated to produce is considered, was that opened at Nantes with the insurgent provinces. We have narrated how it came to pass that he chiefs of La Vendée, divided amongst themselves, almost deserted by their peasants, followed only by a few determined partisans, pressed on all sides by the republican generals, reduced to the alternative of accepting an amnesty or undergoing extermination, had been brought to treat of peace. We have mentioned that Charette had agreed to an interview near Nantes, and that the pretended Baron de Cormatin, Puisaye's major-general, had presented himself as the mediator for Brittany, after having made a long tour with Humbert, hesitating the while between the credit of deceiving the republicans, completing an arrangement with Charette and seducing Canclaux, and the renown of being the pacificator of those celebrated districts. The general rendezvous was at Nantes; the interviews were to commence at the castle of La Jaunaye, a league from that city, on the 24th Pluviose (12th February).

Upon his arrival at Nantes, Cormatin attempted to place Puisaye's letter in the hands of Canclaux; but the man, so intent on beguiling the republicans, lacked wit even to keep from them a knowledge of this dangerous communication. It was discovered and published, and Cormatin constrained to asseverate that the letter was supposititious, that he had not been the bearer of any such document, and that he had come with the sincere desire of concluding a peace. He thus became more than ever committed; his part of a cunning diplomatist, deluding the republicans, concerting with Charette, and winning over Canclaux.

entirely failed him; he was curtailed to that of a pacificator. He saw Charette, and found him reduced by his position to the necessity of at least temporarily treating with the enemy; whereupon he no longer hesitated in deciding for the accomplishment of a peace. Still it was agreed between them that this peace should be merely feigned; that, pending the execution of her promises by England, they should pretend submission to the republic, and strive to obtain, meanwhile, the best conditions possible. So soon as the conferences were opened, accordingly, Cormatin and Charette delivered a note, in which they demanded freedom of religious worship, alimentary provision for all the ecclesiastics of La Vendée, exemption from military service and taxes for ten years, in order to repair the calamities of war, indemnities for all the devastations, the liquidation of the engagements contracted by the chiefs for the supply of their armies, the re-establishment of the old territorial subdivisions of the country and of its old mode of administration, the formation of rural guards under the command of the present chiefs, the removal of all the republican armies, the exclusion of all the inhabitants of La Vendée who had left the country as patriots, and whose property had been seized by the royalists, and, lastly, an amnesty common to the emigrants as well as to the Vendéans. Such demands were preposterous and altogether inadmissible. The representatives granted freedom of worship, indemnities for those whose cottages had been destroyed, exemption from service for the young men liable to the present requisition, for the purpose of repeopling the country, the formation of rural guards, to be under the orders of the administrations, to the number of two thousand men only, and the payment of the obligations signed by the leaders to the extent of two millions. But they refused the restoration of the old territorial subdivisions and the old civil administrations, exemption from taxes for ten years, the removal of the republican armies, and the amnesty for the emigrants; and they insisted upon the restitution of their property to the Vendéan patriots. They stipulated, moreover, that these concessions should be embodied, not in a formal treaty, but in ordinances to be issued by the representatives on mission; and that, on their side, the Vendéan generals should subscribe a declaration acknowledging the republic, and promising to give obedience to its laws. A final conference was fixed for the 29th Pluviose (17th February), as the truce expired on the 30th.

A request was urged that, before concluding peace, Stofflet should be invited to these conferences. Several royalist officers desired it, because they held that he ought to participate in the negotiations; the representatives were also anxious for his presence, as they wished to comprehend all La Vendée in one treaty. Stofflet was at this period swayed by the ambitious Abbé Bernier, who was hostile to a peace which would deprive him of all his influence; and besides, Stofflet himself felt indignant at the idea of playing a second part, and at negotiations being commenced and carried on without his concurrence. However, he consented to attend the conferences, and he appeared at La Jaunaye, accompanied by a numerous retinue of officers.

Great was the tumult consequent upon this gathering. The advocates of peace and the partisans of war evinced much mutual exasperation. The former clustered around Charette: they alleged that those who wished to continue the war were precisely the parties who never engaged in action; that the country was ruined, and reduced to the last gasp; that the powers had done nothing, and would in all probability never do any thing for them; and in whispers they added too, that at any rate it behoved them to temporise, to gain time by means of a simulated peace, and that if England ever kept her promises, they would be always ready to rise. The partisans of war maintained, on the other hand, that they were offered peace merely with the intention of disarming them, subsequently violating all the conditions, and immolating them at leisure; that to lay down their arms, even for an instant, would tend to slacken courage, and to render all future insurrections impracticable; that inasmuch as the republic negotiated, they had good proof she herself was reduced to deplorable extremities; that they only needed the exercise of a little more patience and constancy to see the moment arrive when they might attempt great things by the assistance of foreign powers; that it was unworthy French chivalry to sign a treaty with the secret resolution to break it; and that, for the rest, they had no power to recognise the republic, for they should thereby abjure the rights of the princes for whom they had so long contended. Several consultations were held by the two parties, in which much asperity of feeling was manifested, and even fierce passions engendered. On one occasion, so violent were the reproaches and menaces levelled by the partisans of Charette against those of Stofflet, that a general combat was with difficulty averted. Cormatin was one of the most zealous advocates of peace; his fluency, his vehemence of action and opinion, and his quality of representative of the Breton army, secured him attention and consideration. Unluckily for him, he was accompanied by a certain Solilhac, whom the central committee of Brittany had given him as an attendant. Solilhac, amazed at perceiving Cormatin enact a part so different from that he had been appointed to perform, remarked to him that he was departing from his instructions, and that he had not been deputed to conclude a pacification. Cormatin was thrown into the utmost perplexity; Stofflet and the upholders of war exulted over their opponents, on learning that Brittany purposed rather to gain delay and to concert with La Vendée than to submit, and declared they would never lay down their arms, since Brittany was determined to support them.

On the morning of the 29th Pluviose (17th February), the council of the army of Anjou met in a separate room of the castle of La Jaunaye, to adopt a definitive resolution. The officers of Stofflet's division drew their swords, and swore to cut the throat of the first who spoke of peace; and they forthwith passed a resolution to continue the war. In another room, Charette, Sapinaud, and their followers, decided for peace. At noon a meeting was to be held, under a tent pitched on the lawn, with the representatives of the people. Stofflet, not venturing to confront them with the declaration of his intentions, sent to inform them that he declined their propositions. The representatives left at the prescribed distance the detachment which attended them, and entered the tent. Charette left his Vendéans at the same interval, and repaired to the rendezvous, accompanied only by his principal officers. Meanwhile, Stofflet was seen to mount his horse, with the infuriated partisans who followed him, and depart at full gallop, waving his hat, and shouting "Long live the king!" There was little to discuss under the tent where Sapinaud and Charette had met the representatives, for the ultimatum of the latter had been previously accepted. The stipulations were respectively subscribed. Charette, Sapinaud, Cormatin, and the other officers, signed an act of submission to the laws of the republic; the representatives delivered the ordinances containing the conditions granted to the Vendéan chiefs. A mutual suavity and politeness illustrated the conference, and all things seemed to betoken a sincere reconciliation.

The representatives, desirous of throwing a lustre upon the submission of Charette, made preparations for giving him a magnificent reception in Nantes. The most exuberant joy reigned in that patriotic city. The inhabitants rejoiced in the belief that at length the calamity of civil war was about to terminate; they hailed with rapture the return of so distinguished a man as Charette into the bosom of the republic, and dwelt complacently on the probability of h sword being henceforth devoted to its service. O the day appointed for his solemn entry, the nationa guard and the army of the West were drawn up unde arms. The whole population flocked, full of gladnes and curiosity, to behold and honour the celebrate chief. He was received with shouts of "The repub lic for ever! Charette for ever!" He wore the cos tume of a Vendéan general, relieved by the tricoloure cockade. In character, Charette was stern, distrust ful, cunning, and intrepid; and these qualities wer depicted on his countenance and in his deportment. Of medium stature, his small and sparkling eye, nos of Tartar form, and ample mouth, gave him a strange and peculiar expression, but one singularly appropriat to his character withal. Whilst thus congregated t greet him, all sought to penetrate the sentiments pass ing in his mind. The royalists were fain to detec perplexity and remorse in his features. The repub licans found him delighted, almost intoxicated with his triumph. He might have reasonably been so, de spite the embarrassment of his position; for his enemies accorded him the first grateful recompense he had yet received for his exploits.

Immediately after the conclusion of the peace, the representatives determined upon renewed efforts to win over Stofflet, and to induce the Chouans to accept the conditions granted to Charette. The latter appeared cordial in his manifestations; he circulated proclamations through the country, urging all to return to their duty. The inhabitants were in general overjoyed at the pacification. The men completely addicted to war were organised into rural guards, and their command was intrusted to Charette, with authority to form the police of the country. This was in accordance with a suggestion of Hoche, perverted t satisfy the Vendéan chiefs, who, entertaining both ulterior views and present doubts, desired to retain under their orders the men most inured to martial life. Charette even promised his assistance against Stofflet, if he, hard pressed in Upper Vendée, should fall back on the Marais.

General Canclaux was sent without delay in pursuit of Stofflet. Merely leaving a corps of observation around Charette's district, he moved the greater part of his troops on the Layon. Stofflet, anxious to magnify his importance by a brilliant achievement, made an attempt on Chalonne, which was vigorously repulsed, and he recoiled on Saint-Florent. He declared Charette a traitor to the cause of royalty, and caused sentence of death to be pronounced against him. The representatives, aware that such a war was to be terminated, not only by force of arms, but by giving a counter interest to the motives of the ambitious leaders, by bestowing pecuniary aids on men impoverished and without resources, likewise employed the agency of money. The committee of public welfare had opened them a credit on its secret funds. They listributed 60,000 francs in specie, and 365,000 in assignats, amongst sundry officers of Stofflet. His major-general, Trotouin, received 100,000 francs, half in money and half in assignats, and deserted him. He addressed a letter to the officers of the army of Anjou, exhorting them to peace, adducing such reasons as were best adapted to shake their constancy.

Whilst these measures were in progress touching he army of Anjou, the representatives, pacificators f La Vendée, repaired to Brittany, with the view of ringing the Chouans into a similar accommodation. Cormatin accompanied them; he was now altogether committed to the system of peace, and indulged hopes f repeating at Rennes the triumphal entry of Charette at Nantes. Notwithstanding the truce, several acts of rapine had been perpetrated by the Chouans. They being for the most part mere bandits, without attachment to any cause, and concerning themselves ut little about the political views which induced their hiefs to sign a suspension of arms, took no heed as to its observance, and thought only of pillage and booty. Some of the representatives, viewing this conduct of the Bretons in a serious light, began to doubt their intentions, and to apprehend that all expectation of peace must be abandoned. Boursault was the most disposed to encourage these misgivings. The representative Bollet, on the contrary, a zealous advocate of peace, held that, despite certain acts of hostility, an accommodation was practicable, and that mildness would be eventually efficacious in quelling the dis turbances. Hoche, meanwhile, flying from canton ment to cantonment, at distances of eighty leagues, never enjoying a moment of repose—placed between the representatives who advocated war and those who advocated peace—between the Jacobins of the towns, who accused him of weakness and treachery, and the royalists, who denounced him for barbarity—Hoche was sickened with disgust, though his ardour remained unabated. "You wish me another campaign of the Vosges," he wrote to one of his friends; "how would you make such a campaign against Chouans, and almost without an army?" This young hero saw his talents wasted in an ungrateful war, whilst generals greatly inferior to himself were reaping immortal honour in Holland and on the Rhine, at the head of the finest armies of the republic. Still he prosecuted his mission with zeal, and with a profound appreciation of men and of his own position. We have seen that he had already proffered the most prudent counsels—as, for example, to indemnify those insurgents who had continued the avocation of peasants, and to enrol those whom war had converted into soldiers. Further acquaintance with the country had unfolded to him the veritable means of appeasing the inhabitants and attaching them to the republic.

"We must continue to treat with the chiefs of the Chouans," he said; "their good faith is doubtless problematical, but we must display it towards them. We shall thus, by infusing confidence, gain over those who ask only to have their doubts removed. Such as are ambitious should be tempted by military rank—such as are poor and needy by money; thus they will be divided amongst themselves, and those who may be surely relied on can be intrusted with the rural police, having territorial guards assigned to them, the nstitution whereof has been already sanctioned. At he same time, twenty-five thousand men ought to be distributed in several camps, to watch over the whole country; a service of gunboats placed along the coasts, to be in perpetual activity; and the arsenals, rms, and munitions, transferred from open towns to fortified places and forts. As to the inhabitants, the riests should be employed to influence them, and assistance judiciously administered to the indigent. If we succeed in reviving confidence by means of the riests, Chouannerie will subside at once."

"Circulate," he wrote to his general officers on the 7th Ventôse—"circulate the beneficial law just passed y the convention on the freedom of worship, and indicate religious tolerance in your own persons. The priests, convinced that they will not be disturbed or the future in the exercise of their ministry, will become your friends, were it only to secure tranquil-ty. Their profession disposes them to peace: see hem, and urge upon them that the continuation f the war will expose them to the risk of being harassed and molested, not by the republicans, who respect religious opinions, but by the Chouans, who acknowledge neither God nor law, and are solely in-ent on keeping the country in a state of alarm, and n plundering. Amongst them are many extremely poor, and in general they are very covetous; be careful to offer them assistance, but not ostentatiously; n the contrary, with all the delicacy of which you are capable. Through them you will learn all the manœu-res of the party, and obtain their influence to keep he peasants in their fields and prevent them from oing to fight. You perceive that, to attain this object, mildness, amenity, and candour are requisite. Engage some officers and soldiers to attend with decorum some of their ceremonies, but with strong injunctions never to disturb them. The country expects from you the greatest zeal; all means are lawful in its service, when they are consistent with the laws and with republican honour and dignity." Hoche appended to these exhortations a recommendation not to draw any thing for the subsistence of the army from the country, at least for a time. With regard to the designs of the English, he advised, in order to balk them, that Jersey and Guernsey should be seized upon, and a Chouannerie introduced into England, to give them occupation at home. He cast his eyes also on Ireland; but on this topic he wrote that he would personally explain his views to the committee of public welfare.

This policy, dictated by sound discretion, and employed in various localities with exemplary address, had already been attended with marked success. Brittany was completely divided; all the Chouans who appeared at Rennes were caressed, subsidised, inspired with confidence, and prevailed on to lay down their arms. Others, more obstinate, and relying on Stofflet and Puisaye, determined to persevere in carrying on the war. Cormatin continued to traverse the country, urging all to treat, and endeavouring to draw them to La Prévalaye. Notwithstanding the ardour this adventurer manifested in pacifying the country, Hoche, who had penetrated his character, and duly estimated his instability and vainglory, distrusted him, and doubted he would break faith with the republicans as previously with the royalists. He observed him with close attention, to satisfy himself whether he were labouring sincerely, and without ulterior views, in the great work of pacification.

Singular intrigues were brought to bear on these efforts of the republicans to promote a general pacification. We have seen that Puisaye had proceeded to London with the view of gaining the concurrence of the English cabinet in prosecution of his projects; and we have seen the three French princes scattered over the continent, one awaiting the course of events at Arnheim, another fighting on the Rhine, and the third, in his character of regent, corresponding from Verona with all the European cabinets, and maintaining a secret agency at Paris. Puisaye had conducted his negotiations with equal skill and activity. Disregarding the old Duke of Harcourt, the regent's useless ambassador at London, he addressed himself directly to the English ministry. Pitt, usually inaccessible to the emigrants who abounded in the streets of London, and besieged him with projects and demands, promptly received the organiser of Brittany, and introduced him to the minister of war, Mr Windham, who was an ardent friend of monarchy, and advocated its maintenance or re-establishment throughout the globe. Puisaye's designs, after undergoing a rigid examination, were cordially adopted. England promised an army, a fleet, money, arms, and munitions, for a descent on the coasts of France, but imposed secrecy on Puisaye with regard to his countrymen, and especially as to the Duke of Harcourt, the envoy of the regent. This accorded with Puisaye's own views, who was ambitious of acting entirely by himself: he remained impenetrable to the Duke of Harcourt, to all the other agents of the princes in London, and in particular to the agents at Paris, who corresponded with the secretary of the Duke of Harcourt. He merely wrote to the Count d'Artois requesting from him extraordinary powers, and urging him to come over and put himself at the head of the expedition. The prince forwarded the powers, and intimated his intention of assuming the command in person. In a short time the projects of Puisaye were suspected, despite his efforts to conceal them. All the emigrants, repulsed by Pitt and amused by Puisaye, were unanimous in their denunciations. According to them, Puisaye was a base intriguer, sold to the perfidious Pitt, and meditating most suspicious schemes. This opinion, diligently inculcated at London, soon travelled to the counsellors of the regent at Verona. Already, in that petty court, great distrust of England prevailed—in fact ever since the affair of Toulon; and now that she proposed to make use of one of the princes, the utmost anxiety was engendered. On this occasion, it demanded with extraordinary solicitude what she intended to make of the Count d'Artois; why the name of Monsieur was excluded from her designs; whether she thought he could be dispensed with, &c. The agents at Paris, who held their mission from the regent, and participated in his ideas respecting England, being unable to obtain any communication from Puisaye, repeated the same objections to the enterprise preparing in London. Another motive induced them still more to discountenance it. The regent entertained thoughts of recurring to Spain, and proposed to remove into that country, in order to be nearer La Vendée and Charette, whom he especially idolised as a hero. The agents at Paris, on their part, had opened a communication with an emissary of Spain, who had strongly urged them to avail themselves of that power, and promised it would effect for Monsieur and Charette what England was projecting for the Count d'Artois and Puisaye. But it would be requisite to wait until Monsieur could be transported from the Alps to the Pyrenees by the Mediterranean, and a considerable expedition be prepared. The Parisian intriguers, therefore, were strenuous in extolling Spain. They pretended she would exasperate the French less than England, because her interests were less directly opposed to France; moreover, that she had already gained Tallien through his wife, the daughter of the Spanish banker Cabarus; and they scrupled not to affirm that they were sure of Hoche, so little did imposture cost them, to give importance to their projects. But after all, Spain, with her fleets and armies, was of little moment, as they represented, in comparison with the grand schemes they were concocting in the interior. From their central position in the heart of the capital, they professed to discern a decided feeling of indignation harboured against the revolutionary system. This sentiment, they alleged, must be fostered, and adroitly turned to the advantage of royalty; but, for that purpose, the royalists ought to show themselves as little formidable as possible, for the Mountain was strengthened by all the apprehensions which the idea of a counter-revolution inspired. A victory by Charette, a descent of emigrants in Brittany, would suffice to restore the revolutionary party to the influence it had forfeited, and deprive the Thermidorians, from whom so much was to be expected, of all their popularity. Charette had certainly made peace, but it was with the intention of being ready to resume hostilities: in the same manner, Anjou and Brittany must appear to submit for a time; during the interval the leaders of the government and the generals would be seduced, and the armies allowed to pass the Rhine and become entangled in Germany; then, suddenly, the slumbering convention would be surprised, and royalty proclaimed in La Vendée, Brittany, Paris itself. An expedition from Spain, including the regent, and concurring with these simultaneous movements, would then decide the success of royalty. As to England, all that should be asked from her was money (for these personages were acutely alive to its charms), and afterwards she might be laughed at. Thus, each of the numerous agents employed in behalf of the counter-revolution indulged his own conceits, formed views according to his individual position, and aspired to be the principal restorer of the monarchy. Falsehood and intrigue were their sole instruments for the most part, and money the chief object of their desires.

Holding and inculcating such ideas, the agency at Paris, similar in character to that which Puisaye was labouring to establish at London, naturally sought to prevent any enterprise for the moment, to tranquillise the insurgent provinces, and to promote the conclusion of a feigned peace. Under favour of the truce granted to the Chouans, Lemaitre, Brottier, and Laville-Heurnois had recently succeeded in opening a direct communication with the insurgent provinces. The regent had instructed them to deliver letters into the hands of Charette: they intrusted them to an old officer of the navy, Duverne de Presle, who had been deprived of his commission, and was ready for any employment. They charged him, at the same time, to aid the pacification, by advising the insurgents to temporise, and to wait for succours from Spain and a movement in the interior. This emissary repaired to Rennes, whence he contrived to forward the letters of the regent to Charette, and afterwards recommended a momentary submission to all the chiefs. Others were likewise dispatched on the same mission by the agents at Paris; and speedily ideas of peace, already prevailing in Brittany, became still more predominant. The opinion rapidly propagated that hostilities ought to cease; that England was deceiving the royalists; that every thing was to be expected from the convention; that it was about to re-establish monarchy of its own accord; and that, in the treaty signed with Charette, were included secret articles conditioned for the recognition, as King Louis XVII., of the young orphan in the Temple. Cormatin, whose position had become highly embarrassing, from his having so flagrantly belied the confidence of Puisaye and the central committee, found in the system of the agents at Paris an excuse and encouragement for his conduct. It appears, even, that he was flattered with hopes of having the command of Brittany confided to him in lieu of Puisaye. By dint of great exertions, he succeeded in mustering the principal Chouans at La Prévalaye, and the conferences were eventually opened.

In the mean time, Messieurs de Tinténiac and de la Roberie had been sent from London by Puisaye—the first to convey to the Chouans ammunition, money, and intelligence of an approaching expedition; the latter to apprise his uncle, Charette, of the intended descent on Brittany, and invite him to hold himself in readiness to second it; and both conjointly to insist upon the rupture of the negotiations. They had attempted to disembark with some emigrants on the coast of Brittany; the Chouans, informed of their intention, had hastened to receive them, become embroiled with the republicans, and suffered a defeat. Messieurs de Tinténiac and de la Roberie had escaped by a miracle; but the truce was compromised, and Hoche, who began to be diffident of the Chouans, and strongly suspected the honesty of Cormatin, proposed his immediate arrest. Cormatin protested his good faith to the representatives, and prevailed on them to refrain from declaring the truce broken. The conferences proceeded at La Prévalaye. An agent of Stofflet appeared to take part in them. Stofflet, repulsed, pursued, reduced to extremity, deprived of all his resources by the discovery of the small arsenal he possessed in a forest, now at length begged to be admitted to treat, and accordingly sent an envoy to La Prévalaye in the person of General Beauvais. The conferences were extremely animated, as they had been at La Jaunaye. General Beauvais still advocated the continuance of the war, notwithstanding the sorrowful condition of the chief he represented, and maintained that Cormatin, having signed the peace of La Jaunaye, and acknowledged the republic, had forfeited the command wherewith he had been invested by Puisaye, and was incapacitated from participating in the deliberations. M. de Tinténiac, having penetrated, in spite of all dangers, to the place of conference, essayed to foreclose the negotiation upon the authority of Puisaye, and announced his intention of immediately returning to London; but Cormatin and the partisans of peace prevented him from carrying his object into effect. Eventually Cormatin decided the majority to accept a compromise, on the arguments that time would be gained by agreeing to an apparent submission, and the vigilance of the republicans lulled. The conditions were identical with those conceded to Charette: freedom of religious observances, indemnities to those whose property had been laid waste, exemption from the conscription, and the institution of rural guards. The present treaty was illustrated by one condition the more, to wit, the payment of a million and a half to the principal chiefs, a sum whereof Cormatin was to have his share. Not to forego an instant his career of turpitude, says General Beauvais, Cormatin, at the moment of appending his signature, took his sword in his hand, and swore to resume arms upon the first opportunity; and recommended every one to observe, until fresh orders, the organisation hitherto maintained, and the respect due to all the superiors thereof.

The royalist chiefs subsequently removed to La Mabilaye, a league from Rennes, to sign the treaty at a solemn meeting with the representatives. Several of them expressed repugnance to proceed thither, but Cormatin overruled their objections. The meeting took place with the same formalities as at La Jaunaye. The Chouans had requested that Hoche might not be present, on account of the extreme distrust he manifested: their demand was complied with. On the 1st Floreal (20th April), the representatives delivered similar ordinances to those given at La Jaunaye, and the Chouans subscribed a declaration, wherein they acknowledged the republic and submitted to its laws.

On the following day, Cormatin made his entry into Rennes as Charette into Nantes. The activity he had displayed, and the importance he had arrogated, caused him to be considered as the leader of the Breton royalists. All was attributed to him—as well the exploits of that host of unknown Chouans who had mysteriously overrun Brittany, as the peace which had been so long and ardently desired. He received a species of triumph. Applauded by the inhabitants, admired and flattered by the women, endowed with an ample fund of assignats, he reaped all the honours and advantages of the war, as if he had long been its prop and mainstay. Yet he had disembarked in Brittany only to perform the singular part we have recorded. Henceforward, however, he presumed not to address Puisaye: he dared not venture his person out of Rennes, lest, if he advanced into the country, he might be shot by the malecontents. The principal chiefs, after the formality was over, returned into their several districts, first writing to Puisaye that they had been deceived, that he had only to come amongst them, and that at the first signal they would rally and fly to meet him. A few days afterwards, Stofflet, seeing himself completely deserted, signed the peace at Saint-Florent, on the same conditions as the other chiefs.

Whilst the two divisions of La Vendée and Brittany were thus succumbing, Charette had at length received a letter from the regent, the first token of the interest he had inspired. It was dated on the 1st of February. The prince saluted him as the second founder of the monarchy, expressed to him his gratitude, his admiration, his desire to join him, and nominated him lieutenant-general. These testimonies of regard came somewhat tardily. Charette, greatly moved, forthwith replied to the regent, "that the letter with which he had been honoured transported his soul with joy; that his zeal and fidelity would always remain the same; that necessity alone had constrained him to yield, but that his submission was only feigned; that, when parties were better united, he would again take arms, and be ready to die under the eyes of his prince, and for the most glorious of causes."

Such was the first pacification of the insurgen provinces. As Hoche had divined, it was only apparent; but as he had also judged, it might be rendered fatal to the Vendéan chiefs, by accustoming the country to tranquillity and to the laws of the republic, and by extinguishing or diverting to more beneficial purposes that passion for war which animated numbers of men. Notwithstanding the assurances of Charette to the regent, and of the Chouans to Puisaye, that ferocious spirit must necessarily subside after a few months of calmness and repose. Such subterfuges were neither more nor less than acts of bad faith, excusable, doubtless, in the frenzy of civil war, but which take from those who fall into their commission all right to complain of the severities of their adversaries. The republican representatives and generals exhibited the most scrupulous honour in fulfilling the conditions stipulated. It is surely superfluous to demonstrate the absurdity of the report then circulated, and even since repeated, that the treaties now signed contained secret articles, involving a pledge to place Louis XVII. on the throne. As if any representatives could have been sufficiently mad to contract such an obligation! As if it were credible that a republic would be sacrificed to a few partisans, which was resolutely maintained against all Europe! For the rest, none of the chiefs, when writing to the princes or the various royalist agents, ever ventured to advance so palpable an anomaly. Charette, arraigned at a later date for having violated the conditions of the treaty concluded with him, never attempted to urge so irrefragable a plea as the non-execution of a secret article. Puisaye, in his memoirs, has treated the assertion as equally preposterous and false; and it would not have been here alluded to, had it not been revived in a multitude of memoirs.

The result of this pacification was not simply that it led to a disarming of the disturbed districts; happening concurrently with the treaties of peace signed with Prussia, Holland, and Tuscany, and with the manifestation of pacific intentions by several other states, it had the further advantage of producing a striking moral effect. Europe beheld the republic recognised at once by its internal and external enemies—by the coalition and by the royalist party itself.

Amongst the decided enemies of France, England and Austria stood alone. Russia was too remote to be dangerous; the empire was ready to fall in pieces, and at all events incapable of sustaining the war; Piedmont was exhausted; Spain, little participating the chimerical hopes of the royalist intriguers, sighed for peace; and the anger of the court of Naples was as impotent as ridiculous. Pitt, notwithstanding the unprecedented triumphs of the French republic, despite a campaign without example in the annals of war, was not shaken in resolution; his powerful intellect had comprehended that so many victories, however disastrous to the continent, were not at all hurtful to England. That the stadtholder had lost all, the princes of Germany, Austria, Piedmont, and Spain, a portion of their dominions, was most true; but England had acquired an incontestible superiority upon the seas; she swept the Mediterranean and the ocean; she had confiscated a moiety of the Dutch navy; she was impelling Spain to weaken her marine in conflicts with that of France; she was proceeding to conquer the French colonies, to occupy all those of Holland, and to consolidate for ever her empire in India. An additional period of war and political aberration on the part of the continental powers, was still requisite for her purposes. It behoved her, therefore, to stimulate hostilities by giving subsidies to Austria, rekindling the zeal of Spain, and fomenting fresh disorders in the southern provinces of France. Mournful, doubtless, for the belligerent powers, if they were beaten in a new campaign: but England had nothing to apprehend; she would continue her progress on the ocean, in India, and in America. If, on the other hand, the powers were victorious, she gained an important point, by replacing under the dominion of Austria the Low Countries, which she dreaded above all things to see in the hands of France. Such were the ruthless but profound calculations of the English minister.

Notwithstanding the losses that England had sustained by captures at sea, the defeats of the Duke of York, and the enormous outlay she had incurred in subsidies to Prussia and Piedmont, she still possessed resources much greater even than the English or Pitt himself had conceived. It is true, she complained bitterly of the numerous captures; of the scarcity and enhanced prices of all articles of consumption. English merchant vessels, having alone continued to navigate the seas, were of course more exposed to the hazards of capture by privateers than those of other nations. Policies of insurance, which had become the occasion of boundless speculation, rendered their owners more reckless; and they often refused to wait for convoys, whereby the French cruisers were richly benefited. As to the famine, it was general throughout Europe. On the Rhine, around Frankfort, the bushel of rye cost fifteen florins. The vast consumption of the armies, the multitude of labourers torn from agriculture, and the calamities of ill-fated Poland, which had scarcely furnished any corn last year, had produced this extraordinary dearth. Besides, the navigation from the Baltic to England had become extremely perilous since the French took possession of Holland. Europe had been obliged to visit the New World in quest of food; and at this moment she was subsisting on the surplus produce of those virgin soils which the North Americans had so recently subjected to agriculture. But the rates of freight were excessive, and the price of bread had progressively risen in England to an exorbitant height. The price of meat, also, had kept pace with that of bread. The wools of Spain no longer arrived since the French occupied the ports of Biscay, and the manufacture of cloth was threatened with interruption. Thus, while in the throes of labour with her future greatness, England was oppressed by many grievous afflictions. The working classes mutinied in all the manufacturing towns; the people clamoured for bread in menacing accents; and the houses of Parliament were harassed with petitions, bearing thousands of signatures, imploring a termination to this disastrous war. Ireland, agitated on account of boons denied and withdrawn, was preparing additional embarrassments to those already burdening the government.

Yet, through these sinister appearances, did Pitt discern both the means and motives for prosecuting the war. In the first place, it flattered the passions of his court, it flattered even those of the English people, who had a leaven of hatred against France, always to be stirred even amidst the most cruel suffering. Moreover, despite the losses of commerce, losses which proved that the English alone continued to traverse he seas, Pitt beheld this commerce augmented during he last two years by the monopoly of all the marts of India and America. It was known to him that the export trade had singularly increased since the commencement of the war; and already the future superiority of his nation must have gleamed prophetically as he pondered in his cabinet. In the system of loans he found a resource, the teeming fertility whereof astonished himself. The government stocks maintained their value; the conquest of Holland had affected them but slightly, because, the event being foreseen, a prodigious amount of capital had been remitted from Amsterdam to London. The Dutch merchants, albeit firm patriots, looked nevertheless somewhat gloomily on affairs, and sought to place their wealth in security, by transporting it to England. Pitt had but spoken of a new loan, and, despite the war and all other calamities, offers showered thickly upon him. Experience has since proved that war, cramping commercial enterprise, and concentrating speculation on the public funds, facilitates rather than impedes loans. This result was still more naturally to be anticipated in a country which, having no assailable frontiers, never finds in war a question of existence, but simply one of trade and commercial aggrandisement. Pitt accordingly resolved, by means of the rich capitalists of his nation, to furnish subsidies to Austria, augment his navy, reorganise his army for transport to India and America, and afford considerable succours to the French insurgents. He concluded a subsidiary treaty with Austria, similar to that he had made the year before with Prussia. That power had abundance of soldiers, and she undertook to keep at least two hundred thousand effective men on foot; but she lacked the essential sinew, money, and was unable to obtain further loans in Switzerland, Frankfort, or Holland. England engaged, not actually to provide her with funds, but to guarantee a loan she proposed to open in London. To guarantee the debts of a power like Austria, was almost tantamount to an engagement to pay them; but the operation, under this form, was more easy of justification before parliament. This loan was for 4,600,000 pounds sterling (115 millions of francs), with interest at five per cent. Pitt opened at the same time a loan for eighteen millions, on account of England, at four per cent. The capitalists evinced extreme eagerness for the investment; and as the Austrian loan was guaranteed by England, and bore a higher interest, they demanded that, for two-thirds subscribed to the English loan, one-third should be apportioned them in the Austrian. Pitt, having thus assured himself of Austria, attempted to arouse the animation of Spain; but he found it drooping dolefully. He took in his pay the emigrant regiments under Condé, and intimated to Puisaye that, as the pacification of La Vendée tended to lessen confidence in the insurgent provinces, he would give him a squadron, materiel for an army, and the emigrant regiments, but no English soldiers; and that, if, as they wrote from Brittany, the dispositions of the royalists were really unchanged, and the expedition should prove successful, he would endeavour to render it decisive, by dispatching an army to the scene of action. He moreover resolved to increase his navy from eighty thousand to one hundred thousand seamen. To effect this object, he devised a species of conscription. Every merchant vessel was bound to furnish one sailor from a crew of seven—a contribution due from commerce for the protection it received from the military marine. Agricultural and manufacturing industry likewise owed succour to the navy, which secured them marts; consequently, each parish was also obliged to furnish a sailor. Pitt thus procured the means of giving to the English navy an extraordinary development. The English ships of war were much inferior in construction to the French; but the vast superiority in numerical force, the excellence of the crews, and the ability of the naval officers, precluded all idea of competition.

With all these combined preparations, Pitt met parliament. The opposition had this year received an accession of nearly twenty members. The advocates of peace and of the French revolution were invigorated beyond precedent, for they had portentous facts to oppose to the minister. The language which Pitt prompted to the crown, and which he himself held during this session—one of the most memorable in the British annals for the momentous questions discussed, and the eloquence of Fox and Sheridan—was signally adroit. He granted that France had obtained unparalleled triumphs; but those triumphs, far from discouraging its enemies, ought, on the contrary, he alleged, to inspire them with greater determination and perseverance. It was still England, he represented, that France aimed to injure; it was her constitution and prosperity it sought to annihilate; and to yield before such an inveterate, redoubtable animosity, would be equally imprudent and pusillanimous. At the present moment, especially, a cessation of hostilities on the part of England would, he affirmed, betray a fatal imbecility. France, having only Austria and the empire to combat, would overwhelm them; then, faithful to her hatred, she would return, freed from her enemies on the continent, and fall on England, which, standing alone in the struggle, must be exposed to a terrible encounter. Therefore, the moment when several powers were still contending, was to be seized, to attack in concert the common enemy, to restrict France to her limits, to wrest from her Holland and Belgium, and to repel within her own confines alike her armies, her commerce, and her pernicious principles. Furthermore, one other effort only was required—a single effort—to prostrate her. She had vanquished, doubtless, but at the expense of exhaustion, by employing barbarous expedients, which had become null by their very violence. The maximum, requisitions, assignats, terror, had been used by the rulers of France, until they were of no further avail in their hands. Those rulers had fallen a sacrifice to the very system they pursued for achieving their victories. Thus, he added, one more campaign, and Europe and England were avenged, and preserved from a sanguinary revolution. But, even should these reasons of honour, security, and policy be repudiated, and peace desired, such peace was impossible. The French demagogues would reject it with that ferocious arrogance they had exhibited even before their recent triumphs. And to treat with them, where were they to be found? Where was the government to be sought for amidst those bloodthirsty factions, heaved alternately into power, and disappearing as quickly as they reached it? How could a solid peace be concluded with those ephemeral depositaries of an authority perpetually disputed? It was consequently dishonourable, imprudent, and impossible to negotiate. England had still immense resources; her exports were greatly increased; her trade endured captures which demonstrated its hardihood and its activity; her navy was growing in might, and her wealth was spontaneously offered in profusion to the government, in order to prosecute this "just and necessary war."

This was the appellation wherewith Pitt had gilded the war at its commencement, and which he affected still to retain. We see that, amidst these his senatorial arguments, he dared not allege the true motives; he shrunk from avowing through what machiavellian routes he purposed to conduct England to the pinnacle of greatness. Such ambition is rarely proclaimed in the face of the world.

Accordingly, the opposition replied with overpowering effect. We were asked, said Fox and Sheridan, for but one campaign last session; already sundry fortifications were held by the allies; they were to start therefrom in spring to subjugate France. Yet behold the results! The French have conquered Flanders, Holland, all the left bank of the Rhine save Mayence, a part of Piedmont, the greater portion of Catalonia, and all Navarre. Adduce a similar campaign in the annals of Europe! It is allowed they have taken a few fortresses; show us a war in which so many places have been captured in a single campaign! If the French, contending against the whole of Europe, have gained such triumphs, what advantages will they not have against Austria and England when almost alone?—for the other powers either can no longer assist us or have actually concluded peace. We are told they are exhausted; that the assignats, their sole resource, have lost their value; and that their government has now ceased to manifest its former energy. But the Americans saw their paper-money fall ninety per cent., and they did not succumb. And this government, when it was energetic, we were told was barbarous; now that it has become humane and moderate, it is discovered to be without strength. Our resources, our disposable wealth, are exultingly referred to; but the people are perishing with want, they are unable to purchase either bread or meat, and they demand peace with loud outcries. This marvellous wealth, which seems created as by enchantment, is it real? Are treasures created by paper? All these systems of finance conceal some deadly fallacy—some yawning chasm, which must open appallingly upon us at no distant day. We proceed lavishing our treasure on the powers of Europe: already we have disbursed large sums to Piedmont and to Prussia; and the same extravagance is to be continued towards Austria. Who assures us that this power will be more faithful to her engagements than Prussia? Who guarantees us that she will not prove false to her promises, and negotiate after receiving our gold? We are exciting an infamous civil war; we are arming Frenchmen against their country; and yet, to our disgrace, those Frenchmen, recognising their error and the prudence of their new government, have laid down their arms. Are we to rekindle the extinguished embers of discord in La Vendée, to light up there a devastating conflagration? We are reminded of the barbarous principles of France: can those principles be more antisocial than our conduct with regard to her insurgent provinces? All the means for continuing the war, therefore, are either doubtful or criminal. Peace, we are told, is impossible; France hates England: but when did the wrath of the French manifest itself against us? Was it not when we showed the reprehensible intention of wresting from them their liberty, of interfering in their choice of a government, of exciting civil war amongst them? Peace, it is alleged, would spread the contagion of their principles. But Switzerland, Sweden, Denmark, the United States, are at peace with them: are their constitutions destroyed? Peace, it is added, is impossible with a tottering and ever-changing government. But Prussia and Tuscany have found parties to treat with; Switzerland, Denmark, Sweden, and the United States, know with whom to confer in their relations with France; and yet we cannot negotiate with her! We ought to have been forewarned on commencing the war that we were not to make peace until a certain form of government was re-established amongst our enemies—until the republic was abolished—until they had adopted the institutions it pleased us to give them.

Pitt, resolute in his purpose, unaffected by this encounter of reason and eloquence, still shrouding his veritable motives, obtained all he sought—loans, maritime impressment, suspension of the habeas-corpus act. Aided by his treasures, his navy, the two hundred thousand men of Austria, and the desperate courage of the French emigrants, he determined to wage another campaign, sure at least of domineering on water, even though victory on land remained with the enthusiastic nation he assailed.

To resume: these negotiations, these conflicts of opinion in Europe, these preparations for war, prove how important a station France then held in the world. At this period arrived contemporaneously ambassadors from Sweden, Denmark, Holland, Prussia, Tuscany, Venice, and America. Upon their arrival at Paris, they proceeded to visit the president of the convention, whom they sometimes found dwelling on a third or fourth storey, and whose simple, unaffected welcome had superseded the pompous receptions of the old court. They were afterwards introduced into that famous hall, where sat, on naked benches and in homely costume, the assembly which, by its power and the greatness of its passions, no longer appeared ridiculous, but terrible and imposing in the eyes of men. They were conducted to chairs opposite that of the president; they spoke in a sitting posture; the president replied to them in the same manner, addressing them by the titles expressed in their credentials. He subsequently gave them the fraternal embrace, and proclaimed them representatives of the states from which they came accredited. A gallery was reserved for them to attend the convention when they thought fit, and witness those tempestuous debates which inspired foreigners with mingled curiosity and terror. Such was the ceremonial employed with regard to the ambassadors of the powers at peace with France. Simplicity became a republic, receiving without ostentation, but with propriety and respect, the envoys of the kings it had vanquished. The name of Frenchman was honourable at this epoch: it was ennobled by the most brilliant victories, and the most unsullied of all—those which a nation had won in defending its existence and its liberty.

CHAPTER XLII.

NEW CONSPIRACY OF THE PATRIOTS.—MASSACRE IN THE PRISONS OF LYONS.—ADMINISTRATIVE AND FINANCIAL MODIFICATIONS.—INSURRECTION OF THE 1ST PRAIRIAL; EVENTS OF THAT DAY AND THE FOLLOWING.—ARREST AND EXECUTION OF SEVERAL REPRESENTATIVES.—DISARMING OF THE PATRIOTS.—MEASURES FOR THE RETIREMENT OF ASSIGNATS.

THE events of Germinal had wrought on the two parties which now divided France the invariable consequence of an indecisive collision: those two parties had become more violent—each more furiously intent on extirpating the other. Over the whole south, and particularly at Avignon, Marseilles, and Toulon, the revolutionists, more menacing and audacious than ever, defying all the efforts that were made to disarm or remand them to their communes, persisted in clamouring for the liberation of patriots, the death of returned emigrants, and the constitution of 1793. They corresponded with their partisans in other provinces; they urged them to join them and to concentrate on two principal points—Toulon for the south, Paris for the north. When they should be in sufficient force at Toulon, they intended, so they alleged, to arouse the departments and march to unite with their brethren of the north. This was precisely the scheme of the federalists in 1793.

Their adversaries, whether royalists or Girondists, had also grown more emboldened since the government, attacked in Germinal, had given the signal for persecutions. Masters of the local administrations, they turned to terrible account the decrees enacted against the patriots. They immured them as accomplices of Robespierre or as intromitters with the public funds unannealed by acquittances; they disarmed them as participators in the tyranny abolished on the 9th Thermidor, or chased them from place to place as men who had quitted their communes. It was in the south, more especially, that the severities against the unfortunate patriots were the most actively pursued, for violence necessarily engenders violence. In the department of the Rhone, the reaction was assuming an aspect of most fearful malignity. The royalists, who had been obliged to fly before the remorseless energy of 1793, returned through Switzerland, crossed the frontiers, entered Lyons with false passports, discoursed largely concerning the king, concerning religion, concerning former prosperity, and dwelt pertinaciously on the massacres and enormities consequent upon the siege, with the insidious view of converting that republican city to the tenets of monarchy. Thus, the royalists established themselves at Lyons as the patriots at Toulon. Précy even was stated to be concealed in the city, the calamities of which he had so greatly aggravated by his courageous defence. Numbers of emigrants, accumulated at Basle, Berne, and Lausanne, indulged in more presumptuous language than had ever distinguished them. They spoke confidently of their approaching return, affirming that their friends were now in power; they boasted that the son of Louis XVI. would be shortly replaced on the throne, themselves honourably recalled, and their property restored to them; they said that, with the exception of certain military chiefs whom it would be necessary to punish, every one would promote this restoration with eagerness and zeal. At Lausanne, where the youthful generation was enthusiastic in favour of the French revolution, they were rudely assailed, and compelled to observe silence. In other places they were allowed to chatter as they listed; their vauntings were derided, for they had become stale and trite in a rehearsal of six years; but umbrage was taken at several amongst them, who were pensioned by the Austrian police as spies upon the words of travellers in inns and hostelries. It was in this quarter, that is to say, towards Lyons, that companies had again been formed, under the titles of Companies of the Sun and Companies of Jesus, for the specific objects of scouring the country, penetrating into towns, and slaughtering the patriots living in retirement on their lands or detained in the prisons. The banished priests likewise re-entered France by this frontier, and had already overspread the eastern provinces, where they declared null and void all the ecclesiastical ordinances the conforming priests had administered, they rebaptised the children, remarried those joined in wedlock, and inspired the people with hatred and contempt of the government. They took the precaution, however, of hovering near the frontiers, in order to retreat at the first signal. Those who had not been sentenced to exile, and who enjoyed an alimentary provision in France, and permission to exercise their religious duties, equally abused with their banished brethren the toleration of the government. Not content with celebrating mass in buildings hired or lent for the purpose, they stirred up the people and headed them in forcibly appropriating the churches which had devolved in possession upon the communes. Numerous scandalous scenes of this description had occurred, and the employment of force had been found necessary to compel observance of the laws. At Paris, the venal journalists of royalism, directed by Lemaitre, wrote with more hardihood than ever against the revolution, and almost openly advocated a return to monarchy. Lacroix, the editor of the Spectator, had been acquitted upon the prosecution commenced against him, since which event the tribe of libellists no longer stood in awe of the revolutionary tribunal.

Thus the two parties were in array, prepared for a decisive conflict. The revolutionists, resolved to strike a blow of which the 12th Germinal had been but the portent, openly conspired. They planned schemes in every quarter, since they had lost the principal leaders, who alone revolved designs for the entire party. A meeting was organised at the house of one Lagrelet, in the Rue de Bretagne, wherein they canvassed a project for instigating several simultaneous risings, at the head whereof Cambon, Maribon-Montaut, and Thuriot, were to be placed, some to attack the prisons and deliver the patriots, others to abduct the committees, and others, again, to besiege the convention and wring from it the requisite decrees. Once masters of the convention, the conspirators purposed to coerce it into reintegrating the imprisoned deputies, annulling the condemnation pronounced against Billaud-Varennes, Collot-d'Herbois, and Barrère, excluding the seventy-three, and proclaiming instanter the constitution of 1793. All the arrangements were complete, even to the crowbars for forcing the prisons, to the tickets for ascertaining the initiated, to a piece of cloth for hanging at the window of the house whence orders were to issue. A letter was intercepted, concealed in a loaf, and addressed to a prisoner, in which these words occurred: "On the day you receive eggs half-white and half-red, you will hold yourselves in readiness." The day fixed was the 1st of Prairial. One of the conspirators betrayed the secret, and revealed to the committee of general safety the details of the project. That committee immediately caused all the leaders specified to be arrested, which unfortunately failed to derange the plans of the patriots, for every one was now a leader amongst them, and they plotted in a thousand places at once. Rovère, worthy to be stigmatised in times past with the name of terrorist under the old committee of public welfare, but at present a furious reactionist, presented a report to the convention upon this plot, and inculpated sundry deputies as appointed to take the lead of the various assemblages. Those deputies were strangers to the scheme, and their names had been used without their knowledge, as men who were needful in the emergency, and whose dispositions could be relied on. Already condemned to detention at Ham, they had not obeyed the sentence, and still contrived to elude its execution. Rovère prevailed on the assembly to decide that, unless they forthwith surrendered themselves prisoners, they should be deemed banished by the mere fact of contumacy. This abortive project sufficiently indicated a coming storm.

When this new machination of the patriots was made public by the press, an extraordinary ferment manifested itself in Lyons, and the previous animosity harboured against them was redoubled in intensity. At the moment a prominent terrorist denunciator chanced to be undergoing trial, prosecuted under the decree passed against the accomplices of Robespierre. The Parisian journals subsequently arrived, containing the report presented by Rovère to the convention upon the conspiracy of the 29th Germinal. The Lyonnese began to exhibit symptoms of turbulence; the majority of them, be it remembered, had to deplore either the ruin of their fortunes or the death of their kinsmen. They gathered tumultuously around the hall of the tribunal. The representative Boisset appeared in the midst, on a charger; they closed upon him, vociferously enumerating their several wrongs against the man on trial. The promoters of disorder, the members of the companies of Jesus and the Sun, hastened to profit by this commotion, fomented the excitement, moved towards the prisons, stormed them, and massacred seventy or eighty prisoners, reputed terrorists, and cast their bodies into the Rhone. The national guards made efforts to prevent this slaughter, but perhaps failed to evince the zeal they would have displayed had less resentment animated them against the victims of the day.

Thus, scarcely had the Jacobin plot of the 29th Germinal transpired, ere the counter-revolutionists had answered it by the massacre of the 5th Floreal (24th April) at Lyons. The sincere republicans, albeit holding in abhorrence the projects of the terrorists, were now struck with alarm at those of the counter-revolutionists. Hitherto their views had been chiefly directed to the prevention of a new reign of terror, and royalism had not entered within the scope of their apprehensions; royalism, in sooth, appeared so inconceivable, after the executions of the revolutionary tribunal and the victories of the republic. But when they saw it, hunted as it were from La Vendée, returning through Lyons, forming companies of assassins, pushing turbulent priests into the heart of France, and dictating at Paris itself writings teeming with the diatribes of emigration, they took counsel upon such facts, and concluded, that to the rigorous measures adopted against the abettors of terror must be added others against the partisans of royalty. In the first place, to leave without pretexts those who had suffered from former excesses, and who demanded retribution on the perpetrators, they moved the convention to enjoin upon the tribunals a greater degree of activity in judging the individuals accused of malversations, abuses of authority, and oppressive acts. Thereafter they deliberated on the measures best calculated to repress the royalists. Chénier, known for his literary talents and his stanch republican principles, was charged with a report upon this subject. In his exposition he drew a forcible picture of France, of the two parties disputing its empire, and especially of the insidious practices of the emigration and the clergy. He proposed that every returned emigrant should be forthwith brought before the tribunals, to undergo the application of the law; that every banished person should be considered an emigrant, who, having revisited France, was found therein at the expiration of a month; that whoever violated the law on religious worship, and attempted to take forcible possession of churches, should be visited with six months' imprisonment; that every writer who tended to bring the national representation into contempt, or to promote the return of royalty, should be condemned to banishment; and, lastly, that all the authorities charged with the disarming of the patriots should be obliged to assign motives for each deprivation of arms. All these measures were received with universal approbation, except two, which gave rise to observations. Thibaudeau held it imprudent to punish with six months' imprisonment infractions of the law on religious worship. He argued with reason that the churches were adapted only for one purpose, that of religious ceremonies; that the people, sufficiently devout to attend mass in private conventicles, would always view with indignant regret their exclusion from the edifices in which it was formerly celebrated; and that, whilst declaring the government for ever unconnected with the cost of any worship, the churches might be restored to the Catholics, in order to avert complaints, disturbances, and perhaps a general La Vendée. Thibaudeau's remarks made but a slight impression, for the convention was apprehensive lest, by restoring the churches to the Catholics, even on condition of their upholding them at their own charge, the clergy might revive the imposing pomp of their ritual, which had heretofore materially contributed to exalt their influence. Tallien, who had become a journalist with Fréron, and who, either on that account or from an affectation of justice, desired to protect the independence of the press, controverted the proposal for exiling writers. He maintained that the provision was arbitrary, and allowed too inordinate a latitude for severities against the press. His argument was just; but, in this state of open war with royalism, it perhaps behoved the convention to adopt a strong resolution against those libellists, who laboured so earnestly to reclaim France thus prematurely to monarchical ideas. Louvet, that impetuous Girondist, whose suspicions had wrought such mischief for his party, but who was, undoubtedly, one of the most sincere men in the assembly, hastened to answer Tallien, and conjured all the friends of the republic to forget their mutual differences and grievances, and unite against the oldest, the only veritable enemy they all had, namely royalty. The testimony of Louvet in favour of violent measures could scarcely be impugned; for he had braved a most ruthless proscription in combating the system of revolutionary government. The whole assembly applauded his noble and frank declaration, voted the printing and transmission of his discourse to all the towns of France, and adopted the proposed article, to the sad confusion of Tallien, who had chosen so injudicious a moment to vindicate a maxim inherently just and true.

Thus the convention, having previously ordained prosecutions against the patriots, their deprivation of arms, and their return to their communes, had found it necessary likewise to renew the laws against emigrants and exiled priests, and to prescribe penalties against the opening of churches and against royalist publications. But penal laws are feeble guarantees against parties actuated by an inextinguishable and rancorous feud. The deputy Thibaudeau propounded an opinion that the organisation of the governing committees, since the 9th Thermidor, was too weak and subdivided. This organisation, instituted at the moment when the dictatorship was subverted, had been prompted solely by the dread of a new tyranny. Consequently, to an exceeding tension on all the springs of government had succeeded an extreme relaxation. Each committee had been reinvested with its peculiar authority, in order to destroy the too predominant influence of the committee of public welfare; whence had resulted intricacies, delays, and a complete paralysis of the government. For example, if troubles occurred in a particular department, the administrative gradation in observance assigned the intimation to the committee of general safety; this committed summoned to its assistance that of public welfare, and in certain cases that of legislation; before these committees could unite in conference, each required to be complete; and besides the time thus lost, was added the interval consumed in deliberation. Thus, such meetings were attended with many impediments; and, when formed, were too numerous to decide and act with befitting promptitude. Were it merely requisite to dispatch twenty men on guard, the committee of general safety, charged with the police, was obliged to make application to the military committee. It now became obvious how erroneous was the excessive alarm at the tyranny of the old committee of public welfare, and the precaution against a danger thenceforward chimerical.

A government thus constituted could offer but a very feeble resistance to virulent factions, or curb them by a display of concentrated energy. The deputy Thibaudeau accordingly proposed a simplification of the government. He recommended that the committees should be restricted to the simple function of originating laws, and that executive measures should belong exclusively to the committee of public welfare; that the latter should unite the police to its other attributes, and, in consequence, the committee of general safety be abolished; and, lastly, that the committee of public welfare, thus burdened with the whole weight of government, should be increased to twenty-four members, in order to meet the vast extension of its duties. Those timid personages in the assembly, who were ever ready to take alarm at impossible dangers, exclaimed against this project, and maintained that it would revive the former dictatorship. The question being thus introduced, and scope given to imagination, numerous were the suggestions tendered to the wisdom of the convention. Those who cherished the phantasy of returning to constitutional forms, to the division of prerogatives, proposed to create an executive power apart from the convention, in order that administrative and legislative functions might be kept asunder; others, again, proposed to take the members of this power from the ranks of the convention, but to interdict them, during the continuance of their authority, from exercising the legislative vote. After long and discursive debates, the assembly arrived at the conclusion, that, inasmuch as its existence would not be prolonged beyond the span of two or three months, that is to say, for the interval necessary to complete the constitution, it would be folly to waste its latter moments in framing a provisional constitution, and, above all, to discard the dictatorship at a period so fraught with peril, when strength was more than ever needful. Consequently, it rejected all the propositions tending to promote a division of powers; but the project of Thibaudeau excited too much dread of an opposite character to be adopted, and the convention contented itself with rendering the action of the committees less fettered. It decided that they should be reduced to the mere faculty of submitting laws; that the committee of public welfare should alone possess the direction of executive measures, but that the police should remain with the committee of general safety; that the joint conferences of committees should for the future be managed by delegates; and, finally, to guard still more against that redoubtable committee of public welfare, which caused so much apprehension, that it, this last-named committee, should be deprived of the initiative in laws, and be for ever debarred from taking any steps tending to the impeachment of a deputy.

After these measures had been adopted, with the view of imparting additional energy to the government, the convention resumed consideration of those financial questions, the discussion whereof had been abruptly ruptured by the events of the month Germinal. The abolition of the maximum, of requisitions, of the sequestration—in short, of the entire system of forced expedients—by restoring all things to their natural channel, had rendered still more rapid the decline of assignats. Sales being no longer forced, and prices having become free, commodities had been enhanced in an extraordinary manner, and assignats of course proportionably depreciated. The communications with other countries being re-established, the assignat had again entered into competition with foreign bills, and its inferiority had been speedily manifested by the continual fall of its exchangeable value. Thus the degradation of the paper-money was complete in all respects; and, according to the ordinary law of gravitation, the rapidity of the descent was accelerated according to the depth of the fall. All sudden fluctuations in money-values lead to hazardous speculations, that is to say, to stockjobbing; and as these fluctuations never occur except as the consequence of either financial or political disorder, when production languishes, when industry and trade are discouraged, this species of enterprise is almost the only occupation left; wherefore, instead of fabricating or transporting additional commodities, capitalists are content to speculate on the variations of price in those already on the spot. In lieu of producing, ingenuity and sagacity are diverted to wagering on what is already produced. Stockjobbing, therefore, which had gained such a height in the months of April, May, and June, 1793, when the defection of Dumouriez, the insurrection of La Vendée, and the federalist confederacy, provoked so considerable a depreciation of assignats, reappeared more actively than before in the months of Germinal, Floreal, and Prairial, year 3 (April and May 1795). Thus to the horrors of famine were added the scandal of reckless gambling, which materially aided to enhance the price of commodities and to precipitate the downfall of the paper. The course of the speculators was the same as in 1793—the same, indeed, as ever. They purchased articles of merchandise, which, rising in relation to the assignat with great rapidity, grew in value in their hands, and procured them in short periods large profits. All hopes and all exertions were thus directed to promote the degradation of the paper. Many articles were sold and resold thousands of times without being removed. Nay, bargains were made on imaginary investments. An article was bought of a seller who had it not, but who was to deliver it at a fixed term: the term elapsed, the vender did not deliver it, but paid the difference between the rate of contract and the price of the day if the article had risen, or received the difference if the article had fallen in value. The Palais-Royal, already so odious in the eyes of the people as the resort of "the gilded youth," was the place where the gamblers assembled. A citizen could not traverse that locality without being assailed by traffickers, who carried in their hands stuffs, gold snuff-boxes, silver vases, or rich bronzes: it was veritably a den of thieves. At the Café de Chartres all the speculators in the precious metals chiefly gathered. Although gold and silver were no longer considered merchandise, and since 1793 it was forbidden, under severe penalties, to exchange them against assignats, the traffic in them proceeded almost openly. The louis-d'or was sold for 160 livres in paper; and in the space of an hour it was made to vary from 160 to 200 and even 210 livres.

Thus a deplorable scarcity of bread, an absolute deficiency of fuel, amid a cold still rigorous in the heart of spring, an excessive enhancement in the price of all commodities, the impossibility of obtaining them with a paper which fell every day in value; and amidst all these calamities a loathsome jobbing, accelerating the depreciation of assignats by its operations, and presenting the spectacle of scandalous gambling—of sudden fortunes mocking the general misery—such were the exhaustless topics of invective afforded to the patriots for inflaming the wrath of the people. To alleviate the public distress, and to prevent a general outbreak, it was essential to remove these causes of complaint; but therein lay the ever-recurring and insurmountable difficulty.

The measure deemed indispensable, as we have mentioned, was to enhance the assignats by withdrawing them; but to withdraw them it was necessary to sell domains, and here the real obstacle occurred, which was either not comprehended or wilfully overlooked—the difficulty of obtaining purchasers with the ability to pay for a third of the French territory. Violent means had been rejected, to wit, arresting the currency altogether or levying a forced loan; the choice vibrated between the two voluntary expedients, that is to say, between a lottery and a bank. The proscription of Cambon decided the preference in favour of Johannot's scheme, which contemplated the formation of a bank. But, pending the interval requisite to realise this chimerical idea, which, even though it succeeded, could never restore assignats to the standard of specie, the grand evil, that of a difference between the nominal and the real value of the paper, still remained. Thus the creditor of the state or of individuals received the assignat at par, and could reinvest it only at a loss of nine-tenths at the least. Proprietors who had leased their lands received but the tenth fraction of their rents. Tenants had been seen to discharge the amount of their rents with the produce of a sack of corn, a fatted hog, or a horse. The public exchequer, especially, suffered a loss which contributed to ruin the finances of the state, and, as a necessary consequence, the credit of the paper-money. It received in satisfaction of taxes the assignat at its nominal value, and collected monthly fifty millions, which were equivalent to five at the utmost. To supply the deficit thus accruing, and to meet the extraordinary expenses of the war, it was obliged to issue assignats to the extent of eight hundred millions per month, on account of their great depreciation. The first remedial measure indispensable, therefore, whilst awaiting the effect of the fallacious projects devised for withdrawing and enhancing them, was to establish the relation between their real value and their nominal value, so that the republic, the creditors of the state, the owners of lands, the capitalists, all the individuals, in short, paid in paper, might not be involved in utter bankruptcy and destitution. Johannot proposed to declare the precious metals the standard of value. According to his plan, the current price of assignats, with reference to gold or silver, was to be daily ascertained, and all engagements acquitted on that basis. Thus, he to whom 1000 francs were due would receive 10,000 francs in assignats, if they were only worth the tenth in specie. The taxes, rents, incomes of all kinds, payments for national domains, would all be rendered in money or in assignats at the current rate. This selection of specie, as the common regulator of all values, was opposed, first, from a lingering antipathy against the precious metals, which were accused of having ruined the paper; and, secondly, because the English, having a profusion thereof, would be enabled, so it was gravely argued, to make them fluctuate at their pleasure, and thus control the course of the assignats. Such reasons were truly miserable, but they weighed with the convention to reject metals as the measure of value. Thereupon Jean-Bon-Saint-André suggested the adoption of corn, which formed amongst all nations the essential basis whereby prices of other articles were necessarily regulated. By this method, taking the instance of a man discharging a liability, the quantity of corn which the sum due could command would be calculated, as at the period when the transaction had been concluded, and so many assignats paid in liquidation as would purchase the same quantity at the time of settlement. Thus, he who owed interest, rent, or taxes, to the amount of 1000 francs, at a period when 1000 francs represented 100 quintals of wheat, would give the current value of 100 quintals of wheat in assignats. But here a fatal objection was started. The exigencies of the war and the depression of agriculture had tended to raise considerably the price of corn in relation to all other produce or commodities, even in the proportion of four to one. Wheat ought, according to the present rate of assignats, to have cost only ten times the price of 1790, that is to say, 100 francs the quintal; but it cost nevertheless 400. He who owed 1000 francs in 1790 would now owe 10,000 francs assignats, accounting after the standard of specie, and 40,000 francs, reckoning upon the basis of wheat; he would thus be mulcted in three times his real debt. Calculation was therefore completely baffled as to the adoption of a standard of value. The deputy Raffron proposed to reduce the assignats one per cent. per diem, dating from the 30th of the month. An immediate outcry arose that this was a bankruptcy, as if it were not one to place assignats on a metallic or corn basis, or in other words, reduce them at one blow ninety per cent. Bourdon, who discoursed incessantly on finances without understanding them, caused a decree to be passed that no proposition tending to bankruptcy would be entertained by the legislature.

Moreover, the allocation of the assignat to a rate of exchange had an inconvenience of the gravest nature. If in all payments, whether for taxes or national domains, the assignat should be taken for the future only at the ratio to which it daily sunk, no limit could be assigned to its decline, for then there would be no countervailing agency. In the present state of matters, the assignat being still available for its nominal value in the discharge of taxes, rents, and all sums overdue, it fulfilled a service which gave a certain reality to its value; but if it were received henceforth universally only at the standard of the day, it must fall indefinitely and without measure. The assignat emitted to-day for 1000 francs might to-morrow be worth but 100 francs, one franc, or one centime: true, this depreciation would injure no one, either individuals or the state, for all would take it only for what it was worth; but its value, being forced in no direction, would forthwith decline to the lowest ebb. There was no positive reason why a nominal thousand millions should not dwindle to one substantial franc; and in such case the resource of paper-money, still indispensable to the government, would fail it altogether.

Dubois-Crancé, finding all these projects fraught with danger, opposed the reduction of assignats to a basis, and disregarding the sufferings of those who were impoverished by payments in paper, advocated simply the exaction of the land-tax in kind. The state would thus be enabled to ensure the supply of the armies and the large towns, and to dispense with an emission of from three to four thousand millions of paper, which it must disburse in order to satisfy inevitable demands. This scheme, which seemed plausible at the first blush, was discarded after more mature examination. Some other was to be sought for.

Meanwhile, the evil increased daily: disturbances occurred in all quarters on account of the scarcity of provisions and of wood for fuel; at the Palais-Royal bread was seen exposed to sale at twenty-two francs the pound; boatmen at one of the passages of the Seine had demanded 40,000 francs for a service formerly performed in consideration of 100. A species of despair seized on the minds of men; exclamations broke forth that the country must be extricated from this horrible condition—that measures must be found at all hazards. In this cruel perplexity, Bourdon [de-l'Oise], ignorant as a financier, who treated all these questions in a very declamatory style, discovered, assuredly by accident, the only feasible method of escaping from the embarrassment. To bring the assignats under the regulation of a standard was difficult, as we have shown, both on account of the dilemma touching the selection of specie or corn as the basis, and because it would immediately rob them of all value and expose them to an interminable depreciation. To enhance them by withdrawal was equally difficult, for the national domains must be sold, and the disposition of so prodigious a quantity of immoveable property was almost impossible.

Nevertheless, one mode of selling the domains was practicable, and that consisted in placing them within the reach of purchasers by exacting from them merely a value commensurate with the state of the public fortunes. The domains were at present sold by auction; whence it resulted that offers were based on the depreciation of the paper, and five or six times the price of 1790 was now to be given in assignats. This, it is true, was still only the half of the value the lands bore at that period, but it was too high for the present times, since the land, in reality, was not worth the half, not the fourth of what it had been worth in 1790. There is nothing absolute in value. In America, on vast continents, lands are worth little, because their mass is infinitely superior to the amount of capital. It was the same, so to speak, with France in 1795. The valuation of 1790 had become fictitious, and it was therefore requisite to forego it and adopt one suitable to the era of 1795, for the true value of a thing must depend upon the capability of buying it.

In consequence, Bourdon-de-l'Oise proposed to adjudge lands, without auctions and by mere minutes of agreement, to all who should offer in assignats three times the estimation of 1790—between two competitors, the preference to be accorded to him who had first made the application. Thus, a property valued at 100,000 francs in 1790 would now be bought for 300,000 in assignats. The assignats having fallen to a fifteenth of their value, 300,000 francs represented in reality only 20,000 sterling francs; therefore an estate was to be purchased for 20,000 francs which in 1790 was worth 100,000 francs. This by no means involved an absolute loss of four-fifths, because, in sooth, it was impossible to obtain more. Besides, had the sacrifice been real, still it ought to have been made, for immense advantages attended the scheme.

In the first place, it obviated the inconveniences of establishing a standard of value which would destroy the paper altogether. We have already explained, in fact, that the assignat, levelled to a current rate of exchange for all purposes, even for the payment of national domains, would be entirely deprived of any fixed value, and must sink into nullity. But by preserving to it the faculty of paying for domains, a fixed value was secured to it, for it represented a certain quantity of land; this land being at all times procurable, it would always retain such value as the land itself possessed, and utterly perish only with its substantial representative: consequently the plan averted the annihilation of the paper. But it had other good properties. It is certain, and what occurred two months afterwards proved it, that all the domains might have been forthwith disposed of, on condition of their being paid for at the rate of three times the valuation of 1790. All, or nearly all, the assignats might thus have been retired; those which remained in circulation would have recovered their value; the state might have ventured on a fresh emission, and rendered this resource again available. Doubtless, by requiring only thrice the estimation of 1790, it became obliged to give much more land in order to retire the floating mass of paper; but still sufficient would remain to it for the purpose of meeting extraordinary exigencies. Moreover, the taxes, at present almost unproductive since they were paid in worthless assignats, would be restored in value if the assignats were either absorbed or enhanced. The domains, surrendered to private enterprise and industry, would immediately become productive both to individuals and the state, and the most afflictive calamity would be obviated by the just relation of values being re-established.

The project of Bourdon-de-l'Oise was adopted, and preliminary steps taken for putting it into prompt execution. But the storm which had been long gathering, and whereof the 12th Germinal had been but the precursor, was becoming more portentous than ever; it had settled on the horizon, and was on the point of bursting. The two antagonist parties had continued to agitate in their respective spheres of action. The counter-revolutionists, predominating in certain sections, prepared petitions against the measures introduced by Chénier in his report, and particularly against the provision punishing with banishment the abuses of the press by the royalists. On their side, the patriots, reduced to extremity, meditated designs prompted by despair. The execution of Fouquier-Tinville, condemned with several jurymen of the revolutionary tribunal for the manner in which he had exercised his functions, had urged their exasperation to the highest pitch. Although detected in their scheme of the 29th Germinal, and more recently foiled in a second attempt to constitute all the sections permanent, under pretence of the famine, they conspired with unabated activity in different populous quarters. They had now so far matured their plans, as to form a central committee of insurrection, located between the quarters of Saint-Denis and Montmartre, in the Rue Mauconseil. It was composed of members of the old revolutionary committees, and of sundry individuals of similar character, almost all unknown beyond the precincts of their wards. The plan of insurrection was modelled on preceding outbreaks of the like nature: the women to be put in the van, followed by an immense concourse; the convention to be surrounded by such a multitude that no succours could reach it, and then compelled to discard the seventy-three, recall Billaud, Collot, and Barrère, liberate the deputies detained at Ham and all the incarcerated patriots, declare the constitution of 1793 in force, give a new commune to Paris, and revert to the revolutionary expedients of the maximum, requisitions, &c.—such was the plan of the patriots. They digested it into a manifesto, comprising eleven articles, and published "in the name of the sovereign people re-entered upon their rights." They caused it to be printed on the evening of the 30th Floreal (19th May), and circulated through Paris. The inhabitants of the capital were exhorted to repair, en masse, to the convention, bearing on their hats these words: "Bread and the Constitution of '93." The entire night of the 30th Floreal to the 1st Prairial, was passed in commotion, in clamour, in furious menaces. Women scoured the streets, vociferating that on the morrow the convention must be visited; that it had murdered Robespierre only to assume his place; that it starved the people, protected the dealers who sucked the blood of the poor, and consigned to death all the patriots. They encouraged each other to march in the van, because, they said, the armed force would not venture to fire on women.

In the morning,* in fact, at the break of day, the tumult was general in the Faubourgs Saint-Antoine and Saint-Marceau, in the quarter of the Temple, in the Streets Saint-Denis and Saint-Martin, and, above all, in the City. The patriots rang all the bells they could command, beat the tattoo, and discharged pieces of ordnance. At the same instant, the tocsin pealed from the tower of L'Unité, by direction of the committee of general safety, and the sections began to muster; but those which were involved in the plot, had formed at early dawn, and were already under arms, long before the others had received any intimation to hold themselves in readiness. The multitude, constantly swelling, advanced gradually towards the Tuileries. A gang of women, interspersed with drunken men, and yelling "Bread and the constitution of '93!" troops of bandits, armed with pikes, swords, and every variety of weapon, throngs of the lowest populace, and several battalions of the sections regularly armed, composed this heterogeneous assemblage, and marched without order towards the point assigned for all—the convention. About ten o'clock they had reached the Tuileries; they forthwith beleaguered the hall of the assembly, and blocked all the avenues.

The deputies, summoned in all haste, were at their post. The members of the Mountain, having held no communication with the obscure committee of insurrection, had not been apprised of the intended movement, and, like their colleagues, were warned of it only by the cries of the populace and the knell of the tocsin. They were even moved with distrust, fearing that the committee of general safety had laid a snare for the patriots, and incited them to tumult in order to gain an opportunity of treating them with additional severity. The assembly was no sooner constituted, than Isabeau rose to read the manifesto of insurrection. The galleries, early occupied by the patriots, immediately resounded with deafening acclamations. Seeing the convention thus environed, a member exclaimed, it would know how to die at its post. Instantly all the deputies sprang to their feet, and repeated emphatically, "Yes! yes!" A gallery, filled more favourably than the others, applauded this declaration. Meanwhile, the pervading din grew more distinct, the roar of the great popular wave reverberated in louder echoes: deputies appeared successively in the tribune, and offered divers suggestions. Suddenly, a swarm of women was seen pouring into the galleries; they rushed precipitately forward, treading under foot those who occupied them, and vociferating, "Bread! bread!" The president Vernier covered, and commanded them to be silent; but they not the less continued to cry, "Bread! bread!" Some clenched their fists at the assembly, others mocked its distress. Numerous members arose to speak, but their efforts to obtain a hearing were ineffectual. They called upon the president to enforce the respect due to the convention; the president was powerless. André Dumont, who had presided with firmness on the 12th Germinal, succeeded Vernier, and seated himself on the bench. The disturbance continued, the shouts of "Bread! bread!" were reiterated by the women who had stormed the galleries. André Dumont declared he would order their removal: howls on one side, plaudits on the other, greeted the announcement. At this moment, violent blows were heard on the door to the left of the bench, and the noise of a multitude endeavouring to force it. The stanchions of the door creaked, and the plaster began to fall. In this perilous situation, the president addressed a general, who had presented himself at the bar with a company of young men, to deliver on the part of the section of Bon-Conseil a judicious petition, in these words: "General, I summon you to watch over the national representation; and I appoint you provisional commandant of the armed force." The assembly confirmed this nomination by its applause. The general affirmed he would die at his post, and departed for the scene of combat. Presently, the noise at one of the doors ceased, and a degree of calmness ensued. André Dumont, addressing himself to the galleries, enjoined all good citizens present in them to withdraw, and announced he was about to employ force in compelling their evacuation. Many citizens retired, but the women remained, still echoing the same shouts. In a few minutes, the general, charged by the president to watch over the convention, returned with an escort of fusiliers, and several young men who had provided themselves with postilions' whips. They scaled the galleries, and expelled the women, chasing them away with sonorous chastisement. The females fled, uttering lamentable cries, relieved by the acclamations of the major part of the spectators.

* 1st Prairial year 3 (Wednesday, 20th May).

Scarcely were the galleries cleared, ere the noise at the door on the left recurred. The crowd had returned to the charge; it was again assailing the door, which at length yielded to the pressure, started, and fell in fragments. The members of the convention retreated to the upper benches; the gendarmerie formed a barrier around to protect them. Divers armed citizens of the sections hastened into the hall, by the door on the right, to repulse the populace. They at first succeeded, and captured some women; but they were speedily obliged to recoil in their turn before the victorious horde. Fortunately the section of Grenelle, the first to fly to the succour of the convention, arrived at this critical moment, and furnished an important reinforcement. The deputy Auguis was at its head, sword in hand. "Forward!" he cried. The battalion closed, advanced, crossed bayonets, and repelled without wounding the multitude of assailants, who shrunk back as the glittering phalanx approached. One of the insurgents was grasped by the collar, dragged to the foot of the bench, rifled, and his pockets found full of bread. It was now two o'clock. Comparative tranquillity revived in the assembly: a resolution was passed that the section of Grenelle had deserved well of the country. All the foreign ambassadors had repaired to the gallery set apart for their use, and remained spectators of this scene, as if to partake in some sort the perils of the convention. It was decreed that especial mention of their courageous sympathy should be recorded in the votes.

Meanwhile the crowd gradually increased around the hall. Two or three sections only had been sufficiently alert to gain and penetrate the National Palace, and they were incapable of resisting the continually augmenting mass of assailants. Others had subsequently arrived, but strove in vain to reach the interior; they were debarred from communicating with the committees, they had no specific orders, and thus they halted in ignorance whether to make use of their arms. In a few moments the crowd made a fresh inroad through the Saloon of Liberty, and pushed onward to the prostrated door. The shouts "to arms!" were renewed; the armed force in the interior of the hall hurried to the threatened inlet. The president covered his head, and the assembly sat in calm solicitude. The two parties were speedily in collision; before the portal itself the struggle commenced: the defenders of the convention crossed their bayonets; the assailants on their side fired sundry shots; the bullets whistled through the hall and lodged in the walls. The deputies arose and cried with one accord, "The republic for ever!" Additional detachments poured in, traversed the hall from right to left, and reinforced those already sustaining the assault. The discharge of musketry was redoubled: the battalions charged and pierced the crowd amid the clash of sabres. But the vast mass behind the assailants urged them forward, drove them in their own despite upon the bayonets, overthrew all opposing obstacles, and swept like a torrent into the assembly. A deputy, named Féraud, recently arrived from the army of the Rhine, and who for the last fortnight had been scouring the environs of Paris to hasten the arrival of provisions, an ingenuous young man, glowing with courage and ardour, flew in front of the invading multitude, and conjured them to advance no farther. "Take my life," he exclaimed, laying bare his bosom; "you will enter only after passing over my body!" In fact, he extended himself on the ground, hoping to check them; but the infuriated mob derided his appeal, passed over his body, and pressed on towards the bench. Three o'clock had just struck. Intoxicated women, and men armed with swords, pikes, and muskets, bearing on their hats the words, "Bread and the constitution of '93," filled the hall; some occupied the lower seats abandoned by the deputies; others crowded the space below the bar; and others again planted themselves before the bench, or clustered on the steps leading to the chair of the president. A young officer of the sections, named Mally, stationed on the steps of the bench, tore from one of these men the motto on his hat. He was immediately fired upon, and he fell covered with wounds. At this moment, all the bayonets and pikes were directed upon the president; his head was enveloped in a forest of steel. The occupant of the chair was Boissy-d'Anglas, who had succeeded André Dumont; he remained immovable and calm. Féraud, who had raised himself from the floor, appeared at the foot of the tribune, tore his hair and smote his breast, with the aspect of a man in the deepest affliction; then, perceiving the danger of the president, he sprang forward to cover him with his body. One of the men with pikes endeavoured to restrain him by grasping his coat; an officer, with the view of disengaging Féraud, struck the man who detained him with his fist; the wretch retorted the blow with a pistol-bullet, which pierced Féraud in the shoulder. The unfortunate young man fell; he was borne along in the moving mass, trampled under foot, ultimately dragged out of the hall, and his corpse thrown to the populace.

Boissy-d'Anglas continued in the chair, amidst this frightful commotion, calm and imperturbable: the bayonets and the pikes still bristled as a halo around his head. Now commenced a scene of confusion no pen can adequately describe. Every one essayed to speak, and taxed his lungs in vain to make himself heard. The drums beat to restore silence; but the crowd, feeling delight in the chaos, roared the louder, kicked with their feet, clattering and hallooing with frantic joy at the spectacle of the condition to which the supreme council of the nation was reduced. It was not thus the 31st May had been accomplished, when the revolutionary party, having at its head the commune, the staff of the sections, and a considerable number of deputies, to receive and give the necessary injunctions, surrounded the convention with a silent and armed concourse, and, blockading without invading it, made it pass, with some semblance of dignity, the decrees required at the moment. In the present instance, all was clamour and tumult; no one could be heard, no means were ensured for even extorting an apparent concurrence in the desires of the patriots. An artilleryman, surrounded with fusileers, mounted the tribune to read the plan of insurrection. He was interrupted every instant by shouts, execrations, and the rolling of the drum. One man obtained a momentary lull, and began to address the multitude. "My friends," he said, "we are all here for the same cause. Danger presses, decrees are needed: allow your representatives to pass them." "Down! down!" they shouted to him for answer. The deputy Rhul, an old man of venerable aspect, and a zealous Mountaineer, endeavoured to utter a few words from his place, exhorting to silence; but he was stopped by a renewed storm of vociferations. Romme, a man of austere character, unconnected with the insurrection, as was all the Mountain, but desirous that the measures demanded by the people should be adopted, and perceiving with regret that this deplorable confusion would terminate in no result, like the movement of the 12th Germinal—he, Romme, earnestly begged to be heard. Duroi also urged a similar entreaty with an identical object: neither the one nor the other could obtain attention. The tumult recommenced, more terrible than ever, after these various essays, and continued thus for upwards of an hour longer. Whilst at its height, a head suddenly appeared, borne aloft on the point of a bayonet: it was beheld with a thrill of horror: the features could not be recognised. Some asserted it was the head of Fréron, others that of Féraud. It was Féraud's, too truly: the brigands had decapitated his corpse, and placed the head on the edge of a bayonet. They paraded it through the hall amid the howls of the multitude. The fury against Boissy-d'Anglas was revived; he was again exposed to imminent peril; his head was enclosed in a circuit of bayonets, muskets were levelled at him on all sides, death menaced him from a thousand arms.

Thus the time elapsed until seven in the evening. A new terror was suggested to the minds of the representatives: they feared that the mob, which included many determined miscreants, would proceed to the last extremities, and massacre the national representation under the obscurity of night. Several members of the centre besought certain Mountaineers to exhort the populace to disperse. Vernier endeavoured to inculcate upon the insurgents that it was already late, that they ought now to retire, that they would expose the people to the danger of wanting bread by disarranging the operations for obtaining supplies. "That is the manœuvre," rejoined the crowd; "you have told us that for the last three months." Thereupon sundry cries broke from the multitude: one voice demanded the liberty of the patriots and of the arrested deputies; another the constitution of '93; a third the arrest of all emigrants; numerous others the permanence of the sections, the re-establishment of the commune, the appointment of a commander of the Parisian armed force, domiciliary visits in quest of concealed provisions, the assignats at par, &c. &c. One man, who contrived to gain a hearing for a few moments, insisted that the convention should immediately nominate a commander of the Parisian armed force, and select Soubrany for the post. Another, at a loss what to demand, exclaimed, "The arrest of knaves and cowards!" and for the space of thirty minutes, he repeated at intervals, in sonorous accents, "The arrest of knaves and cowards!"

One of the ringleaders, sensible at length of the necessity of gaining decisions from the convention, proposed that the deputies should descend from the upper benches to which they had retreated, collect in the middle of the hall, and there enter on deliberation. The idea was forthwith acted upon; the people forced the deputies from their seats, compelled them to descend, and drove them, like a flock of sheep, into the space intervening between the tribune and the lowest benches. Men encompassed them with pikes, forming a ring or pen around them with those weapons. Vernier superseded in the presidency Boissy-d'Anglas, who was exhausted with the fatigues of so arduous and perilous a post as he had occupied for the last six hours. It was nearly nine o'clock. A species of deliberation was organised: it was arranged that the people should remain covered, and the deputies alone raise their hats in sign of approbation or disapproval. The Mountaineers began to entertain hopes that the desired decrees might really be passed, and they proceeded accordingly to submit motions. Romme, who had already rendered himself conspicuous, moved that the enlargement of the patriots be ordained by decree. Duroi stated that, since the 9th Thermidor, the enemies of the country had promoted a fatal reaction; that the deputies arrested on the 12th Germinal had been so illegally, and that their recall must be forthwith pronounced. The president was obliged to put these different propositions to the vote; hats were raised, and cries of "Adopted! adopted!" uttered, amidst tremendous uproar, without the possibility of distinguishing whether the deputies had actually affirmed or negatived. Goujon followed Romme and Duroi, and maintained that means must be taken to ensure the execution of the decrees. He said that the commitees had not appeared; that it was of importance to know what they were doing; that they ought to be called upon to render an account of their proceedings, and be replaced by an extraordinary commission. Herein lay the great peril of the day to the Mountaineers. If the commitees remained free to act, they might advance to deliver the convention from its oppressors. Albitte the elder suggested that sufficient order was not manifested in the form of deliberation; that the bureau was not constituted, and that one ought immediately to be formed. It was composed forthwith. Bourbotte moved the arrest of newspaper editors. An unknown voice arose, crying that, to prove the patriots were not cannibals, the penalty of death should be abolished. "Yes, yes!" responded on all sides; "except for emigrants and the forgers of assignats." This proposition was adopted in the same manner as the preceding. Duquesnoi reverted to the subject introduced by Goujon, and moved the suspension of the committees and the nomination of an extraordinary commission of four members. On the instant, Bourbotte, Prieur [de-la-Marne], Duroi, and Duquesnoi himself, were appointed. Those four deputies accepted the functions confided to them. However hazardous they might be, they would know, so they asseverated, how to fulfil them and to die at their post. They prepared to depart, with the intention of repairing to the committees and seizing upon all authority. Here was the difficulty; and the success of the insurrection depended altogether upon the result of that enterprise.

It was nine o'clock: neither the committee of insurrection nor the committees of government had appeared to act during this long and terrible day. All that the committee of insurrection had been able to do, was to propel the people on the convention: as we have previously mentioned, it was composed of obscure leaders, such as remain in the latter days of a party, having no commune, no staff of the sections, no commander of the armed force, no deputies, at their disposition, and consequently incompetent to direct the insurrection with the combination and vigour requisite to ensure it success. They had sent forward a horde of furious wretches, who had committed horrible excesses, but who had done nothing they ought to have done. No detachment had been sent to suspend and neutralise the committees, or to open the prisons and deliver the energetic men whose aid would have been so valuable. The arsenal alone had been seized, which the gendarmerie of the tribunal, comprising the militia organised by Fouquier-Tinville, delivered to the first applicants. On the contrary, the governing committees, surrounded and defended by the "gilded youth," had employed the interval in strenuous efforts to muster the sections. The task was arduous amid the tumult which reigned, the terror wherewith many of them were struck, and the hostile feeling even, displayed by some. The commitees had early succeeded in assembling two or three, whose assistance, as we have seen, had been rendered nugatory by the force of the assailants. At a later period they had contrived to collect a greater number, owing chiefly to the zeal of the section Lepelletier, formerly known as that of the Filles St-Thomas; and towards night they were prepared to seize the moment when the multitude, wearied with fatigue, would begin to dwindle, in order to fall upon the insurrectionists and deliver the convention. Foreseeing that, during its prolonged invasion, the convention would be coerced into decrees repugnant to its wishes, they had passed a resolution, branding as spurious all decrees which might be adopted on that day. Their arrangements thus completed, Legendre, Auguis, Chénier, Delecloi, Bergoeng, and Kervélégan, had proceeded, at the head of strong detachments, towards the convention. Arrived there, they had agreed to leave the doors open, in order that the populace, pressed on one side, might retreat by the other. Legendre and Delecloi had then undertaken to penetrate into the hall, ascend the tribune despite all dangers, and summon the insurgents to withdraw. "If they refuse," they said to their colleagues, "do you charge, and fear nothing for us. Though we must perish in the tumult, still advance."

Legendre and Delecloi, in fact, penetrated into the hall at the very moment the four deputies nominated to compose the extraordinary commission were on the point of departing. Legendre scaled the tribune, amidst insults and blows, and essayed to speak under a roar of howls. "I invite the assembly," he cried, "to remain firm, and the citizens who are present to retire." "Down! down!" shouted the mob. Legendre and Delecloi were compelled to withdraw. Duquesnoi then addressed his colleagues of the extraordinary commission, and urged them to follow him, so that they might at once suspend the committees, which it was obvious, he said, were in contravention to the resolutions of the assembly. Soubrany also engaged them to be prompt. Thereupon all four moved out of the hall; but they speedily encountered the detachment at the head of which marched the representatives Legendre, Kervélégan, and Auguis, and the commander of the national guard, Raffet. Prieur-de-la-Marne demanded of Raffet whether he had received from the president orders to enter. "I have nothing to do with you," replied Raffet, and he proceeded onwards. The multitude was again summoned to withdraw: the president repeated the invitation in the name of the law: it answered by yells. The detachments immediately lowered their bayonets and entered; the unarmed crowd yielded, but the men holding weapons stood and resisted; they were quickly repulsed, and fled, vociferating, "To us, Sans-culottes!" Part of the patriots returned at this cry, and charged with impetuosity the detachment which had penetrated. For a moment they had the advantage: the deputy Kervélégan was wounded in the hand; the Mountaineers, Bourbotte, Peyssard, and Gaston, exulted in shouts of victory. But the noise of the charge had resounded to the outer hall; a considerable reinforcement poured in, made a fresh onslaught upon the insurgents, drove them back, and pursued them at the point of the bayonet. They fled with precipitation, crowding through the doorways, clambering up the galleries, or leaping out of the windows. The hall of representatives was finally cleared, just on the stroke of midnight.

The convention, delivered from the assailants who had outraged by violence and death its hallowed precincts, took a few seconds to recover itself. Tranquillity gradually revived. "It is then too true," exclaimed a member, "that this assembly, the cradle of the republic, has once more narrowly escaped becoming its tomb! Fortunately, the criminal designs of the conspirators have again been foiled. But, representatives, you will not be worthy of the nation, unless you exact for it a signal vengeance." He was applauded from all sides; and, as on the 12th Germinal, the night was devoted to punishing the enormities of the day. But much graver delinquencies now demanded proportionably severer measures. The first care was to rescind the decrees proposed and passed by the insurgents. "Rescind is not the word," said a deputy to Legendre, who had submitted this motion. "The convention did not, could not vote, whilst ruffians were murdering one of its members. All that has been done is not the act of the convention, but of the brigands who oppressed it, and of some culpable representatives who rendered themselves their accomplices." The assembly accordingly declared all that had been done null and void. The secretaries burnt the minutes of the decrees carried by the rebels. All eyes were then turned in quest of the deputies who had taken part in the late tempestuous scene: they were eagerly pointed out, their names vehemently pronounced. "No longer," exclaimed Thibaudeau—"no longer any hope exists of reconciliation between us and a factious minority. Since the sword is drawn, we must combat it with the greater resolution, and profit by existing circumstances to restore peace and security in the heart of this assembly for ever. I move that you instantly decree the arrest of those deputies who, betraying all their duties, endeavoured to realise the views of the insurrection, and embodied them in laws. I move that the committees forthwith propound measures of severity against those mandatories, recreant at once to their country and their oaths." The contumacious deputies were thereupon designated, to wit, Rhul, Romme, and Duroi, who had enjoined silence in order to open the deliberation; Albitte, who had caused the constitution of a bureau; Goujon and Duquesnoi, who had urged the suspension of the committees and the formation of an extraordinary commission of four members; Bourbotte and Prieur-de-la-Marne, who had accepted, with Duroi and Duquesnoi, the appointment of members of that commission; Soubrany, whom the rebels had nominated for commander of the Parisian army; and, lastly, Peyssard, who had shouted "victory" during the action. Duroi and Goujon desired to speak: they were not permitted; they were execrated as assassins, and instantly decreed under arrest. A suggestion was offered, that means should be taken to prevent them escaping, as the majority of those who had been condemned on the 12th Germinal. The president directed the gendarmerie to surround them and convey them to the bar. Search was made for Romme, who shrunk from observation: Bourdon stretched out his hand, detecting him; he was dragged to the bar with his colleagues. The spirit of vengeance, thus aroused, demanded more ample gratification: all the Mountaineers who had signalised themselves on extraordinary missions in the departments, long obnoxious objects, now likewise fell under anathema. "I move," exclaimed a member, "the arrest of Lecarpentier, the executioner of La Manche." "Of Pinet the elder," cried another voice, "the executioner of the people of Biscay." "Of Borie," added a third, "the devastator of the South, and of Fayau, one of the exterminators of La Vendée." These propositions were adopted amid shouts of "The convention for ever! The republic for ever!" "We must have no more half measures," said Tallien. "The object of the movement to-day was the re-establishment of the Jacobins, and especially of the commune; we must destroy what yet remains of it—both Pache and Bouchotte must be arrested. This is only the prelude of the measures the committee will submit to you. Vengeance, citizens—vengeance against the assassins of their colleagues and of the national representation! Let us profit by the blunders of these men, who deem themselves the equals of those who prostrated the throne, and would fain emulate them—of those men who would make revolutions, and can only foment revolts. Let us profit by their incapacity; let us hasten to smite them, and thus put an end to the revolution." The assembly applauded, and at once adopted the proposition of Tallien. In this paroxysm of wrath, sundry voices denounced Robert Lindet, whom his virtues and his services had hitherto shielded from the fury of the reaction. Lehardi moved the arrest of "that monster;" but so many deprecatory voices were raised in praise of Lindet's suavity, in testimony that he had saved from famine entire cities and departments, that the order of the day was adopted on the motion. After these resolutions, the convention renewed its decree for the disarming of the terrorists; it ordained that, on the approaching quintidi (Sunday, 24th May), the sections should assemble, and proceed forthwith "to disarm the assassins—the drinkers of blood—the robbers and agents of the tyranny which preceded the 9th Thermidor;" it even authorised them to arrest those they considered ought to be arraigned before the revolutionary tribunal. It determined at the same time that, until further orders, women should be no longer admitted into the galleries. It was now three in the morning. The committees announcing that all was tranquil in Paris, the convention suspended its session until ten o'clock.

Such was the revolt of the 1st Prairial. On no day during the revolution had so terrible a spectacle been presented. If on the 31st May and 9th Thermidor, cannon were pointed on the convention, the place of its sessions, nevertheless, had not been invaded, rendered the arena of a sanguinary conflict, traversed by bullets, and stained by the murder of a representative of the people. The revolutionists, on this occasion, had exhibited the inefficiency and violence of a party long subdued, devoid of confederates in the government from which it had been excluded, deprived of its leaders, and directed by men at once obscure, compromised, and desperate. Without knowing how to avail themselves of the Mountain, without even apprising it of the movement, they had inculpated and exposed to the scaffold honest deputies, unsullied by the excesses of the subverted tyranny, attached to the patriots from alarm at the reaction, and who had taken part in the events of the day only to avert greater calamities, and to hasten the accomplishment of certain views they held in common with the insurgents.

Nevertheless, the malecontents, seeing the fate impending over them all, and habituated so inveterately as they were to revolutionary struggles, were not men to succumb all at once. They collected on the following day at the hall of the commune, proclaimed themselves in permanent insurrection, and laboured to muster around them the sections devoted to their cause. Feeling, however, that the commune was not a good post, although located between the quarter of the Temple and the City, they deemed it preferable to establish the nucleus of insurrection in the Faubourg Saint-Antoine. They proceeded thither accordingly in the middle of the day, and took measures for renewing the enterprise of the eve. They now endeavoured to act with a greater degree of order and prudence. They dispatched three battalions completely armed and organised, being those of the sections Quinze-Vingts, Montreuil, and Popincourt, all three composed of stalwart operatives, and directed by intrepid leaders. These battalions advanced alone, without the disorderly rabble which had yesterday accompanied them, encountered sections faithful to the convention, but not in sufficient force to check them, and finally, after mid-day, planted themselves with their artillery in front of the National Palace. At the same time, the sections Lepelletier, Butte-des-Moulins, and others, took up a position confronting them, to protect the convention. But should a regular engagement ensue, in the present state of affairs, it was extremely dubious that the victory would remain with the defenders of the national representation. To render the chance more precarious, the artillerymen, who in all the sections were operatives and ardent revolutionists, abandoned the sections drawn up before the palace, and proceeded with their pieces to join the artillerymen of Popincourt, Montreuil, and the Quinze-Vingts. The cry "To arms!" passed along the lines, muskets were loaded on both sides, and all seemed prepared for a sanguinary action. The dull rolling of the ordnance was heard echoing under the arches of the convention. Divers members sprang up to give utterance to their feelings. "Representatives," exclaimed Legendre, "be calm, and remain at your post. Nature has doomed us all to die: a little sooner or a little later is of small moment! Good citizens are ready to defend you. Meanwhile, the dignified course is to observe silence." The entire assembly immediately sat down, and displayed that imposing calmness which it had evinced on the 9th Thermidor, and on so many other occasions in the course of its stormy career. In the interim, the two opposing forces, already in battle array, had assumed the most menacing attitude. Before actually coming into collision, several individuals cried out that it was horrible for good citizens to slaughter one another; that at least some explanation, some effort at an understanding, should be attempted. Many stepped from the antagonist ranks and parleyed on alleged grievances. Certain members of the committees, who chanced to be present, glided into the battalions of the hostile sections, and addressed them in soothing language; when, finding that much might be gained by the ways of conciliation, they sent to request from the assembly a deputation of twelve members, for the purpose of fraternising with the relenting rebels. The convention, considering this step an act of unbecoming weakness, manifested repugnance to adopt it; but being assured that its committees deemed it advisable and calculated to prevent the effusion of blood, it acquiesced: the twelve members were delegated, and they presented themselves to the three sections. Speedily the ranks were broken on both sides, and the troops mingled indiscriminately. The man of uncultivated mind and inferior grade is always sensible to the amicable demonstrations of the person whom costume, language, and manners, place above him. The soldiers of the three malecontent battalions were affected; they declared that they had no wish either to shed the blood of their fellow-citizens, or to fail in the respect due to the National Convention. However, the ringleaders insisted upon their petition being heard. General Dubois, who commanded the cavalry of the sections, and the twelve representatives commissioned to fraternise, consented to introduce a deputation from the three battalions to the bar of the National Convention.

They accordingly introduced the deputation, and craved leave for the petitioners to speak. Some deputies protested against the permission; but it was eventually accorded. "We are instructed to ask from you the constitution of 1793 and the liberty of the patriots," commenced the orator of the delegates. At these words the occupants of the galleries manifested impatience, and uttered cries of "Down with the Jacobins!" The president imposed silence on the brawlers. The orator continued, and stated that the citizens assembled before the convention were ready to withdraw into the bosom of their families, but that they would rather die than abandon their post, if the remonstrances of the people were not heeded. The president replied with firmness to the petitioners, that the convention had just passed a decree on the subject of provisions, which he would read to them. This promise he proceeded to fulfil, and subsequently added that the convention would examine their propositions, and decide in its wisdom what was fitting in the case. He then invited them to the honours of the sitting.

During this interval, the three malecontent sections had remained intermingled with the others. They were told that their petitioners had been graciously received, that their demands would be considered, and that they must await the decision of the convention. It was now eleven o'clock; the three battalions saw themselves surrounded by a large majority of the inhabitants of Paris; the hour was moreover late, especially for working men, and they adopted the resolution of retiring into their faubourgs.

This second attempt, therefore, equally ended in the discomfiture of the patriots. They nevertheless continued congregated in the faubourgs, preserving their hostile attitude, and persevering in the demands they had so often urged. The convention, during the morning of the 3d, passed several decrees warranted by the exigency. With the view of infusing greater unity and vigour into the execution of its measures, it conferred the direction of the armed force on three representatives, Gilet, Aubry, and Delmas, and authorised them to employ the agency of arms in the maintenance of public tranquillity. It prescribed six months' imprisonment on whomsoever should beat the tattoo without orders, and the penalty of death on whomsoever should beat the general call to arms without the sanction of the representatives of the people. It ordained the formation of a military commission, to try and send to immediate execution all the prisoners taken from the rebels in the insurrection of the 1st Prairial. It converted into a decree of impeachment the decree of arrest pronounced against Duquesnoi, Duroi, Bourbotte, Prieur-de-la-Marne, Romme, Soubrany, Goujon, Albitte the elder, Peyssard, Lecarpentier of La Manche, Pinet the elder, Borie, and

The Right Hon.ble Charles James Fox

Engraved by J. Freeman

Arch.d Fullarton & Co.

Fayau. It adopted a similar proceeding with regar to the deputies arrested on the 12th and 16th Germinal, and enjoined its committees to present a report on the tribunal to be appointed for the trial o both classes of offenders.

The three representatives hastened to recall th troops distributed over the environs of Paris to protec the arrival of corn; they retained under arms the sections favourable to the convention, and called aroun them companies of the young men, who had neve quitted the committees during the whole insurrection. The military commission entered on its functions tha very day. The first individual it tried was the assassin of Féraud, who had been apprehended the previou evening; it condemned him to death, and ordered his execution the same afternoon. The convict was accordingly carried to the scaffold; but the patriots were cognisant of the intention: some of the most determined had gathered around the place of punishment; they rushed upon the scaffold, dispersed the gendarmerie, rescued the criminal, and conveyed him into the insurgent faubourg. During the night, they summoned to their aid all the patriots scattered through Paris, and prepared to intrench themselves in the Faubourg Saint-Antoine. They placed themselves under arms, pointed their cannon on the square of the Bastille, and thus awaited the consequences of their audacious outrage.

So soon as this event was communicated to the convention, it decreed that the Faubourg Saint-Antoine should be summoned to deliver up the convict, to surrender its arms and artillery, and, in case of refusal, be immediately bombarded. At this moment, in fact, the forces at its disposal permitted the convention to assume a more imperious tone. The three representatives had succeeded in assembling three or four thou sand troops of the line; they had besides upwards of twenty thousand men of the armed sections, whom the dread of witnessing the revival of the terror inspired with courage and zeal; and, finally, the devoted companies of the "gilded youth." They intrusted the command of these united forces to General Menou, and prepared to march on the faubourg. That sam day, 4th Prairial (23d May), whilst the representatives were advancing, the "gilded youth" had been moved by a spirit of bravado to repair alone to the Faubourg Saint-Antoine. This daring troop was composed of ten or twelve hundred individuals. The patriots allowed them to penetrate, without offering any resistance, and then enveloped them on all sides. The young men speedily perceived the redoubtable battalions of the faubourg in their rear; at the windows they descried a multitude of infuriated women, ready to shower upon their heads a storm of missiles; and they began to conclude their reckless enterprise must terminate in a disastrous catastrophe. Luckily for them, however, the armed force was approaching, and, moreover, the inhabitants of the faubourg had not an insatiable thirst for their blood; they permitted them to retreat from the quarter, after inflicting chastisement upon sundry of their number. At this moment General Menou appeared with 20,000 men; he caused all the avenues of the faubourg to be occupied, especially those which communicated with the patriot sections. He planted his artillery, and formally summoned the rioters. A deputation came forward and received his ultimatum, which contained a demand for the surrender of all arms and of Féraud's assassin. The manufacturers, together with all the more wealthy and peaceable citizens of the faubourg, alarmed at the threat of a bombardment, hastened to use their influence over the population, and prevailed upon the three sections to lay down their arms. Accordingly, the insurgent sections of Popincourt, Montreuil, and the Quinze-Vingts delivered up their artillery, and undertook to search for the convict, who had been removed. General Menou returned in triumph with the cannon of the faubourg; and from that instant the convention had nothing more to dread from the patriot party. Utterly prostrated, its only part in future annals is undergoing the exactions of vengeance.

The military commission forthwith commenced to try all the prisoners captured during the late events: it condemned to death gendarmes who had taken part with the rebels, and operatives, shopkeepers, and members of the revolutionary committees, seized in flagrante delicto on the 1st Prairial. In all the sections, the disarming of the patriots, and the apprehension of the most conspicuous malecontents, proceeded on the day appointed; and, as the interval was too short for such an operation to be completed within the prescribed hours, the sections were authorised to declare themselves permanent for that special occupation.

But it was not at Paris alone that the despair of the patriots urged them to excesses. In the South, equally deplorable occurrences signalised the spirit that actuated them. We have narrated their congregation at Toulon to the number of seven or eight thousand; their violence towards the representatives upon divers occasions, tearing from them prisoners accused of emigration; and their efforts to draw into the revolt the workmen of the arsenal, the garrison, and the crews of the ships of war. The fleet was ready to set sail, and they determined to prevent it. The crews of certain vessels arrived from Brest, and united to the Toulon squadron for the expedition in meditation, were altogether adverse to them; but they could rely on the seamen belonging to the port of Toulon. They pitched upon nearly the same period for their outbreak as the patriots of Paris. The representative Charbonnier, who had solicited leave of absence, was charged with secretly instigating them. They arose in insurrection on the 23d Floreal (14th May), marched on the commune of Soulies, seized upon fifteen emigrant prisoners, and carried them in triumph to Toulon; they consented, however, to surrender them to the representatives. But on the following days they again revolted, stirred up the workmen of the arsenal, appropriated the arms it contained, and surrounded the representative Brunel, to exact from him an order for the liberation of the patriots. The representative Nion, who was on board the fleet, hurried to the assistance of his colleague; but the sedition proved too formidable. The two deputies were compelled to sign the order of liberation. Brunel, overwhelmed with shame for having yielded, blew out his brains; Nion sought refuge in the squadron. Thereupon the insurgents resolved to march on Marseilles, in order, as they stated, to arouse the whole South. But the representatives on mission at Marseilles planted a company of artillery on the route, and took all possible precautions to prevent the execution of their projects. On the 1st of Prairial, they were masters of Toulon, but unable to extend their sway; they directed their endeavours to gain over the crews of the squadron, of whom a part resisted their blandishments, whilst the remainder, comprising Provençal seamen alone, betokened a spirit of mutiny and an intention to join them.

The narrative of these events was communicated to the convention on the 8th Prairial. It was well calculated to provoke a fresh ebullition against the patriots and Mountaineers. The insurrections at Toulon and Paris were at once deemed the result of concert; the Mountaineer deputies were proclaimed their secret organisers, and the wrath against them was lashed to fury. Instantly, decrees of arrest were passed against Charbonnier, Escudier, Ricord, and Salicetti, all four accused of agitation in the southern departments. The deputies incarcerated on the 1st Prairial, whose judges were not yet appointed, became the objects of ruthless malediction. Without regard to their quality of representatives, they were consigned to the military commission instituted to try the authors and accomplices of the insurrection of the 1st Prairial.

One only was excepted, the aged Rhul, whose moderation and virtues were attested by several deputies. The tribunal of the Eure-et-Loir was assigned for the trial of the ex-mayor Pache, his son-in-law Audouin, the ex-minister Bouchotte, and his adjuncts Daubigny and Hassenfratz, and the three principal agents of Robespierre's police, Heron, Marchand, and Clemence. The sentence of exile pronounced against Billaud, Collot, and Barrère, ought to have been definitive as a judgment passed: it was not so considered. In this hour of rigour, the punishment was deemed too light: it was decided they should be tried again, and arraigned before the tribunal of La Charente-Inferieure, to receive the doom of death destined for all the leaders of the revolution. Hitherto, the remaining members of the former committees had appeared forgiven; the brilliant services of Carnot, Robert Lindet, and Prieur [de-la-Côte-d'Or], had seemingly availed to protect them against their enemies: they were now denounced with extreme virulence by the Girondist Henri Larivière. Robert Lindet, although defended by numerous deputies who avouched his merit and services, was decreed under arrest. "Carnot organised victory," exclaimed sundry voices: even the most furious of the reactors shrunk from proposing a decree against the vanquisher of the coalition. Prieur-de-la-Cote-d'Or happily escaped further observation. But all the members of the old committee of general safety not yet arrested, were involved in the common fate. David, who owed a previous absolution to admiration of his genius, was arrested with Jagot, Elie-Lacoste, Lavicomterie, Dubarran, and Bernard of Saintes. The only exception made was in favour of Louis of the Lower Rhine, whose known humanity pleaded all-powerfully in his behalf. Lastly, the report previously ordered against those who had fulfilled missions, and who were stigmatised with the epithet of proconsuls, was demanded on the instant. Proceedings were immediately ordered against Artigoyte, Mallarmé, Javognes, Sergent, Monestier, Lejeune, Allard, Lacoste, and Baudot; and it was moreover resolved that the conduct of every member who had been intrusted with any mission whatsoever, should be investigated and minutely reviewed. Thus, not one of the leaders of that government which had saved France, was pardoned: members of committees, deputies on missions, underwent a common anathema. Carnot alone, whom the esteem of the armies rendered it expedient to respect, was spared from ignominy; but Lindet fell, a citizen equally useful and more generous, but whom the lustre of victories was wanting to shield from the base obduracy of the reactors

Assuredly, such sacrifices were more than needful to satisfy the manes of young Féraud; solemn honours rendered to his memory might have sufficed. In truth, the convention decreed a funereal sitting on his account. The hall was hung in black; all the representatives appeared in grand mourning costume. Soft and melancholy music opened the scene, and Louvet subsequently delivered an eulogium upon the young representative, so devoted, so courageous, so early taken from his country. A monument was voted to perpetuate his heroism. The occasion was seized to ordain a commemorative festival in honour of the Girondists. The homage was just and commendable; victims so illustrious, although they had endangered their country, merited sympathy and reverence; but flowers strewed upon their tombs would have been sufficient, blood was not required. And yet it was shed in floods; for what party, even that which assumes humanity as its device, is wise in anger? It seemed, indeed, as if the convention, not content with its several diminutions, had taken some stern resolution to augment them of its own action. The impeached deputies, originally conducted to the castle of La Taureau, in order to prevent any attempt in their favour, were remanded to Paris, and the process against them prepared with the greatest diligence. The old man Rhul, who had been alone excepted from the decree of impeachment, repudiated such clemency; believing liberty for ever lost, he struck a dagger into his heart. Affected by so many mournful scenes, Louvet, Legendre, and Freron, urged that the deputies consigned to the military commission should be arraigned before their constitutional judges; but Rovère, an old terrorist, now become a rabid royalist, and Bourdon-de-l'Oise, implacable as a man who had quaked with many a mortal dread, insisted upon the maintenance of the existing decree, and succeeded in enforcing its execution.

The deputies were led before the commission on the 29th Prairial (17th June.) Notwithstanding the most assiduous researches, no fact had been discovered demonstrating their secret connivance with the insurgents. Such a discovery, in fact, was rather difficult, as they had been profoundly ignorant of the intended movement; they were even unacquainted with each other, save that Bourbotte knew Goujon, having met him on a mission to the armies. It was merely proved that, during the predominance of the insurrection, they had endeavoured to invest some of the commands of the populace with a legal sanction. They were found guilty, nevertheless; for a military commission, to whose mercies a government commends important state criminals, would betray its trust were it to return them absolved, to shame and upbraid the prosecutor. Forestier alone was acquitted; he had been conjoined with the others, although he had not made a single motion during the famous sitting. Peyssard, who had simply uttered an exclamation during the conflict, was adjudged to banishment. Romme, Goujon, Duquesnoi, Duroi, Bourbotte, and Soubrany, were condemned to death. Romme was a simple and austere man; Goujon, young, handsome, and gifted with engaging qualities; Bourbotte, equally youthful with Goujon, combined a highly cultivated mind with a rare fortitude; Soubrany was an ex-noble, sincerely devoted to the cause of the revolution. At the moment their sentence was pronounced, they delivered to the registrar letters, signets, and portraits, intended for their families. They were then removed, to be placed in a secluded chamber, preparatory to their conveyance to the scaffold. They had vowed never to reach it. They only possessed a knife and a pair of scissors, which they had concealed in the lining of their raiment. On descending the staircase, Romme first pierced his body, and, fearful lest he should miscarry in his purpose, struck himself several times, on the heart, the throat, and the face. He transferred the knife to Goujon, who, with a steady hand, gave himself a mortal stab, and fell lifeless. From the grasp of Goujon, the liberating weapon passed successively to the hands of Duquesnoi, Duroi, Bourbotte, and Soubrany. Unfortunately, Duroi, Bourbotte, and Soubrany, failed to inflict mortal wounds on themselves; they were dragged weltering in blood to the scaffold. Soubrany, bathed in blood, retained, despite his anguish, the self-possession and haughty aspect for which he had been always remarkable. Duroi manifested deep regret at his attempt having proved abortive. "Enjoy," he exclaimed—"enjoy your triumph, gentlemen royalists!" Bourbotte preserved all the serenity of youthful manhood; he spoke with imperturbable tranquillity to the people. At the instant he was about to receive the fatal stroke, it was perceived the adze had not remounted; the instrument of death required adjustment: he employed the interval in delivering a few additional observations. He assured the spectators that none died more devoted to his country, more attached to its welfare and liberty. The number present at the execution was small: the period of political fanaticism had elapsed; slaughter no longer proceeded with that wild fury which steeled the hearts of men, and rendered them insensible to emotions of pity. A deep feeling of commiseration was aroused in the minds of all on learning the details of this afflictive scene, and the Thermidorians reaped a deserved measure of opprobrium. Thus, in this long succession of contrary ideas, victims were sacrificed to all; the ideas even of clemency, humanity, and reconciliation, had their hecatombs: so true it is that in revolutions none can remain pure from human blood.

The Mountaineer party was thus entirely destroyed. The patriots had just been suppressed at Toulon. After a sanguinary engagement on the highway to Marseilles, they had been compelled to lay down their arms, and surrender the city which they hoped to secure as a basis for insurrectionising France. They were consequently extinct as an obstacle to the predominant party; and, according to precedent, their fall involved the proscription of several revolutionary institutions. The celebrated tribunal, almost reduced, since the law of the 8th Nivose, to an ordinary court of justice, was definitively abolished. All prisoners were remitted to the criminal tribunals trying after the forms of process observed in 1791; conspirators alone were to be judged by the procedure established on the 9th Nivose, and without the privilege of appeal. The phrase "revolutionary," as applied to institutions and authorities, was discarded. The national guards were re-organised on the ancient footing; operatives, servants, indigent citizens, the people, in short, were excluded from its ranks; and the care of the public tranquillity again devolved on the class most interested in its maintenance. At Paris, the national guard, organised in battalions and brigades, and commanded in rotation by the chiefs of brigade, was placed under the supreme direction of the military committee. Furthermore, the concession so ardently desired by the Catholics, the restitution of the churches, was granted them; they possessed them under the burden of upholding those fabrics at their own cost. This measure, indeed, although the consequence of the reaction, was advocated by the most reflective minds. They deemed it calculated to calm the Catholics, who would never consider they had recovered religious freedom so long as they were debarred from celebrating the ceremonies of their faith in the accustomed edifices.

The financial discussions, interrupted by the events of Prairial, were resumed by the assembly on the restoration of tranquillity, as still involving the most urgent and painful claims on its attention. It revived the regulation that only one description of bread should be sold, in order to remove from the populace a pretext for invective against the luxury of the rich; it ordered estimates of the stocks of grain, with the view of assigning the superfluity of each department to the supply of the armies and large cities; and it rescinded the decree permitting a free traffic in gold and silver. Thus the exigency of circumstances constrained a recurrence to some of those revolutionary measures which had been most virulently reprobated. The spirit of gambling, meanwhile, had reached a fearful height. The race of butchers, bakers, and grocers, as separate callings, was extinct; every one bought and sold bread, meat, spices, oils, &c. The granaries and vaults were filled with articles of merchandise and consumption, on which speculation operated. On the Exchange, at the Palais-Royal, wheaten bread was sold at 25 and 30 francs the pound. Regraters swept the markets, and bought up the fruits and vegetables brought by the country people, in order to force up prices. They purchased in advance the growing crops and herds of cattle grazing, in anticipation of future profits. The convention prohibited these forestallers from appearing in the markets before a certain hour. It was obliged to decree that licensed butchers alone should be competent to purchase cattle, and that crops could not be sold before maturity. Thus extraordinary confusion was introduced into all the relations of life; individuals, altogether unconnected with the speculations of commerce, became alive to each variation of the assignat, in order to throw the loss on others, and obtain for themselves the utmost value of any article of food or merchandise.

We have seen that, repudiating the two schemes of reducing the assignat to its current value and of levying the taxes in kind, the convention had preferred a project for disposing of the national domains by private contract, at thrice the valuation of 1790. This was, as we have already explained, the only mode of selling them, since exposing them to auction always tended to enhance the prices in proportion to the depression of assignats, to such an extent, in fact, that the public could not possibly compete. So soon as the law was passed, the number of applications was prodigious. When it became generally known that a person had only to be the first applicant to obtain lands at thrice the valuation of 1790 in assignats, competitors poured in from all quarters. For certain properties several hundred offers were lodged; at Charenton, three hundred and sixty were made for a domain escheated by the Fathers of Mercy; for another, even five hundred were submitted. The district court-houses were crowded with aspirants. Simple clerks, men without fortune, but in whose hands assignats had momentarily accumulated, hastened to apply for national property. As they were only bound to pay one-sixth immediately, and the residue after the lapse of several months, they purchased with trifling sums considerable estates, with the intention of re-selling them at a profit to those who had been less alert. Owing to this eagerness, domains which the local authorities were not aware had become national property, were signalised as such. The plan conceived by Bourdon-de-l'Oise was consequently attended with complete success, and hopes might reasonably be indulged that, in a short time, a large proportion of the domains would be sold, and the assignats either retired or enhanced. It is true that on these sales the republic suffered losses, which, numerically calculated, were very considerable. The estimation of 1790, founded on the apparent rent, was frequently inaccurate; for the lands of the clergy, and those of the order of Malta, were let at extremely low money-rents; the farmers made up the deficiency in free-will offerings, which often amounted to three or four times the amount of the stipulated payment. A farm leased ostensibly at 1000 francs, produced in reality 4000: by the valuation of 1790, this farm was timated at 25,000 francs; it was now purchasable for 75,000 in assignats, which were actually worth only 7500 francs. At Honfleur, the salt magazines, which had cost 400,000 francs in erecting, were to be sold for 22,500 effective francs. Agreeably to this calculation, the loss was enormous; but it was necessary to submit to it, save that it might be rendered less, by demanding four or five times the valuation of 790, instead of three times only, as at present contemplated.

Rewbel and many other deputies failed to comprehend this necessity; they saw only the apparent loss. They asserted that the wealth of the republic was ilfully wasted, and that its resources would be dried up. The operation provoked remonstrances on all sides. Those who did not understand the question, and they were not few, and those who saw with reluctance the lands of the emigrants distributed, coalesced to obtain a suspension of the decree. Balland and Bourdon-de-l'Oise defended it with energy: they lacked sufficient insight to rely upon the essential reason, to wit, that more should not be demanded for the domains than purchasers could give; but they alleged with truth that the numerical loss was not so great as t actually appeared; that 75,000 francs in assignats were certainly worth only 7500 francs in specie, but that specie intrinsically possessed twice the value of former times, and that 7500 francs represented in fact 15,000 or 20,000 francs of 1790. They argued, moreover, that the actual loss was counterbalanced by the advantages of bringing to a speedy close the financial catastrophe, of retiring or enhancing the assignats, of erminating the speculations on commodities by directing the paper to land, of delivering to private industry the mass of national property, and, finally, of blasting the last hopes of the emigrants.

The decree was nevertheless suspended. The local authorities were ordered to continue to receive applications, in order that all the national property might be made known through the instigation of individual cupidity, and thus a more exact account thereof be framed. A few days afterwards, the decree was abrogated altogether, and a return to the system of sales by auction commanded.

Thus, after obtaining a glimpse of the means whereby the crisis might be averted, the convention retraced its steps, and fell back into the direful distress whence it had the opportunity of emerging. However, since it refused to follow out measures calculated to enhance the assignats, it could not persist in upholding the monstrous fallacy of the nominal value, which was ruining the republic and all individuals paid in paper. It was compelled to revert to the proposition previously submitted for reducing the assignats. It had rejected the plan of levelling them to the standard of specie, because the English, it was alleged, having a superfluity of the precious metals, would be masters of the course of exchange; it had declined to reduce them to the standard of corn, because the price of grain had advanced considerably; it had refused to adopt time as a scale, and to reduce the paper monthly at a certain rate, because that was equivalent to demonetisation or striking it from the circulation and declaring a bankruptcy. All these reasons were frivolous, for, whether specie, corn, or time, were taken to determine the reduction of the paper, it would be equally demonetised, or, in other words, branded as a circulating medium. Bankruptcy did not consist in reducing the value of the assignat as between individuals, for such reduction had in fact taken place, and to recognise it would have merely the effect of preventing cruel robberies; bankruptcy was more real by re-establishing the sale of national property by the way of auction. What the republic had promised, in reality, was not that the assignats should bear such or such a value as between individuals (which did not depend upon it), but that they should command such an amount of property; now, by establishing the system of auctions, the assignats no longer commanded that quantity of property; they became equally useless with regard to the domains as with reference to commodities; they underwent a similar depreciation from the effect of competition.

Another measure than that of specie, corn, or time, for regulating the reduction of assignats, was therefore to be found: the quantity in circulation was taken as the basis. It is undeniable in principle that the augmentation of the circulating medium tends to augment proportionally the price of all objects. Thus, if an article had been worth one franc, when there were two thousand millions of a currency in circulation, it must be worth two francs when there are four thousand millions of that currency, three when there are six, four when there are eight, five when there are ten. Supposing that the actual circulation of assignats amounted to ten thousand millions, it was now necessary to pay five times more for any commodity than when there were only two thousand millions. A scale of proportion was established, commencing at the period when there were but two thousand millions in circulation, and it was decreed that, in every payment made in assignats, a fourth should be added to the principal for every five hundred millions added to the circulation. Thus, a sum of two thousand francs, due when there were two thousand millions in circulation, would be liquidated, when there were two thousand five hundred millions, by two thousand five hundred francs; when there were three thousand millions, by three thousand francs; and at present, when there were ten thousand millions, the liquidation could be effected only by ten thousand francs.

Those who regarded demonetisation* as a bankruptcy, could have had their apprehensions but little calmed by such a measure as this, for it merely substituted one mode of driving the assignat out of circulation for another; instead of demonetising in the proportion of specie, corn, or time, it demonetised in that of issues, which amounted to the same thing, with one inconvenience the more. By the new scale, every emission would lower to a certain and prescribed amount the value of the assignat; consequently, by issuing five hundred millions, the state would rob the holder of assignats of a fourth, a fifth, a sixth, &c., of what he possessed.

At the same time, this scale, which had its inconveniences in common with the other proposed reductions to the standard of specie or corn, ought at least to have been made applicable to all transactions; but this the convention did not venture to attempt—it was rendered applicable at first only to taxes and arrears of taxes. Promises were made to apply it to the public functionaries when their number should have been reduced, and to the fundholders of the state when the receipts of the taxes, gathered according to the new scale, should permit them to be paid on the same basis. In like manner, the advantage of this improved mode of accounting was not extended to private creditors, the owners of houses in town or country, the proprietors of kilns, &c. The only favoured class was that of landowners. As the farmers were making enormous profits by their produce, and paying, through the convenient agency of assignats, only the tenth or twelfth fraction of their covenanted rents, they were constrained henceforth to liquidate them agreeably to the new scale. They were to render an amount of assignats proportioned to the quantity emitted since the date of their contracts of lease.

Such were the measures by which it was sought to lessen the evils of over-speculation and stockjobbing, and to terminate the grievous calamity of a disordered state of the exchanges. They consisted, as we see, in prohibiting speculators from forestalling consumers in the purchase of the necessaries of life, and in regulating payments in assignats upon a scale graduated by the quantity of paper in circulation.

The close of the Jacobin Club in Brumaire had commenced the ruin of the patriots, the event of the 12th Germinal had accelerated it, and that of the 1st Prairial had consummated it. The great mass of citizens who had opposed them, not from a tendency to royalism but from the dread of a new reign of terror, were at the present moment furiously incensed, and persecuted them with merciless rigour. All the men who had zealously assisted the revolution were immured or disarmed. Acts equally arbitrary were committed towards them as any that had been enforced against the former "suspected." The prisons were filled as before the 9th Thermidor, but their inmates were revolutionists. The number of the detained was not, as previous to that era, nearly one hundred thousand, but certainly twenty or twenty-

* [Demonetisation is a term, we believe, not to be found in the glossary of British political economists, and for the very fortunate reason that the idea it represents has never been suggested in this country. Although pains have been taken to explain the word, by paraphrasing it in the text, it may not be quite obvious to all readers. To elucidate it more fully, we will take the instance of a bank of issue stopping payment; on the occurrence of such a catastrophe, its notes necessarily become no longer current, and, in fact, become demonetised, that is, struck out of the circulating medium of the country. France is perhaps the only country in the world wherein it was ever seriously contemplated to declare of no value a currency which the government had issued on its plighted faith, to the extent of nearly five hundred millions sterling. The distress to individuals consequent upon such a measure can be scarcely imagined, so great and universal must it have been. The bare proposition of so flagrant a violation of national honour shows into what a wretched condition the revolution had thrown France in this particular.]

five thousand. The royalists were in exuberant spirits. The disarming or imprisonment of the patriots, the execution of the Mountaineer deputies, the proceedings commenced against sundry others, the suppression of the revolutionary tribunal, the restoration of the churches to the services of religion, the recomposition of the national guards—were so many measures inflating them with joy and hope. They flattered themselves with the idea that they should speedily provoke the revolution to destroy itself, and witness the republic immuring or guillotining all the men who had founded it. To hasten that consummation, they intrigued in the sections, inflamed them against the revolutionists, and urged them to direful excesses. A multitude of emigrants re-entered France, either with false passports or under pretext of soliciting their erasure from the list of the proscribed. The local administrations, remodelled since the 9th Thermidor, and filled with men of weak character or secretly hostile to the republic, lent themselves to all the official falsehoods craved from them; any act tending to mitigate the hardships of those who were called the victims of terror seemed to them defensible; and they thus furnished too many enemies of their country with the means of revisiting it to rend and convulse it. At Lyons and in all the southern departments, the royalist agents continued to gather stealthily. The companies of Jesus and the Sun had committed fresh massacres. Ten thousand muskets, destined for the army of the Alps, had been fruitlessly distributed to the national guard of Lyons; it had made no use of the arms, but looked calmly on whilst a number of patriots were slaughtered (25th Prairial). The Saône and the Rhone had once more floated with corpses. At Nismes, Avignon, and Marseilles, similar massacres had been perpetrated. In the last-named city, men had proceeded to the Fort Saint-Jean, and renewed the horrors of September against the prisoners confined therein.

The dominant party in the convention, composed of Thermidorians and Girondists, albeit intent on crushing the revolutionists, yet observed the royalists with uneasiness, and felt the necessity of curbing them. It immediately caused a decree to be passed, ordaining that the city of Lyons should be disarmed by a detachment from the army of the Alps, and that the authorities which had permitted the massacre of the patriots should be superseded. At the same time, the civil committees of the sections were enjoined to revise the lists of detention, and to direct the enlargement of those who were immured upon insufficient grounds. Thereupon the sections, stimulated by the royalist intriguers, expressed great indignation; they presented menacing petitions to the convention, and complained that the committee of general safety liberated terrorists and restored them their arms. The sections of Lepelletier and the Theatre-Français (Odéon), always the most ardent against the revolutionists, insolently demanded whether it were intended to reinvigorate the prostrated faction, and whether it were not merely to stifle the recollection of terrorism, that royalism was spoken of in France.

To these petitions, often most irreverently couched, the interested fomenters of disorder added such rumours as were best adapted for keeping the public mind in agitation. Toulon had been delivered into the hands of the English; the Prince of Condé and the Austrians were on the point of entering France by Franche-Compté, whilst the English were to penetrate by the West; Pichegru was dead; provisions would shortly fail altogether, since it had been determined to replace them on a basis of free trade; all the committees had suddenly assembled, alarmed at the public dangers, to deliberate in concert on the expediency of re-establishing the system of terror. The journals devoted to the cause of royalism originated and aggravated all such and many other sinister reports; and, amidst this general agitation, it might be truly said that the reign of anarchy had come. The Thermidorians and the counter-revolutionists deceived themselves when they stigmatised as anarchy the order of things preceding the 9th Thermidor: that system had been a fearful dictatorship; but anarchy had veritably commenced, since two factions, nearly equal in strength, arose to wage an inveterate warfare, without the government being sufficiently powerful to restrain them.

CHAPTER XLIII.

SITUATION OF THE ARMIES IN THE YEAR 3.—FIRST INDICATIONS OF PICHEGRU'S TREASON.—INTRIGUES OF THE ROYALISTS IN LA VENDEE AND BRITTANY.—RENEWAL OF HOSTILITIES IN THOSE COUNTRIES.—EXPEDITION OF QUIBERON.—PEACE WITH SPAIN.—PASSAGE OF THE RHINE BY THE FRENCH ARMIES.

THE situation of the armies had undergone little change, and, although half of the favourable season was elapsed, no important event had occurred. Moreau had received the command of the army of the North, encamped in Holland; Jourdan that of the Sambre-and-Meuse, stationed on the Rhine towards Cologne; and Pichegru that of the army of the Rhine, cantoned from Mayence to Strasburg. The troops were in a state of destitution, daily augmented by the relaxation of all the springs of government and by the ruin of the paper-money. Jourdan was devoid of a bridge-equipage for passing the Rhine, and of horses to draw his artillery and baggage-waggons. Kléber, before Mayence, possessed not the fourth of the materiel necessary for besieging that fortress. The soldiers deserted in numbers to the interior. The greater part deemed they had done enough for the republic in bearing its victorious banners to the banks of the Rhine. The government was incapable of forwarding supplies, and equally so to occupy or rekindle their ardour by grand operations. It dared not remand by force those who abandoned their colours. It was notorious that the young men of the first requisition, who had returned into the interior, were neither sought after nor punished; at Paris even, they enjoyed the favour of the committees, for whom they often formed a volunteer militia. Thus the number of desertions was considerable; the armies had lost the fourth of their effective force, and that feeling of a general laxity was every where predominant, which so powerfully tends to detach the soldier from the service, to render the officers discontented, and to place their fidelity in peril. The deputy Aubry, to whom, in the committee of public welfare, the constitution of the army was confided, had wrought a complete reaction against all the patriot officers in favour of those who had not served in the two great campaigns of 1793 and 1794.

If the Austrians had been less dispirited, now was the moment for them to avenge their reverses; but they slowly concentrated beyond the Rhine, and ventured no demonstration to impede the only two operations attempted by the French armies—the siege of Luxumbourg and that of Mayence. Those two fortresses were the sole points still retained by the coalition on the left bank of the Rhine. The fall of Luxumbourg would complete the conquest of the Low Countries, and render it definitive; that of Mayence would deprive the Imperialists of a tête-de-pont, which always allowed them to clear the Rhine in security. Luxumbourg, blockaded during the whole winter and spring, surrendered from famine on the 6th Messidor (24th June). Mayence could be captured by a siege alone, but the materiel was deficient; it was necessary to invest the place on both banks, and, for that purpose, either Jourdan or Pichegru must pass the Rhine, an operation difficult in the presence of the Austrians, and impossible in the absence of bridge equipages for the transit. Thus the French armies, although victorious, were arrested by the Rhine, which they were unable to cross for lack of means, and drooped, in common with the whole administrative action, under the paralysing influence of the existing government.

On the frontier of the Alps, the situation of the French was still less satisfactory. On the Rhine, they had at all events gained the important acquisition of Luxumbourg, whereas on the Italian frontier they had recoiled. Kellermann commanded the two armies of the Alps; they were in the same state of destitution as the others; and, in addition to the effects of desertion, they had been weakened by draughts of divers detachments. The government had conceived the absurd idea of attempting a sudden attack on Rome. Actuated by a desire to avenge the assassination of Basseville, it had embarked 10,000 men on board the Toulon squadron, completely refitted by the exertions of the old committee of public welfare; these it determined to send to the mouth of the Tiber, there to be landed for the purpose of levying a contribution on the papal city, and after that exploit to be reshipped with all convenient promptitude. Fortunately, a naval engagement sustained against Lord Hotham, from which both parties had retired equally crippled, prevented the execution of the scheme. The division which had been drawn from the army of Italy was restored; but, at the same time, it became necessary to detach a corps on Toulon, in order to crush the terrorists, and another on Lyons, in order to disarm the national guard, which had allowed the massacre of the patriots. In this manner, the two armies of the Alps found themselves weakened by the loss of part of their strength in presence of the Piedmontese and Austrians, reinforced by ten thousand men arrived from the Tyrol. General Devins, seizing the moment when Kellermann had dispatched one of his divisions to Toulon, had attacked his right towards Genoa. Kellermann, unable to resist his superior force, had been obliged to fall back. Still occupying with his centre the Col di Tende, on the Alps, he had ceased to extend his right as far as Genoa, and had taken up a position behind the line of Borghetto. Fears were entertained that the communication would be interrupted with Genoa, whose trade in grain must be exposed to many obstacles, should the Riviera di Ponente be occupied by the enemy.

In Spain, nothing decisive had been performed. The French army of the Eastern Pyrenees still occupied Catalonia to the banks of the Fluvia. Fruitless actions had been fought on the banks of that river, and it had been unable to establish itself beyond the barrier. In the Western Pyrenees, Moncey was engaged in organising his army, suffering from disease, with the intention of returning to Guipuscoa and advancing into Navarre.

Although the French armies had not lost ground, except in Italy, and had even subjugated one of the strongest fortresses in Europe, they were, as we perceive, defectively supplied, feebly conducted, and benumbed by the effects of the general anarchy prevailing in every branch of the administration.

This, then, was a favourable moment, not for vanquishing them, for the peril of an attack would have revived their energy, but for practising on their fidelity and attempting projects of counter-revolution. We left the royalists and foreign cabinets contemplating various enterprises on the insurgent provinces—Puisaye and England concerting a plan of descent in Brittany, the agents at Paris and Spain projecting an expedition into La Vendée. The emigrants were at the same time speculating on an incursion into France by another point. They designed to attack her on the east, whilst the expeditions adventured by Spain and England were operating on the west. The Prince of Condé had his head-quarters on the Rhine, where he commanded a corps of 2500 infantry and 1500 cavalry. All the emigrants dispersed over the continent were to be strictly enjoined to unite with him, under pain of being no longer suffered by the powers to remain in their territories; his corps would be thus augmented by the hitherto useless emigrants; and, leaving the Austrians occupied on the Rhine in checking the republican armies, it might endeavour to penetrate by Franche-Comté, and march on Paris, whilst the Count d'Artois, with the insurgents of the west, was approaching that capital on the other side. Should the emigrants not succeed, they had the hope at least of obtaining a capitulation similar to that of the Vendéans: they had the same reasons for demanding it. "We are Frenchmen," those who took part in the expedition might urge, "who have had recourse to civil war—but in France, and without including foreigners in our ranks." According to the partisans of this project, it was in truth the only mode whereby the emigrants could ever return to France, combining the alternative chances of a counter-revolution or of an amnesty.

The English government, which had taken the corps under Condé into its pay, and which ardently desired a diversion towards the east whilst it was operating on the west, was urgent that the Prince of Condé should hazard an enterprise, no matter of what kind. It promised him, through the medium of its ambassador in Switzerland, Wickham, ample subsidies and all necessary means for forming new regiments. The gallant prince had no higher ambition than to have an expedition intrusted to him; he was altogether incapable of directing an affair of importance, or a battle, but he was ready to rush into the jaws of danger when prompted by astuter heads.

At this time the idea was suggested to him that Pichegru, who commanded the army of the Rhine, might be open to seduction, from considerations of the following nature. The terrible committee of public welfare no longer overawed the generals, or kept over them a watchful eye and a suspended arm; the republic, paying its officers in assignats, gave them scarcely wherewithal to satisfy their most pressing wants; the disorders now convulsing it put its existence in peril, and must alarm the ambitious men, rendering them fearful of losing by its fall the eminent positions they had gained. It was known that Pichegru was addicted to the pleasures of wine and women; that the 4000 francs he received per month in assignats, being scarcely worth 200 francs on the frontiers, must be inadequate to gratify his desires; and that he had expressed disgust at serving under a government so unstable and tottering. It was remembered, also, that in Germinal he had taken arms against the patriots on the Champs-Elysées. All these circumstances tended to inspire hopes that Pichegru might probably be accessible to tempting offers. Accordingly, the prince addressed himself to M. de Montgaillard for the execution of the project, and he again to a bookseller of Neufchâtel, M. Fauche-Borel, who, the denizen of a prudent and flourishing republic, consented to become the obscure servitor of a dynasty under which he had not been born. This M. Fauche-Borel repaired to Altkirch, where the head-quarters of Pichegru were then fixed. After following him to several reviews, he succeeded in attracting his attention by perseveringly hovering on his steps: at length, he ventured to accost him in a corridor: he spoke to him at first of a manuscript he wished to dedicate to him, and Pichegru, having in some sort provoked a confidential disclosure, he concluded by explaining his purpose. Pichegru demanded from him a letter signed by the Prince of Condé himself, that he might know with whom he was really treating. Fauche-Borel returned to Montgaillard, and the latter to the prince. An entire night was consumed in inducing the prince to write a letter of eight lines. Now he was averse to styling Pichegru a general, apprehensive of thereby acknowledging the republic; now he refused to impress his arms on the envelope. Eventually, the letter being written, Fauche-Borel returned to Pichegru, who, recognising the holograph of the prince, immediately entered on the negotiation. He was offered for himself the dignity of marshal, the government of Alsace, a million in specie, the castle and park of Chambord in fee, with twelve pieces of cannon taken from the Austrians, and a pension of 200,000 francs, with reversion to his wife and children. He was offered, with regard to his army, the confirmation of all commissions, pensions for the commandants of fortresses who should surrender them, and exemption from taxes, during fifteen years, for the towns which should open their gates. But it was required that Pichegru should hoist the white flag, deliver the fortress of Huningen to the Prince of Condé, and march with him on Paris. Pichegru was too cunning to accept such propositions. He would not deliver Huningen and raise the white standard in his army; that would commit and compromise him too effectually. He demanded that he should be allowed to pass the Rhine with a chosen corps; there he promised to unfurl the white banner, unite with the Prince of Condé, and subsequently march on Paris. It is not clear how his design could be thereby promoted; for it was as difficult to seduce the army beyond as on this side the Rhine; but he avoided the danger of surrendering a fortress, of being surprised in the criminal act, and of having no excuse to allege for his treason. Besides, after gaining the other bank of the Rhine, he would still have it in his power to repudiate the treason, if he failed to settle terms with the Prince of Condé and the Austrians; or, if he were discovered too soon, he might profit by the passage of the river to execute the operations commanded him by his government, and then profess he had listened to the propositions of the enemy only to make them instrumental to his discomfiture. In each case he reserved the faculty of betraying either the republic or the prince with whom he was treating. Fauche-Borel returned to his employers; but he was again sent back to insist on the same proposals. He thus went to and fro several times, without being able to terminate the difference, which always consisted in the positive determination of the prince to obtain Huningen, and that of Pichegru the passage of the Rhine. Neither was disposed to recede, to give up in advance so considerable an advantage. The motive which chiefly weighed with the prince in refusing consent to Pichegru's preliminary demand, was founded on the necessity of an application to the Austrians for authority to grant the passage of the river: he desired to act without their concurrence, and to monopolise the honour of the counter-revolution. It would appear, however, he was obliged to refer the matter to the Aulic Council; and in the interim, Pichegru, vigilantly watched by the representatives, found it necessary to suspend his correspondence and postpone his treason.

Whilst these things were passing on the frontiers, the agents in the interior, Lemaitre, Brottier, Despomelles, Laville-Heurnois, Duverne-Despresle, and others, continued their intrigues. The young prince, son of Louis XVI., had died of a tumour on the knee, the result of a scrofulous affection. The royalist agents affirmed he had been poisoned; and made diligent inquiries after works treating on the ceremonial of coronations to send to Verona. The regent had become king in their eyes, under the title of Louis XVIII. The Count d'Artois had in like manner become Monsieur.

In the insurgent districts of La Vendée and Brittany the pacification had only been apparent. The inhabitants, who began to enjoy repose and security, were, it is true, disposed to remain at peace; but the chiefs and the warlike men who surrounded them, only awaited an occasion for resuming their arms. Charette, having under his orders those rural guards into which all those had entered whose tastes were of a decidedly military character, was engaged, under pretext of executing the police of the country, in forming the nucleus of an army preparatory to a recommencement of hostilities. He seldom quitted his camp at Belleville, and received there numerous royalist emissaries. The agents at Paris had forwarded to him a letter from Verona, being a reply to that epistle he had formerly written to excuse the pacification. The pretender relieved him from all anxiety on that point, assured him of his continued confidence and favour, confirmed his nomination as lieutenant-general, and announced to him the approaching succours of Spain. The agents at Paris, improving on the expressions of the prince, flattered the ambition of Charette with a most alluring perspective: they promised him the command of all the royalist districts, and the aid of a considerable expedition intended to be dispatched from the ports of Spain, bearing the French princes and ample supplies. As to the expedition preparing in England, they appeared to put no faith in it. The English, they said, had always promised and always deceived; at the same time, it might be expedient to make use of their assistance, if the opportunity offered, but for a very different object from that which they proposed to themselves: the succours destined for Brittany must be landed in La Vendée, and that country subjugated to Charette, who alone enjoyed the confidence of the present king. Such ideas were well calculated to gratify at once the ambition of Charette, his animosity against Stofflet, his jealous spleen at the importance recently acquired by Puisaye, and his resentment against England, which he denounced for having never afforded him countenance or aid.

With regard to Stofflet, he had less inclination than Charette to resume arms, although he had manifested much greater repugnance to lay them down. His district of country was more sensible of the benefits of peace than the others, and exhibited an unequivocal distaste for a renewal of hostilities. He himself was deeply mortified at the preference shown for Charette. He had equally merited that distinction of lieutenant-general conferred on his rival, and he was thoroughly disgusted at the injustice of which he deemed himself the victim.

Brittany, organised as heretofore, was completely ripe for an outbreak. The leaders of the Chouans had secured, like the Vendéan chiefs, the organisation of their best soldiers into regular companies, under the pretence of constituting a rural police. Each of the chiefs had formed a company of chasseurs, wearing a uniform of green coat and pantaloons, and red vest, and composed of the most intrepid amongst the Chouans. Cormatin, continuing his old career, had assumed an amazing importance. He had established at La Prévalaye what he denominated his head-quarters; he publicly dispatched orders, dated from that locality, to all the Chouan chiefs; he travelled through the various districts for the purpose of inspecting the companies of chasseurs; he affected to punish infractions of the treaty when any had been committed, and acted in all respects as if he were the veritable governor of Brittany. He often rode into Rennes decked in his Chouan uniform, which had become the prevailing fashion: there he received in polite circles the flattering homage of the inhabitants and the blandishments of the women, who thought they beheld in him a personage of supreme importance, and the grand leader of the royalist party.

Secretly, he fomented the hostile spirit rife amongst the Chouans, and maintained a correspondence with the royalist agents. His position with regard to Puisaye was embarrassing; he had disobeyed him and belied his confidence, insomuch that his only resource thenceforth was to throw himself into the arms of the agents at Paris, who had given him hopes of receiving the command of Brittany, and confided to him the secret of their negotiations with Spain. That power promised 1,500,000 francs per month, on condition that England should not be allowed to participate. Nothing could be more agreeable to Cormatin than a plan based on a rupture with England and Puisaye. Two other officers, whom Puisaye had sent from London into Brittany, Messieurs de la Vieuville and Dandigné, had likewise fallen into the system of the Paris agents, being persuaded that England designed to repeat the deception practised at Toulon, make use of the royalists in order to secure a port, and incite Frenchmen to combat against Frenchmen, but to afford no real succour capable of consolidating the power of the royalist party and ensuring its triumph. Whilst these ideas prevailed amongst one portion of the Breton chiefs, those of Morbihan, Le Finistère, and the Côtes-du-Nord, long connected with Puisaye, accustomed to serve under him, organised by his efforts, and strangers to the intrigues of Paris, remained attached to their old leader, stigmatised Cormatin as a traitor, and wrote to London that they were ready to fly to arms. They made diligent preparations, purchased munitions and bales of cloth for fashioning into black collars, their distinctive peculiarity, decoyed the republican soldiers, and induced them to desert. Their success in these practices was owing to the advantage they possessed of having provisions in abundance, they being masters of the country, while the republican soldiers, insufficiently fed and unable to eke out their scanty rations with valueless assignats, were compelled to forsake their colours in order to subsist. Moreover, the government had been imprudent enough to leave numerous Bretons in the regiments serving against the royalist districts, and it was only natural they should pass into the ranks of their compatriots.

Hoche, whose vigilance was ever on the alert, observed with attention the state of the country. He saw the patriots persecuted under colour of the law for disarming them, the royalists full of presumptuous confidence, the agricultural produce kept back by the farmers, the highways insecure, the public vehicles obliged to start with convoys for protection, the Chouans congregating in secret assemblies, and frequent communications interchanged with the Channel Islands: moved by these portents, he had written to the committee and the representatives that the pacification was an infamous deception, that the republic had been beguiled, and that every thing announced a speedy resumption of arms. He had employed the interval in forming moveable columns, and distributing them throughout the country, with the view of maintaining tranquillity, and of falling upon the first insurgent band that might be mustered. But the number of his troops was insufficient for the extent of the country and the immense line of coast. Every moment the apprehension of a movement in some part of the province, or the reported appearance of the English fleet on the coasts, demanded the presence of his columns, and they were worn out by constant marching. In so arduous and harassing a service, a resignation, infinitely more meritorious than the courage of braving death, was essential both on his part and on that of his army. Unfortunately, the soldiers indemnified themselves for their fatigues and hardships by excesses: such conduct deeply afflicted the young general, and his anxieties were redoubled by the twofold solicitude of curbing his own troops and watching the enemy.

He had shortly an opportunity of detecting Cormatin in flagrant delinquency. Dispatches from him to divers Chouan chiefs were intercepted, and positive proof of his secret machinations was obtained. Apprised that he intended to visit Rennes on a fair-day with a number of disguised Chouans, and fearing he contemplated an attempt on the arsenal, Hoche caused him to be arrested on the evening of the 6th Prairial, and thus put an end to his career. The various chiefs immediately exclaimed against the act, and complained that the treaty was violated. Hoche published in reply the letters of Cormatin, and sent him with his accomplices to the prison of Cherbourg; at the same time, he held all his columns in readiness to overwhelm the first rebels who should show themselves. The Chevalier Desilz having arisen in Morbihan, was promptly attacked by General Josnet, who destroyed three hundred of his men, and completely routed him, the chief himself falling in the action. In the Côtes-du-Nord, Bois-Hardi likewise started into insurrection: his corps was dispersed, and himself taken and killed. The soldiers, furious at the bad faith of that young chief, who was the most formidable in the country, cut off his head and elevated it on the point of a bayonet. Hoche, indignant at this breach of military generosity, wrote a noble letter to his soldiers, and ordered the culprits to be sought out and punished. This speedy destruction of two chiefs who had attempted to renew the rebellion, overawed the others; they remained quiet, awaiting with impatience the arrival of that expedition so long announced. Their motto was—"The King, England, and Bonchamp!"

At this moment active preparations were proceeding at London. Puisaye had come to a perfect understanding with the British ministers. They declined to grant him all they had originally promised, because the pacification diminished their confidence in the project; but they gave him the emigrant regiments and considerable warlike stores to effect the disembarkation, and they promised him all the resources of the monarchy if the expedition had a successful commencement. The obvious interest of England was a pledge of the sincerity of these promises; for, driven from the continent since the conquest of Holland, she regained a field of warfare, carried that field of warfare into the very heart of France, and composed her armies of Frenchmen. The means placed at the disposal of Puisaye may be thus sketched. The emigrant regiments on the continent had, since the last campaign, passed into the service of England; those forming the corps under Condé were, as we have mentioned, to act on the Rhine; the others, which were mere wrecks, were to be shipped at the mouth of the Elbe and transported into Brittany. Besides these old regiments, which bore the black cockade and were disgusted with the fruitless and murderous service in which they had been hitherto employed by the coalition, England had consented to form nine new regiments to be in her pay, but which were to mount the white cockade, in order that their object might appear more peculiarly French. The difficulty consisted in recruiting them; for, if in the early moments of fervour the emigrants had agreed to serve as common soldiers, they refused to do so now. It was proposed to take French deserters and prisoners collected on the continent. Deserters were not to be found, for the conqueror but rarely deserts to the vanquished; prisoners, therefore, were the only resource. The Count d'Hervilly having discovered certain Toulon refugees at London, who had been enrolled in a regiment, incorporated them into his own, and thus succeeded in swelling it to eleven or twelve hundred men, that is to say, to more than two-thirds of its complement. The Count d'Hector composed another of sailors who had emigrated, and thus mustered a regiment of six hundred men. The Count du Dresnay found in the prisons several Bretons, enrolled against their will in the first requisition, and made prisoners during the war: of these he collected four or five hundred. But these constituted all the Frenchmen that could be gathered to serve in the regiments distinguished by the white cockade. Thus, of the nine contemplated, only three were formed, whereof one had two-thirds, and the other two but one-third of their respective complements. Lieutenant-colonel Rothalier, however, who commanded four hundred Toulon artillerymen, was still at London. Of these a regiment of artillery was composed, to which were joined sundry French engineers, embodied as a separate engineer corps. As to the host of emigrants who refused to serve except in their former grades, and were unable to obtain soldiers for the formation of regiments, it was resolved to constitute them as skeleton-regiments, to be filled up in Brittany with insurgents. There, men being abundant, and experienced officers rare, they would find no difficulty in resuming their appropriate functions. They were sent to Jersey in order to be organised and ready to follow the descent. Whilst thus engaged in marshalling troops, Puisaye at the same time sought to provide himself with funds. England had originally undertaken to furnish him with a sufficient quantity of specie; but he desired to procure assignats. Accordingly, he obtained authority from the princes to fabricate three thousand millions of forged assignats; for this employment he designed the idle ecclesiastics who could not wield the sword. The Bishop of Lyons, viewing this measure in a different light from the princes and Puisaye, prohibited the clergy from lending their aid in its execution. Puisaye then applied to other more pliable instruments, and succeeded in forging the quantity he purposed to carry with him. He likewise desired to be accompanied by a bishop, who might perform the part of a papal legate to the Catholic districts. He remembered that an intriguer, the pretended Bishop of Agra, had gained an extraordinary influence over the minds of the peasants by assuming that usurped title in the first Vendéan war. He consequently took with him the Bishop of Dol, who held a commission from Rome. In fine, he procured from the Count d'Artois the necessary powers to command the expedition, and nominate to commissions, pending his own arrival. The English ministry, too, on its part, confided to him the direction of the expedition; but, distrusting his temerity and his extreme anxiety to land, it stipulated that the Count d'Hervilly should command the emigrant regiments until the descent were consummated.

All the dispositions being made, a squadron took on board the regiment of D'Hervilly, the two regiments of D'Hector and Du Dresnay, all wearing the white cockade, the four hundred Toulon artillerymen commanded by Rothalier, and an emigrant regiment of old embodiment, that of La Châtre, known under the name of the Loyal-Emigrant, and reduced by the war on the continent to four hundred men. This gallant remnant was to be reserved for decisive actions. In the squadron were likewise shipped provisions for an army of 6000 men during three months, 100 saddle and draught horses, 17,000 complete infantry uniforms, 4000 cavalry uniforms, 27,000 muskets, ten field-pieces, and 600 barrels of powder. Puisaye was presented with ten thousand louis in gold and letters of credit on England, to add to his false assignats financial resources of a more assured character. The squadron intrusted with this expedition comprised three ships of the line of 74 guns, two frigates of 44, four brigs of 30 to 36, and several gunboats and transports. It was commanded by Commodore Warren, one of the most distinguished and intrepid officers in the English navy. It constituted the first division. Immediately subsequent to its departure, it was agreed that another naval division should proceed to take up at Jersey the emigrant officers there organising; that, after so doing, it should cruise for some time before Saint Malo, where Puisaye had opened communications, and which certain traitors had promised to deliver into his hands; and that after this cruise, if Saint Malo were not surrendered, it should follow Puisaye, and convey to him the emigrant officers. At the same time, transport ships were to be detached to the mouth of the Elbe, to receive the emigrant regiments wearing the black cockade, and transport them to Puisaye. It was expected that these different detachments would arrive almost simultaneously with himself. If all he had stated were realised—if the disembarkment were effected without difficulty—if the natives of Brittany flocked to his standard—if he succeeded in taking up a solid position on the coasts of France, whether it were Saint-Malo, L'Orient, Port-Louis, or any other port that he contrived to seize—then a fresh expedition, bearing an English army, additional supplies of military stores, and the Count d'Artois in person, would immediately put to sea. Lord Moira had in fact been commissioned to visit the continent in quest of that prince.

These arrangements were liable to only two objections, but those of a serious character. The expedition was divided into several detachments, and the French prince, above all, was not placed at the head of the first.

The expedition set sail towards the end of Prairial (middle of June). Puisaye carried with him the Bishop of Dol, a numerous body of clergy, and forty noblemen, all bearing an illustrious name, and serving as simple volunteers. The point of disembarkment was a mystery for all except Puisaye and Commodore Warren, and Messieurs de Tinténiac and d'Allegre, whom Puisaye had dispatched to announce his arrival.

After long and anxious deliberation, the southern coast of Brittany had been preferred, and the Bay of Quiberon finally pitched upon, as an admirable and secure station, and one well known to the English, from their having long used it as an anchoring ground. Whilst the expedition was under sail, Sir Sidney Smith and Lord Cornwallis made threatening demonstrations along the whole extent of the coast, in order to deceive the republican armies as to the true point of disembarkation; and Lord Bridport, with the squadron stationed off the Isle of Ushant, protected the convoy. The French Atlantic fleet had not yet recovered the effects of the disastrous cruise during the previous winter, in the course of which the Brest squadron had been dreadfully shattered by tempestuous weather. However, Villaret-Joyeuse was ordered to depart with nine ships of the line anchored off Brest, to relieve a division blockaded at Belle-Isle. He weighed anchor accordingly, and, after relieving the division and giving chase to sundry English vessels, he returned towards Brest, when he encountered a sudden squall of wind which dispersed his fleet. Much time was lost in uniting it again, and in the interval he fell in with the expedition destined for the coasts of France. He was superior in force, and might have completely destroyed it; but Commodore Warren, descrying the danger, crowded all sail, and placed his convoy in the distance, so as to present the appearance of a second line: at the same time he detached two corvettes in quest of the powerful squadron under Lord Bridport. Villaret, deeming he could not give battle with advantage, resumed his course for Brest, according to the instructions he had received. But Lord Bridport hove in sight at this moment, and immediately attacked the republican fleet. It was the 5th Messidor (23d June). Villaret, wishing to form parallel with the Alexandre, which was a bad sailer, wasted irreparable time in fruitless manœuvres. His line was thrown into confusion: he lost three vessels, the Alexandre, the Formidable, and the Tiger, and, being unable to regain Brest, was obliged to run for L'Orient.

The expedition having thus signalised its outset by a naval victory, continued to steer for the Bay of Quiberon. A division of the squadron diverged to summon the garrison of Belle-Isle in the name of the King of France, but it received from General Boucret an energetic reply, backed by a volley of cannon-balls. The convoy came to anchor in the Bay of Quiberon, on the 7th Messidor (25th June). Puisaye was aware, from the information he had gathered, that there were but few troops on the coast; he proposed, in his ardour, to make an immediate descent on shore. The Count d'Hervilly, who was a brave officer, well calculated to discipline a regiment, but incapable of skilfully directing an operation, and above all, vastly punctilious with regard to authority and duty, stated that he commanded the troops, that he was answerable for their safety to the English government, and that he would not hazard them on a strange and hostile coast until time had been taken to reconnoitre. He consumed an entire day in surveying the coast with a telescope; and, though he had not descried a single soldier, he still refused to allow the troops to land. Puisaye and Commodore Warren insisting on the descent, D'Hervilly ultimately acceded; and, on the 9th Messidor (27th June), those heedless and imprudent Frenchmen alighted, full of joyful anticipation, on that soil to which they were bringing the horrors of civil war, and on which they were appointed to meet so mournful a fate.

The bay in which they had cast anchor is formed on one side by the shore of Brittany, and on the other by a promontory nearly a league broad and two leagues in length; it is the well-known peninsula of Quiberon. It adjoins the mainland by a narrow tongue of sand, a league in length, and called La Falaise. The fort of Penthièvre, erected between the peninsula and La Falaise, defends the approach on the land side. In this fort was a garrison of seven hundred men. The bay, formed by this promontory and the coast, offers to vessels one of the safest and best sheltered roads on the continent.

The expedition disembarked in the bottom of the bay at the village of Carnac. At the instant of its arrival, several chiefs, Dubois-Berthelot, D'Allegre, George Cadoudal, and Mercier, forewarned by Tinténiac, hastened with their troops, dispersed the detachments guarding the coast, drove them into the interior, and repaired to the shore. They brought four or five thousand men inured to war, but ill-clad, badly armed, advancing without order, and resembling a gang of plunderers rather than an array of soldiers. With these Chouans had mingled the peasants of the neighbourhood, crying, "The king for ever!" and carrying eggs, fowls, provisions of all kinds, to the liberating army, come to restore to them their prince and their religion. Puisaye, overjoyed at this demonstration, already concluded that all Brittany was ready to rise in insurrection. The emigrants who accompanied him experienced different impressions. Having lived in courts or served in the best appointed armies of Europe, they viewed with disgust and apprehension the soldiers to be placed under their command. Sarcasms and murmurs already began to circulate. The chests of muskets and uniforms were exposed; the Chouans fell impetuously thereupon; some sergeants of D'Hervilly's regiment attempted to establish order; a scuffle ensued, and, but for the intervention of Puisaye, fatal consequences might have resulted. These first circumstances were little calculated to promote confidence between the insurgents and the regular troops, who, coming from England and belonging to that power, were regarded with a certain degree of suspicion by the Chouans. However, the bands which arrived were all armed, and in the course of two days their number amounted to ten thousand men. They were invested with red coats and muskets, and Puisaye then prepared to assign them leaders. There was a deficiency of officers, for the forty volunteer noblemen who had followed him were insufficient; the skeleton regiments were not yet at his disposal, for, according to the plan agreed upon, they were still cruising before Saint Malo; he therefore proposed to draught officers from the regiments in which they abounded, distribute them amongst the Chouans, march rapidly on Vannes and Rennes, allow the republicans no time to concentrate, stir up the whole country, and advance to take a position behind the important line of Mayenne. Once there, master of forty leagues of country, with the entire population in action, Puisaye deemed it would be then the time to organise the irregular troops. D'Hervilly, gallant but fastidious, methodical, and holding these uncouth Chouans in contempt, refused his officers. Instead of giving them to the Chouans, he wished to pick out from amongst the latter men to complete the regiments, and then advance, reconnoitring cautiously and selecting safe positions. This but ill accorded with Puisaye's views. He attempted to enforce his authority; D'Hervilly denied it, stating that the command of the regular troops belonged to him, that he was responsible for their safety to the English government, and that he must take care not to compromise them. Puisaye represented to him that he held that command only during the voyage, but that, landed on the soil of Brittany, he, Puisaye, was the supreme chief and director of the operations. He forthwith dispatched a corvette to London, to obtain an explanation of the powers confided to him; and, in the interim, he conjured D'Hervilly not to foil the enterprise by baneful divisions. D'Hervilly was a man unquestionably of loyal intentions, but not at all adapted for civil war, and he had moreover an invincible repugnance towards the tatterdemalion insurgents. All the other emigrants, besides, thought with him they were not parties to Chouannise; that Puisaye would endanger them by advancing into Brittany; that it was in La Vendée they ought to have landed, where they would have met the illustrious Charette, and doubtless very different soldiers.

Several days were lost in contentions of this nature. The Chouans were finally distributed into three corps, and sent to take up advanced positions so as to occupy the roads leading from L'Orient to Hennebon and Aurai. Tinténiac, with a corps of 2500 Chouans, was stationed on the left at Landevant; Dubois-Berthelot, with a nearly equal force, on the right towards Aurai. The Count de Vauban, one of the forty volunteer noblemen who had accompanied Puisaye, and one of those whom reputation and merit placed in the first rank, was ordered to occupy a central position at Mendon with four thousand Chouans, so as to be able to succour either Tinténiac or Dubois-Berthelot. He had the command of the whole line, defended by nine or ten thousand men, and projected four or five leagues into the interior. The Chouans, thus planted in the van, immediately demanded why troops of the line were not associated with them; they relied much more on those troops than on themselves; they had come to rally around them, to follow and support them, but expecting at the same time that they would be the first to advance, in order to sustain the formidable shock of the republicans. Such were their murmurings. Vauban solicited at least four hundred men, both to resist, in case of need, a first attack, and to encourage the Chouans, afford them an example, and prove to them they were not intended to be exposed alone. D'Hervilly at first refused the application, then took time for consideration, and eventually sent the required detachment.

The expedition had been disembarked five days, and had advanced only three or four leagues into the land. Puisaye was wroth and discontented; but he suppressed his chagrin, hoping to overcome the delays and obstacles his companions in arms opposed to his designs. Deeming that, under any circumstances, it would be advisable to secure a basis of operations, he proposed to D'Hervilly the seizure of the peninsula by surprising the fort of Penthièvre. Once masters of that fortress, which closed the peninsula towards the land, and supported on both sides by the English squadrons, they would hold an unassailable position, and the peninsula itself, a league in width and two leagues in length, would become a possession as sure as the ports of Saint-Malo, Brest, or L'Orient, and more commodious. The English would have ample facilities for landing there all the succours they had promised in men and stores. This measure of security was of a nature to please D'Hervilly: he yielded his consent, but recommended a regular siege of the fort of Penthièvre. Puisaye paid no attention to his advice, and projected an attack by way of assault: Commodore Warren, animated with the utmost zeal, undertook to support it by all the fire of his squadron. They commenced to cannonade it on the 1st July (13th Messidor), and the decisive attack was fixed for the 3d July. Whilst making his preparations, Puisaye dispatched envoys through all Brittany, in order to arouse Scépeaux, Charette, Stofflet, and other chiefs of the insurgent provinces.

Tidings of the disembarkation had spread with singular rapidity; the intelligence traversed Brittany in two days, all France in a few more. The royalists full of joy, the revolutionists of wrath, deemed the emigrants already at Paris. The convention instantly delegated two extraordinary commissioners to Hoche, selecting for the mission Blad and Tallien. The presence of the latter on the threatened point was intended to prove that the Thermidorians were equally opposed to royalism as to terror. Hoche, calm and energetic, forthwith wrote to the committee of public welfare to allay its fears. "Composure," so he expressed himself, "activity, the provisions we need so much, and the twelve thousand men you have promised me so long: such are our wants." He issued the requisite orders to his chief of the staff; he directed General Chabot to plant himself between Brest and L'Orient, with a corps of 4000 men, in order to fly to the aid of either of those ports if menaced. "Watch especially over Brest," he said to him; "in extremity, shut yourself in the place, and defend it to the death." He wrote to Aubert-Dubayet, who commanded the coasts of Cherbourg, to detach troops to the north of Brittany, for the purpose of guarding Saint-Malo and the coast. To secure the south, he begged Canclaux, who was still watching Charette and Stofflet, to send him General Lemoine with an auxiliary force through Nantes and Vannes. He subsequently caused all his troops to concentrate on Rennes, Ploermel, and Vannes, disposing them on those three points with the view of guarding his rear. Finally, he advanced in person on Aurai with all the strength he could muster at the moment. On the 14th Messidor (2d July) he appeared at Aurai with from three to four thousand men.

Brittany was thus entirely encompassed. Now were to be dissipated the illusions which the first war of La Vendée had generated. Because in 1793, the peasants of La Vendée, encountering in combat mere national guards, composed of citizens who were ignorant how to handle a gun, had been able to occupy all Poitou and Anjou, and afterwards organise in their marshes and ravines a focus of rebellion difficult to destroy, it was imagined that Brittany would rise at the first signal from England. But the Bretons were far from having the ardour of the first Vendéans; certain brigands merely, under the appellation of Chouans, were resolutely bent on war, or, to speak more correctly, on pillage; and moreover, a young captain, whose activity equalled his genius, commanding experienced troops, curbed the entire population with a firm and dexterous hand. The only hope of kindling the embers of revolt in Brittany, under such circumstances, rested on the promptitude and rapidity wherewith the expedition, come to rally it under the royal standard, advanced into the country; but, as we see, it loitered, under the gloomy auspices of discord, on the strand it had been first cast upon.

Nor was this all. Part of the Chouans who were under the influence of the royalist agents at Paris, desired, before joining Puisaye, the presence of a prince in his camp. The objections of those agents and of all those who participated in their intrigues were, that the expedition was insufficient and fallacious, and that England had appeared in Brittany only to repeat the occurrence of Toulon. They no longer alleged that she purposed to bestow the crown on the Count d'Artois, because he was not there, but on the Duke of York; they wrote, urging their adherents not to aid the expedition, which, they stated, must be compelled to re-embark and make the descent in concert with Charette. That chief was perfectly favourable to this view of matters. He evaded the requests of Puisaye's agents by asserting that he had sent M. de Scépeaux to Paris, in order to claim the execution of one of the articles contained in his treaty, and that he must therefore await the return of that officer to avoid exposing him to the chance of arrest by prematurely resuming arms. Stofflet, who was better inclined towards Puisaye, answered, that if the rank of lieutenant-general were assured to him, he would instantly march and cause a diversion on the rear of the republicans.

Thus all things conspired against Puisaye—counter-views entertained by the royalists of the interior, jealousies harboured by the Vendéan chiefs, and an able adversary, disposing of forces perfectly organised, and sufficiently numerous to keep in check whatever royalist zeal might lurk amongst the Bretons.

Meanwhile, the 15th Messidor (3d July), the day assigned by Puisaye for attacking the fort of Penthièvre, arrived. The soldiers who defended it had been devoid of bread for three days. Threatened with an assault, bombarded by the fire of the ships, and commanded pusillanimously, they sounded a parley, and surrendered the fortress to Puisaye. At that precise moment, Hoche, established at Aurai, executed an attack upon all the advanced posts of the Chouans, for the purpose of restoring the communications from Aurai to Hennebon and L'Orient. He had ordered the attack to be simultaneous on Landevant and on the post towards Aurai. The Chouans under Tinténiac, vigorously assailed by the republicans, were unable to stand before those disciplined troops. Vauban, who was placed intermediately at Mendon, hastened with a part of his reserve to the aid of Tinténiac, but he found the corps of that leader dispersed, and the band he himself led melted away at the sight; he was compelled to fly with precipitation and swim across two small inlets of the sea, in order to rejoin the residue of his Chouans at Mendon. On his right, Dubois-Berthelot had been repulsed; whereby the republicans were enabled to advance on both his flanks, and expose him to the risk of being enclosed within their two divisions. It was at this critical instant that the four hundred troops of the line he had required would have been of essential service in sustaining his Chouans and rallying them to the combat; but D'Hervilly had remanded them for the attack on the fort. However, he inspired his soldiers with an impulse of courage, and induced them to profit by the occasion, in order to fall on the rear of the republicans, whom the ardour of pursuit had carried far into the van. He accordingly recoiled towards his left, and charged upon a village which the republicans had just entered in the heat of their chase after the Chouans. They were unprepared for this rough and sudden onslaught, and were compelled to fall back. Vauban subsequently returned towards his position of Mendon; but he found it deserted; all had taken to flight around him: and he also was obliged to retire, but with order, and after an act of hardihood which had checked the impetuosity of the enemy.

The Chouans were indignant at having been exposed alone to the attack of the republicans, and they inveighed most bitterly against the withdrawal of the four hundred men of the line. Puisaye upbraided D'Hervilly with the abstraction; the latter retorted that he had recalled them for the assault on the fort. Such reciprocal complaints were calculated rather to widen than to heal the breach, and on both sides great irritation prevailed. However, the fort of Penthièvre had been taken. Puisaye caused all the military stores sent by the English to be landed on the promontory; he likewise fixed his head-quarters there, removed most of the troops into it, and resolved to establish himself solidly on that advantageous station. He gave orders to the engineers to perfect the defences of the fort, and to throw up advanced works. On its turrets was planted the white banner, in conjunction with the English standard, as the symbol of alliance between the kings of France and England. It was agreed that the garrison should be composed by draughting a detachment from each regiment in proportion to its force. D'Hervilly, who was very solicitous to complete his own regiment, especially with good troops, proposed to the republicans who had been taken prisoners to pass into his service, and to form a third battalion in his regiment. Largesses, the provisions so long withheld from them, the reluctance to remain as prisoners, and the hope of being soon enabled to return to Hoche, decided their acquiescence in the proposal; and they were consequently enrolled in the corps commanded by D'Hervilly.

Puisaye, whose design to march into the interior was still inflexible as ever, and who had only paused to take the peninsula with the view of assuring himself a position on the coast, now addressed D'Hervilly in a more peremptory tone, laying before him the strongest reasons to induce his compliance with his views, and threatening to demand his dismissal if he persisted in controverting them. D'Hervilly appeared for a moment to accede to his projects. The Chouans, as Puisaye represented, required, in order to elicit their bravery, the support and example of regular soldiers; hence it was necessary to distribute in their van and on their rear troops of the line, thus place them in the midst, and, with twelve or thirteen thousand men, comprising nearly three thousand of the line, push over the forces under Hoche, who had at the moment but five or six thousand men at the utmost. D'Hervilly consented to this plan. Meanwhile, Vauban, who found his position extremely hazardous, having lost that he had originally occupied, demanded orders and succours. D'Hervilly sent him an order, couched in most pedantic terms, wherein he enjoined him to fall back on Carnac, and prescribed to him a series of manœuvres such as the best-trained troops of Europe only could have executed.

On the 5th July (17th Messidor), Puisaye issued from the peninsula to hold a review of the Chouans, and D'Hervilly likewise came forth with his regiment, to prepare for the execution of the project, agreed upon the previous day, to march into the interior. Puisaye encountered nothing but dejection, despondency, and discontent, amongst the men who, a few days earlier, had manifested such enthusiasm. They said it was evident they were to be exposed alone, and sacrificed to the republican troops of the line. Puisaye appeased them as well as he could, and endeavoured to cheer their spirits and re-animate their courage. D'Hervilly, on his part, beholding those unfortunate men, accoutred in red coats, wearing their ill-adjusted uniforms and carrying their bayonets in so ungainly a fashion, exclaimed that nothing could be made of such wretched troops, and wheeled round with his regiment. Puisaye met him as he drew off, and asked him whether it was thus he purposed fulfilling the stipulated plan. D'Hervilly replied that he would never risk himself in an enterprise with such soldiers; that the only course left was to re-embark, or shut themselves up in the peninsula, to await fresh orders from London, which, as he surmised, would bring directions to make the descent in La Vendée.

On the following day, 6th July (18th Messidor), Vauban was secretly apprised that the republicans were preparing to attack his whole line. The intimation found him in a most perilous situation. His left rested on a post called Saint-Barbe, which communicated with the peninsula; but his centre and right skirted the coast of Carnac, and had only the sea for a retreat. Thus, if he were strongly assailed, his right and centre might be driven into the sea; his left alone could find refuge in Quiberon, through Saint-Barbe. His Chouans, utterly dispirited, were incapable of maintaining their ground; no other plan was open to him, therefore, save to throw his centre and right on his left, and defile by La Falaise into the peninsula. But in that case he shut himself up in that strip of land without the possibility of leaving it: for the post of Saint-Barbe, which was to be abandoned, although defenceless on the land side, was impregnable on the side of La Falaise, and completely commanded it. Thus this project of retreat was equivalent to a determination to retire altogether into the peninsula of Quiberon. Consequently Vauban demanded aid, in order that he might be saved the necessity of adopting that alternative. D'Hervilly transmitted him further orders, drawn up in all the pomposity of the military style, and containing a positive injunction to hold Carnac to the last extremity. Puisaye served a formal summons on D'Hervilly to send troops, which drew from him a promise to forward a detachment.

At break of day on the morrow, 7th July (19th Messidor), the republicans were seen advancing in deep columns, and making dispositions to attack the ten thousand Chouans along their whole line. The latter cast their eyes towards La Falaise, but discerned no appearance of a movement on the part of the regular troops. Thereupon they broke out into furious outcries against the emigrants for not coming to their assistance. Young George Cadoudal, whose soldiers refused to fight, entreated them not to disband; but they gave no heed to his solicitations. George, sharing their exasperation, exclaimed that those miscreants of English and emigrants had arrived only to ruin Brittany, and that it was unfortunate the sea had not engulfed them rather than transported them to that coast. Vauban, in this state of affairs, ordered his right and centre to recoil upon his left, with the view of saving them by La Falaise, in the peninsula. The Chouans rushed precipitately to the point indicated; the greater part were followed by their families, flying from the vengeance of the republicans. Old men, women, children, bearing their household wrecks, and intermingled with several thousand Chouans in their military garb, covered that long and narrow tongue of sand, lashed on both sides by the waves, and already furrowed by cannon-balls and bullets. Vauban, gathering around him all the chiefs, endeavoured to rally the bravest of the men, urging them not to expose themselves by a precipitate flight to certain destruction, and conjuring them, for their safety and honour, to make a retreat in good order. "They would cover with shame that troop of the line," he told them, "which so disgracefully left them to bear the whole brunt of the peril." By degrees he infused into them a degree of confidence; they turned to face the enemy, braved his fire, and retorted it. Thereupon, owing to the admirable fortitude of the chiefs, the retreat began to be executed with calmness; the ground was disputed inch by inch. Still, a vigorous charge might have proved irresistible, and forced the retiring Chouans into the sea; but, fortunately, the gallant Warren, mooring his ships and gunboats inshore, opened a tremendous fire on the republicans from both sides of La Falaise, and prevented them for that day at least from further pursuing their advantage.

The fugitives flocked to enter the fort, but for a time access was debarred them; they accordingly fell upon the palisades, tore them up, and poured pell-mell into the peninsula. At that moment, D'Hervilly appeared with his regiment; Vauban encountered him, and, under an impulse of anger, warned him he would bring his conduct under review before a council of war. The Chouans overspread the area of the promontory, on which were perched sundry hamlets and cottages. All the accommodation was forestalled by the officers and soldiers of the regiments, who defended their quarters from invasion; disputes and tumults ensued, but finally the Chouans stretched themselves on the ground. A half-ration of rice was distributed amongst them, which they consumed in the raw state, being destitute of the means of cooking food.

Thus the expedition, which was to have carried so speedily and triumphantly the banner of the Bourbons and the English to the banks of the Mayenne, was at present confined within the limits of a promontory jutting two leagues into the sea. Its conductors had twelve or fifteen thousand souls the more to support, to whom they could give neither shelter, nor fuel, nor utensils to prepare their victuals. The peninsula, defended by a fortress at its gorge, and flanked on both sides by the English squadrons, might be deemed an invulnerable possession; but it suddenly became untenable by the want of provisions. On board the squadron, in fact, had been shipped only supplies calculated to maintain six thousand men during three months, and there were eighteen or twenty thousand tongues clamorous for food. To escape from this dolorous position by a sudden assault on Saint-Barbe was scarcely possible; for the republicans, relaxing not an instant in their ardour, were intrenching that post in a manner to render it impregnable from the peninsula. Whilst confusion, animosities, and dejection, prevailed amid the incongruous assemblage of Chouans and emigrants, in the camp of Hoche, on the contrary, soldiers and officers were animated with one spirit, fired with an emulous zeal to perfect the defences of their position. "I saw," says Puisaye, "the officers themselves, in their shirts, and merely distinguished by their cravats, wielding the pick-axe, and accelerating the labours of their soldiers."

However, Puisaye determined upon a sortie that very night, in order to interrupt the works; but the darkness, combined with the terrors of the enemy's cannonade, threw the ranks into confusion, and he found it necessary to draw in the troops. The poor Chouans were stricken with despair: they loudly complained of having been villanously deceived; they lamented their old mode of warfare, and clamoured to have their forests restored to them. They suffered the pangs of hunger, too. D'Hervilly, for the purpose of constraining them to enlist in the regiments, had issued an ordinance, to the effect that only half-rations should be distributed to the irregular troops. They broke into open mutiny. Puisaye, without whose knowledge the order had been promulgated, immediately cancelled it; full rations were granted, and the malecontents pacified.

Besides the ability and spirit for which Puisaye was eminent, he was distinguished for an extraordinary perseverance under difficulties: he was never discouraged. He now conceived the idea of selecting the choicest amongst the Chouans, and disembarking them on the coast in two divisions, with instructions to scour the country to the rear of Hoche, muster the chiefs from whom no tidings had as yet come, and bear en masse on the camp of Saint-Barbe, so as to take it in rear, whilst the troops from the peninsula were attacking it in front. This project promised the advantages of reducing the number of consumers by six or eight thousand, employing those detached in beneficial activity, rekindling the zeal of the Breton chiefs, at present so singularly sluggish, and preparing the way for an attack on the rear of the camp of Saint-Barbe. The scheme formed, he picked his men from the Chouan ranks with the best discrimination, and assigned four thousand to Tinteniac, together with three intrepid chiefs, George Cadoudal, Mercier, and D'Allegre, and three thousand to Messieurs Jean-Jean and Lantivy. Tinténiac was to be landed at Sarzeau, near the mouth of the Vilaine; Jean-Jean and Lantivy near Quimper. Both were enjoined, after sweeping over a wide area, to unite at Baud on the 15th July (27th Messidor), and march in conjunction, at dawn on the 16th, upon the rear of the camp of Saint-Barbe. At the instant of departure, the Chouan chiefs sought out Puisaye, and entreated him, their old leader, to accompany them, representing to him that the traitorous English would assuredly ruin him: it was impossible for Puisaye to comply with these friendly instances. The troops sailed for their destinations, and were happily disembarked. Puisaye lost no time in writing to London that all would be yet repaired, but that supplies of provisions, ammunition, and troops, must be immediately forwarded, together with the person of a French prince.

Whilst these arrangements were progressing in the peninsula, Hoche had collected from eight to ten thousand men at Saint-Barbe. Aubert-Dubayet provided him, from the coasts of Cherbourg, with troops to guard the north of Brittany, and Canclaux had sent a considerable reinforcement from Nantes, under the orders of General Lemoine. The representatives had foiled all the machinations tending to deliver up L'Orient and Saint-Malo. The prospects of the republicans, therefore, brightened with the lapse of every day. Moreover, Lemaitre and Brothier, the royalist agents, were straining every nerve to thwart the expedition. They had at the commencement written to Brittany, condemning and disparaging it. As they described it, the expedition had a dangerous object in view, manifested by the fact of the prince's absence, and that no good royalist ought to aid it. In consequence, emissaries had gone abroad and circulated orders, in the name of the king, to abstain from participating in any movement; they had also warned Charette to persist in his inaction. Adhering, nevertheless, to their good old practice of profiting by the succours of England while deriding and duping it, the agents had formed a scheme for turning them to account in the present instance. Implicated in the intrigue to deliver Saint-Malo into the hands of Puisaye, their design was to call the emigrant officers cruising on board the English fleet into that place, and take possession of the port in the name of Louis XVIII., leaving Puisaye to act at Quiberon as he best could, and, as they insinuated, in behalf of the Duke of York. The plot touching Saint-Malo having failed, they fixed upon Saint-Brieuc, retained before that coast the flotilla bearing the skeleton regiments, and hastily dispatched emissaries to Tinténiac and Lantivy, with whose disembarkation they were acquainted, to enjoin them to move upon Saint-Brieuc. It was thus their aim to form in the north of Brittany a counter-expedition, more sure, as they prognosticated, than the enterprise of Puisaye in the south.

Tinténiac had, as we have intimated, effected a landing without loss or accident: after carrying several republican posts, he had advanced to Elven. At that place he received a command, delivered in the name of the king, to march on Coëtlogon, there to await fresh orders. He alleged in objection the commission given him by Puisaye, and the impropriety of hazarding the success of an arranged plan by departing from the point indicated. He yielded, however, hoping, by means of a forced march, to reach the background of Saint-Barbe by the 16th. Jean-Jean and Lantivy, having landed with equal good fortune, were preparing to move towards Baud, when they likewise were served with an injunction to march upon Saint-Brieuc.

Meanwhile, Hoche, disquieted as to his rear, felt compelled to send out detachments to arrest the bands of whose march he had been apprised; but he retained in Saint-Barbe a force sufficient to resist an assault. He was much incommoded by the English gunboats, which opened a destructive fire on his troops whenever they ventured to appear on La Falaise, and his hopes of reducing the emigrants were thus almost restricted to the tardy operation of famine.

Puisaye, on his part, was engaged in diligent preparations for the important day of the 16th July (28th Messidor). On the 15th, a naval division cast anchor in the bay; it proved to be that formerly dispatched to the mouth of the Elbe to receive the emigrant regiments which had entered the service of England, and were known as the regiments with the black cockade. It brought the legions of Salm, Damas, Béon, and Péregord, reduced in all to eleven hundred men, by the losses of the campaign, and commanded by a distinguished officer, M. de Sombreuil. The squadron likewise contained additional supplies of provisions and ammunition, and announced the coming of three thousand English led by Lord Graham, and the speedy advent of the Count d'Artois with more considerable forces. A letter from the English minister informed Puisaye that the emigrant officers in the other division were detained upon the northern coast by the royalist agents, who professed to have it in their power to secure them the possession of a port. Another despatch, which arrived at the same time, terminated the difference between Puisaye and D'Hervilly, by confirming the former in the absolute command of the expedition, and conferring on him, moreover, the title of lieutenant-general in the army of England.

Puisaye, thus rendered free in his command, completed his arrangements for the grand enterprise of the morrow. He would have willingly postponed the projected attack, in order to afford Sombreuil's division time to disembark; but, every thing having been fixed for the 16th, and that day distinctly assigned to Tinténiac, he could not defer it. On the evening of the 15th, he detached Vauban with 1200 Chouans to land on the beach at Carnac, for the purpose of causing a diversion on the extremity of the camp of Saint Barbe, and uniting with the Chouans appointed to assail it from the rear. It was late before the boats were got ready, and Vauban was unable to embark until midnight. He had orders to discharge a rocket if he succeeded in landing, and to shoot up a second if he should fail to hold his ground on shore.

At break of day on the 16th, Puisaye issued from the peninsula with the whole force at his disposal. He marched in columns. The gallant regiment of the Loyal-Emigrant was in the van, with the artillerymen under Rothalier. On the left advanced the regiments of Royal-Marine and Drusenay, with six hundred Chouans, commanded by the Duke de Levis. D'Hervilly's regiment, and a thousand Chouans, commanded by the Chevalier de Saint-Pierre, occupied the right. These united corps scarcely mustered four thousand men. Whilst advancing along La Falaise, they perceived a rocket in the air discharged by the Count de Vauban; not seeing a second, they concluded that Vauban had succeeded. They continued their march. Suddenly a distant sound, as of musketry, was heard. "It is Tinténiac," exclaimed Puisaye; "forward!" Thereupon the charge was sounded, and the assailants moved with quicker step on the intrenchments of the republicans. Hoche's vanguard, commanded by Humbert, was stationed in front of the heights of Saint-Barbe. At the approach of the enemy it fell back, and withdrew into the lines. The attacking force pushed onwards in confidence and exultation: suddenly a corps of cavalry, which had remained in position, made a movement askance, and unmasked a formidable range of batteries. A fire of musketry and artillery instantly opened on the emigrants; grape-shot, balls, and shells, showered thickly upon them. On the left, the regiments of Royal-Marine and Drusenay lost whole ranks without swerving; the Duke de Levis was seriously wounded at the head of his Chouans; on the right, the regiment of D'Hervilly marched intrepidly amid the appalling fire. Meanwhile, the musketry thought to have been heard on the flanks and rear had ceased to resound. Neither Tinténiac nor Vauban, therefore, had attacked, and all hope of storming the camp was extinguished. At this moment, the whole republican army, infantry and cavalry, moved out of its intrenchments; Puisaye, seeing further perseverance in the attempt must lead to certain destruction, instructed D'Hervilly to give orders for the right to retreat, whilst he himself executed that movement on the left. D'Hervilly, who confronted the fire with the utmost courage, unhappily received a bullet in his chest at this instant; he charged an aide-de-camp to convey the order of retreat; the aide-de-camp was swept away by a cannon-ball. Not being warned, therefore, the regiment of D'Hervilly, and the thousand Chouans under Saint-Pierre, continued to advance despite the terrible fire. Whilst a retreat was sounded on the left, the charge was sounded on the right. The confusion and the carnage were frightful. In this dismal state of things, the republican cavalry fell furiously on the emigrant army, and drove it in disorder back on La Falaise. Rothalier's ordnance, embedded in the sand, was captured. After many feats of heroic valour, the whole army fled to the fort of Penthièvre; the republicans followed at their utmost speed, and would have entered the fortress with the fugitives, but an unhoped-for aid intervened to check the ardour of pursuit: Vauban, who was understood to be at Carnac, appeared at the extremity of La Falaise with his corps of Chouans, and by his side stood Commodore Warren. Planted in gunboats, and pouring on La Falaise a terrific fire, they caused the republicans to pause, and once more saved the unfortunate army of Quiberon.

Thus Tinténiac had not appeared. Vauban, too late in embarking, had failed to surprise the republicans, and being subsequently ill supported by his troops, who plunged their muskets in the water to avoid the necessity of fighting, had returned near the fortress. His second rocket, sent up in the sun's rays, had not been perceived; and it was thus that Puisaye, deceived in all his combinations, had sustained this disastrous repulse. All the regiments had undergone heavy losses: that of Royal-Marine had lost out of seventy-two officers fifty-three; the others had suffered in proportion.

It must be allowed that Puisaye acted with great precipitation in attacking the camp. Four thousand men, proceeding to assail ten thousand, strongly intrenched, ought to have been assured beyond all doubt that the co-operative movements on the rear and the flanks were ready to be executed as prearranged. It was assuredly not sufficient to have assigned a rendezvous for troops, having numerous difficulties to surmount, to conclude at once that they must arrive at the hour and place fixed; a signal, or some other means, ought to have been agreed upon, whereby intelligence might be communicated, and the desired combination secured. In this respect, although deceived by the report of distant firing, Puisaye had not evinced adequate caution. At the same time, he had himself participated in all the dangers of the enterprise, and given a sufficient answer to those who affected to suspect his personal bravery, because they could not deny his talents.

It is not difficult to account for Tinténiac's breach of engagement. He had received at Elven orders to march on Coetlogon, with which strange injunction he had complied, in the hope of regaining the lost time by a forced march. At Coëtlogon he had found sundry females commissioned to deliver him an order to move upon Saint-Brieuc. This order emanated from the agents opposed to Puisaye, who, using the name of the king, on whose behalf they always affected to speak, desired to make the corps detached by Puisaye concur in promoting the counter-expedition which they meditated on Saint-Malo or Saint-Brieuc. Whilst conferences were holding on the subject of this command, the castle of Coëtlogon was attacked by the detachments which Hoche had despatched in pursuit of Tinténiac; that unfortunate leader hastened to the scene of action, and in a few moments fell lifeless, pierced by a bullet in the temple. His successor in the command consented to march on Saint-Brieuc. On their side, also, Messieurs Jean-Jean and Lantivy, who had landed in the vicinity of Quimper, had found similar orders; the leaders were divided in opinion, and their soldiers, already discontented, seeing this conflict of orders and projects, finally dispersed. Such were the circumstances preventing either of the corps detached by Puisaye to effect a diversion from arriving at the rendezvous. The agency of Paris, with its peculiar schemes, had thus deprived Puisaye of the emigrant officers it detained upon the northern coast, of two detachments it had kept from repairing to Baud on the 14th, and, lastly, of the aid and concurrence of those numerous chiefs it had interdicted from sharing in any movement.

Shut up in Quiberon, Puisaye had no longer any hope of emerging in order to advance into the interior; it only remained for him to re-embark ere driven by famine, and proceed to attempt a more fortunate descent on another part of the coast, in La Vendée to wit. The major part of the emigrants were extremely favourable to this idea; the renown of Charette led them to anticipate in La Vendée a great general at the head of a splendid army. They were likewise gratified with a plan which promised to take from Puisaye the management of the counter-revolution, if any such were to be consummated.

Meanwhile, Hoche was occupied in attentively surveying the peninsula, and canvassing the means of penetrating into it. It was defended in front by the fort of Penthièvre, and on the flanks by the English squadrons. To effect a landing in boats was out of the question, and to reduce the fortress by a regular siege was equally impracticable, for it could be reached only by La Falaise, always swept by the fire of the English gunboats. In fact, the republicans were unable to make even a reconnoissance without being mowed down by continuous volleys. Consequently, a nocturnal surprise, or famine, could alone give Hoche possession of the promontory. A circumstance determined him to attempt a surprise, however hazardous it might be. The prisoners, who had been enrolled almost against their will in the emigrant regiments, could have been reconciled to the change by success alone; but, setting aside their patriotism, they were urged by pressing motives of interest to take part with a victorious enemy, who would treat them as deserters if taken with arms in their hands. Many of them repaired at night to the camp of Hoche, asseverating that they had enlisted only to get out of prison, or to avoid being subjected to the confinement of one. They indicated to him a mode of penetrating into the peninsula. A rock stood on the left of Fort Penthièvre; it was possible to make the circuit of that rock by wading into the water breast high, and then a path would be found conducting to the elevation of the fort. The fugitives gave assurance, in the name of their comrades composing the garrison, that they would aid in opening its gates.

Hoche no longer hesitated, notwithstanding the danger of such an enterprise. He formed his plan according to the information given him, and resolved to force his way into the peninsula, in order to capture the whole expedition before it had time to re-embark on board the ships. On the evening of the 20th July (2d Thermidor), the sky was overcast; Puisaye and Vauban ordered patrols for the specific purpose of averting the chance of a nocturnal attack. "In such weather," they said to the officers, "you must compel the enemy's sentinels to keep discharging their muskets." All appearing to them tranquil, they retired to rest in full security.

The preparations were speedily completed in the republican camp. At the approach of midnight, Hoche put his army in motion. The sky was densely charged with clouds; a strong wind agitated the waves; their united roar covered the tramp of soldiers and the clang of arms. Hoche disposed his troops in columns on La Falaise, and assigned three hundred grenadiers to Adjutant-General Ménage, a young republican of intrepid courage. He ordered him to defile towards the right, plunge into the sea with his grenadiers, turn the rock on which the walls of the fortress rested, scale the pathway, and attempt thus to introduce himself into the fort. These dispositions made, he marched forward in profound silence: patrols to whom red uniforms had been given, taken from the dead in the action of the 16th, and possessing the pass-word, deceived the advanced sentinels. The assailants proceeded without being recognised. Ménage entered the sea with his three hundred grenadiers, the howling of the wind drowning the noise they made in moving through the water. Several fell and regained their footing, others were engulfed in deep holes. At length, scrambling from rock to rock, they reached the land in the wake of their gallant leader, and succeeded in ascending the path conducting to the fortress. In the interim, Hoche had arrived beneath the walls with his columns. But at this critical moment the sentinels discovered one of the false patrols; even in the obscurity of the night they perceived a dark and moving mass; instantly they discharged their pieces; the alarm was given. The Toulonnese artillerymen flew to their guns, and opened a vigorous cannonade on Hoche's troops: they were thrown into disorder, their ranks confounded, and the whole assailing body on the point of giving way. But at this instant Ménage reached the elevation of the fort; the soldiers of the garrison, confederates of the besiegers, appeared on the battlements, held out the butt-ends of their muskets to the republicans, and thus helped them to scale the walls of the fortress. All together then fell on the remainder of the garrison, slew those who resisted, and immediately hoisted the tricoloured flag. Hoche, amidst the confusion into which the enemy's batteries had thrown his columns, retained all the composure for which he was remarkable; he sought out the commanding officers, remanded each to his post, restored the regularity of the ranks, and rallied his army under the tremendous fire from the fort. The darkness beginning to decrease, he descried the republican banner floating on the pinnacle of the fortress. "What!" he cried to his soldiers, "will you recoil when your comrades have already planted their standard on the walls?" He led them upon the advanced works, in which a body of the Chouans was encamped; they penetrated on all sides, and finally rendered themselves masters of the fortress.

At this moment, Vauban and Puisaye, aroused by the firing, hastened to the scene of action; but it was too late. They met, flying in all the precipitancy of terror, the Chouans, the officers abandoned by their soldiers, and the portion of the garrison which had remained faithful. Hoche made but a transient pause after the capture of the fort; he marshalled a part of his columns, and advanced into the peninsula before the expedition could have time to re-embark. Puisaye, Vauban, and all the chiefs, retired towards the interior, where were still encamped the regiment of D'Hervilly, the wrecks of the regiments Drusenay, Royal-Marine, and Loyal-Emigrant, together with the legion of Sombreuil, landed two days earlier, and eleven hundred men strong. By taking up a good position, and there was more than one such on the promontory, and manning it with the three thousand regular troops they yet possessed, they might have given the squadron time to rescue the unfortunate emigrants. The [illegible] of the gunboats would have protected the embarcation: but consternation was predominant amongst the fugitives; the Chouans rushed into the sea with their families, to seize some fishing-boats moored along the shore, and pushed off to the squadron, which the stormy weather kept at a considerable distance. The troops, scattered in the peninsula, ran to and fro, incapable of concentrating. D'Hervilly, well adapted for vigorously defending a position, and thoroughly conversant with the locality, lay mortally wounded; Sombreuil, who had succeeded to his command, was unacquainted with the ground, was ignorant where he might make a stand, whither he ought to retire, and, although of unquestionable bravery, appeared in this emergency to have lost the necessary presence of mind. Puisaye, meanwhile, having reached Sombreuil's quarters, indicated to him a favourable position. Sombreuil inquired whether he had sent to the squadron desiring it to approach nearer; Puisaye replied that he had dispatched a skilful and trusty pilot; but the wind was high—the pilot would not arrive sufficiently early in the opinion of men exposed to the imminent hazard of being driven into the sea. The republican columns were advancing; Sombreuil grew more urgent. "Is the squadron apprised?" he demanded of Puisaye. Unable to give any satisfactory answer, Puisaye agreed to go on board in person to urge the approach of the commodore—a commissioi he might have more suitably delegated to another, f he ought to have been the last to withdraw from tl danger. An important consideration decided him—the necessity of securing his correspondence, whicl would have compromised numberless individuals i Brittany if it had fallen into the hands of the repub licans. There were doubtless as pressing reasons foi saving it as for saving the army itself; but Puisay might have sent it on board without going in person He departed, and arrived alongside the commodor simultaneously with the pilot he had already dis patched. The distance, the darkness, and the rough ness of the weather, had prevented the disaster fron being perceived on board the squadron. Admiral Warren, who during the whole expedition had seconde the emigrants with the greatest zeal, lost no time in hoisting sail, and eventually hove-to within cannon-shot of the shore, at the moment that Hoche, a the head of seven hundred grenadiers, was closing or Sombreuil's legion, and forcing it almost to the water' edge. How melancholy a spectacle did that coas present at the instant! The raging surf scarcely permitted the boats to near the shore; a despairing multitude of Chouans and fugitive soldiers plunged into the water up to their necks, in order to reach the boats, many being drowned amid the breakers in their anxious haste to meet them; whilst several hundreds of unfortunate emigrants, placed between the sea and the bayonets of the republicans, were reduced to the alternative of throwing themselves into the waves or upon the bristling weapons of their enemies, suffering at the same time from the fire of the English squadron equally with the republicans themselves. A few boats had gained the shore, but on a different point. On that side there was only one corvette, which kept up an astonishing fire, and retarded for a moment the march of the republicans. Some grenadiers cried out, it is stated, to the emigrants—"Surrender; no injury will be done to you." This phrase passed from rank to rank. Sombreuil attempted to approach the republicans to open a parley with General Humbert; but the continued fire prevented him from accomplishing his purpose. An emigrant officer forthwith swam off to the squadron to obtain a cessation of the cannonade. Hoche was determined to grant no capitulation; he was too well acquainted with the laws against the emigrants to venture upon contracting an engagement, and he was incapable of promising what he could not perform. He has affirmed, in a letter published through all Europe, that he heard none of the pledges attributed to General Humbert, and that he would not have sanctioned them. Some of his soldiers might have exclaimed "Surrender!" but he offered no terms, came under no obligation. He advanced imperturbably; and the emigrants, having no alternative but to surrender or to sell their lives, conceived hopes that they would probably be treated like the Vendéans. They threw down their arms. No capitulation, even verbally, was made with Hoche; Vauban, who was present, allows that no convention took place, and even asserts that he advised Sombreuil not to surrender upon the vague expectations inspired by the shouts of a few soldiers.

Several of the emigrants fell on their swords; others threw themselves into the waves to join the ships. Commodore Warren made all practicable efforts to surmount the obstacles arising from the roughness of the sea, in order to save the greatest possible number of those unfortunate persons. There were many who, on seeing the boats draw near, had plunged into the water to their necks; the republicans fired at their heads from the beach. Sometimes they attempted to enter boats already overloaded, and those already therein, apprehensive of being swamped, hacked off their hands with their sabres.

Let us quit, however, these scenes of horror, where appalling calamities visited in retribution egregious faults. Several were the causes that had contributed to foil the success of the expedition. In the first place, too great a reliance had been placed on Brittany. A people veritably disposed to rebel arises with one impulse, as did the Vendéans in May 1793, goes in quest of leaders, entreats, and forces them to become its rulers and directors, not postponing its outbreak until it be sedulously organised, nor suffering two years of oppression, to revolt after the oppression itself has ceased. But, had the population of Brittany been actuated by the most eager desire to hail a liberator, such an overseer as Hoche would have repressed its manifestations. Thus Puisaye unquestionably laboured under much delusion. Still, important aid might have been drawn from this population, numbers might have been found prepared to combat, if a considerable expedition had advanced to Rennes, and chased before it the army which kept the country in check. For this end, it was indispensable that the chiefs of the insurgents had been in concert with Puisaye, and Puisaye with the agency at Paris; that the most opposite instructions had not been transmitted to the Chouan chiefs, some receiving orders to remain quiescent, others directed upon points distant from those assigned by Puisaye; that the emigrants had formed a more correct idea of the war they were about to prosecute, and entertained somewhat less contempt for the peasants devoted to their cause; that the English had been less distrustful of Puisaye, fettered him with no adjunct in the command, given him at once all the means they destined for him, and entered upon the expedition with their full measure of strength; above all, that a great prince had been at the head of the enterprise—that he should be great indeed was scarcely needed, so that he had been the first to set foot on shore. At his presence, all obstacles would have vanished. The dissensions of the Vendéan chiefs amongst themselves, of the Vendéan chiefs with the Breton chief, of the Breton chief with the agents at Paris, of the Chouans with the emigrants, of Spain with England—that discord in all the elements of the enterprise—would have instantaneously ceased. At the appearance of the prince, all the enthusiasm of the country would have been fired, jealousies or rivalries have ceased, every one have submitted to the pre-eminence of the prince, and concurred with alacrity in the undertaking. Hoche might have been encompassed, and, despite his talents and vigour, compelled to recede before an influence all-powerful in those districts. Doubtless, he had behind him those valiant armies which had conquered Europe; but Austria might have occupied them on the Rhine, and prevented them from detaching strong reinforcements; the government no longer possessed the energy of the great committee, and the revolution would assuredly have encountered infinite hazard. Subverted twenty years earlier, its benefits would not have had time to take root and become consolidated; all the incredible efforts, the immortal victories, the torrents of blood, which had illustrated it, would have produced no fruit for France; or at least, if it were not reserved for a handful of fugitives to have subjugated to their yoke a brave nation, they would have placed its regeneration in peril, whilst, with regard to themselves, they would not have abandoned their cause without strenuous efforts to render it paramount, and their pretensions, however fatal to the country, would have derived factitious honour from their energy and fortitude.

The blame of the failure, meanwhile, was charged upon Puisaye and England by the malignants composing the royalist party. Puisaye, as they maintained, was a traitor suborned by Pitt to renew the scenes of Toulon. Nevertheless, it was undoubted that Puisaye had done all he could under the circumstances. It was preposterous to suppose that England did not desire success; her precautions with regard to Puisaye himself, the selection she made of D'Hervilly to interpose lest the emigrant regiments might be too rashly compromised, and finally, the zeal manifested by Commodore Warren in rescuing the unfortunate survivors from the peninsula, prove that, notwithstanding her crafty genius, she had not meditated the base and revolting crime attributed to her. Justice to all be our motto, even to the implacable enemies of the revolution and of France!

Commodore Warren disembarked on the Isle of Houat the forlorn remnants of the expedition, and there awaited fresh orders from London, and the arrival of the Count d'Artois, who was on board the Lord Moira, to regulate his further proceedings. Despair reigned on that little island: the emigrants and Chouans, in the greatest misery, and afflicted with a contagious malady, indulged in passionate recriminations, and bitterly upbraided Puisaye. The despair was yet greater at Aurai and Vannes, whither the thousand emigrants taken in arms had been transported. Hoche, after subduing them, had hurried from the dismal spectacle, and proceeded in pursuit of Tinteniac's band, known under the appellation of the Red Army. The fate of the prisoners rested not on his fiat; he was powerless for the aggravation or mitigation of their punishment. The laws existed, and he could neither evade nor annul them. He left the question concerning them to be decided by the committee of public welfare and by Tallien. That deputy hastily departed for Paris, where he arrived on the eve of the anniversary of the 9th Thermidor. On the morrow was celebrated, according to the new mode adopted, within the walls of the convention itself, a festival in commemoration of Robespierre's fall. All the representatives assembled in grand costume; a numerous orchestra executed patriotic airs; choristers chanted hymns composed by Chénier. Courtois read a report on the achievement of the 9th Thermidor. Tallien afterwards read a report on the affair of Quiberon. The intention of arrogating a double triumph was remarked as too palpable in him; nevertheless, his services of the previous year, and those he had just rendered, procured him boundless applause. His presence, in fact, had been of considerable advantage to Hoche. On the same day a banquet was given by Tallien: the principal Girondists were associated with the Thermidorians as his guests; Louvet and Lanjuinais appeared conspicuously at the festive board. Lanjuinais proposed a toast to the 9th Thermidor, and to the courageous deputies who had prostrated the tyranny. Tallien proposed a second to the seventy-three, to the twenty-two, to all the deputies who had been the victims of the reign of terror: Louvet added these words —"And to their intimate union with the men of the 9th Thermidor."

They had great need of union, in truth, to combat in concert the adversaries of various kinds now threatening the republic. Great joy prevailed in Paris, increased by the reflection how signal must have been the danger had the expedition in the West been able to co-operate with that which the Prince of Condé had prepared towards the East.

The fate of the prisoners was a subject requiring immediate decision. Numerous solicitations were addressed to the committees; but, in the present position of affairs, it was impossible to spare them. The republicans were constantly asserting that the government intended to recall the emigrants, restore to them their property, and, consequently, re-establish royalty; the royalists, always presumptuous, maintained the same thing; they stated that their friends governed the country, and the more their hopes were excited the more audacious did they prove themselves. To evince the least lenity on this occasion, was to justify the fears of the first, the idle anticipations of the latter; it would drive the republicans to despair, and stimulate the royalists to still bolder enterprises. The committee of public welfare ordered the laws to be enforced, and assuredly there were no Mountaineers within its pale to influence the resolution; it felt the impossibility of acting otherwise. A commission, located at Vannes, was instructed to separate the prisoners enrolled in their own despite from the real emigrants. These latter were shot. The soldiers allowed as many to escape as they could. Several brave men perished, certainly, but they could have anticipated no other doom, after carrying war into their native country and being taken with arms in their hands. Less menaced by enemies of every description, and in particular by their own confederates, the republic might have pardoned them; it was debarred from doing so under actual circumstances. M. de Sombreuil, albeit a man of bravery, yielded at the moment of death to an impulse little worthy of his courage. He wrote a letter to Commodore Warren, in which he accused Puisaye with all the virulence of desperation. He commissioned Hoche to forward it to the commodore. Although it contained a false assertion, Hoche, respecting the wishes of a dying man, transmitted it to the commodore; but he repelled the statement of Sombreuil in a letter of his own: "I was at the head of Humbert's seven hundred grenadiers," he said, "and affirm that no capitulation was made" All the contemporaries to whom the character of the young general was known, have deemed him incapable of falsehood. Eye-witnesses have moreover confirmed his assertion. Sombreuil's letter was singularly prejudicial to the emigrants and to Puisaye; and it was judged so dishonourable to the memory of its author that the republicans were charged with fabricating it, an imputation in every respect worthy of the miserable fables propagated by the emigrants.

Whilst the royalist party thus sustained so rude a check at Quiberon, a discomfiture equally fatal was preparing for it in Spain. Moncey had again entered Biscay, taken Bilboa and Vittoria, and was closely pressing Pampeluna. The favourite who governed the court of Madrid, after repudiating the overtures of peace made by the French government at the commencement of the campaign, because he was not the medium through which they were submitted, now determined to negotiate, and dispatched the Chevalier Yriarte to Basle. The peace was signed at that place with the envoy of the republic, Barthélemy, on the 24th Messidor (12th July), the very time disasters were thickening so portentously at Quiberon. The conditions were the restitution of all the conquests of France on the territory of Spain, and, in requital, the cession to France of the Spanish portion of Saint-Domingo. Here France made great concessions for an advantage almost illusory, for Saint-Domingo no longer belonged to either power; but those concessions were dictated by the soundest policy. France had nothing to covet beyond the Pyrenees; she had no interest in weakening Spain: on the contrary, it behoved her, had it been possible, to restore to that power the strength it had lost in a contest so detrimental to the interests of both nations.

This peace was hailed with the most lively satisfaction by all who loved France and the republic. It detached another power from the coalition, it showed a Bourbon recognising the republic, and it rendered two armies disposable for transference to the Alps, the West, or the Rhine. The royalists were struck with consternation. The agents at Paris, especially, dreaded lest their intrigues might be divulged, lest their letters to Spain should be made public. England would have therein read their real sentiments respecting her; and, although that power was grossly vituperated for the affair of Quiberon, it was henceforth their only pecuniary resource; hence the necessity of conciliating it, with a mental reservation to deride and deceive it when the opportunity occurred.*

An exploit, not less important in its consequences, was achieved by the armies of Jourdan and Pichegru. After long delays, it had been finally decided that the Rhine should be passed. The French and Austrian armies confronted each other upon the opposite banks, from Basle to Düsseldorf. The defensive position of the Austrians on the Rhine was excellently chosen. The fortresses of Düsseldorf and Ehrenbreitstein covered their right; Mayence, Manheim, and Philipsbourg, their centre and left; the Neckar and the Maine, taking their sources not far from the Danube, and flowing almost parallel towards the Rhine, formed two important lines of communication with the hereditary states, brought supplies in profusion, and covered the two flanks of the army when operating concentrically towards Mayence. The plan to be followed on this scene of warfare was identical for both the Austrians and French: according to the opinion of an eminent general and a celebrated critic, it was incumbent on both to act concentrically between the Maine and the Neckar. The obvious plan for the French armies under Jourdan and Pichegru was to attempt the passage of the Rhine towards Mayence, at a short distance from each other, subsequently unite in the valley of the Maine, separate Clairfayt from Wurmser, and ascend between the Neckar and the Maine, striving to repulse successively the two Austrian generals. In like manner, the Austrian generals were called upon to concentrate their forces, in order to debouch by Mayence upon the left bank. If they were anticipated, if the Rhine were passed on any point, they ought to concentrate between the Neckar and the Maine, prevent the junction of the two French armies, and seize an opportunity for falling on one or other. The Austrian commanders had every advantage for taking the initiative, as they occupied Mayence, and could debouch, when they pleased, on the left bank.

The French, however, took the initiative. After a tedious delay, the Dutch boats had at length reached the height of Dusseldorf, and Jourdan prepared to cross the Rhine. On the 20th Fructidor (6th September), he passed, at Eichelcamp, Dusseldorf, and Neuwied, by a bold manœuvre. He advanced by the Dusseldorf road to Frankfort, between the line of the Prussian neutrality and the Rhine, and arrived at the Lahn on the 4th complementary day or Sans-Culottide (20th September). In the mean time, Pichegru had been ordered to attempt the passage over the Upper Rhine, and to summon Manheim. That flourishing town, threatened with a bombardment, surrendered, contrary to all expectation, on the 4th complementary day (20th September). From that moment all the advantages were with the French. Pichegru, based on Manheim, had only to draw thither all his army and unite with Jourdan in the valley of the Maine. They would then be enabled to divide the two Austrian generals, and act concentrically between the Maine and the Neckar. It behoved Jourdan especially to move with all dispatch from his position between the neutral line and the Rhine; for his army, having no means of transport for its supplies, and being unable to treat the country in a hostile manner, must soon be reduced to destitution unless he marched forward.

Thus, at this era, fortune smiled benignantly on the republic. Peace with Spain, the destruction of the expedition hazarded by England on the coasts of Brittany, the passage of the Rhine, offensive operations propitiously commenced in Germany—success beamed on all quarters. It remained for its generals and statesmen to profit by the concurrence of so many auspicious events.

* The fifth volume of Puisaye's Memoirs contains proof that such were the views entertained.

CHAPTER XLIV.

MACHINATIONS OF THE ROYALIST PARTY.—DIRECTORIAL CONSTITUTION, AND DECREES OF THE 5TH AND 13TH FRUCTIDOR.—ACCEPTANCE THEREOF BY THE PRIMARY ASSEMBLIES.—INSURRECTION OF THE 13TH VENDEMIAIRE; DEFEAT OF THE INSURGENT SECTIONS.—DISSOLUTION OF THE NATIONAL CONVENTION.

Defeated on the frontiers, and abandoned by the court of Spain, on which it relied most securely, the royalist party was reduced to intrigue in the interior; and it must be allowed that, at this moment, Paris was an admirable arena for intrigues. The preparation of the constitution was nearly completed; the period when the convention should abdicate its authority, France be convoked to elect new representatives, and a fresh assembly replace that which had reigned so long, was the most favourable that could be imagined for prosecuting counter-revolutionary projects.

In the sections of Paris violent passions were in fermentation. The frequenters of those assemblies were not royalists, but they unconsciously aided royalism. They had laboured to oppose the terrorists; they had become inflamed by their arduous struggle, desired to persecute the vanquished, and inveighed against the convention, because it refused to carry persecution to an extreme limit. They were ever ready to recall to recollection that the terror had emanated from the convention itself; they demanded from it a constitution and a code of laws, and the termination of its prolonged dictatorship. The majority of the men who urged these demands, scarcely cast a thought upon the Bourbons. They were members of the wealthy third-estate of 1789—merchants, shopkeepers, proprietors, advocates, literary men, who were at last determined to insist upon the re-establishment of laws and the enjoyment of their rights; young men, sincerely republican, but blinded by their wrath against the revolutionary system; and sundry ambitious personages, writers in journals, and orators of sections, who, to make way for themselves, wished the convention to retire from the stage. The royalists lurked behind this mass. They were composed of certain emigrants and priests who had returned, divers creatures of the old court who had lost lucrative posts, and many indifferent and timid individuals who shuddered at the idea of a tempestuous democracy. These latter rarely visited the sections; but the former were assiduous in their attendance, and employed all possible means for keeping them in agitation. The instructions given by the royalist agents to their confidants, were to adopt the language of the sectionists, inveigh upon the same topics, demand like them the punishment of the terrorists, the accomplishment of the constitution, and the trial of the Mountaineer deputies; but to insist upon these things with a greater degree of violence, so as to compromise the sections with the convention and provoke fresh commotions; for every turmoil afforded a chance, and might at all events serve to excite disgust for a republic so incessantly the prey of tumult and disorder.

Such machinations were fortunately possible at Paris alone, for that is invariably the most agitated city in France—that wherein discussions on public questions are carried on with the greatest heat, where the desire and pretention of dictating to the government are universal, and where opposition is always first manifested. Excepting Lyons, Marseilles, and Toulon, where the populations were engaged in massacres, the rest of France viewed with comparative indifference the political struggles of the time, and took an infinitesimally less part therein than the sections of Paris.

Combined with all they said or prompted in the sections, the intriguers in the service of royalism circulated pamphlets and published articles in the journals. Moreover, they prevaricated egregiously, as was their wont, arrogated an importance they were far from possessing, and wrote abroad that they had seduced the principal leaders of the government. By means of such arrant mendacity alone, they contrived to procure money, and had recently obtained from England several thousands of pounds sterling. Nevertheless, it is certain that, although they had not gained Tallien or Hoche, as they boasted, they had succeeded with some members of the convention—two or three, perhaps. As men who had fallen within their toils were mentioned Rovère and Saladin, originally two rabid revolutionists, and of late become equally rabid reactors. It is credible, also, that they had moved, by more delicate appliances, sundry of those deputies holding moderate sentiments, who felt an inclination favourable to representative monarchy, that is to say, to a Bourbon pretending to be bound by laws on the English model. Pichegru had been tempted by abrupt offers of a castle, artillery, and money; legislators and members of committees may have been more cautiously addressed: "France is too extensive a country to be a republic; she would be far happier under a king, with responsible ministers, hereditary peers, and deputies." This idea, indeed without being suggested, might naturally occur to contemplative personages, especially those who deemed themselves well adapted for fulfilling the functions of deputies or hereditary peers. Be that as it may, the Lanjuinais', Boissy-d'Anglas, Henri-Larivière, and Lesage [d'Eure-et-Loire], were regarded at this epoch as secret royalists.

We perceive that the means wielded by the agency were not very potent; but they sufficed to harass public tranquillity, infuse apprehensions into the minds of men, and above all, recall to the memory of the French those Bourbons, the only implacable enemies of the republic, whom its arms were unable to vanquish, for traditions are not obliterated by bayonets.

Amongst the seventy-three reintegrated deputies, there were assuredly monarchists; but in general they were republicans; the Girondists were all so, or nearly all. Nevertheless, the newspapers in the counter-revolutionary interest lauded them with singular pertinacity, and thus succeeded in rendering them suspected by the Thermidorians. To vindicate themselves from these affected eulogies, the seventy-three and the twenty-two strenuously protested their attachment to the republic; in sooth, none would have then dared to speak slightingly of that republic. How dismal an inconsistency, indeed, if they had not cherished it, after having made such sacrifices of blood and treasure for its establishment!—after having immolated in its cause thousands of Frenchmen in civil warfare or in resisting foreign aggression! Therefore, to love the republic, or at least to profess that affection, was an imperative obligation. However, notwithstanding these protestations, the Thermidorians were distrustful; they relied with confidence only on Daunou, whose probity and severe principles were incontestible, and on Louvet, whose ardent mind had remained unequivocally republican. After having lost so many illustrious friends, and in his own person encountered so many perils, Louvet could not believe the whole to have been a dream—that those valuable lives had been taken to pave the way for royalty. Accordingly, he had completely identified himself with the Thermidorians. These again approximated day by day more closely to the Mountaineers—to that body of sturdy republicans, whose ranks they had themselves so wofully thinned.

The Thermidorians desired to pass stringent measures against the return of the emigrants, who continued to pour into France, some with false passports and under fictitious names, others under pretence of seeking the erasure of their names from the emigrant lists. Almost all presented false certificates of residence, and alleged they had not left France, but had remained in concealment or been pursued only on occasion of the events of the 31st May and 2d June. Under pretext of prosecuting their appeals before the committee of general safety, they flocked to Paris, where many fomented the agitations in the sections. Amongst the most eminent personages returned to Paris was Madame de Staël,* who had reappeared in France with her consort, the ambassador from Sweden. She had thrown open her saloons, where she gratified her ruling ambition of displaying her varied and brilliant powers. A republic was far from distasteful to the soaring hardihood of her mind, but she would have accepted it only on condition of seeing her proscribed friends shining in its councils—on condition of sweeping away those revolutionists, who passed doubtless for men of energy, but as uncouth and devoid of intellectual refinement. From their hands, in truth, the saved republic would be thankfully received, but with the intention of promptly excluding them from the legislature and the government. Foreigners of distinction, all the ambassadors of friendly powers, the men of letters most renowned for their talents and wit, assembled under the roof of Madame de Staël. It was no longer the saloon of Madame Tallien, it was hers, which attracted all attention; and that circumstance alone may afford an estimate of the change French society had undergone during the previous six months. Madame de Staël was asserted to intercede for emigrants, endeavouring to procure the recall of Narbonne, Jaucourt, and several others. Legendre formally denounced her from the tribune. The journals were filled with complaints of the influence exercised by the coteries formed around the foreign ambassadors, and advocated the necessity of suspending all appeals for erasures. The Thermidorians, indeed, caused the adoption of a decree, enacting that every emigrant returned to solicit his erasure should be bound to repair to his commune, and there await the decision of the committee of general safety.† By this expedient, it was hoped that the capital might be freed from a multitude of intriguers who contributed to disturb its tranquillity.

The Thermidorians were anxious, at the same time, to check the persecutions directed so remorselessly against the patriots. They had already induced the committee of general safety to liberate Pache, Bouchotte, the noted Héron, and several others. It must be allowed they might have selected a better object for their commiseration than the last-named personage. The sections had previously presented petitions on the subject of these liberations, as we have recorded; they now remonstrated with redoubled vehemence. The committees, thus provoked, replied that it was fitting the imprisoned patriots should be forthwith tried, and no longer detained if they were innocent. To propose their trial was tantamount to a proposition for their enlargement, since their delinquencies were for the most part of that political character which rendered their arraignment impossible. Excepting certain members of the revolutionary committees, guilty of atrocious excesses, the majority could not be legally condemned. Several sections appeared before the convention to request that they might be granted a few days of consecutive permanence, in order to assign grounds for the arrest and disarming of those they had incarcerated; they alleged that in the hurry of the moment, they had been unable to search for proofs or to particularise reasons; but they offered to furnish them. The convention repudiated these insidious demands, which cloaked the desire of obtaining permission to assemble in permanent meetings, and it instructed the committees to submit a project for bringing the detained patriots to trial.

* [Madame de Staël was the daughter of Necker, the finance minister in the early period of the revolution. She is distinguished as the authoress of two celebrated works, "Corinne," and "De l'Allemagne." The latter especially is a work of extraordinary merit, not only from the matchless graces of its style, the admirable picture it presents of Germany, and the masterly analysis of German literature and philosophy it contains, but also from the sublime sentiments it upholds in all that concerns the great interests of humanity. The work was proscribed in France under Napoleon, his police minister, the Duke de Rovigo, writing to Madame de Staël that her production was not "French!" and ordering her to quit the realm within a week. The disgraceful conduct of Napoleon towards this lady pourtrays his character in one of its meanest and most contemptible phases. Through his unrelenting animosity she led a life of exile for many years, and resided for some time in England, where her celebrity secured her admission into the most elevated circles.]

† Decree of the 18th August.

This project gave rise to a stormy discussion. On one side it was proposed to send the patriots before the departmental tribunals; on the other, members, apprehensive of local prejudices and passions, opposed the selection of those judicatories, and advocated the appointment of a commission of twelve members taken from the convention, empowered to institute a preliminary investigation touching the detained, to liberate those against whom insufficient charges were preferred, and to consign the remainder to the criminal courts. They argued that this commission, unaffected by the animosities rankling in the departments, would act with greater justice and impartiality, and avoid confounding patriots simply misled by the ardour of their zeal with men undoubtedly culpable of having participated in the cruelties of the decemviral tyranny. All the inveterate enemies of the patriots exclaimed against the suggestion of this commission, which would doubtless proceed after the manner of the committee of general safety when remodelled subsequent to the 9th Thermidor, that is to say, by liberating en masse. They tauntingly asked how this commission of twelve members could investigate twenty or twenty five thousand different cases. They were answered very shortly, that it would manage like the committee of general safety, which had adjudicated upon eighty or a hundred thousand, on occasion of the prisons being thrown open. But this was precisely the mode of deciding on incarcerations now considered so objectionable. After a debate of several days, interspersed with petitions, one emulous of the other in the audaciousness of its terms, the resolution was finally passed that the patriots should be tried by the departmental tribunals, and the decree was referred to the committees, for the purpose of being modified in certain of its practical provisions. The continuation of the report upon deputies denounced for acts committed whilst on missions was likewise carried. Decrees of arrest were passed* against Lequinio, Lanot, Leflot, Dupin, Bô, Piorry, Maxieu, Chaudron-Rousseau, Laplanche, and Fouché; and the process against Lebon was commenced. At this period, the convention had as many of its members in prison as during the reign of terror. Thus the partisans of clemency had no especial reason to deplore the past; they had returned the full measure of evil for evil.

Meanwhile, the constitution had been presented by the commission of eleven. It was discussed during the three months of Messidor, Thermidor, and Fructidor, year 3, and was seriatim decreed with little variation. Its authors were Lesage, Daunou, Boissy-d'Anglas, Creuzé-Latouche, Berlier, Louvet, Larévellière-Lépaux, Lanjuinais, Durand-Maillane, Baudin of the Ardennes, and Thibaudeau. Sieyes had refused to form part of the commission; for on the topic of constitutions he was even more dogmatical than on other subjects. The contemplation of his whole life had been centred on constitutions; they formed his peculiar vocation. He had one ready-wove in his brain, and he was not the man to bury it in the recesses thereof. He propounded it on his own behalf, and without the intervention of the commission. The convention, from respect for his genius, willingly accorded him a hearing, but declined to adopt his scheme. We shall find it reappear at a later date, and that will be the appropriate time for making known this conception, which presents so remarkable a feature in the history of the human mind. That which the assembly adopted was in accordance with the progress made in practical knowledge. In 1791, men were at once so inexperienced and confiding, that they had not imagined as possible the existence of an aristocratic body controlling the will of the national representation, and yet they had admitted and retained with reverence, almost with affection, the royal power. But, upon more mature reflection, they might have recognised that an aristocratic body is of all countries, and even that it is more peculiarly suitable to republics; that a great state may very well dispense with a king, but never with a senate. In 1795, however, they had enjoyed abundant opportunities of judging to what disorders a single assembly is exposed, and they cheerfully consented to the establishment of a legislative body divided into two assemblies. They were then less irritated against aristocracy than against royalty, because, in truth, they dreaded the latter more at the moment. Thus they displayed greater solicitude in guarding against its semblance when deciding the composition of an executive power. The commission contained a monarchical party, comprising Lesage, Lanjuinais, Durand-Maillane, and Boissy-d'Anglas. This party proposed a president: the idea was repelled. "Some day, perhaps," said Louvet, "you would have a Bourbon presented to you." Baudin of the Ardennes and Daunou suggested two consuls; others demanded three. Five directors, deciding by a majority, were preferred. None of the essential attributes of royalty was conferred on this executive authority, such as inviolability, the sanction of laws, the judicial prerogative, or the right of peace and war. It simply possessed the common inviolability of deputies, the promulgation and execution of laws, the direction, but not the decision of war, and the negotiation, but not the ratification of treaties.

Such were the principles on which reposed the directorial constitution. The convention accordingly decreed the institution of—

A council, called of the Five Hundred, composed of five hundred members, thirty years of age at least, solely enjoying the privilege of originating laws, and renewable by a third every year;

A council, called of the Ancients, composed of two hundred and fifty members, forty years of age at least, all to be either married or widowers, enjoying the privilege of sanctioning laws, and also renewable by a third yearly;

Lastly, an executive directory, composed of five members, deliberating by a majority, renewable every year by a fifth, having responsible ministers, promulgating laws and enforcing their execution, holding the disposition of the land and sea forces, managing external relations, possessing the power to repel sudden hostilities but not to make war without the consent of the legislative body, and to negotiate treaties, submitting them to the ratification of the legislative body, with the reservation of secret articles, which it had the faculty of stipulating if they were not in contravention of the patent articles.

These different authorities were to be nominated in the following manner:—

All the citizens, twenty-one years of age, met of right in primary assemblies every first day in the month of Prairial, and appointed electoral assemblies. These electoral assemblies met every 20th of Prairial, and appointed the two councils. The two councils nominated the directory. It was judged that the executive power, holding its appointment from the legislative body, would be more dependent on it, and a consideration, founded on existing circumstances, strengthened the determination. The republic not being yet integrally associated with the habits of France, being rather a theory of enlightened men or of those compromised in the revolution than an universal sentiment, it was deemed impolitic to intrust the composition of the executive power to the masses. Hence the conclusion that, during the first years at least, the authors of the revolution, necessarily predominating in the legislative body, should hold the power of selecting directors capable of defending their work.

* Decrees of the 8th and 9th August.

The judicial functions were confided to elective judges. Justices of peace were instituted. A civil tribunal was established for each department, adjudicating causes arising in the department in the first instance, and by appeal those arising in adjacent departments. A criminal court, composed of five members and a jury, was added to the list of judicatories.

Communal assemblies were not admitted; in lieu were introduced municipal and departmental administrations, composed of three or five members and more, according to the population; they were to be formed by the mode of election. Experience prompted the adoption of certain accessory dispositions of great importance. Thus the legislative body itself assigned the place of its sessions, and could remove into any commune it pleased to select. No law could be passed without three preliminary readings, unless it were qualified as a measure of urgency, and were so recognised by the council of ancients. This regulation was intended to prevent those hasty and often-revoked decisions for which the convention had been so remarkable. Moreover, all societies self-styled popular, holding public meetings, having a regular organisation of officers (a bureau) and tribunes, with affiliations, were interdicted. The press was entirely unshackled. The emigrants were for ever expelled from the territory of the republic, the national domains irrevocably secured to the purchasers, and all creeds declared free, albeit not recognised or supported by the state.

Such was the constitution based upon the hope of maintaining France as a republic. After its adoption, a material question occurred: the Constituent Assembly, through an ostentatious disinterestedness, had excluded its members from the legislative body which superseded it; was the convention to do the same? There can be no doubt such a determination would have been an act of great imprudence. Among a volatile and fickle people, who, after sitting under the yoke of monarchy for fourteen centuries, had cast it off in a moment of enthusiasm, the republic was not so firmly rooted as to warrant abandoning its establishment to the course of events. The revolution could only be efficiently defended by its authors. The convention was composed in great part of members of both the Constituent and Legislative Assemblies; it comprised the men who had abolished the ancient feudal constitution on the 14th July and 4th August 1789, who had subverted the throne on the 10th August, who had on the 21st January immolated the head of the Bourbon dynasty, and who, during the space of three years, had made astounding efforts against banded Europe to uphold their work—they alone were capable of adequately sustaining the revolution, now consecrated in the directorial constitution. Thus, abjuring all mawkish disinterestedness, they boldly decreed, on the 5th Fructidor (22d August), that the new legislative body should, in the fraction of two-thirds, be composed of the existing convention, and that only one-third should be newly chosen. This decision originated the further question whether the convention should itself designate the two-thirds conserved, or leave that task to the electoral assemblies. After an acrimonious disputation, it was agreed, on the 13th Fructidor (30th August), that the electoral assemblies should be charged with that selection. The convention ordained, moreover, that the primary assemblies should meet on the 20th Fructidor (6th September) to accept the constitution and the two supplementary decrees of the 5th and 13th Fructidor. It likewise decreed that, after having recorded their votes on the constitution and the decrees, the primary assemblies should re-constitute themselves, and forthwith make, that is to say, in the year 3 (1795), the elections appointed for the 1st Prairial of the following year. The convention thereby proclaimed its immediate purpose to lay down the dictatorship and put the constitution in operation. It lastly resolved that the armies, although usually debarred from the privilege of deliberating, should nevertheless muster on the fields of warfare they occupied at the moment, in order to vote the constitution. It was fitting, the advocates of this measure urged, that those who were to defend should have the option of accepting the constitution. Furthermore, the armies, by this exercise of the suffrage, would feel still greater interest in the cause of the revolution.

The adoption of these resolutions threw the numerous and various enemies of the convention into a paroxysm of rage and disappointment. The constitution was an object of mere secondary importance to the majority amongst them. Any suited their views, so long as it gave occasion for a general renewal of the members of the government. The royalists desired that renewal as a means of provoking confusion, and with the view also of returning as many men favourable to their cause as possible, thus availing themselves of the republic itself to work out their schemes of royalty. It was especially dear to them, moreover, as presenting an opportunity of discarding the conventionalists, who were so deeply interested in opposing the counter-revolution, and of throwing the government into the hands of new men, inexperienced, not compromised like their predecessors, and more easy of seduction. Many literary men, authors, and obscure personages, who were devoured by a passion to enter the political career, not from any counter-revolutionary zeal, but simply from personal ambition, likewise desired this complete renewal, in order that the number of vacant seats might be multiplied. All these overspread the sections, and incited them against the decrees. The convention, they said, wished to perpetuate itself in power; it spoke of the rights of the people, and yet indefinitely postponed their exercise; it controlled them in their suffrages, and took from them the power of preferring men unsullied by crimes; it evinced a determination forcibly to preserve a majority composed of the individuals who had covered France with scaffolds. Thus, they added, the new legislature would not be purged of all the terrorists; France would not be perfectly at ease touching her future destiny; she could not enjoy the certainty of never again beholding a horrible system of terror predominant. These declamations acted upon a great number of minds—the burgher class of the sections, which was sufficiently favourable to the new institutions, but laboured under an excessive dread of the revival of terror; conscientious but irreflective men, who cherished dreams of spotless republics, and longed to see a new and pure generation seated in power; young men, enamoured of the same utopian chimeras; and, in fine, that large community greedy of novelty—all these viewed the conduct of the convention in thus prolonging its existence for two or three years with regret and disapprobation. The tribe of journalists inveighed with wonted virulence. Sundry individuals who held rank in literature or had figured in the former assemblies, appeared in the tribunes of the sections. Suard, Morellet, Lacretelle the younger, Fiévée, Vaublanc, Pastoret, Dupont of Nemours, Quatremère of Quincy, Delalot, the violent convert La Harpe, General Miranda, escaped from the imprisonment to which his behaviour at Neerwinden had consigned him, the Spaniard Marchenna, saved from the proscription of his friends the Girondists, and Lemaître the leader of the royal agency, signalised themselves by pamphlets or vehement orations in the sections. An universal turmoil prevailed.

The plan open to the malecontents was perfectly simple, namely, to accept the constitution and reject the decrees. This they accordingly proposed to do at Paris, and strenuously urged all the sections in France to imitate the example. But the intriguers who agitated the sections, and who were bent on pushing the opposition into insurrection, advocated a more extensive plan. They held that the primary assemblies, after having accepted the constitution and rejected the decrees of the 5th and 13th Fructidor, should constitute themselves permanent, declare the powers of the convention at an end, and the electoral assemblies free to choose as their deputies whomsoever they thought fit, and refuse to separate until after the installation of the new legislative body. The emissaries of Lemaitre circulated this scheme in the environs of Paris; they wrote into Normandy, where views favourable to the constitution of 1791 were assiduously inculcated, into Brittany, the Gironde, into every district, in short, where they maintained relations. One of their letters was intercepted and read from the tribune. The convention heard without alarm of the machinations in progress against it, and awaited with composure the decision of the primary assemblies throughout France, assured that the majority would declare in its favour. Nevertheless, suspecting the design of an outbreak in prospective, it ordered some troops to advance, and collected them in the camp of Les Sablons, under Paris.

The section of Lepelletier, erst Saint-Thomas, took a prominent part upon this occasion, as from its well-known sentiments was but natural: it appeared, with those of the Mail, the Butte-des-Moulins, the Champs-Elysées, and the Théatre-Français (L'Odéon), to present petitions to the assembly. They all concurred in demanding whether the Parisians had proved themselves delinquent, whether the convention distrusted them, since it had summoned troops; they moreover complained of the pretended violence offered to the freedom of election, and used this insolent expression: "Merit our suffrages, not command them." The convention replied with dignified firmness to these addresses, contenting itself with stating that it awaited with respect the manifestation of the national will, that it would defer thereto when unequivocally expressed, and that it would compel all others to yield a like obedience.

The chief object of the malecontents was to establish a central point of communication with all the sections, in order to give them a common impulse, and thus organise a revolt. Examples had been sufficiently plentiful to show that such was the primary want. The section of Lepelletier undertook to form the required centre: it was well entitled to the honour, for it had ever approved itself the most turbulent. It commenced by publishing an act of guarantee, equally inconsiderate and futile. "The powers of the constituent body," it said in substance, "ceased in presence of the sovereign people; the primary assemblies represented that sovereign people; they had the right to express any opinion whatsoever on the constitution and the decrees; they were under mutual safeguards as respected each other, and ought to give reciprocal guarantees of their independence." These, as general maxims, were undeniable, saving a modification to be appended—that the constituent body retained its powers until the fiat of the majority was pronounced. For the rest, these vain generalities were only intended as introductory to a further and graver step. The section of Lepelletier urged each of the forty-eight sections of Paris to nominate a delegate, in order that the sentiments entertained by the citizens of the metropolis on the constitution and the supplementary decrees might be expressed. Herein was involved an infraction of the laws; for the primary assemblies were prohibited from holding intercommunications—from corresponding by delegates or addresses. The convention cancelled the resolution of the section, and declared that its execution would be considered a misdemeanour affecting the public security.

The sections, not being yet sufficiently emboldened, succumbed, and proceeded to collect the votes on the constitution and the decrees. They commenced by expelling, without the semblance of any legal form, the patriots who came to record their suffrages. In some, they were quietly turned to the door of the hall; in others, they were warned by placards to remain at home, for if they presumed to appear at the sections, they would be ignominiously driven from the precincts. The persons thus debarred from exercising their franchise were very numerous; they flocked to the convention to protest against the violence offered to them. The convention reprobated the conduct of the sections, but declined to interfere, in order to avoid the appearance of canvassing for votes, and to let the very abuse prove the freedom of the deliberation. The patriots, thus excluded from their sections, took refuge in the galleries of the convention, and occupied them in great numbers; they daily pressed the committees with solicitations to restore them their arms, affirming that they were ready to employ them in the defence of the republic.

All the sections of Paris, except that of the Quinze-Vingts, accepted the constitution and rejected the decrees. The case was very different in the rest of France. Opposition, as usual, was less ardent in the provinces than in the capital. The royalists, the intriguers, the ambitious, all who had interested motives for urging the renewal of the legislative body and the government, had chiefly congregated at Paris, and were numerous there only; consequently, in the provinces the assemblies deliberated with calmness, although without the slightest constraint. They adopted the constitution almost unanimously, and the decrees by a large majority. As to the armies, they received the constitution with enthusiasm, both in Brittany and La Vendée, on the Alps and on the Rhine. The camps, converted into primary assemblies, resounded with acclamations. They were full of men devoted to the revolution, attached to it by the very perils they had undergone in its cause. That violent revulsion which had taken place in Paris against the revolutionary government was unfelt in the armies. The conscripts of 1793, with whom their ranks were filled, preserved in grateful remembrance the famous committee, which had directed and supported them so incomparably better than the new government. Removed from the sphere of private life, accustomed to brave hardships, fatigues, and death, animated by the lust of glory and by dazzling illusions, they still retained that enthusiasm, which, in the interior of France, was rapidly decaying—they were proud to call themselves soldiers of a republic upheld by them against all the kings of Europe, and with which they were closely identified, as in some sort their own work. They swore with fervour and sincerity never to let it perish. The army of the Sambre-and-Meuse, commanded by Jourdan, partook the noble sentiments of its gallant leader. It was the same which had conquered at Watignies and raised the blockade of Maubeuge; the same that had vanquished at Fleurus and given Belgium to France; the same, in fine, which, by the victories on the Ourthe and the Röer, had assured to her the bulwark of the Rhine. That army, which had best merited of the republic, was also the most attached to it. It had recently passed the Rhine; it paused on its triumphant march, and exhibited the solemn spectacle of sixty thousand men marshalled on a foreign battle-field, greeting with one accord the new republican constitution of their country.

Tidings of these events, arriving successively in Paris, diffused joy amongst the members of the convention, and corresponding sadness amongst the sectionaries. These had daily appeared, to present addresses, wherein they announced the vote of their assemblies, and proclaimed with insulting rapture that the constitution was accepted and the decrees rejected. The patriots, massed in the galleries, murmured at these declarations; but when the returns from the departments were read, recording for the most part the acceptance of both the constitution and the supplementary decrees, the patriots broke into frantic acclamations, and exulted in peals of derisive mirth over the crestfallen sectionists seated at the bar. The concluding days of Fructidor passed in scenes of this description. At length, on the 1st Vendémiaire of the year 4 (23d September 1795), the general result of the suffrages was proclaimed.

The constitution was accepted almost unanimously by the voters, and the decrees by an immense majority. Several thousand votes, nevertheless, had been given against the decrees, and, here and there, some had ventured to demand a king—a sufficient proof that the most perfect freedom had reigned in the primary assemblies. That very day, the constitution and the decrees were solemnly declared by the convention laws of the state. This declaration was followed by prolonged plaudits. The convention subsequently decreed that the primary assemblies which had not yet appointed their electors should be bound to conclude that nomination before the 10th Vendémiaire (2d October); that the electoral assemblies should be formed on the 20th, and finish their operations by the latest on the 29th (21st October); and, lastly, that the new legislative body should meet on the 15th Brumaire (6th November).

This issue of the great experiment was desolation to the sectionists. They had hoped, up to the last moment, that France would pronounce a verdict similar to that of Paris, and that they would be delivered from what they called "the two-thirds;" but the decree just passed cut off every ray of hope. Affecting to discredit the honest computation of the votes, they sent delegates to the committee of decrees, in order to investigate the records. This invidious proceeding was met with unmerited courtesy. They were allowed to examine the records, and to compare the account of votes; they found it correct. Thenceforth they had not even this forlorn objection of an error or a fraud in the calculation; nothing remained to them save an insurrection. But this was a desperate expedient, and, moreover, one not easily compassed. Those ambitious characters who desired to supplant the men of the revolution in the government of the republic; the youths who were eager to display their courage, the majority of whom, indeed, had served in the armies; the royalists, in fine, who had no other resource than an attack by force, might willingly expose themselves to the hazards of a conflict; but that mass of peaceable men, prompted to attend the sections by a dread of the terrorists rather than by political courage, was to be roused with difficulty. In the first place, insurrection was opposed to their principles: how could the avowed enemies of anarchy assail with arms the established and recognised authority of the state? Parties, it is true, are not scrupulous about contradictions or inconsistencies: but then, again, how were burghers, who had never left their desks or domiciles, to venture an attack on troops of the line fortified with artillery? However, the royalist and ambitious agitators bestirred themselves in the sections; they discoursed largely on the public interest, and on honour; they averred that the feeling of security was altogether inconsistent with the longer governance of the present conventionalists; that the country would always remain exposed to the revival of terrorism; and that, at any rate, it was ignominy to recede and tamely submit. They adroitly seized the occasion, too, to enlist vanity as one of their moving influences. The youths who had been in the armies were boisterous and exuberant; they rallied, inspirited the timid, and prevented them from manifesting their fears. An act of energy was determined upon. Groups of youths traversed the streets, vociferating, "Down with the two-thirds!" When the soldiers of the convention interfered to disperse or prevent them uttering seditious cries, they presented arms, and often discharged a volley. There were divers collisions and many shots fired in the very midst of the Palais-Royal.

Lemaitre and his colleagues, perceiving their designs thus prospering, called several Chouan chiefs and emigrants to Paris; these they sedulously secreted, awaiting the signal to bring them forth. They had succeeded also in provoking commotions at Orleans, Chartres, Dreux, Verneuil, and Nonancourt. At Chartres, a representative, by name Letellier, having failed in his efforts to quell a riot, passed a bullet through his head. Although these disturbances had been suppressed, a successful rising in Paris would probably lead to a general movement. Nothing was omitted to foment it, and too speedily the success of the conspirators appeared complete.

The expedient of an insurrection was not yet fully resolved upon; but the honest burghers of Paris gradually allowed themselves to be overcome by the hairbrained youths and the crafty intriguers. In a short while they were found indulging in bravadoes equally with the others, and became irrevocably committed. The section of Lepelletier still maintained its reputation for superior turbulence. As we have already intimated, it had been deemed essential, before forming any enterprise, to establish a central direction. The means of accomplishing this purpose had been anxiously canvassed for some time. It was suggested that the assembly of electors, nominated by all the primary assemblies of Paris, might become this central authority; but, according to the late decree of the convention, that assembly was not to meet before the 20th, a delay which the excitement of the moment could not brook. The section of Lepelletier thereupon imagined a resolution, founded on a sufficiently singular allegation. The constitution, it set forth, interposed but twenty days between the meeting of the primary assemblies and that of the electoral assemblies. The primary assemblies were convoked on this occasion for the 20th Fructidor; the electoral assemblies ought therefore to meet on the 10th Vendémiaire. The convention had fixed the 20th, however, for their muster, evidently with the view of postponing the period for putting the constitution in operation, and dividing power with the new third. In consequence, premising the necessity of protecting the rights of the citizens, the section Lepelletier resolved that the electors already appointed should immediately assemble; and it communicated the resolution to the other sections, craving their approval and concurrence. Several of these acceded accordingly. The assembly was fixed for the 11th, at the Théatre-Français (L'Odeon).

On the 11th Vendémiaire (3d October), a portion of the electors congregated in the theatre, under the protection of certain battalions of the national guard. A multitude of persons, attracted by curiosity, gathered on the Place de L'Odéon, and soon formed a considerable assemblage. The committees of general safety and public welfare, together with the three representatives who, since the 4th Prairial, had retained the direction of the armed force, were always united on important occasions. They hastened to the convention in order to denounce this preliminary infraction, which evidently denoted, as they deemed, an ultimate project of insurrection. The convention was engaged in celebrating, in the hall of its sessions, a funereal festival in honour of the lamented Girondists. It was proposed to postpone the solemnity: Tallien controverted the suggestion; he said it would be unworthy of the convention to interrupt its proceedings; amidst all perils it ought to pursue the even tenor of its duties. A decree was passed, enjoining every meeting of electors, formed either in an illegal manner or before the prescribed term, or for an object alien to their electoral functions, immediately to separate. To afford those an outlet who might be disposed to recede, a clause was added to the decree, bearing that all who had been led into illegal practices, and should forthwith return to their duty, would be exempted from prosecution. Certain officers of police, under an escort of six dragoons, were dispatched to the Place de L'Odéon, with instructions to proclaim the decree. The committees were desirous to avoid, as far as possible, the employment of force. The crowd around the Odéon had increased as the night advanced. The interior of the theatre was dimly lighted; the boxes were filled with a vast concourse of sectionaries; those who took an active part in the movement perambulated the stage in great excitement. Indecision reigned in the meeting; the malecontents ventured neither to deliberate nor to decide. On learning the arrival of the officers of police commissioned to read the decree, they hurried to the open square. The crowd had already surrounded those functionaries; they instantly rushed upon them, extinguished the torches they carried, and compelled the dragoons to fly. They then returned into the theatre, in exultation at this achievement; they delivered sundry orations, and vowed with oaths to resist tyranny; but no measure was taken to abet the decisive act they had just committed. Meanwhile the night was progressing: many of the sectionaries and of the curious retired; the theatre began rapidly to disgorge its unruly occupants, and remained completely deserted at the approach of the armed force, which speedily reached the locality. The committees had ordered General Menou, appointed since the 4th Prairial general of the army of the interior, to advance with a column from the camp of Les Sablons. The column arrived with two pieces of ordnance, but discovered no living soul either loitering on the square or lurking in the theatre of L'Odéon.

This occurrence, although without result, caused a great sensation. The sectionaries were flushed with their demonstration of strength, and invigorated in courage, as generally happens after an open defiance of authority. The convention and its partisans viewed with alarm the events of this day; and, more prompt to dread the resolutions of their adversaries than the latter to form them, they no longer doubted an insurrection was intended. The patriots, albeit wroth with the convention, which had treated them so severely, but inspired with their usual indomitable ardour, felt that they ought to sacrifice their resentment to their cause; and, in the course of that same night, they flocked in numbers to the committees, for the purpose of tendering their assistance and demanding arms. Some had but just issued from prison, others had been excluded from the primary assemblies, all had the most powerful motives for zeal. To them were joined numerous officers struck from the rolls of the army by the reactor Aubry. The Thermidorians, still predominating in the committees, and now entirely allied to the Mountain, were well disposed to receive the offers of the patriots with approbation, and their opinion was supported by more than one Girondist. Louvet, in meetings which were held at the house of a common friend of the Girondists and the Thermidorians, had already proposed to re-arm the faubourgs and even re-open the Jacobin Club, reserving the power of subsequently closing it should the necessity recur. The committees, therefore, promptly determined to deliver arms to all the citizens who presented themselves, and gave them for officers the military men then at Paris without employment. The veteran General Berruyer was charged to command them. This operation of arming the patriots was effected during the morning of the 12th. The intelligence quickly travelled into all the quarters of Paris. It furnished an admirable pretext for the agitators of the sections, who were striving to compromise the peaceable citizens of the metropolis. The convention purposed, they alleged, to recommence the system of terror, since it had re-armed the terrorists; it was preparing to let them loose on all honest people; persons and property were no longer in safety; arms must be taken up in pure self-defence. In truth, the sections of Lepelletier, the Butte-des-Moulins, the Social Contract, the Théatre-Français, the Luxembourg, the Rue Poissonnière, Brutus, the Temple, declared themselves in insurrection, caused the tattoo to be beaten in their wards, and enjoined all citizens in the national guard to repair to their battalions, in order to watch over the public safety, menaced by the terrorists. The section of Lepelletier forthwith constituted itself permanent, and became the centre of all the counter-revolutionary machinations. The drummers and proclamators of the sections overspread Paris with singular audacity, and carried every where the signal of revolt. The citizens, excited by the reports in circulation, hastened in arms to their sections, ready to yield to all the suggestions of impetuous and imprudent youths, and of a perfidious faction.

The convention declared itself in permanence, and charged its committees to watch over the public safety and the execution of its decrees. It repealed the law which ordained the disarming of the patriots, and thus legalised the steps taken by the committees. At the same time, it published a proclamation designed to tranquillise the inhabitants of Paris and calm their disquietude as to the intentions and patriotism of the men to whom arms had been restored.

The committees, perceiving that the section of Lepelletier had become the focus of intrigue, and would shortly perhaps be the head-quarters of rebellion, resolved that the section should be surrounded and disarmed without delay. Menou received a fresh order to quit Les Sablons with a corps of troops and artillery. This General Menou, an excellent officer, mild and moderate as a citizen, had led throughout the revolution a painful and harassing existence. Sent to combat in La Vendée, he had been tormented by all the vexatious proceedings of the Ronsin party. Transferred to Paris, and threatened with a trial, he had owed his life to the timely occurrence of the 9th Thermidor. Nominated general of the army of the interior on the 4th Prairial, and directed to march on the faubourgs, he had upon that occasion to oppose men who were his natural enemies—men, moreover, proscribed by opinion, and who, above all, cared, in their furious energy, too little for the lives of others to inspire scruples about sacrificing theirs; but now it was the superior population of the capital, the youth of the best families, the class, in short, which ruled opinion, that he was appointed to massacre, if it persisted in its heedless criminality. He was thrown, therefore, into cruel perplexity by this consideration, as is usual with a weak man who shrinks from resigning his commission, and yet cannot reconcile himself to a rigorous line of duty. He put his columns in motion with great tardiness; he allowed the sections the whole day of the 12th to act and publish proclamations as they listed; he even opened a secret parley with some of their leaders, instead of acting promptly; and declared to the three representatives intrusted with the direction of the armed force, that he would not have under his orders the battalion of patriots. The representatives intimated to him, in reply, that the battalion, so obnoxious in his eyes, was placed under the sole command of General Berruyer. They urged him to fulfil the injunctions of the committees, without denouncing to them his indecision and lukewarmness. They detected, moreover, a similar repugnance on the part of sundry officers, and amongst others, in the two generals of brigade, Despierre and Debar, who, pretending illness, absented themselves from their posts. At length, as night was closing in, Menou advanced, with the representative Laporte, on the section of Lepelletier. It was sitting in the convent of the Filles Saint-Thomas, which has been since replaced by the fine structure of the Exchange. They proceeded thither by the Rue Vivienne. Menou accumulated his infantry, cavalry, and artillery, in this street, placing himself in a position where he would have fought under great disadvantages, encompassed by the multitude of sectionaries, who blocked all the outlets and crowded the windows of the houses. He eventually planted his cannon before the door of the convent, and entered, with the representative Laporte and a battalion, into the hall occupied by the section. The members of the section, instead of being formed into a deliberative assembly, were under arms and drawn up in line, with their president, M. Delalot, at their head. The general and the representative summoned them to surrender their arms; they sternly refused. The president Delalot, seeing the faintness and hesitation with which the summons was made, replied with warmth, addressed the soldiers of Menou pertinently and with much presence of mind, and announced that the last extremities must be resorted to before the section would lay down its arms. To commence an engagement in that confined area, or to retire and bombard the convent with cannon-balls, was a dolorous alternative undoubtedly; but if Menou had spoken with firmness and pointed his cannon in readiness to fire, it is questionable whether the resolution of the sectionaries would not have quailed. Menou and Laporte preferred a capitulation; they undertook to withdraw the troops of the convention, on receiving a pledge that the section would instantly separate: it gave, or feigned to give, the required promise. A part of its battalion actually defiled as if to retire. Menou, on his part, left the building with his company, and wheeled round his columns, which experienced great difficulty in traversing the multitude amassed in the surrounding quarters. Whilst he thus weakly recoiled before the firmness of the section, that body re-entered its hall of session, and, proud of its successful resistance, was more than ever confirmed in its rebellious spirit. The report quickly circulated that the decrees were not executed, that the insurrection was triumphant, that the troops had returned without having succeeded in enforcing the authority of the convention. Numerous spectators of the late scene flew to the galleries of the convention, which was in permanence, apprised the deputies of its incidents, and soon from all sides voices were heard vociferating, "We are betrayed! we are betrayed! General Menou to the bar!" The committees were ordered to attend and give explanations.

At this moment the committees, warned of the pusillanimous retreat of their general, were in the utmost alarm and agitation. They determined to arrest Menou, and judge him on the instant. But his punishment could not retrieve affairs; what he had lacked fortitude to perform required to be done, and promptly too. But forty individuals, discussing measures of execution, were little adapted for resolving and acting with the necessary vigour and precision. Nor were three persons, holding the command of the armed force, fitted to exercise an authority equal to the emergency. The idea of nominating a single leader was suggested, as on all critical occasions; and at this instant, which vividly recalled the dangers of the 9th Thermidor, memory reverted to the deputy Barras, who, in his capacity of general of brigade, had received the command on that famous day, and acquitted himself with all the energy desirable. The deputy Barras was tall in stature, and possessed a sonorous voice; he was incapable of making long speeches, but he excelled in the art of extemporising short, graphic, and vehement phrases, which obtained for him the reputation of a resolute and sincere man. He was now, accordingly, appointed general of the army of the interior, and given as adjuncts the three representatives previously charged with the direction of the armed force. This selection of the committees proved singularly happy, from a circumstance which may be deemed fortuitous. Barras had near him an officer eminently qualified to command, and he dared not have displayed the deplorable meanness of throwing aside a man he knew to be more able than himself. All the deputies commissioned to the army of Italy were acquainted with the young officer of artillery who had decided the capture of Toulon, and carried Saorgio and the lines of the Roya. That young officer, after attaining the rank of general of brigade, had been superseded by Aubry, and was condemned to loiter in Paris, inactive and almost reduced to indigence.* He had been introduced to Madame Tallien, who received him with her accustomed amiability, and even exerted her powers of solicitation in his behalf. His figure was slight, and somewhat short, his cheeks hollow and livid; but his expressive features, his fixed and piercing eyes, the firmness and originality of his language, attracted attention. He frequently spoke of a decisive theatre of war, where the republic would find victories and peace: he meant Italy. He laboured assiduously to impress that belief: it was the constant theme of his discourse. Thus, when the lines of the Apennines were lost under Kellermann, he was called before the committee to propound his views. The committee at that time confided to him the framing of dispatches, and he had remained attached to the direction of the military operations. Barras remembered him on the 12th Vendémiaire, and demanded him as second in command, which was accorded. The two nominations, submitted to the convention the same night, were immediately confirmed. Barras delegated the care of the military operations to the young general, who undertook the charge with alacrity, and proceeded to issue orders with extreme activity.

Meanwhile, the call to arms had continued to beat in all the quarters of Paris. Emissaries had been dispatched in every direction to extol the resistance and success of the section Lepelletier, exaggerate its dangers, inculcate that those dangers were common to all the sections, pique their spirit of emulation and honour, and excite them to rival the brave grenadiers of Saint-Thomas. These instigations were successful. Men hastened from all parts, and a central military committee was at length formed in the section of Lepelletier, under the presidency of the journalist Richer-Serizy. The project of an insurrection was finally decided: the battalions mustered, irresolute men were borne along almost in their own despite, and the whole burgher class of Paris, deluded upon a false point of honour, prepared to play a part little adapted to its habits or fitted to promote its interests.

The time was past for entertaining the idea of

* [The following notice of Bonaparte at this period, when we reflect on his future destiny, seems inexpressibly interesting. It is taken from the memoirs of the Duchess D'Abrantes:—

'On Bonaparte's return to Paris, he was in very destitute circumstances. From time to time he received remittances, I suspect from his brother Joseph, but with all his economy, these supplies were insufficient. He was therefore in absolute distress. Junot used often to speak of the six months they passed together in Paris at this time. When they took an evening stroll on the Boulevard, which used to be the resort of young men mounted on fine horses and displaying all the luxuries which they were permitted to show at that time, Bonaparte would declaim against fate, and express his contempt for the coxcombs, who, as they rode past, would eulogise in ecstacy the manner in which Madame Solo sang. 'And is it on such beings as these,' he would say, 'that Fortune confers her favours? Heavens, how contemptible is human nature!' His friend Junot used occasionally to resort to the gaming-table; he was often successful, and on these occasions he and Bonaparte used to make merry and pay off their most pressing debts. The latter was at that time attired in the costume he wore almost ever after. He had on a grey greatcoat very plainly made, buttoned up to his chin; a round hat, which was either drawn over his forehead so as almost to conceal his eyes, or stuck upon the back of his head so that it appeared in danger of falling off; and a black cravat very clumsily tied." It was at this time that he is stated to have left his sword at a coffee house in security of his reckoning, redeemed by Talma, the celebrated tragedian.]

marching on the section Lepelletier, to crush the insurrection in embryo. The convention had only about five thousand troops of the line at its disposal. If all the sections manifested the like zeal, they could bring together forty thousand men, perfectly armed and organised, and it was assuredly not with five thousand men the convention could venture to advance through the streets of a large capital, upon forty thousand redoubtable adversaries. The utmost hope, therefore, was to defend the convention by converting it into an intrenched camp. This was the course projected by General Bonaparte. The sections were devoid of artillery; they had all delivered up their cannon after the 4th Prairial, and the most turbulent at present were then the first to give the example, in order to ensure the disarming of the Faubourg Saint-Antoine. This was a circumstance of great advantage to the convention. The entire park was located in the camp of Les Sablons. One of Bonaparte's first measures was to order Colonel Murat to take three hundred horses and bring the whole into Paris. That officer arrived at the very moment a battalion of the section Lepelletier was advancing to seize the park; he outstripped the battalion, yoked his horses, and dragged the pieces to the Tuileries. Bonaparte then took his precautions for barricading the avenues. He had five thousand soldiers of the line; a troop of patriots, which, since the preceding night, had been increased to fifteen hundred men; several gendarmes of the tribunals, disarmed in Prairial and re-armed on this occasion; and, lastly, the police legion, and a few invalids, the whole scarcely amounting to eight thousand men. He distributed his troops and artillery in the streets Cul-de-sac Dauphine, L'Echelle, Rohan, and Saint-Nicaise; on the Pont-Neuf, the Pont-Royal, and the Pont Louis XVI.; on the places Louis XV. and Vendôme—on all the points, in short, whereby the convention was accessible. He placed his corps of cavalry, and a part of his infantry, in reserve on the Carrousel and in the garden of the Tuileries. He directed that all the provisions stored in Paris should be transported to the Tuileries, and that a depôt of munitions, and an infirmary for the wounded, should be likewise established in that palace. He sent a detachment to seize the depôt of Meudon, and to occupy its heights, with the view of retiring on that point with the convention in case of a reverse. He caused the Saint-Germain road to be blockaded, in order to prevent cannon being brought to the rebels; and chests of arms to be conveyed to the Faubourg Saint-Antoine, in order to arm the section of the Quinze-Vingts, which had alone voted for the decrees, and whose zeal Fréron had proceeded to kindle. These dispositions were completed during the morning of the 13th. Orders were issued to the republican troops to await aggression, and to avoid provoking it.

During the like interval, the committee of insurrection, established at the section of Lepelletier, had likewise made its dispositions. It had declared the governing committees out of the pale of the law, and instituted a species of tribunal to judge those who should resist the sovereignty of the sections. Sundry generals had appeared to offer it their services—a Vendéan, known under the name of the Count de Maulevrier, and a young emigrant, called Lafond, emerged from their retreats to direct the movement. The Generals Duhoux and Danican, who had commanded the republican armies in La Vendée, had joined the insurgents. Danican was a restless personage, better calculated to shine as a declaimer in clubs than as the commander of an army; he had been a friend of Hoche, who often rebuked him for his vagaries and inconsistencies. He was now at Paris, erased from the army-list, discontented with the government, and quite prepared to embrace any desperate project; he was appointed generalissimo of the sections. The determination having been irrevocably taken to wage battle, and the citizens being committed to the enterprise past recall, a regular plan of attack was digested. The sections of the Faubourg Saint-Germain, under the orders of the Count de Maulevrier, were to start from the Odéon with the view of attacking the Tuileries by the bridges; the sections on the right bank of the Seine were to advance by the Rue Saint-Honoré and all the cross streets leading from the Rue Saint-Honoré to the Tuileries. A detachment, under the orders of young Lafond, was to occupy the Pont-Neuf, so as to preserve the communication between the two divisions of the sectionary army. In the van of the columns were stationed the young men who had served in the armies, and who were best adapted for standing the fire of artillery. Of the forty thousand men composing the national guard, twenty or twenty-seven thousand at the utmost were present under arms. An infinitely surer manœuvre was open to them than that of confronting the fire of the batteries in deep columns; this consisted in throwing up barricades in the streets, enclosing the convention and its troops in the Tuileries, seizing upon the surrounding houses, directing thence a continuous fire, picking off the defenders of the national representation, and thus leisurely reducing them by bullets and famine. But the insurgents thought only of a direct assault, and expected by a single charge to penetrate to the palace, and force their way into its precincts.

In the course of the morning, the section of Poissonnière intercepted the artillery horses and the arms intended for the section of the Quinze-Vingts; that of Mont-Blanc carried off the provisions destined for the Tuileries; a detachment of the section Lepelletier took possession of the Treasury. Lafond, at the head of several companies, moved towards the Pont-Neuf, whilst other battalions proceeded by the Rue Dauphine. General Carteaux had been charged to guard that bridge with four hundred men and four pieces of cannon. Not wishing to commence the engagement, he retired upon the quay of the Louvre. The battalions of the sections advanced on all sides, and drew up a few paces from the posts of the convention, sufficiently near to converse with the sentinels.

The troops of the convention would have had a decided advantage if they had taken the initiative, and probably, by making a sudden attack, they would have thrown the assailants into confusion; but the generals had been recommended to await aggression. In consequence, notwithstanding the acts of hostility already committed, notwithstanding the abduction of the artillery horses, the seizure of the provisions destined for the Tuileries and of the arms forwarded to the Quinze-Vingts, and the murder of an hussar attached to the ordnance, slain in the Rue Saint-Honoré, they still persisted in maintaining a defensive attitude.

The forenoon had thus elapsed in preparations on the part of the sections, in observance on the part of the conventional army, when Danican, before beginning the combat, deemed it fitting to dispatch an envoy to the committees with a tender of conditions. Barras and Bonaparte were visiting the posts when the envoy was conducted to them, his eyes bandaged as in a place of war. They directed him to be led before the committees. The envoy spoke in very menacing terms, and offered peace on condition that the patriots were disarmed and the supplementary decrees of the 5th and 13th Fructidor repealed. Such conditions were inadmissible; and, furthermore, none could be then entertained. However, the committees, deliberating to avoid a specific answer, resolved to nominate twenty-four deputies for the purpose of fraternising with the sections—an expedient which had often succeeded; for words of conciliation have a mighty effect on men ready to engage in mortal strife, and they willingly accede to an arrangement which may obviate the necessity of the murderous appeal. Meanwhile Danican, receiving no reply to his propositions, issued orders for the attack. Volleys of musketry were heard: Bonaparte sent into one of the rooms of the convention eight hundred guns and cartouche-boxes, in order to arm the representatives themselves, who would serve, in case of need, as a body of reserve. This precaution made manifest the full extent of the danger. Each deputy hastened to take his seat, and, following the precedent of earlier crises, the assembly awaited in profound stillness the result of the combat, the first regular battle it had waged against the revolted sections.

It was half-past four, afternoon. Bonaparte, accompanied by Barras, mounted his horse in the court of the Tuileries, and galloped to the post of the Cul-de-sac Dauphine, fronting the church of Saint-Roch. The sectionary battalions filled the Street Saint-Honoré, and were pushing towards the entrance of the cul-de-sac. One of their best battalions had taken post on the steps of the church Saint-Roch, and was placed in an advantageous position for shooting the conventional artillerymen. Bonaparte, well aware of the importance of the first blow, immediately advanced his pieces, and ordered a general discharge. The sectionaries retorted by a continuous volley of musketry; but Bonaparte, showering upon them grape-shot, obliged them to recoil on the steps of the church Saint-Roch; he instantly debouched into the Street Saint-Honoré, and directed upon the church a troop of patriots, who fought by his side with the greatest intrepidity, and who were moreover animated by the injuries they had to avenge. The sectionaries, after a vigorous resistance, were dislodged. Bonaparte, turning his pieces to the right and to the left, swept the whole length of the Rue Saint-Honoré. The assailants forthwith fled on all sides, and retreated in the utmost disorder. Thereupon Bonaparte left to an officer the task of continuing the fire and completing the defeat; he himself returned towards the Carrousel, and hurried to the other posts. He every where ordered discharges of grape, and soon put to flight those unfortunate sectionaries, so imprudently exposed in deep columns to the effects of artillery. The sectionaries, although having at their head men of great bravery, fled precipitately towards the head-quarters of the Filles Saint-Thomas. Danican and the other leaders then recognised the fault they had committed in marching on intrenched cannon instead of throwing up barricades and effecting a lodgment in the houses contiguous to the Tuileries. However, their courage was still buoyant, and they determined to make a renewed effort. They agreed to operate a junction with the columns advancing from the Faubourg Saint-Germain, with the view of attempting a general assault on the bridges. Accordingly, they rallied from six to eight thousand men, directed them towards the Pont-Neuf, where Lafond was posted with his troop, and coalesced with the battalions coming from the Rue Dauphine, under the command of Count Maulevrier. All blended together, advanced in close column from the Pont-Neuf towards the Pont-Royal, following the Quay Voltaire. Bonaparte, always present where danger called, had hastened to this locality. He planted several batteries on the quay of the Tuileries, which runs parallel with the Quay Voltaire; he caused the cannons placed at the end of the Pont-Royal to be moved forward, and pointed so as to enfilade the quay whereby the assailants were approaching. These measures taken, he allowed the sectionaries to draw near; suddenly he gave the word to fire. Volleys of grape poured from the bridge, and mowed the sectionaries in front; simultaneous discharges crossed from the quay of the Tuileries, and swept them in flank. Dreadful havoc ensued in their ranks: the insurgents were stricken with dismay. Young Lafond, still undaunted, rallied around him his firmest soldiers, and continued to push for the bridge, with the hope of capturing the ordnance. A redoubled fire scattered his column. He vainly strove to rally it a last time; it fled and dispersed in all directions before the terrific thunder of the artillery.

At six o'clock, the conflict, commenced half an hour before five, was over. Bonaparte, who had evinced merciless energy in action, and fired on the population of the capital as on Austrian battalions, now gave orders to load with powder only, to consummate the discomfiture of the rebels. Some sectionaries had intrenched themselves on the Place Vendôme, in the church of Saint-Roch, and in the Palais-Royal. He caused his troops to debouch by all the avenues of the Rue Saint-Honoré, and detached a corps which, starting from the Place Louis-Quinze, traversed the Rue Royale, and skirted the Boulevards. He thus rendered the Place Vendôme untenable, cleared the church of Saint-Roch, invested the Palais-Royal, and blockaded its area, in order to avoid the hazards of a nocturnal combat.

The following morning a few shots sufficed to procure the evacuation of the Palais-Royal and the convent of the section Lepelletier, where the insurgents had contemplated intrenching themselves. Bonaparte threw down some barricades formed near the barrier of Les Sergents, and stopped a detachment advancing from Saint-Germain with cannon for the sectionaries. Tranquillity was entirely re-established during the forenoon of the 14th. The dead were removed with all speed, and every other trace of the melancholy conflict forthwith obliterated. Three or four hundred bodies were collected, killed and wounded on both sides.

This victory excited general joy amongst the sincere friends of the republic, who could not be insensible to the influence of royalism in the recent movement. It restored to the menaced convention, that is to say to the revolution and its authors, the authority they so much needed for the consolidation of the new institutions. At the same time, an universal sentiment prevailed adverse to harshness and severity. A reproach was ready-coined against the convention: malignants were prepared to assert that it had fought on the late occasion under the banner of terrorism, and with the view of re-establishing its reign. Hence the importance of averting all pretext for the imputation that it purposed to shed blood. Moreover, the sectionaries had approved themselves but sorry conspirators, and showed they were far from possessing the energy of the patriots; they had hastened to regain their homes, satisfied with their escape from the dangers of the day, and proud of having braved for an instant that artillery which had so often shattered the lines of Brunswick and Cobourg. So that they were left to indulge in harmless boasts of their courage, there was little fear of their becoming dangerous. Upon these considerations, therefore, the convention contented itself with dismissing the staff of the national guard, dissolving the companies of grenadiers and chasseurs, which were the best organised of the sectionary forces, and contained almost all the young men of the "gilded youth," placing the national guard for the future under the orders of the general commanding the army of the interior, ordaining the sections Lepelletier and the Théatre-Français to be disarmed, and instituting three commissions to try the chiefs of the rebellion, who, however, had for the most part disappeared.

The companies of grenadiers and chasseurs quietly yielded to the order for their dissolution; the sections of Lepelletier and the Théatre-Français surrendered their arms without resistance; all, in fact, evinced a docile and submissive spirit. The committees, fully participating in the general bias to lenity, allowed the implicated to escape by flight or to remain in careless concealment at Paris. The commissions pronounced all their sentences in contumacy. One only of the armed leaders was apprehended—young Lafond. He had inspired considerable interest by his intrepidity, and a wish to spare him was entertained; but he obstinately insisted on avowing himself a returned emigrant, and vindicating his rebellion: it was found impossible to pardon him. So great was the tolerance, that a member of the committee formed to direct the insurrection at the section of Lepelletier, M. de Castellane, encountering a patrol one night, who challenged him with the usual cry, "Who goes there?" replied, "Castellane, an outlaw!" The consequences of the 13th Vendémiaire, therefore, were singularly bloodless, and the capital was saved from any of those harrowing scenes which had so often thrown it into sadness and gloom. The guilty retired, or walked freely abroad, and the saloons resounded with narratives of the exploits they were not afraid to recount. Instead of punishing those who had attacked it, the convention rewarded those who had defended it; it declared they had deserved well of the country, voted them subsidies, and accorded to Barras and Bonaparte, in particular, distinguished honours. Barras, already celebrated for his conduct during the 9th Thermidor, reaped vast additional renown from the affair of Vendémiaire: the preservation of the convention was attributed to his exertions. However, he had the candour to throw part of his glory on his young lieutenant. "It is General Bonaparte," he said, "whose prompt and skilful dispositions saved this edifice." These words were warmly applauded. The command of the army of the interior was confirmed to Barras, and the post of second in command to Bonaparte.

The royalist intriguers were somewhat puzzled to account for this issue of the grand insurrection. They wrote to Verona that they had been deceived by every one; that money had been deplorably deficient; that "where there ought to have been gold they had scarcely found old rags;" that "the monarchist deputies, those from whom they had promises, had wofully deceived them, and played a villanous game;" that "they were a Jacobinical race, in whom no trust could be placed;" that, "unfortunately, those who wished well to the cause had not been sufficiently compromised and committed;" that "the royalists of Paris with black and green collars and braided hair, who were such braggadocios under the roofs of theatres, had fled at the first musket-shot, and concealed themselves beneath the beds of the women who countenanced them."

Lemaitre, their leader, had been arrested with other instigators of the section Lepelletier. At his house a quantity of papers had been seized: the royalists were struck with apprehension lest these papers might betray the secret of their plot, and, above all, lest Lemaitre himself might make fatal revelations. Still they were far from losing courage; their trusty adepts in agitation continued to perambulate the sections. The impunity allowed to the sectionaries had conduced to resuscitate their hardihood. Since the convention, they argued, although victorious, dared not punish them, it clearly recognised that opinion was on their side; it could not be sure of the justice of its cause since it thus hesitated. Accordingly, notwithstanding their defeat, they assumed an air of superiority over the convention, and reappeared in the electoral assemblies to carry the elections in conformity with their views. Those assemblies were appointed to meet on the 20th Vendémiaire and to continue until the 30th; the new legislative body was convoked for the 5th Brumaire. At Paris, the royalist agents secured the nomination of the conventionalist Saladin, whom they had previously gained. In several departments they provoked collisions; schisms ensued in many of the electoral assemblies, and those bodies separated into two hostile parts.

These machinations, this revival of audacity, contributed greatly to irritate the patriots who had seen, in the events of the 13th, all their prognostics realised, and were proud at once of having divined so justly, and of having overcome by their courage the danger they had foretold. They were naturally desirous that the victory should not be wholly useless to their party, but lead to retributive severities on their adversaries, and reparations to their friends detained in the prisons. Thus they framed petitions, wherein they craved the liberation of patriots in captivity, the dismissal of the officers appointed by Aubry, the restoration to their grades of those superseded by him, the trial of the incarcerated deputies, and their reintegration on the electoral lists, if they should be proved innocent. The Mountain, supported by the galleries which were filled with patriots, cheered these demands, and contended with vehemence for their adoption. Tallien, the civil leader of the predominant party, as Barras was its military chief, and who had recently approximated towards the Mountain, strove to moderate its violence, and caused the withdrawal of the last demand relative to the insertion of the imprisoned deputies on the electoral lists, as contrary to the decrees of the 5th and 13th Fructidor. Those decrees, in fact, declared ineligible the deputies actually suspended from their functions. However, the Mountain was equally difficult to keep in check as the sectionaries; and it seemed almost impossible that the latter days of the National Convention, which had but a decade to sit, could elapse without some final storm to illustrate its demise.

The intelligence from the frontiers likewise tended to foment agitation, by arousing suspicions on the part of the patriots, and stimulating the inextinguishable hopes of the royalists. We have mentioned that Jourdan had passed the Rhine at Düsseldorf, and advanced on the Sieg; that Pichegru had entered Manheim, and thrown a division beyond the Rhine. These propitious events had failed to inspire the so-much-vaunted Pichegru with any great conception, and he had fully demonstrated either his incapacity or perfidy. According to analogous deductions, we should attribute his errors to incapacity, for, even with the contemplation of treachery, a man never refuses an opportunity of obtaining signal advantages: they always serve to enhance the value of his defection. Nevertheless, contemporaries worthy of credit have judged that his false manœuvres must be imputed to treachery; in which case he is the only general known in history who has wilfully contrived his own discomfiture. It was not a mere corps he ought to have thrown beyond Manheim, but his entire army, in order to seize upon Heidelberg, which is the essential point where the roads cross leading from the Upper Rhine into the valleys of the Neckar and the Maine. He would thus have occupied the point whereby Wurmser could effect a junction with Clairfayt, for ever separated those two generals, and made sure of the position, enabling him to unite with Jourdan and to form with him a mass capable of successively overwhelming Clairfayt and Wurmser. Clairfayt, discerning the danger, quitted the banks of the Maine, and hastened to Heidelberg; but his lieutenant, Kwasdanovich, aided by Wurmser, had already succeeded in dislodging from Heidelberg the division which Pichegru had planted in that place. Thereupon, Pichegru being immured in Manheim, and himself relieved from all apprehensions as to his communications with Wurmser, Clairfayt immediately marched on Jourdan. This latter general, squeezed between the Rhine and the line of the Prussian neutrality, debarred from using the country in a hostile manner, and having no service organised for drawing resources from the Low Countries, found himself in a most critical position, where he could neither advance forward nor operate a junction with Pichegru. Moreover, Clairfayt, not respecting the neutrality, had extended his forces in such a manner as to turn his left, and threaten to drive him into the Rhine. It was impossible for Jourdan, therefore, to remain where he was. The representatives and the generals, convoked in a council of war, recommended that he should recoil on Mayence, and form the blockade of that city on the right bank. But that position would be equally hazardous with the preceding; it left him in the same destitution, exposed him to the attacks of Clairfayt in a disadvantageous situation, and subjected him to the risk of losing his communications towards Düsseldorf; in consequence, it was ultimately determined that he should execute a retreat, with the view of regaining the Lower Rhine, which he accomplished in good order, and without being incommoded by Clairfayt, who, revolving a grand project, returned upon the Maine in order to keep in the vicinity of Mayence.

The effect of these tidings, intimating the retrograde march of the army of the Sambre-and-Meuse, was aggravated by sinister rumours touching the army of Italy. Schérer had joined it with two excellent divisions from the Eastern Pyrenees, rendered disposable by the peace with Spain; but nevertheless that general was stated to view his position as extremely precarious, and to have demanded succours in matériel and supplies, which the government could not forward to him, and without which he threatened to make a retrograde movement. Lastly, reports were circulated of a second expedition from England, bearing the Count d'Artois and numerous troops for disembarkation.

These various tidings, although little alarming as regarded the stability of the republic, which still held the course of the Rhine, possessed two additional armies to detach, the one into Italy and the other into La Vendée, and had such recent grounds, in the event at Quiberon, for confidently relying on Hoche and disregarding the expeditions of the emigrants, tended notwithstanding to reinvigorate the royalists, prostrated for the moment by the 13th Vendémiaire, and to exasperate the patriots, discontented with the manner in which that victory had been used. The discovery of Lemaitre's correspondence, above all, produced a most baneful impression. Therein was detected the entire plot, as it had been long suspected. All doubts were removed as to the existence of a secret agency established at Paris, communicating with Verona, La Vendée, and all the provinces of France, fomenting counter-revolutionary movements, and maintaining intelligence with several members of the convention and the committees. The very boasting of those wretched agents, who plumed themselves on having gained sometimes generals, sometimes deputies, and who professed to hold intimate relations with the monarchists and the Thermidorians, contributed still more to excite distrust, and to throw doubts upon the honesty of the members of the right side.

Rovère and Saladin had been previously designated as disguised royalists, and now irrefragable proofs were obtained against them. The latter had published a pamphlet against the decrees of the 5th and 13th Fructidor, and been rewarded therefor by the suffrages of the Parisian electors. Lesage [d'Eure-et-Loire], Larivière, Boissy-d'Anglas, and Lanjuinais, were likewise marked as secret accomplices of the royalist agency. Their silence during the days of the 11th, 12th, and 13th Vendémiaire, had given rise to severe comments. The counter-revolutionary journals, by assiduously extolling them, contributed to compromise them more effectually. These same journals, which so zealously lauded the seventy-three, fiercely vituperated the Thermidorians. Under such circumstances, a rupture must almost necessarily ensue. The seventy-three and the Thermidorians still continued to meet at the house of a common friend; but mutual alienation and want of confidence were manifested in their intercourse. Towards the latter days of the session, conversation turned, at one of these meetings, on the new elections, on the intrigues of the royalists to influence them, and on the silence of Boissy-d'Anglas, Lanjuinais, Larivière, and Lesage, during the scenes of Vendémiaire. Legendre, with his usual impetuosity, upbraided the four deputies who were present with this silence. They attempted to justify themselves. Lanjuinais allowed to escape him the singular expression of the massacre of the 13th Vendémiaire, thus exhibiting a marvellous confusion of ideas, or sentiments but slenderly republican. Tallien, upon hearing this phrase, was moved with the utmost wrath, and prepared to leave the apartment, exclaiming that he would not longer remain in the society of royalists, but proceed to denounce them before the convention. The company intercepted him in his purpose, calmed his irritation, and strove to palliate the language of Lanjuinais. Nevertheless, the parties separated in avowed hostility.

Meanwhile, the excitement grew more vivid in Paris; misgivings multiplied on all sides, and suspicions of royalism extended vaguely and indefinitely. Tallien moved the convention to resolve itself into a secret committee, and then formally denounced Lesage, Larivière, Boissy-d'Anglas, and Lanjuinais. His proofs were not sufficient; they rested only on deductions more or less probable, and the accusation was not sustained. Louvet, although attached to the Thermidorians, declined to support the denunciation against the four deputies, who were his personal friends; but he accused Rovère and Saladin, and expatiated on their conduct in vehement terms. He retraced their career in its alternations from the most rabid terrorism to the most violent royalism, and provoked a decree of arrest against them. The like proceeding was adopted against Lhomond, compromised by Lemaitre and by Aubry, the author of the military reaction.

The adversaries of Tallien moved, in reprisal, the publication of a letter from the pretender to the Duc d'Harcourt, wherein, speaking of what was communicated to him from Paris, he said, "I cannot believe that Tallien is a royalist of the true kind." It will be recollected that the agents at Paris pretended to have gained Tallien and Hoche. Their habitual vauntings, and their calumnies with respect to Hoche, suffice to acquit Tallien of the imputation. The letter itself had very little effect, for Tallien, since the catastrophe of Quiberon, and his conduct in Vendémiaire, had departed so far from any semblance of royalism as to be esteemed a sanguinary terrorist. Thus, the men who ought to have acted in concert—directed their common efforts to save a revolution which was their own work—viewed each other with distrust and animosity, and suffered themselves to be tarnished in reputation, if not actually seduced, by the machinations of royalism. Owing to the calumnies of the royalists, this illustrious assembly closed as it had begun, in turmoil and contention.

Tallien eventually proposed the appointment of a commission, to consist of five members, charged to propound efficacious measures for upholding the revolution during the transition from one government to the other. The convention acceded, and nominated Tallien, Dubois-Crancé, Florent-Guyot, Roux [de-la-Marne], and Pons of Verdun. The design of this commission was to counteract the manœuvres of the royalists in the electoral assemblies, and to calm the apprehensions of the republicans as to the composition of the new government. The Mountain, ever buoyant and ardent, imagining that this commission would realise all its views, believed for a moment, and circulated the report, that all the elections were to be annulled, and the operation of the constitution suspended, for a time to come. The Mountaineers were in truth firmly persuaded that the present was not the period for abandoning the revolution to itself, that the royalists were not sufficiently subdued, and that the revolutionary government ought to be prolonged in order to consummate their suppression. The counter-revolutionists laboured insidiously to propagate similar rumours. The deputy Thibaudeau, who had hitherto acted neither with the Mountaineers, the Thermidorians, nor the Monarchists, but had nevertheless betokened a firm adherence to republican principles, and on whom the choice of thirty-two departments had just fallen (for by nominating him the electors gained the advantage of avoiding a declaration in favour of any party)—Thibaudeau was very naturally inclined to deem the public mind in a much sounder state than the Thermidorians. He held that Tallien and his party calumniated the nation by advocating so many precautions against it; he even surmised that Tallien entertained personal schemes—that he meditated planting himself at the head of the Mountain, and maturing a dictatorship, under pretext of preserving the republic from the royalists. He accordingly denounced, in virulent and unmeasured terms, this pretended project of dictatorship, and discharged against Tallien an unexpected tirade, whereat all the republicans were sorely amazed, for the motive was to them a complete enigma. This attack, indeed, ruined Thibaudeau in the opinion of those most predisposed to mistrust; and henceforth intentions were imputed to him which he had certainly not formed. If he could refer to his position as a regicide, it was well known, from seized letters,* that the death of Louis XVI. could be expiated by services rendered to his heirs, and this distinction was consequently no longer regarded as an undoubted guarantee. Thus, albeit a sincere republican, his outburst against Tallien injured him in the estimation of the patriots, and procured him extravagant eulogies from the royalists. He was designated the Rod of Iron.

The convention passed to the order of the day, and awaited the report of Tallien from the commission of five. The result of that commission's labours was a project of law containing the following provisions:—

Exclusion from all civil, military, legislative, and judicial functions, of emigrants and relatives of emigrants, until a general peace.

Permission for all who were unwilling to live under the laws of the republic to quit France and remove their property.

Dismission of all officers who had not served during the revolutionary system, that is to say, since the 10th August, and who had been appointed since the 15th Germinal, that is to say, since the administration of Aubry.

These dispositions were adopted and embodied in a decree.

Thereafter the convention promulgated, in solemn form, the union of Belgium with France, and its subdivision into departments. Finally, on the 4th Brumaire, on the eve of dissolution, it resolved to terminate its long and tempestuous career by a signal homage to humanity. It decreed that the punishment of death should be abolished in the French republic from the period of general peace; it changed the name of the Place de la Revolution to that of Place de la Concorde; and it pronounced an amnesty for all acts having reference to the revolution, save for the revolt of the 13th Vendémiaire. This was setting at liberty the men of all parties, except Lemaitre, against whom alone of all the conspirators of Vendémiaire sufficient proofs to warrant condemnation existed. The sentence of banishment against Billaud-Varennes, Collot-d'Herbois, and Barrère, which had been revoked in order that they might undergo a new trial, or in other words a judgment of death, was confirmed. Barrère,† who alone had not yet embarked, was appointed to be transported forthwith. All the prisons were ordered to be thrown open. At length, two hours and a half after mid-day of the 4th Brumaire year 4 (26th October 1795), the president of the convention delivered these words: "The National Convention declares that its mission is fulfilled, and its session terminated." Cries enthusiastically repeated of "Long live the republic!" accompanied and followed these last words.

Thus closed the protracted and memorable session of the National Convention. The Constituent Assembly had found the old feudal organisation to destroy and a new organisation to construct: the task of the Legislative Assembly had been to essay this new organisation, burdened with the king left as a component part of the constitution. After an experiment of several months, it ascertained and proclaimed the incompatibility of the king with the new institutions, and his confederacy with coalesced Europe; it suspended the king and the constitution, and abdicated its functions. The convention, therefore, on its convocation, encountered a dethroned king, an abrogated constitution, war declared against Europe, and, as resources in the emergency, an administration utterly subverted, a paper-money greatly depreciated, and antiquated forms of regiments, hollow and emasculated skeletons. Thus, it was not liberty the convention had to assert in presence of an enfeebled and contemned throne; it was liberty it had to defend against all Europe—a task of very different import. Undaunted in the crisis, it proclaimed the republic in the teeth of the hostile armies; it immolated the king to render its contest irrevocable; eventually it arrogated all authority, and resolved itself into a dictatorship. Within its own pale, voices arose to invoke humanity when it would hear only of energy; it stifled them. Speedily this dictatorship, which it had assumed over France in the exigency of general peril, twelve members assumed over it, for the like reason and in aggravated exigency. From the Alps to the ocean, from the Pyrenees to the Rhine, those twelve dictators seized upon all, men and things, and commenced with the nations of Europe the greatest and most terrible struggle recorded in history. In order to remain supreme directors of this mighty undertaking, they smote all parties successively; and, according to the condition of human weakness, they exhibited their qualities in their extremes. Those qualities were fortitude and energy; the excess was cruelty. They shed torrents of blood, until, become useless through victory and odious by the abuse of power, they succumbed. The convention thereupon resumed the dictatorship, and began by degrees to relax the springs of its redoubtable administration. Tranquillised regarding its safety by victory, it listened to the voice of humanity, and yielded to its spirit of regeneration. During a year it was actuated by the desire of devising and establishing whatever was good and great in a community; but factions, crushed beneath a merciless authority, revived under a government of clemency and forbearance. Two factions, in which were amalgamated, in infinite shades, the friends and enemies of the revolution, attacked it in turn. It vanquished the first in Germinal and Prairial, the second in Vendémiaire, and to the last day manifested an heroic courage amidst dangers. Finally, it framed a republican constitution, and, after a strife of three years, with Europe, with factions, and with itself, bleeding and mutilated, it abdicated, and transferred France to the Directory.

It has left behind it terrible reminiscences; but for its exculpation it has one—one single fact to allege, and all reproaches sink before that stupendous fact—it saved France from foreign invasion! The preceding assemblies had left France in peril and hazard, it bequeathed France saved and victorious to the Directory and the Empire. If the emigration had succeeded in subduing France in 1793, no trace had remained of the labours of the Constituent Assembly, or of the benefits resulting from the revolution; instead of those admirable civil institutions—of those magnificent achievements which signalised the Constituent, the Convention, the Directory, the Consulate, and the Empire—France would have been a prey to such sanguinary and degrading anarchy as we now deplore beyond the Pyrenees. By repelling the aggression of the kingly conspiracy against the republic, the convention secured to the revolution an uninterrupted action of thirty years on the area of France, and afforded to its works time for consolidation, and for acquiring that force which enables them to defy the impotent wrath of the inveterate foes of humanity.

* Moniteur of the year 4, page 150. Letter from D'Entraigues to Lemaitre, dated the 10th October 1795.

† [Barrère, it appears, has only died this year, 1841. He is reported to have expired on the 13th February at Turbes, his native place, at the advanced age of 85.

To the men who call themselves with pride "patriots of 1789," the convention will always justly reply, "You had provoked the struggle; it is I who sustained and terminated it."

CHAPTER XLV.

INSTALLATION OF THE LEGISLATIVE BODY AND DIRECTORY.—FIRST MEASURES OF THE DIRECTORY.—RESUMPTION OF HOSTILITIES IN BRITTANY AND LA VENDEE.—FORCED LOAN BY THE DIRECTORY.—ARMISTICE CONCLUDED ON THE RHINE.—OPERATIONS OF THE ARMY OF ITALY.—EXPEDITION OF ISLE-DIEU, AND DEPARTURE OF THE ENGLISH SQUADRON.—RESULTS OF THE CAMPAIGN OF 1795.

The 5th Brumaire year 4 (27th October 1795) was the day assigned for putting in force the directorial constitution. On that day, the two-thirds of the convention, retained in the new legislative body, were to unite with the third freely chosen by the electoral assemblies, divide into two councils, take formal organisation, and proceed to nominate five directors for wielding the executive power. During the first moments devoted to the organisation of the legislative body and the directory, the old governing committees were to remain in activity, and preserve the delegation of all authority. The members of the convention, commissioned to the armies or to the departments, were to continue their functions until the installation of the directory was duly notified to them.

The public mind was in a state of anxiety and ferment. The moderate and the ultra patriots showed an equal irritation against the party which had attacked the convention on the 13th Vendémiaire. They were filled with apprehensions, and exhorted each other to coalesce, to array themselves in a firm compact, in order to resist royalism; they loudly asserted the necessity of calling to the Directory, and to all places of power, such men only as were irrevocably committed to the cause of the revolution; they were tormented with doubts touching the deputies of the new third, and inquired with solicitude into their names, their past lives, and their known or presumed opinions.

The sectionaries, scattered on the 13th Vendémiaire, but treated with unexampled lenity after the victory, had again become presumptuous. Proud of having withstood artillery for an instant, they seemed to imagine that the convention, in sparing them, had dreaded their spirit and strength, and tacitly recognised the justice of their cause. They were every where to be met boasting of their great deeds; in the saloons they reviled with disgusting impertinence the assembly which had just resigned the government, and exulted at the prospect of the things to be achieved by the newly elected deputies.

Those deputies, thus appointed to take their seats amidst the veterans of the revolution, and to represent the opinions generated in France after its long convulsions, were far from justifying either the apprehensions of the republicans or the hopes of the counter-revolutionists. In their number appeared sundry members of the old assemblies, such as Vaublanc, Pastoret, Dumas, Dupont [de Nemours], and the honest and learned Tronchet, who had rendered such eminent services to French legislation. The majority, however, were new men, not those extraordinary characters who shine at the outbreak of revolutions, but several possessing those solid qualifications which, in the career of politics as in that of arts, follow in the wake of genius; for example, jurisconsults and administrators, such as Portalis, Simeon, Barbé-Marbois, and Tronçon-Ducoudray. In general, the newly elected members, saving certain notorious counter-revolutionists, belonged to that class of moderate men, who, having taken no part in events, and having consequently never been exposed to commit wrong or yield to delusion, professed to cherish the republic, but apart from what they called its crimes. They were naturally well disposed to censure the past; but they were reconciled with the convention and the republic by their election; for men willingly pardon an order of things in which they have gained station and eminence. In fine, strangers to Paris and to politics, timid as yet on the novel arena, they sought out and paid court to the most distinguished members of the National Convention.

Such were the dispositions of men on the 5th Brumaire. The re-elected members of the convention met and attempted to settle in concert the nominations yet to be made, so as to secure the control of the government. By virtue of the celebrated decrees of the 5th and 13th Fructidor, the number of conventionalists in the new legislative body was fixed imperatively at five hundred. If this number were not completed by the re-elections, the members present on the 5th Brumaire were to resolve themselves into an electoral body to supply the vacancies. A list was drawn out at the committee of public welfare, in which were included several decided Mountaineers. This list was not wholly sanctioned, but nevertheless known patriots only were inserted in it. On the 5th, all the deputies present, gathered in a single assembly, constituted themselves into an electoral body. In the first place, they completed the two-thirds of the conventionalists who were to sit in the legislative body; afterwards, they framed a list of all the deputies who were married and above forty years of age, and selected by ballot two hundred and fifty to form the Council of Ancients.

On the morrow, the Council of Five Hundred met at the Manége, in the former hall of the Constituent Assembly, and chose Daunou president, and Rewbell, Chénier, Cambaceres, and Thibaudeau, secretaries. The Council of Ancients assembled in the former hall of the convention, and called Larévellière-Lépaux to the chair, and Baudin, Lanjuinais, Bréard, and Charles Lacroix, to the bureau. These selections were highly appropriate, and proved that the majority in both councils were wedded to the republican cause. Thereafter the councils declared they were constituted, interchanged communications by message to that effect, confirmed provisionally the powers of the deputies, and postponed their formal verification until after the organisation of the government.

The most important of all the elections yet remained, that of the five magistrates to be invested with the executive power. In their nomination were involved at once the fate of the republic and the fortune of individuals. The five directors, in fact, holding the appointment of all public functionaries and of all officers in the army, would be enabled to compose the government at their pleasure, and to fill it with men favourable or adverse to the republic. The destiny of individuals, moreover, would rest entirely with them; they could open or close at will the career of public employment, and reward or discourage talents consecrated to the cause of the revolution. Hence the influence they must of necessity exercise was immense. Consequently, attention was keenly directed to the choice of those high dignitaries.

The conventionalists congregated privately to decide their suffrages. Their unanimous opinion was in favour of electing regicides, in order to secure additional guarantees. After fluctuating for some time, their choice eventually fell on Barras, Rewbell, Sieyes, Larévellière-Lépaux, and Le Tourneur. Barras had rendered great services in Thermidor, Prairial, and Vendémiaire; he had been in some respect the martial legislator opposed to all the factions; the last struggle of the 13th Vendémiaire especially had elevated him high in consideration, although the merit of the military dispositions on that celebrated occasion belonged exclusively to young Bonaparte. Rewbell, immured in Mayence during the siege, and frequently called into the committees since the 9th Thermidor, had adopted the views of the Thermidorians, and betokened aptitude and application in the conduct of affairs, together with a certain fortitude of character. Sieyes was regarded as the first speculative genius of the age. Larévellière-Lépaux had voluntarily associated himself with the Girondists on the day of their proscription, returned amidst his colleagues on the 9th Thermidor, and since combated with zeal the two factions which had alternately assailed the convention. A mild and humane personage, he was the only Girondist whom the Mountain viewed without suspicion, and the only patriot whose virtues the counter-revolutionists dared not deny. He had but one drawback, in the opinion of certain cavillers, namely, the deformity of his person; they sneeringly remarked, that the directorial mantle would sit uncouthly on his shoulders. Finally, Le Tourneur, known as a patriot, esteemed for his honesty of character, was an old officer of engineers, who had in recent times replaced Carnot at the committee of public welfare, albeit far from possessing the talents of his predecessor. Some of the conventionalists would have seen with complacency the elevation to a seat in the directory of one of the generals who had most distinguished themselves in military commands, as Kléber, Moreau, Pichegru, or Hoche; but the majority were apprehensive of giving too much influence to soldiers, and repudiated the idea of investing any of them with supreme power. In order to render their selections certain, the conventionalists agreed to employ an expedient, which, without being illegal, bore a strong affinity to guile and covin. Agreeably to the constitution, the Council of Five Hundred, in the case of all nominations, was to present a decemviral leet to the Council of Ancients. The latter, out of the ten candidates, culled one. For the five directors, therefore, it was requisite to send up the names of fifty candidates. The conventionalists, who formed the majority in the five hundred, resolved to place Barras, Rewbell, Sieyes, Larévellière-Lépaux, and Le Tourneur, at the head of the list, and append thereto forty-five unknown names, from which it would be impossible to make an eligible choice. By this device, the five candidates whom the conventionalists wished to plant in the directory must be perforce preferred.

This plan was faithfully pursued, save that a name happening to be deficient among the forty-five, the leet was completed with that of Cambaceres, to the great gratification of the new third and all the moderates. When the list was presented to the Ancients, they manifested much displeasure at this artful mode of coercing their votes. Dupont [de Nemours], who had already figured in the preceding assemblies, and was an avowed opponent, if not of the republic, at least of the convention, strongly advocated an adjournment. "Doubtless," he argued with great plausibility, "the forty-five individuals who complete this list are not unworthy of your choice, for the contrary supposition would imply that it has been purposely intended to constrain your suffrages in favour of five personages. Assuredly these names, which now come before you for the first time, belong to men of modest virtue, and who are consequently worthy to represent a great republic; but we require time to enable us to know them and form an estimate. Their very modesty, which has conduced to keep them in the shade, calls upon us to institute researches in order that we may appreciate their merit, and authorises us to demand a postponement." The Ancients, however, although discontented with the subterfuge, really participated in the sentiments of the majority of the Five Hundred, and confirmed the five nominations thus adroitly imposed upon them. Larévellière-Lépaux, out of two hundred and eighteen voters, obtained the suffrages of two hundred and sixteen, so nearly unanimous was the feeling of esteem for that exemplary individual. Le Tourneur obtained one hundred and eighty-nine; Rewbell, one hundred and seventy-six; Sieyes, one hundred and fifty-six; and Barras, one hundred and twenty-nine. The latter, being more a party man than the others, naturally provoked dissents and attracted fewer votes.

These five nominations gave unqualified satisfaction to the revolutionists, who saw themselves thereby secured of the government. But it was nevertheless a question whether all the directors would accept the appointment. There was not much doubt about three of them, but two were known to have no predilection for power. Larévellière-Lépaux, a simple and modest man, little adapted for the difficult part of managing men and things, found and sought pleasure only at the Botanical Garden (Jardin des Plantes), with the brothers Thouin: it was very questionable whether he would be prevailed upon to undertake the duties of director. Sieyes, with a powerful mind capable of grasping all subjects—matters of business equally with principles—was notwithstanding incompetent by character to bear the burdens of government. Perhaps, also, his spleen at a republic not constituted according to his ideas, rendered him less disposed to accept the direction of its affairs. As to Larévellière-Lépaux, a consideration was urged upon him which proved irresistible to his honest nature: he was assured that his association with the magistrates who were to govern the republic was advisable and necessary. In truth, a man of spotless and acknowledged virtue was really indispensable as an adjunct to persons recommended solely by their reputation as men of business or of action, and such a character was supplied by the adhesion of Larévellière-Lépaux. He yielded to the solicitations wherewith he was besieged. But the repugnance of Sieyes could not be overcome; he refused, asseverating that he candidly believed himself unfit for government.

It became necessary to provide a substitute. Carnot at this period enjoyed a vast consideration in Europe. His military services, great and real undoubtedly, were much exaggerated; the entire series of French victories was attributed to his inspiration; and, although he had been a member of the famous committee of public welfare, the colleague of Robespierre, Saint-Just, and Couthon, he was known to have often opposed those redoubtable triumvirs with fortitude and vigour. In him was seen combined the endowment of rare military genius with the stern, unbending characteristics of a stoic. Sieyes and he were the two most renowned personages of the epoch; and, for the credit of the Directory, it seemed expedient to replace one of such reputations by the other. Carnot was consequently inscribed on the new leet, along with men who rendered his election constrained, except that Cambaceres was again added to the list, which thus contained but eight unknown names. The ancients, however, hesitated not to prefer Carnot; he obtained one hundred and seventeen votes out of two hundred and thirteen, and became one of the five directors.

Thus Barras, Rewbell, Larévellière-Lépaux, Le Tourneur, and Carnot, were the five magistrates charged with the government of the republic. Amongst these five individuals, there was no man of genius or even of imposing celebrity, excepting Carnot. But this defect was unavoidable at the conclusion of a sanguinary revolution, which, in the course of a few years, had swept away whole generations of superior men in all orders of service. The assemblies could no longer boast of an extraordinary orator; in diplomacy there was not a single esteemed negotiator. Barthélemy alone, by his treaties with Spain and Prussia, had attracted a degree of attention; but the patriots regarded him with aversion and distrust. In the armies great generals were already formed, and still greater generating; but at present there was no decided superiority, and furthermore, the military were objects of jealousy and suspicion. There existed, accordingly, but two great reputations, as we have stated, those of Sieyes and Carnot. In the impossibility of procuring the first, the latter had been secured to the directorial board. Barras could acquit himself in action, Rewbell and Le Tourneur were indefatigable in toil, Larévellière-Lépaux was sage and upright. It would have been hardly possible, at the moment, to have better or otherwise composed the supreme magistracy.

The situation in which these five magistrates were called to power was most deplorable; and infinite courage and public spirit on the part of some, much ambition on the part of others, could alone have induced them to accept so onerous a burden. The country had just witnessed a conflict wherein it had been found requisite to invoke the aid of one faction to combat another. The patriots who had fought so resolutely were importunate; the sectionaries had not ceased to be presumptuous. The day of the 13th Vendémiaire, in short, had not been one of those victories followed by retributive vengeance, which, albeit subjecting the government to the sway of a triumphant faction, delivered it at least from the turbulence of the vanquished faction. The patriots were reinvigorated, the sectionaries were not subjugated. Paris teemed with intriguers of all parties; it was at once convulsed by all the discordant elements of ambitious strife, and stricken with woful misery.

Now, equally as in Prairial, provisions failed in all the large towns; the paper-money occasioned disorder in every transaction, and left the government without resources. The convention having refused to dispose of the national domains for thrice the valuation of 1790 in assignats, the sales had been suspended; the paper, which could be redeemed only by such sales, had remained in circulation, and its depreciation had proceeded with alarming strides. In vain had a scale of proportion been devised, to diminish the loss of those who received assignats; that scale reduced them merely to a fifth, whereas they retained not even the one hundred and fiftieth fraction of their primitive value. The state, receiving paper alone in payment of taxes, was ruined equally with individuals. It collected, certainly, a moiety of the land-tax in kind, which furnished it with partial supplies for the nourishment of the armies; but the means of transport were frequently deficient, and those articles of subsistence perished in the magazines. Its expenditure, moreover, was greatly increased by the necessity of provisioning Paris. It dispensed the rations for a sum in assignats, which scarcely covered the hundredth part of the cost. At the same time, this was the only possible mode of providing the fundholders and public functionaries, who were paid in assignats, with even a modicum of bread; but this exigency had swelled the disbursements of the state to an enormous extent. Having nothing but paper to meet it, the state had issued assignats without measure, and had carried in a few months the emission from twelve to twenty-nine thousand millions. By former redemptions and funds in the exchequer, the quantity in actual circulation amounted to nineteen thousand millions [eight hundred millions sterling], an appalling sum, exceeding all known calculations in finance. In order to avoid the further multiplication of issues, the commission of five, instituted during the latter days of the convention for the purpose of propounding extraordinary measures of police and finance, had caused the adoption in principle of an extraordinary war-contribution, amounting to twenty times the land-tax, and ten times the miscellaneous imposts, the amount whereof might reach to six or seven thousand millions in paper. But this contribution was decreed only in principle; meanwhile, purveyors were given inscriptions of stock, which they received at a ruinous rate. Five francs of annuity were accepted for ten francs of capital. Moreover, the expedient of a voluntary loan, at three per cent., had been essayed, on terms equally disastrous to the state, without, however, attracting many subscribers.

In this melancholy state of things, the public functionaries, utterly unable to exist upon their appointments, resigned their offices; the soldiers deserted the armies, which had lost a third of their effective force, and returned into the towns of the interior, where the weakness of the government permitted them to remain with impunity. Thus five armies and an immense metropolis to sustain, with the bootless faculty of issuing assignats without worth; those armies to recruit, and the whole government to reconstruct, amid the assaults of two hostile and inveterate factions—such the task of the five magistrates now raised to the supreme administration of the republic.

The necessity of order is so strongly felt in human societies, that they themselves tend spontaneously to its establishment, and marvellously second those who are charged with the care of reorganising them: it would be indeed impossible to accomplish the task were it otherwise, but we are not the less bound to admire the courage and efforts of those who venture to grapple with the difficulties of such an undertaking. The five directors, on repairing to the palace of the Luxembourg, found not a single article of furniture within its walls. The keeper lent them a ricketty table, a sheet of letter-paper, and an inkstand, enabling them to indite their first communication, which announced to the two councils that the Directory was constituted. Not a penny in specie was discovered at the Treasury. The assignats necessary for the service of the following day were struck off each night, and they issued reeking damp from the presses of the republic. The greatest uncertainty prevailed as to the supplies of provisions, and during several days it had been impossible to distribute more than a few ounces of bread or rice to each of the people.

The first demand of the Directory was for a vote of credit. According to the new constitution, it was requisite that every disbursement should be preceded by a vote of credit, with allocation to the respective ministries. The two councils were to pass the vote, and then the treasury, which had been rendered independent of the directory, would deliver the funds granted by the decree of the two councils. The directory demanded, in the first place, three thousand millions of assignats, which were accorded; these it had to exchange forthwith for specie. But here a difficulty arose, whether the directory or the treasury ought to be intrusted with this negotiation. The treasury, by being permitted to make contracts, departed from its province of mere superintendence; nevertheless the question was solved by conferring upon it the commission of negotiating the paper. The three thousand millions could at the utmost produce twenty or twenty-five millions in metallic currency. Thus they could merely avail to satisfy immediate current wants. The digestion of a regular plan of finance was meanwhile undertaken, and the directory intimated to the two councils that it would be submitted to them in the course of a few days. In the interim, Paris, which was utterly destitute, must be subsisted. There was no longer an organised system of requisitions; consequently the Directory asked power to exact, by the formality of summonses, in the departments contiguous to that of the Seine, the quantity of 250,000 quintals of grain, on account of the land-tax payable in kind. The Directory subsequently demanded a variety of laws for the suppression of abuses of all kinds, and particularly of desertion, which was daily diminishing the strength of the armies. At the same time, it proceeded to select the individuals who were to compose the administration. Merlin of Douay was appointed to the ministry of justice; Aubert-Dubayet was called from the army on the coasts of Cherbourg to receive the portfolio of the war department; Charles Lacroix was placed in the office of foreign affairs; Faypoult in that of finances and Benezech, an enlightened administrator, in that of the interior. From the multitude of solicitors who importuned it, the Directory next strove to cull the men most capable of filling public offices. In the precipitation to which it was condemned, it could scarcely avoid making certain bad selections. It confided employments to a great number of patriots, who had signalised themselves too conspicuously to be impartial and discreet. The 13th Vendémiaire had rendered them necessary, and obliterated the apprehensions they had formerly excited. The entire government, therefore—directors, ministers, and agents of all grades—was constituted in hostility to the 13th Vendémiaire and to the party which had provoked that day. The conventional deputies, even, were not yet remanded from their missions; the Directory, wishing to afford them time to complete their operations, had merely for that purpose to avoid formally notifying to them its installation. Fréron, commissioned to the southern departments to quell the counter-revolutionary excesses there prevailing, was thus enabled to continue his circuit through those unfortunate districts. The five directors laboured indefatigably, and manifested, in these the first moments of their administration, the same exemplary zeal as had been displayed by the members of the great committee of public welfare during the ever-memorable days of September and October 1793.

Unhappily, the difficulties of their task were aggravated by military reverses. The retreat to which the army of the Sambre-and-Meuse had been constrained, gave rise to the most alarming rumours. By a superlatively vicious plan, and the treachery of Pichegru, the projected invasion into Germany had been completely foiled, as we have previously narrated. The French had designed to pass the Rhine on two points, and occupy the right bank by two armies. Jourdan, starting from Dusseldorf after having crossed the river under flattering auspices, had proceeded on the Lahn, hemmed in between the Rhine and the Prussian frontier, and incapable of drawing supplies from a neutral country, where he was debarred from living at discretion. But this distress would have only lasted a few days, if he could have advanced into the hostile territories and effected a junction with Pichegru, who had obtained, by the occupation of Manheim, so easy and unexpected a means of passing the Rhine. Jourdan would have repaired by this junction the errors of the plan of campaign prescribed to him; but Pichegru, who was still discussing the conditions of his defection with the agents of the Prince of Condé, had merely thrown beyond the Rhine a weak and insufficient corps. He persisted in refusing to pass the river with the bulk of his army, and left Jourdan alone, en flèche,* in the midst of Germany. This position could not be maintained. All who had the smallest conception of warfare trembled for Jourdan. Hoche, who, although sufficiently engaged with his harassing command in Brittany, cast an eye of interest on the operations of the other armies, wrote in terms of great anxiety on the subject. Jourdan was eventually compelled to retire and repass the Rhine, and he therein acted with consummate prudence, and merited every eulogium for the manner in which he effected his retreat.

The enemies of the republic exulted at this retrograde movement, and indulged in comments calculated to diffuse dismay and apprehension. Their malignant predictions were unfortunately realised at the very moment of the installation of the Directory. The inherent vice of the plan adopted by the committee of public welfare consisted in dividing the French forces, thus leaving the enemy, who occupied Mayence, the advantage of a central position, and suggesting to him thereby the idea of uniting his troops and moving their entire mass on one or other of the French armies. General Clairfayt owed to this situation a brilliant conception, which attested a higher genius than he had hitherto exhibited, or than he showed indeed in its execution. A corps of about thirty thousand French blockaded Mayence. In possession of that place, Clairfayt could thence debouch and overwhelm this blockading army, before Jourdan and Pichegru had time to reach the spot. He seized the suitable moment with admirable judgment. Scarcely had Jourdan retired upon the Lower Rhine by Düsseldorf and Neuwied, ere Clairfayt, leaving a detachment to observe him, marched on Mayence, and there concentrated his forces, with the view of suddenly debouching on the blockading division. This division, under the orders of General Schaal, stretched in a semicircle around Mayence, forming a line of nearly four leagues. Although great care had been taken to fortify this line, its extent did not allow of its being barred throughout. Clairfayt, who had accurately surveyed it, discovered more than one point easily accessible. The extremity of this semicircular line, which ought to have rested on the upper course of the Rhine, left between the last intrenchments and the river a spacious plain. It was upon this point that Clairfayt resolved to direct his principal effort.

On the 7th Brumaire (29th October), he debouched by Mayence in formidable strength, but nevertheless with forces not sufficiently numerous to render his operation decisive. Military men, in truth, have censured him for leaving on the right bank a corps, which, employed in action on the left bank, would have inevitably ensured the ruin of a part of the French army. He propelled a column along the meadow-land stretching over the space between the Rhine and the line of blockade, which marched with arms poised. At the same time a flotilla of gunboats ascended the stream to aid the movement of this column. Clairfayt directed the remainder of his army on the front of the lines, and ordered a prompt and vigorous attack. The French division placed at the extremity of the semicircle, finding itself at once attacked in front, turned by a corps defiling along the river, and bombarded by a flotilla from the rear, was seized with a panic, and fled in disorder. The division under Saint-Cyr, which was stationed immediately approximate, was thereupon uncovered, and threatened with inevitable destruction. Fortunately, the rapid appreciation and judgment of its general extricated it from peril. He gave the command to wheel round front to rear, and executed his retreat in good order, warning the other divisions to follow his example. From that moment the whole semicircle was abandoned, the division of Saint-Cyr made its movement of retreat on the army of the Upper Rhine, whilst the divisions of Mengaud and Renaud, which occupied the other part of the line, finding themselves separated, recoiled on the army of the Sambre-and-Meuse, whereof a column, commanded by Marceau, had by a happy hazard advanced into the Hunds-Rück. The retreat of these latter divisions was extremely difficult, and might have become altogether impossible, had Clairfayt, fully comprehending the whole value of his admirable manœuvre, acted with stronger masses and with adequate rapidity. He might, in the opinion of military critics, after breaking the French line, have rapidly turned the divisions descending towards the Lower Rhine, enveloped and hemmed them in the recess the Rhine forms by its bend from Mayence to Bingen.

Clairfayt's manœuvre, nevertheless, was supremely dexterous, regarded as the first of the kind attempted by the allies. Whilst he thus carried the lines of

* [The French are so much better adepts in military terms than the English, that it is found absolutely necessary to adopt their phraseology, which is at once concise and expressive. En flèche may be Anglicised "far ahead," as an arrow shot from the bow, consequently isolated from co-operating forces.]

Mayence, Wurmser, making a simultaneous attack on Pichegru, wrested from him the bridge of the Neckar, and afterwards drove him behind the walls of Manheim. Thus, the two French armies, repulsed beyond the Rhine, preserving, it is true, Manheim, Neuwied, and Düsseldorf, but separated from each other by Clairfayt, who had swept away the whole blockading force before Mayence, might incur the extremest hazards before a bold and enterprising general. The late events had greatly shaken their confidence; many fugitives had recovered from their alarm only when beyond the frontier, and an absolute destitution added to the dispiriting effects of defeat. By a fortunate chance, Clairfayt acted with tardiness and excessive circumspection, consuming infinitely more time than needful to concentrate all his forces.

These mournful tidings, which reached Paris on the 11th and 12th Brumaire, at the very moment of the installation of the Directory, materially contributed to aggravate the difficulties attending the new republican organisation. Other events, less dangerous in reality, but equally grave in aspect, were passing in the West. A renewed disembarkment of emigrants menaced the republic in that quarter. After the disastrous descent at Quiberon, which was effected as we have recorded, with but a portion of the forces collected by the English government, the wrecks of the expedition had been embarked on board the English fleet, and eventually put on shore in the small island of Houat. There were landed the ill-fated families of Morbihan, who had so eagerly rushed to hail the expedition on its arrival, and the sad remnant of the emigrant regiments. An epidemic disease and inveterate discord reigned among the forlorn groups cooped up on this petty surface. After the lapse of a short period, Puisaye, invoked by all the Chouans who had ruptured the pacification, and who attributed to the English alone, and not to their old leader, the misfortune of Quiberon, had returned into Brittany, where he had made every preparation for a renewal of hostilities. During the Quiberon expedition, the chiefs of La Vendée had remained inert, on account of the expedition not having been directed to their shores, on account of the orders transmitted by the Paris agents prohibiting them from aiding Puisaye, and finally, on account of their repugnance to compromise themselves until encouraged by some successful achievement. Charette alone had become embroiled with the republican authorities, on the subject of various disorders committed in his district of country, and of certain military preparations he was charged with making, and he had almost openly revolted. He had recently received, through the medium of Paris, additional favours from Verona, and obtained the command-in-chief of the Catholic provinces, which was the great object of his ambition. This new dignity, albeit congealing the zeal of his rivals, had tended to stimulate his own in a singular degree. He confidently anticipated a fresh expedition destined for his province; and Commodore Warren having offered him the munitions remaining from the Quiberon expedition, he no longer hesitated; he made a general attack along the shore, drove in the republican posts, and secured some barrels of powder and muskets. The English fleet, at the same time, disembarked on the coast of Morbihan the unfortunate families it had borne from their native land, and who had been suffering the extremities of hunger and misery on the Isle of Houat. Thus the pacification was broken, and the war recommenced.

The three republican generals, Aubert-Dubayet, Hoche, and Canclaux, respectively commanding the three armies styled of Cherbourg, Brest, and the West, had long regarded the pacification as ruptured not only in Brittany but also in the Lower Vendée. They had all three met in consultation at Nantes, but had taken no definitive resolution. They had, nevertheless, arranged their forces to hasten individually upon the first threatened point. The rumour of a fresh disembarkation gained ground; it was stated, truly enough, that the division sent to Quiberon was only the first, and that another would shortly arrive. Apprised of the new dangers menacing the coasts, the French government nominated Hoche to the command of the army of the West. The victor of Weissembourg and Quiberon, in truth, was the man to whom, in this pressing exigency, the national confidence was justly due. He immediately repaired to Nantes, in order to replace Canclaux. The three armies appointed to keep in check the insurgent provinces, had been successively reinforced by detachments drawn from the North, and by several of the divisions rendered disposable from the peace with Spain. Hoche obtained permission to draught additional detachments from the armies of Brest and Cherbourg, to augment that of La Vendée, which he thus increased to 44,000 men. He established strongly intrenched posts on the Sevre-Nantaise, which flows between the two Vendées, and which separated the country of Stofflet from that of Charette. His object was thus to isolate those two chiefs, and prevent them from acting in concert. Charette had entirely thrown off the mask, and again proclaimed war. Stofflet, Sapinaud, and Scépeaux, jealous of Charette's appointment as generalissimo, intimidated, moreover, by Hoche's preparations, and uncertain of the arrival of the English, refrained as yet from any demonstration. The English squadron at length appeared, first in the Bay of Quiberon, and subsequently in that of Isle-Dieu, off the coast of Lower Vendée. It carried 2000 English infantry, 500 fully equipped cavalry, sundry emigrant skeleton regiments, provisions, habiliments for a considerable army, funds in specie, and, above all, the long-expected prince. More numerous forces were to follow, if the expedition commenced with the harbinger of success, and if the French prince betokened a sincere intention of putting himself at the head of the royalist party. Scarcely was the squadron signalled off the coasts ere all the royalist chiefs sent emissaries to the prince, to assure him of their devotedness, to claim the honour of his presence, and to concert their operations. Charette, master of the sea board, was most advantageously placed to facilitate the disembarkation, and his reputation, combined with the prepossessions of the emigrants, attracted the expedition to his vicinage. He had likewise dispatched agents to settle a plan of operations.

Hoche, meanwhile, carried on his preparations with his accustomed activity and promptitude. He formed the project of moving three columns from Challans, Clisson, and Saint-Hermine, three points placed on the circumference of the country, and propelling them on Belleville, the head-quarters of Charette. These three columns, from twenty to twenty-two thousand men strong, would, he expected, by their imposing mass, overawe the district, ruin the principal establishment of Charette, and throw him, by a sudden and vigorous attack, into such disorder as to disable him from protecting the disembarkation of the emigrant prince. Hoche accordingly ordered the columns to march, and united them at Belleville without encountering any obstacle. Charette, whose principal force he hoped to surprise and overthrow, was not at Belleville; he had collected nine or ten thousand men, and proceeded towards Luçon, with the view of carrying the war into the midst of the country, and thereby diverting the attention of the republicans from the coasts. His plan was well conceived; but it failed through the unwavering fortitude of his opponents. Whilst Hoche took possession of Belleville with his three columns, Charette was before the post of Saint-Cyr, which covers the route from Luçon to Les Sables. He attacked that post with all his forces: two hundred republicans intrenched in a church offered an heroic resistance, and gave the division of Luçon, which heard the cannonade, time to hasten to their succour.

Charette, taken in flank, was completely defeated, and obliged to disperse with his bands in order to regain the interior of the Marais.

Hoche, not finding the enemy as he anticipated, and comprehending the true intent of his movement, led his columns to the points whence they had started, and occupied himself in establishing an intrenched camp at Soullans, near the coast, with the design of falling on the first corps which should attempt to land. During this interval, the emigrant prince, surrounded by a numerous council and the envoys of all the Breton and Vendéan chiefs, had continued in deliberation upon the various schemes of descent propounded to him, and allowed to Hoche ample time for preparing his means of resistance. The English vessels, meanwhile, hovering in sight of the coasts, tormented the republicans with apprehensions, and inflated the royalists with hopes.

Thus, precisely at the time the Directory was installed, a defeat before Mayence and an impending disembarkation in La Vendée, were topics of alarm seized upon with perfidious avidity by the enemies of the government, to harass and impede its establishment. The Directory explained or denied many of the rumours so diligently circulated respecting the situation of affairs on the two frontiers, and promulgated elucidations as to the occurrences that had recently happened. It could not disguise the defeat sustained before the lines of Mayence; but it showed, in reply to the exaggerations of the alarmists, that Neuwied and Düsseldorf still remained in possession of the French; that Manheim also was in their hands; that, consequently, the army of the Sambre-and-Meuse held two têtes-de-pont,* and the army of the Rhine one, enabling them to debouch, when circumstances warranted, beyond the Rhine; and that their situation was therefore analogous to that of the Austrians, since, if the latter enjoyed facilities for acting on both banks through Mayence, the former had equivalent advantages through Düsseldorf, Neuwied, and Manheim. The reasoning was just; but the contingency was doubtful, whether or not the Austrians, pursuing their success, would wrest from their adversaries both Neuwied and Manheim, and consolidate themselves on the left bank, between the Vosges and the Moselle. As to La Vendée, the government detailed the vigorous dispositions made by Hoche, which satisfied all considerate minds, but failed to banish the fears of the ultra-patriots, or to prevent the counter-revolutionists from labouring assiduously to instil dread.

Amidst these dangers, the Directory redoubled its efforts to reorganise the government, the administrations, and, above all, the finances. Three thousand millions had been granted to it, as we have mentioned, and had produced at the uttermost twenty or twenty-five millions in specie. The voluntary loan opened at three per cent., during the concluding days of the convention, had been suspended; for the terms offered by the state bound it to pay the interest in specie on an amount of stock commensurate with the capital advanced in paper, involving a most ruinous loss. The extraordinary war-tax proposed by the commission of five had not yet been enforced, and it occasioned complaints as a last revolutionary act of the convention against the public contributors. All the ramifications of the public service were on the eve of stagnation. Individuals, reimbursed debts according to the scale of proportion, urged such pressing remonstrances, that it had been found necessary to suspend coercive acquittances. The postmasters, paid in assignats, intimated their intention to throw up their offices, as the insufficient payments of the government subjected them to heavy deficits. The service of the posts would therefore fail altogether, that is to say, all communications, even by letter, would cease throughout the area of France. Hence the urgency of developing without delay the financial plan already announced to be in preparation. It was commanded as the primary necessity of the state, and the first importunate duty of the Directory. It was at length communicated to the finance commission.

The mass of floating assignats might be estimated at twenty thousand millions [eight hundred and forty millions sterling]. Even supposing the assignats still worth the hundredth fraction of their value, and not the one hundred and fiftieth, their actual value did not exceed two hundred millions [eight millions four hundred thousand pounds]: it is certain they did not pass for more in circulation, and that those who possessed them could not make them available at a higher rate. The reality might therefore be at once legalised, assignats taken only for what they were veritably worth, and admitted as currency only at the par of exchange, whether in transactions between individuals, in the discharge of taxes, or in the payment for national domains. Thus, in one instant, this great and appalling mass of paper, this enormous debt, would disappear. There yet remained nearly seven thousand millions, specie value, in national domains, including in the calculation those of Belgium and the national forests: ample resources existed, therefore, to redeem these twenty thousand millions, when reduced to two hundred millions, and to offer a basis for future expenses. But this mode, so prompt and bold, of solving all difficulties, was not easily to be compassed; it was repudiated, both by the scrupulous, who regarded it as a bankruptcy, and by the patriots, who condemned it as tending to ruin the assignats.

Both classes of objectors exhibited slender powers of induction. This bankruptcy, if it were one, was inevitable, and came to pass at no distant date. The material point at present was to abridge the calamity, that is to say, the confusion in values, and restore the just equipoise, the paramount justice due from the state to the whole community. Doubtless, at the first blush, it appeared a bankruptcy to take, in 1795, for one franc, an assignat which, in 1790, had been issued for one hundred, and which then embodied a promise of one hundred francs in land. Upon that basis, the twenty thousand millions of paper ought to have been estimated at the same number of millions in bullion, and integrally redeemed; but the national domains would have scarcely paid a third of that sum. Even in the case of ability to pay the sum integrally, the question must have arisen how much the state had truly received for this emission of twenty thousand millions: four or five thousand millions, perhaps. At such depreciation those assignats had been accepted when received from the state, and it had already redeemed by sales an equal amount in national property. It would therefore have been the cruellest injustice with regard to the state, that is to say, to those contributing to its burdens, to estimate the assignats according to their primitive value. Hence the necessity of consenting to estimate them at a reduced standard: the process had been already commenced by the adoption of the scale of proportion.

Undoubtedly, if there were individuals yet holding the first assignats issued, having retained without once exchanging them, such persons were exposed to a prodigious loss; for, having received them almost at par, they would now suffer the full extent of the reduction. But this was a purely gratuitous fiction. No one had kept assignats in his coffers, for paper is not what men hoard or treasure up: all had hastened to pass them away, and each had sustained a portion of the loss. Every body had already endured his share of this pretended bankruptcy, and accordingly it was no longer one. The bankruptcy of a state consists in throwing upon a few individuals, that is to say, creditors, a debt which ought to be borne by the community at large; now, if every member of that community had more or less suffered from the depreciation of assignats, the bankruptcy was illusory—it affected no one. A still stronger argument might have been urged than all the others. If assignats had undergone depreciation in the hands of only a few individuals—if they had really lost value only for a few individuals—they had now passed into the possession of speculators in paper, and it would have been that class, much more than that of the veritable sufferers, who would have reaped the advantage of an insensate restoration of value. Thus, Calonne had published a pamphlet in London, wherein he stated, with great justice, that the belief was vain and unsubstantial that France must sink beneath the burden of assignats that this paper-money offered the means of making without declaring a bankruptcy. He ought to have stated, to express himself with greater accuracy, that it presented a mode of throwing that bankruptcy upon the whole community, or, in other words, of rendering it null and innocuous.

* [Tete-de-pont a military term, requiring a circumlocutory interpretation. It signifies the possession of a bridge as the basis or medium of operations, or, in some cases, the possession of an advantageous position for effecting or defending a passage.]

It was, therefore, reasonable and just to legalise the reality—to take the assignat for what it was really worth. The patriots contended that this course would ruin the assignats, which had saved the revolution, and reprobated the idea as a conception emanating from the royalists. Those who professed to reason with more enlightenment and greater knowledge of the subject, maintained that the paper would be utterly depressed, and no circulating medium left in the country, lacking the assignats perished and the metals either hoarded or exported abroad. The future demonstrated the error of those who used such reasoning; but a simple calculation might have at once inspired them with juster notions. Thus, the twenty thousand millions of assignats represented less than two hundred millions; now, according to all estimations, the circulation could not be kept up formerly with less than two thousand millions, gold or silver. If, therefore, the assignats were a constituent element of the circulation only to the extent of two hundred millions, how was the deficiency supplied? It is very evident that the precious metals must have circulated in great quantity; and they did so circulate, but in the provinces and rural districts, far from the observation of the government. Besides, the precious metals, like all other merchandise, always come where the demand imperiously calls them; and, after driving away the paper, they would have spontaneously returned, as they returned, in fact, when the paper expired of itself.

Hence it was a twofold error, nevertheless firmly imbedded in the minds of men, to regard the reduction of the assignat to its real value as a bankruptcy and as a sudden destruction of all circulating medium. The scheme had one inconvenience, which, however, was not objected to it, as we shall shortly learn. The finance commission, fettered by the general prejudices prevalent, could only partially adopt the true principles of the matter. After having concerted with the Directory, it digested the following project:—

Until, by the new plan to be adopted, the sale of property and the collection of taxes brought into the exchequer real and not fictitious payments, it was still necessary to make use of assignats. It was accordingly proposed to increase the emission to thirty thousand millions, under a solemn obligation not to exceed that amount. On the 30th Nivose, the copperplate was to be publicly broken. Thus the public would be satisfied as to the exact quantity of the new issues. To the thirty thousand millions emitted were to be distinctly appropriated one thousand millions of money in national domains; whereby the assignat, which was worth in circulation but the one hundred and fiftieth fraction, and much less, would be liquidated at a thirtieth, which promised a considerable advantage to the holders of the paper. Another thousand millions of lands were to be assigned as recompenses to the soldiers of the republic, in fulfilment of an old pledge to those defenders of the country. Thus there would remain five out of the seven thousand millions disposable. In these five were included the national forests, the moveables of the crown and emigrants the royal palaces, and the property of the Belgian clergy. Five thousand millions in national property. therefore, lay at the disposal of the state. But the great difficulty was to realise that valuation. The assignats had been originally devised as the means of bringing that dormant capital into circulation, in anticipation of sales being effected. But the assignats being practically suppressed, since ten thousand millions only could be henceforth added to the twenty existing—a sum which, at the utmost, represented but one hundred millions of money—how was the value of the domains to be realised in advance and made subservient to the expenses of the war? Herein lay the sole objection that might be urged against the liquidation of the paper and against its suppression. The plan of mortgage schedules was conceived, which had been suggested the preceding year. According to this revived scheme, the state would borrow, and give to the lenders schedules bearing specific hypothecations on particularised domains. In order to prosecute this system of borrowing, it was proposed to recur to financial companies, which would take charge of these schedules in the first instance. Thus, instead of a paper with a forced circulation, which possessed merely a general hypothec over the mass of national property, and the value whereof fluctuated from day to day, there would be substituted, by the medium of schedules, a voluntary paper-money, which was specifically charged on an estate or a messuage, and which could undergo no other fluctuation than the value of the hereditament it bonâ fide represented. This, indeed, was not properly a paper currency. It was not exposed to depression, because it was not forcibly introduced into the circulation; but for that very reason it would be impracticable to negotiate it. In short, the difficulty always consisting, now equally as at the commencement of the revolution, in bringing into circulation the value of the domains, the question was, whether it were better to force the circulation of that value or to leave it voluntary. The first mode being utterly exhausted, it was natural that recourse should be had to the latter.

It was therefore determined, that, after increasing the paper to thirty thousand millions, after appropriating one thousand millions of money's worth in property as an absorbing medium for that paper, and reserving another thousand millions in lands for the soldiers of the country, the state should issue schedules for a sum proportioned to the public exigencies, and, by means of those schedules, treat with financial companies. The national forests were not to be scheduled; it was intended to keep them in the hands of the state. They formed nearly two out of the five thousand millions remaining disposable. Simply the alienation of their produce during a certain number of years to the companies was contemplated.

The consequence of this project, founded on the reduction of assignats to their real value, would be to admit them for the future in all transactions only at the par of exchange. In the interim, until, by the sale of the thousand millions specially assigned in their behalf, they could be redeemed, they were to be receivable by individuals and by the state simply at their current value. Thus, the disorder in all social transactions would cease, and fraudulent payments become impossible. The state would receive real funds from the taxes, which would at least cover the ordinary expenditure, and the extraordinary expenses of the war alone would have to be borne by the national property. The assignats were to be received at par only in satisfaction of arrears of taxes—arrears which were considerable, amounting to thirteen thousand millions. Thereby an easy mode of discharging their obligations was afforded to tax-payers in arrear, on condition they took advantage of it without delay; and that sum of thirty thousand millions, redeemable in national domains at the rate of a thirtieth, would be so far diminished.

This plan, adopted by the Five Hundred after a long discussion in secret committee, was forthwith submitted to the Ancients. Whilst the latter were preparing to discuss it, additional questions were brought before the Five Hundred, touching the manner whereby the soldiers who had deserted to the interior might be remanded to their flags, and touching the mode of nominating judges, municipal officers, and functionaries of all kinds, whom the electoral assemblies, agitated by the passions rampant in Vendémiaire, had not had time or inclination to elect. The Directory thus laboured with indefatigable industry, and continually provided fresh subjects of deliberation to the two councils.

The financial scheme submitted to the Ancients rested on sound principles; it developed resources, for France still possessed many great and undoubted; but, unfortunately, it failed to obviate the material difficulty, for it did not render those resources sufficiently actual and available. It is very evident that France, with taxes adequate to defray her annual expenditure when the paper no longer rendered the receipt illusory, and with seven thousand millions of national property to redeem the assignats and provide for the extraordinary expenses of the war—it is very evident, we say, that France had resources. The difficulty consisted in meeting the instant emergencies of the state, whilst founding a plan upon equitable principles and adapting it to the future.

Now, the Ancients were loath to believe that assignats must be so promptly relinquished. The power of creating a further quantity of ten thousand millions involved at the utmost a resource of one hundred millions cash—but a small fund to proceed upon whilst awaiting the receipts prognosticated from the new plan. Moreover, would companies be found to treat for the lease of forests during twenty or thirty years? Would they be found to accept the schedules, that is to say, free assignats? In the uncertainty prevailing whether it would be possible to render the national property available by the new expedients, ought the old manner of turning them to account to be renounced, that is to say, forced assignats? The Council of Ancients, which evinced great severity in judging the resolutions of the Five Hundred, and had already rejected more than one, set its veto on the financial project, and refused to sanction it.

This rejection occasioned a general feeling of anxiety, and replunged all things into the utmost uncertainty. The counter-revolutionists, overjoyed at the conflict between the branches of government, proclaimed the difficulties of the situation to be insuperable, and the republic doomed to perish through the corroding evil of the finances. The most enlightened men, who are not always the most dauntless, feared their prognostics would be too surely realised. The patriots, driven to he highest pitch of irritation by the avowed design of abolishing assignats, were clamorous against the destruction of this last revolutionary creation, which had saved France; they demanded that, without any more devious experiments, the credit of assignats should be re-established by the expedients of 1793—the maximum, requisitions, and death. A degree of violence and excitement prevailed, which recalled the most turbulent epochs. To fill up the measure of calamity, the events on the Rhine grew more ominous: Clairfayt, without profiting by his victory as a great captain, had nevertheless gained fresh advantages. Having summoned to his aid the corps of La Tour, he had marched on Pichegru, attacked him on the Pfrim and canal of Frankendhal, and successively repulsed him even to the walls of Landau. Jourdan had advanced on the Nahe through a difficult country, and evinced the noblest zeal in pushing the war amidst hideous mountains, in order to disengage the army of the Rhine; but his efforts could only arrest the impetuosity of the enemy, without repairing the losses of the French.

If, therefore, the barrier of the Rhine remained to the French in the Low Countries, it was lost parallel with the Vosges, and the Austrians had driven them from a vast semicircle stretching around Mayence.

In this dismal crisis, the Directory addressed an urgent message to the Council of Five Hundred, and proposed one of those extraordinary measures which had been adopted in the most pressing emergencies of the revolution. This was a forced loan of six hundred millions in real funds, either specie or assignats at the par of exchange, levied on the wealthiest classes. The proposal seemed the harbinger of a renewed series of arbitrary acts, like its prototype, the forced loan exacted by Cambon from the rich; but, as this new loan was to be immediately exigible, as it would absorb all the circulating assignats, and furnish besides a surplus of three or four hundred millions in specie, and as, above all, it was absolutely necessary to find instant resources, the legislature sanctioned it.

The law decided that the assignats should be received at the one hundredth fraction: therefore, two hundred millions of the loan would suffice to absorb twenty thousand millions of paper. All thus paid into the exchequer were to be burnt. It was hoped that the paper, thus almost entirely withdrawn, would rebound from its depression, and that in extremity more might be issued, and this resource again made serviceable. After the absorption of the assignats, there would remain four hundred millions, out of the loan of six hundred millions, to receive in specie—a fund sufficient to satisfy the wants of the two next succeeding months, for the expenditure of this year (year 4—1795-1796) was estimated at fifteen hundred millions.

Certain adversaries of the Directory, who, without materially interesting themselves in the state of the country, were solely intent on thwarting the new government at all hazards, sounded the tocsin of alarm in this instance with transcendent vehemence. This loan, they asserted, would sweep away all the specie in France, even had she sufficient to pay it; as if the state, in taking four hundred millions of specie, would not throw them back into the circulation by purchases of grain, cloth, leather, iron, &c. The state intended to burn the paper only. The real question was, whether France could furnish, within a short interval, four hundred millions in articles of subsistence and merchandise, and commit two hundred millions of paper to the flames—an amount ostentatiously described as twenty thousand millions. There is no doubt she could. The only inconvenience was in the mode of perception, which would be necessarily vexatious, and thereby become less productive; but, truly speaking, the wit of man was sorely baffled. To limit the assignats to thirty thousand millions, that is to say, to secure merely one hundred millions real cash in advance, then destroy the plate, and commit the fortune of the state to the chance of selling the yearly produce of the forests and negotiating the proposed schedules, or, in other words, to the emission of a voluntary paper, had appeared too bold an experiment. In the uncertainty how free will might act, the legislative councils preferred to force the French to contribute extraordinarily.

By the forced loan, it was concluded, a portion at least of the paper would return to the state coffers, and with it a certain quantity of specie; and still, moreover, the plate would remain—a very valuable possession after the absorption of the greater part of the assignats. Nevertheless, other resources were not renounced: it was determined that a portion of the domains should be scheduled, an operation requiring much time, for the description of each hereditament must be inserted in the schedules, and contracts subsequently negotiated with financial companies. A decree was passed for exposing to sale the messuages situated in towns, estates consisting of less than three hundred acres, and, lastly, the property of the Belgian clergy. The alienation of all the former royal palaces was likewise ordered, excepting Fontainebleau, Versailles, and Compiègne. The moveables of the emigrants were also directed to be forthwith converted into money. All these sales were appointed to be made by auction.

The government, therefore, shrunk as yet from decreeing the reduction of the assignats to the par of exchange, which would have obviated the greatest evil of the time—the ruin inflicted on all who were obliged to receive them, both individuals and the state. It was deterred by considerations from destroying them by this prompt and simple measure. It decided, at the same time, that in the forced loan they should be received as one for a hundred; that for arrears of contributions they should be received for their full value, in order to encourage the discharge of those arrears, which might be anticipated to bring in thirteen thousand millions; that the forced repayments of principal sums should still be suspended, but that house-rents and interests of all kinds should be paid at the rate of ten for one, which was still a very onerous arrangement for those who drew their incomes from such sources. The payment of the land-tax and of territorial rents was maintained on the old basis, that is to say, half in kind, half in assignats. The customs-duties were to be levied half in assignats, half in specie. This proviso was applied to the customs, because specie was already plentiful on the frontiers. There was likewise a special provision with regard to Belgium. The assignats had not penetrated into that part of the republic; accordingly, it was determined that the forced loan and the taxes should be there collected in specie alone.

Thus, the existing government of France timidly reverted to specie, not daring boldly to solve all difficulties by one decisive step, and betraying the temporising hesitation usual in such cases. The financial expedients were, therefore, the forced loan, the national domains exposed to sale, and the collection of arrears; all which, promising to lodge large amounts of paper in the state coffers, would permit a future issue. Moreover, regular receipts in specie might be relied on.

The subjects next in importance to the questions of finance were those relative to desertion and to the nomination of the non-elected functionaries. Touching the first, a measure was required for recomposing the armies; and with regard to the latter, one for completing the organisation of the municipal bodies and the courts of justice.

Desertion to the enemy, a crime very rare, was punished with death. The penalty to be inflicted for seducing soldiers was discussed with much warmth. Notwithstanding a severe opposition, however, seduction was punished in the same manner as desertion to the enemy. All furloughs granted to the young men of the requisition were to expire in ten days. The pursuit after conscripts who had forsaken their banners, when confided to the municipalities, was found to be conducted with apathy and to be of none effect; wherefore the duty was transferred to the gendarmerie. Desertion to the interior was punished with detention for the first offence, and with the galleys for the second. The grand plan of requisition framed in August 1793, which remained the sole measure of recruitment that had been adopted, provided a sufficient number of men to fill the armies; it had sufficed for three years to maintain them on a respectable footing, and it might still prove adequate by means of a new law more effectually ensuring its execution. The propositions of the government were assailed by the opposition, which of course strove to impede the action of the executive; but they were adopted by the majority of the two councils.

Numerous electoral assemblies had consumed the interval of their convocation in debates on the decrees of the 5th and 13th Fructidor, and failed to nominate individuals to compose the local administrations and the tribunals. Such as were held in the provinces of the West, had been debarred from making those appointments by the civil war. Others had allowed the privilege to lapse through negligence. The conventionalist majority, actuated by the desire of rendering all the parts of the government harmonious, and of perfecting one homogeneous revolutionary whole, maintained that the Directory should have the nominations. It seems natural that the rights citizens think fit to relinquish should devolve on the government, or in other words, that the action of the government should make amends for the inaction of individuals. Accordingly, in all cases where the electoral assemblies had allowed the constitutional term to elapse, or refrained for any cause from exercising their privileges, the Directory was naturally the party to supply the vacancies. To convoke new assemblies would involve an infringement of the constitution, which prohibited such recall, and offer, moreover, a recompense to disobedience and revolt; above all, the opportunity would be seized to provoke fresh troubles. Besides, there already existed analogous provisions in the constitution, tending to resolve the question in favour of the Directory. Thus, it was empowered to fill up nominations in the colonies, and to replace functionaries deceased or resigned in the period occurring between the elections. The opposition controverted this doctrine with great force. Dumolard in the Council of Five Hundred, Portalis, Dupont [de Nemours], and Tronçon-Ducoudray, in the Council of Ancients, objected that this right of appointment would confer a royal prerogative on the Directory. This minority, which secretly inclined rather to a monarchy than a republic, here changed parts with the republican majority, and advocated democratical views with strange exaggeration. At the same time, the discussion, conducted at once with warmth and decorum, was not disturbed by any violent outbreak. The Directory obtained the nominations, on the sole condition of making its selections amongst the men who had been already honoured by the suffrages of the people. This determination was inspired by a regard to principles; but policy recommended it even more forcibly. New elections, and their concomitant agitation, were thereby avoided, and the whole administration of the country, comprehending local authorities, courts of justice, and the executive, was rivetted in a compacter unity.

The Directory, therefore, was armed with the means of procuring funds, recruiting the army, and completing the organisation of the civil and judicial administration. It had a majority in the two councils. A systematic opposition had arisen, it is true, in the Five Hundred and the Ancients; certain members of the new third disputed the augmentation or extent of its attributes, but their opposition was calm, and free from unseemly virulence. It seemed as if they respected its extraordinary situation and its courageous labours. Doubtless, they likewise respected, in this government elected and supported by the conventionalists, the still all-puissant revolution yet smouldering with wrath. The five directors had divided amongst themselves the general service of the state. Barras superintended the composition and Carnot the movement of the armies; Rewbell managed the foreign relations; Le Tourneur and Larévellière-Lépaux the internal administration. On all important measures, however, they deliberated in common. They had, since their first occupation of the Luxembourg, possessed but sorry furniture; they eventually drew from the Garde-Meuble the necessary articles for the embellishment of that residence, and began to represent the French republic with a more imposing dignity. Their antechambers were crowded with eager applicants, amongst whom it was not always easy to choose with very nice discrimination. Faithful to the nature and origin of its institution, however, the Directory invariably selected the most decided adherents of the revolution. Warned by the revolt of the 13th Vendémiaire, it had marshalled a considerable force to guarantee Paris and the seats of government from the hazards of an assault. Young Bonaparte, who had rendered himself so conspicuous on the 13th Vendémiaire, was intrusted with the command of this force, styled the army of the interior. He had subjected it to a total reorganisation, and located it in the camp of Grenelle. He had embodied in a single corps, under the name of the legion of police, a portion of the patriots who had offered their services on the 13th Vendémiaire. Those patriots belonged for the most part to the old gendarmerie dissolved after the 9th Thermidor, which had been entirely composed of soldiers formerly enrolled in the French guards. Bonaparte afterwards organised the constitutional guard of the Directory and that of the two councils. This formidable and well-directed force was adequate to impress the turbulent with a wholesome feeling of respect, and to keep all parties in awe and order.

Firm in its line of policy, the Directory manifested its principles still more unequivocally in various measures of detail. It persisted in abstaining from any formal notification of its installation to the conventional deputies on missions in the departments. It enjoined the managers of theatres to proscribe the recitation of all popular airs but one, the Marseillaise. The Reveil du Peuple was interdicted. This order was censured as puerile: it is certain dignity would have been best consulted by prohibiting every species of song; but the object of the government at present was to rekindle republican enthusiasm, unhappily somewhat dormant and lukewarm. The Directory prompted prosecutions against sundry royalist journalists, who had continued to write with the same violence as in Vendémiaire. Although the freedom of the press was unlimited, the law of the convention against writers who should provoke to the return of royalty, furnished a medium of repression in extreme cases. Richer-Serizy was indicted; the process was opened against Lemaitre and Brottier, whose correspondence with Verona, London, and La Vendée, proved their character of royalist agents and their influence in the troubles of Vendémiaire. Lemaitre was condemned to death as the principal agent; Brottier was acquitted. Two secretaries of the committee of public welfare were ascertained to have communicated to them important papers. The three deputies, Saladin, Lhomond, and Rovère, placed under arrest on account of the 13th Vendémiaire, but subsequent to their actual re-election by the electoral assembly of Paris, were reintegrated by the two councils, on the ground that they were already deputies when proceedings were commenced against them, and that the forms prescribed by the constitution with regard to deputies had not been observed. Cormatin, and the Chouans seized with him as infractors of the pacification, were likewise put on their trial. Cormatin was sentenced to expatriation for having continued secretly to foment civil war; the others were acquitted, to the great displeasure of the patriots, who complained most bitterly of the indulgence evinced by the tribunals.

The conduct of the Directory with reference to the minister of the court of Florence, demonstrated even more emphatically the republican rigour of its sentiments. A convention had been signed with Austria, whereby it was agreed to deliver into her hands the daughter of Louis XVI., the sole remnant of the family immured in the Temple, on condition that the deputies betrayed by Dumouriez should be surrendered to the French advanced posts. The princess emerged from the Temple on the 28th Frimaire (19th December). The minister of the interior attended in person to receive her, and conducted her, with signal marks of respect, to his residence, whence she departed, accompanied by the individuals she had selected for that purpose. A munificent allowance was granted for her journey, and she was thus honourably conveyed to the frontier. The royalists failed not to publish verses and articles on the unfortunate captive, at the moment of her being finally restored to liberty. Count Carletti, the Florentine minister, who had been accredited to France on account of his known attachment to the country and the revolution, demanded from the Directory permission to visit the princess in his character of ambassador of an allied court. This minister had become suspected, doubtless erroneously, owing to the very exaggeration of his republicanism. It appeared inconceivable that the envoy of an absolute prince, and especially of an Austrian prince, could honestly entertain such extreme opinions. The Directory, as the sole reply to his demand, signified to him an order forthwith to leave Paris, but declared at the same time that this proceeding was purely personal to the ambassador, and not intended as an insult to the court of Florence, with which the French republic remained, and wished to remain, on terms of amity.

Six weeks at the uttermost had elapsed since the Directory was installed, and already it began to be firmly seated in authority; the parties were becoming habituated to the idea of an established government, and, meditating less upon its subversion, prepared to combat it within the limits prescribed by the constitution. The patriots, adhering to their favourite idea of a club, congregated at the Pantheon; they often gathered within that spacious edifice to the number of four thousand and upwards, composing an assemblage bearing a strong affinity to that of the effete Jacobins. Obedient, however, to the letter of the constitution, they abstained from any direct violation of its prohibitions affecting the meetings of citizens, abjuring every semblance of organisation as a political assembly. Thus they appointed no regular officers to constitute a bureau; they distributed no tickets amongst themselves; the individuals present were not distinguished as spectators and initiated associates; they maintained neither correspondence nor the relations of affiliation with other societies of a like nature. With these exceptions, the club had all the characteristics of the old parent society, and its passions, if more dulled by time, were only the more obstinately rooted.

The sectionaries resolved themselves into associations more analogous to their tastes and manners. Now, as under the convention, they included secret royalists in their ranks, but comparatively few in number; the majority of them, from undefined apprehensions, and from an affectation of fashion, were declared enemies of terrorists and conventionalists, whom they professed to confound, and whose predominance in the new government they regarded with spleen and anger. They formed societies, where they met to read the newspapers and converse on political topics with all the suavity and polish of the saloons, and where such perusal and conversations were followed by dancing and music. The winter was advancing, and these personages abandoned themselves to gaiety, as a proof of hostility to the revolutionary system—a system, by the way, which was beyond the power of revival, for no Saint-Justs, Robespierres, or Couthons, were alive to enforce upon the French, by the agency of terror, odious and impossible manners.

The two parties had their respective journals. The patriots had Le Tribun du Peuple, L'Ami du Peuple, L'Eclaireur du Peuple, L'Orateur Plébéien, Le Journal des Hommes Libres: these publications were thoroughly Jacobinical. La Quotidienne, L'Eclair, Le Véridique, Le Postillon, Le Messager, La Feuille du Jour, passed for royalist journals. The patriots, in their club and peculiar prints, betokened great discontent and irritation, although the government was assuredly well attached to the revolution. It was, undoubtedly, less against the government than against events that their wrath was excited. The reverses on the Rhine, the new movements in La Vendée, and the dismal financial crisis, were to them so many grounds for reverting to their cherished doctrines. If the armies were beaten, if assignats fell, it was because of the indulgent laxity—because recourse was not boldly had to the grand revolutionary expedients. The new financial system, especially, which betrayed the desire to abolish assignats, and seemed too sure a precursor of their ultimate suppression, had aroused their choler in a supreme degree.

To their adversaries no other subjects of invective were needed than this very irritation of the patriots. Terror, so they inculcated, was on the eve of resuscitation. Its partisans were incorrigible: the Directory vainly strove to obey their wishes; they were not satisfied; they were engaged in renewed agitations, they had re-opened the old den of the Jacobins, and were meditating all imaginable atrocities.

Such were the labours of the government, the tendencies of opinion, and the situation of parties, in Frimaire year 4 (November and December 1795).

The military operations, continued despite the season, began to promise more auspicious results, and to afford the new administration some solace for its arduous efforts. The zeal wherewith Jourdan had plunged into the Hundsrück through a horrible country, and without any of the physical resources calculated to alleviate the sufferings of his army, had somewhat re-established affairs on the Rhine. The Austrian generals, whose troops were equally fatigued with the French, finding themselves exposed to a series of stubborn conflicts, in the heart of winter, proposed an armistice, during which the two hostile armies should retain their actual positions. The armistice was accepted, on condition of its cessation being proclaimed ten days before the resumption of hostilities. The line which separated the two armies, following the Rhine, from Düsseldorf to above Neuwied, left the river at that point, formed a semicircle from Bingen to Manheim, passing by the foot of the Vosges, rejoined the Rhine above Manheim, and skirted it all the way to Basle. Thus the French had lost all that the semicircle encompassed on the left bank—a loss, at the same time, which a well-conceived manœuvre might repair. The great misfortune consisted in having forfeited for the moment the ascendancy of victory. The armies, overwhelmed with hardships and exhaustion, entered into cantonments, and in the interim, the preparations requisite for putting them in a state to open a decisive campaign early in the ensuing spring, were diligently prosecuted.

On the Italian frontier, likewise, the season failed to put an entire stop to the operations of war. The army of the Eastern Pyrenees had been transported to the Alps. The march from Perpignan to Nice had necessarily occupied a lengthened interval, and had been additionally delayed by the want of provisions and of shoes for the soldiers. At length, towards the month of November, Augèreau appeared with a superb division, which had already gathered laurels in the plains of Catalonia. Kellermann, as previously chronicled, had been compelled to fall back on his right wing, and to relinquish the immediate communication with Genoa. He had his left on the Great Alps, and his centre in the Col di Tende. His right was stationed behind the line called of Borghetto, one of the three detected and marked out by Bonaparte during the preceding year as available in case of a retreat. Dewins, vastly elated with his inconsiderable success, reposed on the Genoese coast, and talked in a majestic strain about his projects, without, however, attempting the execution of any. The brave Kellermann had awaited with impatience the reinforcements from Spain, in order to resume the offensive and recover his communication with Genoa. He longed to terminate the campaign by a brilliant action, which might restore the Riviera to the French, open to them the avenues of the Apennines and of Italy, and detach the King of Sardinia from the coalition. The French ambassador in Switzerland, Barthélemy, forcibly inculcated that a victory towards the Maritime Alps would immediately ensure a peace with Piedmont and the definitive cession of the barrier of the Alps. The French government, in unison with Kellermann as to the necessity of attacking, dissented from him with regard to the plan of operations, and superseded him in favour of Schérer, whom his achievements at the battle on the Ourthe and in Catalonia had already recommended to favourable notice. Schérer arrived in the middle of Brumaire, and resolved to attempt a decisive blow.

It is known that the chain of the Alps, now become the Apennines, trenches closely on the Mediterranean from Albenga to Genoa, and leaves between the sea and the crest of the mountains merely narrow and rapid slopes, which have a breadth of scarcely three leagues. On the opposite side, on the contrary, that is to say, towards the valley of the Po, the slopes decline gently upon a space of twenty leagues. The French army, placed on the maritime slopes, was encamped between the mountains and the sea. The Piedmontese army, under Colli, fixed in the intrenched camp of Ceva, on the reverse of the mountain ridge, guarded the avenues of Piedmont against the left of the French army. The Austrian army, stationed partly on the summit of the Apennines, at Rocca-Barbenne, and partly on the maritime flank in the basin of Loano, thus communicated with Colli by its right, occupied with its centre the pinnacle of the mountains, and blocked the shore with its left, so as to intercept the French communications with Genoa. Upon a contemplation of this state of things a conception was vividly presented to the mind. Move in force on the right and centre of the Austrian army, drive it from the crests of the Apennines, and wrest from it all the upper heights: such the plan pointed out to the French. They would thus isolate the Austrians from Colli, and, marching rapidly along the mountain tops, enclose their left in the basin of Loano, between the mountains and the sea. Massena, one of the generals of division, had seized this idea and propounded it to Kellermann. Schérer likewise discerned all the advantages of the plan, and resolved to put it in execution.

Dewins, after having essayed a few attempts on the French line of Borghetto during the months of August and September, had renounced the intention of any further aggressive movement for the year. He had fallen into bad health, and given up the command to Wallis. The officers of his army thought only of enjoying to the utmost the pleasures of winter in Genoa and the environs. Schérer, after procuring for his forces supplies of provisions and twenty-four thousand pairs of shoes, whereof they were absolutely devoid, fixed his movement for the 2d Frimaire (23d November). With thirty-six thousand men he prepared for an attack upon forty-five thousand; but the excellent choice of the point whereon he purposed to direct his efforts compensated the inferiority of strength. He instructed Augereau to drive the left of the enemy into the basin of Loano; he ordered Massena to fall on their centre at Rocca-Barbenne, and seize upon the summit of the Apennines; lastly, he enjoined Serrurier to keep in check the army under Colli, who formed the right on the opposite flank. Augereau, whilst pushing the Austrian left into the basin of Loano, was to operate leisurely; Massena, on the contrary, was to defile rapidly along the crests and turn the basin of Loano, with the view of hemming in the Austrian left; Serrurier was directed to beguile the attention of Colli by false demonstrations of attack.

On the morning of the 2d Frimaire, the French cannon startled the Austrians, who had but little expectation of a battle. The officers hastened from Loano and Finale to place themselves at the head of their amazed troops. Augereau attacked with vigour but with preconcerted composure. He was arrested by the brave Roccavina. That general, placed on an eminence in the middle of the basin of Loano, defended it with obstinacy, and allowed himself to be surrounded by the division under Augereau, resolutely refusing to surrender. When he was enveloped, he rushed headlong on the encompassing line, and rejoined the Austrian army, sweeping over the bulk of a French brigade.

Schérer, restraining the ardour of Augereau, obliged him to skirmish before Loano, in order to avoid pushing the Austrians too rapidly on their line of retreat. In the interim, Massena, charged with the brilliant part of the plan, scaled, with the temerity and vigour which distinguished him on all occasions, the crests of the Apennines, surprised Argenteau, who commanded the right of the Austrians, threw him into extreme disorder, chased him from all his positions, and appeared in the evening on the heights of Melogno, which formed the enclosure of the basin of Loano and barred its rear. Serrurier, by a series of firm and skilfully devised attacks, had kept Colli and the whole adverse right in check.

On the evening of the 2d, the French encamped on the positions they had gained, amidst deplorable weather. By dawn on the 3d, Schérer resumed his operation: Serrurier, being reinforced, prepared to engage Colli more seriously, with the view of completely isolating him from his allies; Massena continued to occupy all the crests and gorges of the Apennines; Augereau, ceasing to restrain his ardour, impetuously assailed the Austrians, whose rear-ground had been thus intercepted. From that moment, the Imperialists began their retreat, impeded by dismal weather and most frightful roads. Their right and centre recoiled in disorder upon the reverse flank of the Apennines, whilst their left, pressed between the mountains and the sea, retired arduously along the line of coast by the route of Corniche. A storm of wind and snow prevented the pursuit being prosecuted with all the requisite activity; nevertheless, five thousand prisoners, several thousands disabled on the field, forty pieces of cannon, and immense magazines, were the results of this engagement, which proved one of the most disastrous fought by the allies since the commencement of the war; whereas, on the part of the French, it has been deemed most ably planned and conducted, by experienced military critics.

Piedmont was struck with consternation at the tidings of this defeat; all Italy, indeed, trembled, and was consoled only by the hope that the advanced season would deter the French from carrying forward their operations. Abundant magazines, meanwhile, served to alleviate the sufferings and privations of their army. This important achievement occurred most opportunely to dispel the gloom brooding over France, and to strengthen the nascent government. It was proclaimed and greeted with rapturous joy by all true patriots.

In the provinces of the West, also, events simultaneously took a turn not less favourable to the government. Hoche, having augmented the army occupying the two Vendées to 44,000 men, planted intrenched posts on the Sèvre-Nantaise, so as to separate Stofflet from Charette, and dispersed the first assemblage gathered by the latter chief; and, by means of a camp at Soullans, guarding the whole coast of the Marais, was fully prepared to oppose a disembarkation. The English squadron, anchored off Isle-Dieu, was, on the contrary, in a very forlorn condition. The island on which the expedition had so injudiciously landed, was a bare surface, without shelter or resource, and less than three quarters of a league in area. The shores of the islet, moreover, afforded no safe anchorage. The vessels were exposed to all the violence of the wind, on a rocky ground which cut the cables and nightly placed them in imminent peril. The confronting coast, on which it was proposed to disembark, presented to contemplation a long, flat, narrow beach, on which the waves were incessantly breaking, and which the boats, taken athwart by the billows, could not approach without incurring great danger of being swamped. Every day increased the hazards of the English squadron and the means of Hoche. Six weeks had already elapsed since the French prince first set foot on Isle-Dieu. The envoys of the Chouans and Vendéans clustered around him, and, amalgamated with his own staff, proffered their views and counsel with emulous ardour, each labouring to give his own predominance. All wished to possess the prince, but all were agreed that his immediate disembarkment was essential, whatever point might obtain the preference.

It cannot be denied that this sojourn of six weeks in Isle-Dieu, within view of the coasts, had rendered a disembarkation more difficult. A descent on a hostile land, like the passage of a river, should not be preceded by a prolonged hesitation, which puts the enemy on his guard and intimates to him the menaced point. When the resolution to assail the coast was finally taken, and all the chiefs were forewarned, the descent should have been suddenly attempted at a point where the communication with the English squadron might be maintained, and the Vendéans and Chouans enabled to concentrate with their forces. There is little doubt that, if the disembarkation had been effected on the coast without this long preliminary menace, forty thousand royalists from Brittany and La Vendée might have been mustered before Hoche had time to put his battalions in motion. When we remember what occurred at Quiberon—the facility with which the descent was accomplished, and the interval that elapsed before the republican troops could be assembled—we readily comprehend how easy this second descent would have been, if it had not been wilfully jeopardised by a lengthened cruise off the coasts. Moreover, in the previous expedition, the supremacy of Puisaye was distasteful to the chiefs; whereas, in the present one, the name of the prince would have rallied them all, and stirred twenty departments. True, the emigrants when landed would have had many rude combats to sustain; they must have submitted to encounter the chances that Stofflet, Charette, and others had braved for nearly three years—to disperse, perchance, before their enemy, fly like marauding partisans, conceal themselves in woods, reappear, again seek concealment, and, in fine, incur the risk of being captured and shot. Thrones are won by such means. There was no degradation in Chouannising amid the woods of Brittany, or amidst the marshes and thickets of La Vendée. A prince, issuing from those retreats to regain the throne of his fathers, would not have been less glorious than Gustavus Vasa, emerging from the mines of Dalecarlia. For the rest, it is probable that the presence of the prince would have awakened sufficient zeal in the royalist districts to enable him, with a numerous army steadfast under his banner, to attempt enterprises of greater pith and moment. It is, at the same time, equally probable that none of those around him would have possessed sufficient genius to cope with the young plebeian who commanded the republican army; but, at all events, the glory of contesting victory was to be gained. There are often consolations amid discomfiture: Francis I. found such after the defeat of Pavia.

If, therefore, the disembarkation had been practicable at the moment the squadron arrived, it was no longer so after loitering six weeks at Isle-Dieu. The English naval officers declared that the station would speedily become untenable, and that some determination must be forthwith taken. All the coast of Charette's country was covered with troops; there was no possibility of effecting a descent except beyond the Loire, towards the mouth of the Vilaine, or in Scépeaux's district, or again in Brittany, in concert with Puisaye. But the emigrants and the prince were averse to a descent any where but in Charette's neighbourhood, and expressed confidence in that leader alone. Now, the thing was impracticable on Charette's line of coast. The prince, according to the assertion of M. de Vauban, demanded to be recalled by the English ministry. That ministry at first refused his application, unwilling that the expenses of its armament should be altogether fruitless. Ultimately it left the prince at liberty to adopt what step he chose.

Immediately thereupon preparations were made for departure. Long and useless instructions were framed for the royalist chiefs. They were told that superior orders prevented for the moment the execution of the enterprise; that Messieurs Charette, Stofflet, Sapinaud, and Scépeaux, must arrange to assemble a force of twenty-five or thirty thousand men beyond the Loire, which, with the junction of the Bretons, might be swelled into an effective army of forty or fifty thousand men, sufficient to protect the disembarkment of the prince; that the point of descent would be intimated so soon as those preliminary measures had been taken; and that all the resources of the English monarchy would be freely lavished in aiding the efforts of the royalist districts. With these instructions were combined sundry thousands of pounds sterling for each chief, a supply of muskets, and a small quantity of gunpowder. These articles were landed at night on the coast of Brittany. The provisions the English had stored in their squadron having become damaged, they were cast into the sea. It was found necessary to consign to a like fate the five hundred horses belonging to the English cavalry and artillery. Those animals were almost all diseased from the effects of the prolonged navigation.

The English squadron set sail on the 15th November (26th Brumaire), and left as its parting legacy consternation amongst the royalists. It was the English, they were taught, who had compelled the prince to forsake them: they were filled with indignation, and inveighed in terms of unmeasured virulence against the perfidy of England. Charette was the most deeply incensed, and he had good reason to be so, for he was the most compromised. Charette had resumed arms in anticipation of a great expedition—in the hope of receiving powerful succours capable of establishing an equality of strength between him and the republicans: these expectations belied, he could see before him nothing but destruction—an inevitable and speedy destruction. The threatened descent had drawn upon him all the forces of the republicans; this time he could entertain no hopes of a negotiation; the fate awaiting him, if taken, must be stern and merciless, without any right on his part to complain of an enemy who had once so generously forgiven him.

He determined to sell his life dearly, and to devote his last moments to a desperate struggle. He waged several engagements in endeavours to pass to the rear of Hoche, pierce the line of the Sèvre-Nantaise, and reach the country of Stofflet, in order to coerce that partisan into a resumption of hostilities. His efforts were vain, and he was driven back into the Marais by the columns of Hoche. Sapinaud, whom he had engaged to retake arms, surprised the town of Montaigu, and attempted to penetrate as far as Châtillon; but he was stopped before that place, defeated, and obliged to disband his corps. The line of the Sèvre could not be forced. Stofflet, behind that fortified barrier, was constrained to remain in tranquillity, and, indeed, he was not disposed to resume arms. He viewed with secret pleasure the approaching ruin of a rival who had been loaded with titles, and who had meditated his deliverance into the hands of the republicans. Scépeaux, also, between the Loire and the Vilaine, dared not move. Brittany was disorganised by discord. The division of Morbihan, commanded by George Cadoudal, had revolted against Puisaye, at the instigation of the emigrants who accompanied the French prince, and who still harboured against him their old resentments. They were anxious to wrest from him the command of Brittany. However, the division of Morbihan was the only one that denied the authority of the generalissimo.

It was in this state of things that Hoche commenced the great work of pacification. That young soldier, an able politician as well as general, perceived that the agency of arms alone must be ineffectual to subjugate an enemy who baffled all pursuit and was impervious to regular warfare. He had already dispatched several moveable columns in the wake of Charette; but soldiers, heavily armed and under the necessity of carrying every thing with them, and ignorant, moreover, of the country, could not keep pace with the fleetness of peasants who bore nothing but their muskets, sure of finding provisions every where, and cognisant of every petty ravine and thicket in the land. Accordingly, he countermanded his orders for pursuit, and formed a plan, which, followed with constancy and firmness, promised to revive the reign of peace in those desolated provinces.

The inhabitant of La Vendée was at once a peasant and a soldier. Amidst all the horrors of civil war he had never ceased to cultivate his fields and tend his flocks. His musket was ever at his side, concealed under the soil or in the midst of straw. At the first signal from his chief he flew to the rendezvous, attacked the republicans, disappeared through the woods, returned to his fields, and again concealed his musket: so the republicans found him a mere unarmed peasant, in whom it was impossible to recognise the recent soldier. In this manner the Vendéans carried on incessant hostilities, reared sufficient produce for their maintenance, and remained, as it were, unassailable to their enemies. Whilst they always possessed the means of inflicting injury and recruiting their strength, the republican armies, to whom an exhausted administration could no longer forward the requisite supplies, lacked all essential articles, and pined under the most horrible destitution.

Under such circumstances, the only mode of making the Vendéans feel the war sensibly was by perpetrating devastations—a course that had been adopted during the system of terror, but which had only tended to excite more inveterate animosities without causing the cessation of the civil war.

Hoche devised an ingenious scheme for reducing without destroying the country, by abstracting its arms, and appropriating a part of its produce for the use of the republican army. In the first place, he adhered to the plan of distributing several intrenched camps, whereof some, situated on the Sèvre, separated Charette from Stofflet, whilst others covered Nantes, the coast, and Les Sables. He next formed a circular line resting on the Sèvre and the Loire, whereby it was intended progressively to encompass the whole district. This line was composed of strong posts, connected together by patrols, so that not an interval remained free to admit the passage of an enemy at all numerous. These posts were charged to occupy every market-town and village, and disarm the inhabitants. To succeed in that operation, they were directed to seize the cattle, which usually depastured in common, and the corn stored in granaries, and to arrest the most notable of the inhabitants; the cattle, corn, and inhabitants thus taken as hostages, were to be restored only when the peasants should have voluntarily surrendered their arms. Now, as the Vendéans prized their flocks and grain more than the Bourbons or Charette, it was pretty certain they would give up their weapons. To frustrate any deception on the part of the peasants, who might deliver a few damaged pieces and retain the rest, the officers intrusted with the care of disarming them were to insist upon an inspection of the registers of enrolment kept in each parish, and demand as many muskets as there were names enrolled. In default of these registers, they were enjoined to make a calculation of the population, and exact a number of fire-arms equivalent to the fourth of the male inhabitants. After receiving the arms, they were commanded to restore the cattle and grain with scrupulous fidelity save a portion deducted under the title of impost, be deposited in magazines formed to the rear of the line of circumvallation. Hoche strongly inculcated upon his officers the necessity of treating the inhabitants with the greatest mildness, and of observing the strictest good faith in the restitution of their flocks, stores, and above all, their hostages. He especially exhorted them to hold conciliatory converse with the people, manifest an interest in their welfare, forward some of them to his head-quarters, and make them presents in grain or in different objects. He likewise prescribed sedulous regard towards the incumbents. The Vendéans, he urged, were actuated by but one genuine sentiment—attachment to their priests. Those ecclesiastics wanted merely protection and repose; let them be assured on those two points, let even certain benefits be added, and the affections of the country would be retrieved to the republic.

The line, which was denominated the line of disarmment, was intended to envelop Lower Vendee circularly, advance by gradual steps, and conclude by grasping it in close tension. As it moved forward, it would leave behind it the country disarmed, reduced and even reconciled with the republic. Moreover, it would protect such districts from a return of the insurgent chiefs, who were accustomed to punish by devastations submission to the republic and the deposit of arms. Two moveable columns were to precede it, for the purpose of engaging those chiefs and seizing them if possible; and thus, steadily compressing them more and more, it must speedily surround and inevitably capture them. The utmost vigilance was recommended to the commandants of posts, in maintaining communications by patrols, and preventing armed bands from penetrating the line and returning to wage war in the rear. However watchful the attention nevertheless, it might occur that Charette and some of his followers were able to baffle the vigilance of the posts, and clear the line of disarmment; but, in that case even, which was possible, they could only pass with a few individuals, and would find themselves in disarmed localities, restored to repose and security, tranquillised by humane treatment, and furthermore intimidated by that vast network of troops embracing the country. The contingency of a revolt on the rear was also foreseen. Hoche ordered that one of the moveable columns should immediately recoil on the insurgent quarter, and that, to punish it for not having surrendered all its arms and for having again appealed to them, its flocks and grain should be carried off, and the principal inhabitants arrested. The effect of such chastisement was undoubted; dispensed with justice, its infliction was sure to inspire, not hatred, but a salutary dread.

The project thus sagaciously conceived by Hoche was forthwith put in execution, that is to say, during the months of Brumaire and Frimaire (November and December). The line of disarmment, passing by Saint-Gilles, Légé, Montaigu, and Chantonnay, formed a semicircle, the right extremity whereof rested on the sea, the left on the River Lay, to be progressively advanced until Charette was cooped up in impracticable marshes. Upon the wisdom of the execution the success of a plan of this nature entirely depended. Hoche guided his officers by detailed instructions marked by good sense and perspicuity, and was himself on every point to amend irregularities. It was no longer merely a war he had to prosecute, but a grand political operation, which required equal prudence and vigour. The inhabitants soon began to surrender their arms, and to become reconciled with the republican troops. Hoche granted certain appropriate relief to the indigent from the magazines of the army; he visited in person the inhabitants detained as hostages, kept them under guard for a few days, and then dismissed them well satisfied. To some he gave cockades, to others caps worn by the police, and sometimes corn to those who needed it to sow their fields. He maintained a correspondence with the incumbents, who had great confidence in him and acquainted him with all the secrets of the country. He thus commenced to acquire a great moral influence—the veritable power wherewith such a war might be best terminated. Meanwhile, the magazines formed on the rear of the line of disarmment were filled with grain, large flocks of cattle were herded, and the army began to enjoy abundance, through the very simple expedient of collecting taxes and penalties in kind.

Charette had retreated into the woods, with one hundred or one hundred and fifty men, equally desperate with himself. Sapinaud, who, at his instigation, had again taken up arms, offered to lay them down a second time, on the sole condition of having his life spared. Stofflet, enclosed in Anjou with his minister Bernier, welcomed to his district all the officers who abandoned Charette and Sapinaud, and sought to strengthen himself with their spoils. At his head-quarters of Laval, he held a species of court, composed of emigrants and officers. He enrolled men and levied contributions, under pretext of organising the rural guards. Hoche kept an attentive eye upon his movements, pressed upon him more closely with the intrenched camps, and threatened him with an immediate disarming on the first cause of offence. An expedition which Hoche dispatched into Le Loroux, a country which had a sort of independent existence, obeying neither the republic nor any chief, struck Stofflet with dismay. Hoche was prompted to undertake this expedition in order to procure supplies of wine and wheat, with which Le Loroux abounded, and whereof the city of Nantes was entirely devoid. Stofflet was grievously alarmed, and solicited an interview with Hoche. He might plausibly protest his fidelity to the treaty, intercede for Sapinaud and the Chouans, affect the part of mediator in a new pacification, and secure by such means a prolongation of influence. It was his object thus to probe the views of Hoche regarding him. Hoche expressed to him the complaints of the republic, and intimated that if he afforded asylum to every brigand, continued to levy men and money, and attempted to be any thing more than the temporary chief of the police of Anjou, or to play the part of a prince, he would instantly seize him and disarm his province. Stofflet promised unlimited submission, and retired full of disquieting reflections touching the future.

Hoche was beset with additional difficulties at this critical moment. He had drawn under his standard draughts from the two armies of Brest and Cherbourg. The impending danger of a descent had procured him these reinforcements, which had increased to 44,000 men the troops assembled in La Vendée. The generals commanding the armies of Cherbourg and Brest now reclaimed the detachments they had lent, and the Directory seemed to approve their demands. Hoche wrote that the operation he had just commenced was of the utmost moment; that if he were deprived of the troops he had spread like a net around the Marais, the subjugation of Charette's country, and the destruction of that chief, which were imminent, would be postponed indefinitely; that it would be better to finish what was already so far advanced before proceeding elsewhere; and that, after such accomplishment, he would use all diligence in returning the troops he had borrowed, and even furnish his own to the general commanding in Brittany, in order that the same measures might be there applied which had already produced such happy effects in La Vendée. The government, struck with the reasons of Hoche, and having great confidence in him, summoned him to Paris, with the intention of approving all his plans and conferring on him the command of the three armies of La Vendée, Brest, and Cherbourg. It was at the end of Frimaire that the order reached him to visit Paris, for the purpose of concerting with the Directory the operations best adapted for putting an end to this, the most calamitous of wars.

Thus terminated the campaign of 1795. The capture of Luxumbourg, the passage of the Rhine, the victories on the Pyrenees, followed by peace with Spain, the destruction of the emigrant army at Quiberon, had illustrated the commencement and the middle. The end was less propitious. The retreat of the armies over the Rhine, the loss of the lines before Mayence, and of part of the territory at the foot of the Vosges, occurred to obscure for a while the lustre of victory; but the battle of Loano, laying open the avenues of Italy, re-established the French ascendancy in arms, whilst the labours of Hoche in the West prepared the way for the veritable pacification of La Vendée, so often prematurely announced.

The coalition, reduced to England and Austria, with a few straggling princes of Italy and Germany, was in the last throes of its efforts, and would have demanded peace but for the late successes on the Rhine. Clairfayt was invested with a vast renown; and the next campaign was apparently expected to open in the heart of the Rhenish provinces.

Pitt, who stood in need of subsidies, convoked a second parliament in autumn to demand fresh sacrifices. The inhabitants of London still invoked peace with their former pertinacity. The society called the Corresponding Society had met in the open air, and adopted addresses, couched in bold and menacing language, against the continuance of the war and in favour of parliamentary reform. As the king went down to parliament, his carriage was assailed with stones, the windows were broken, and an air-gun was even supposed to have been discharged at his person. Pitt, passing through the streets of London on horseback, was recognised by the people, pursued to his residence, and covered with mud. Fox and Sheridan, armed with all the powers of their eloquence, had a rigorous account to exact. Holland conquered, Belgium incorporated with the French republic, its conquest rendered in some sort definitive by the reduction of Luxumbourg, enormous sums shamefully expended in La Vendée, and unfortunate Frenchmen fruitlessly exposed to death, were serious subjects of accusation against the ability and policy of the government. The Quiberon expedition, in particular, excited general indignation. Pitt essayed its defence by alleging the fact that English blood had not flowed. "Alas!" retorted Sheridan, in a bitter repartee, "if no English blood trickled, English honour gushed out at every pore."

Pitt, with his usual impassibility, represented all the events of the year as misfortunes which must be expected when the fortune of war is risked; but he laid great stress on the recent victories of Austria on the Rhine; he infinitely overrated their importance in a military sense, as likewise their effect in facilitating negotiations with France. Adhering to his accustomed topics, he maintained that the French republic touched the limit of its power; that an inevitable bankruptcy was on the point of throwing it into complete confusion and prostration; and that, by having supported the war for another year, the advantage had been gained of reducing the common enemy to extremity. He solemnly promised, at the same time, that if the new French government gave token of becoming established and assuming a regular form, he would seize the first opening to negotiate. He concluded by asking a new loan of three millions sterling, and penal laws against the press and political societies, to which he attributed the outrages offered to the king and himself. The opposition replied to him, that the boasted victories on the Rhine were merely ephemeral; that defeats in Italy had since destroyed the effect resulting from any advantages obtained in Germany; that the French republic, perpetually reduced to the last gasp, arose more vigorous than ever at the opening of each campaign; that the assignats had sunk long ago, they had performed the service for which they were instituted, the resources of France were independent of that paper currency, and if she were really verging to a state of exhaustion, Great Britain was advancing to that catastrophe much more rapidly; finally, that the national debt, daily augmented, had reached an appalling amount, and threatened speedily to crush the energies of the British nation. As to the laws against the press and popular meetings, Fox declared, in a transport of indignation, that if they were passed, the English people had no other resource than resistance; and that he would regard resistance no longer as a question of duty, but one of prudence. This assertion of the right of insurrection provoked a violent outburst, which was terminated by the adoption of Pitt's propositions: he obtained the new loan and the repressive laws, promising to open a negotiation as soon as practicable. The session of parliament was prorogued on the 2d February 1796 (13th Pluviose year 4).*

Pitt had not the slightest intention to conclude peace. He merely purposed to make demonstrations to satisfy public opinion and facilitate the success of his loan. The possession of the Low Countries by France rendered all idea of peace insupportable. His pledge simply implied that he would take an opportunity of commencing a feigned negotiation, and offering inadmissible conditions.

Austria, to satisfy the empire, which clamoured for peace, had made overtures through the medium of Denmark. That power, on the part of Austria, had claimed from the French government the formation of an European congress; to which the French government had replied, with justice, that a congress would render all negotiation impracticable, because too many interests would be brought into collision; that if Austria wished for peace, she had only to make a direct proposition, since France was ready to treat individually with all her enemies, and to seal a peace without any intermediate agency. This reply was consonant with reason, for a congress would have necessarily complicated the negotiations, the subject-matter of one treaty being mixed up with that of another, so that the peace with Austria might have been made contingent on peace with England or the empire, and thus rendered any conclusion impossible. For the rest, Austria desired no other rejoinder, as she had no real inclination to negotiate. She had lost too much, and her recent successes had inspired too sanguine hopes, for her to lay down arms with complacency. She strove to reanimate the courage of the King of Sardinia, whom the victory of Loano had greatly alarmed, and promised him for the ensuing campaign a numerous army and a different general. The honours of a triumph were decerned to Clairfayt on his entrance into Vienna: his carriage was drawn by the people, and the favours of the court happily mingled with the incense of popular enthusiasm.

Thus closed, for all Europe, the fourth campaign of this ever memorable war.

CHAPTER XLVI.

CONTINUATION OF ADMINISTRATIVE LABOURS BY THE DIRECTORY.—PARTIES IN THE LEGISLATIVE BODY.—DISCONTENT OF THE JACOBINS.—INSTITUTION OF THE MINISTRY OF POLICE.—FINANCIAL EMBARRASSMENTS; CREATION OF MANDATS.—CONSPIRACY OF BABŒUF.—PACIFICATION OF LA VENDEE; DEATHS OF STOFFLET AND CHARETTE.

THE republican government was at once encouraged and strengthened by the events wherewith the campaign had finally terminated. The convention, by incorporating Belgium with France, by comprehending it within the constitutional area, had imposed on its successors the obligation of concluding treaties solely on the basis of the Rhine remaining the barrier of France. New efforts were requisite, therefore—a fresh campaign, more decisive than the preceding, was required, to constrain the house of Austria and England to acquiesce in the galling fact of French aggrandisement. With this necessity before it, the Directory laboured without intermission to complete the armies, re-establish the finances, and repress the factions.

* [The session in question was not closed until the 19th May 1796. The inaccuracy of French authors in treating of British affairs has often been remarked.]

The Directory exhibited the utmost rigour in executing the laws relative to the young conscripts, and obliged them to rejoin the armies with stern harshness. It had caused to be annulled all pleas of exemption, and had instituted in each canton a medical board to adjudicate upon cases of infirmity. A great number of young men had intruded themselves into the offices of administration, where they defrauded the republic and manifested a dangerous spirit. Strict orders were accordingly issued that no persons should be retained in the public offices but such as were free from the requisition.

The finances attracted the especial attention of the Directory. It strove with indefatigable activity to accelerate the collection of the forced loan of six hundred millions; but an interval must necessarily elapse before it could touch the funds arising from that loan, from the alienation of the produce of the national forests, from the sale of domains three hundred acres in extent, and from the payment of contributions in arrear. In the interim means were to be found to meet the expenses, which unfortunately pressed multitudinously, inasmuch as the installation of the new government was the period which had been assigned as the era of general liquidation, and the winter, moreover, was the season appointed for the preparations of war. To forestall the receipts from all these sources, the Directory had been compelled to employ that resource which had been purposely left at its disposition—the issue of assignats. But it had already emitted in one month from twelve to fifteen thousand millions, in order to obtain a few millions in specie; and the crisis had at length arrived when it was no longer possible to negotiate them at any sacrifice whatsoever. It thereupon conceived the idea of issuing a current paper at short dates, representing the income of the year, as is practised in England with exchequer bills, and as is now usual in France with royal bills. In consequence, it emitted, under the title of rescriptions, bills to bearer, payable at the treasury with the bullion which would continuously flow in, as well from the forced loan, which, in Belgium, was exigible in specie alone, from the produce of the customs, and from the contracts made with the companies which should undertake the management of the forests. It issued at first thirty millions of these rescriptions, and speedily increased them to sixty millions, using the aid of bankers in the operation.

Financial companies were no longer prohibited. The government determined to render them instrumental in the establishment of a bank—an institution needful to public credit, especially at a moment when the belief was prevalent that specie had entirely departed from France. It constituted a company, and proposed to endow it with a certain quantity of national domains to serve as the capital of a bank. This bank was to issue notes, which would have lands as their pledge, and would be payable at sight, like all bank-notes. It was to lend the state a sum proportioned to the quantity of domains so hypothecated. This, we gather, was only another mode of drawing on the value of the national property; instead of resorting to the medium of assignats, that of bank-notes was adopted.

The success of this experiment was extremely problematical; but, in its miserable situation, the government had recourse to every device, and was justified by the pressure of circumstances. Its most commendable operation was the suppression of rations and the reinstatement of free traffic in the article of provisions. We have often alluded to the efforts imposed upon the government, by having taken upon itself the charge of alimenting Paris, and to the heavy burden thence resulting upon the treasury, which bought corn in genuine money, and distributed it to the people of the capital for a nominal value. It recovered scarcely the two-hundredth part of the expenditure; and thus the republic almost virtually subsisted the population of Paris.

The new minister of the interior, Benezech, keenly sensible to the inconveniences of this system, and convinced that existing circumstances warranted its relinquishment, exhorted the Directory to evince the requisite courage. Trade was beginning to resume its wonted course; corn reappeared in all the markets; the people insisted upon receiving their wages in specie, and they were consequently enabled to defray the price of bread, which, in intrinsic currency, was moderate. The minister Benezech, therefore, formally proposed to the Directory to suppress the distribution of rations, which were paid in assignats alone, reserving them merely for the indigent, and for the public fundholders and functionaries, whose annual incomes did not exceed one thousand specie francs. Excepting these three classes, all others were henceforth to provide themselves at the bakers' shops on the principle of free trade.

This was a very bold measure, and required no ordinary courage to attempt. The Directory put it into immediate execution, regardless of the discontent it might engender amongst the people, and of the provocative to turmoil it might furnish to the two factions confederated against the tranquillity of the republic.

Besides these measures, it devised others not less calculated to exacerbate individuals, but which were equally necessary. One of the chief wants of the armies—a want always severely felt in the progress of lengthened warfare—was horses. The Directory demanded from the two councils authority to levy all horses kept for pleasure, and to take, paying for the same, the thirtieth horse employed in agriculture and wainage. The acknowledgment of a horse thus appropriated was to be received in satisfaction of taxes.

This measure, though harsh, was indispensable, and was sanctioned.

The two councils seconded the Directory in all its endeavours, and betokened in every respect an identical spirit, apart from the opposition, hitherto guarded, of the minority. Divers discussions had occurred touching the verification of the powers, the law of the 3d Brumaire, the successions of emigrants, the priests, and the events in the southern departments; and parties began to assume a more distinct development.

The verification of the powers having been referred to a commission, which had numerous investigations to institute relative to the members whose eligibility might be contested, its labours had necessarily occupied a long interval, and the legislature had sat two months ere its report was ready for presentation. It gave rise to a variety of altercations on the intent and meaning of the law of the 13th Brumaire. That law, we remember, proclaimed an amnesty for all crimes and misdemeanours committed during the revolution, excepting those having reference to the 13th Vendémiaire; it excluded from political functions the kinsmen of emigrants and the individuals who, in the electoral assemblies, had declared rebelliously against the decrees of the 5th and 13th Fructidor. It had been the crowning act of energy on the part of the conventionalists, and it was singularly repugnant to the men of moderate tendencies and to the counter-revolutionists who lurked behind them. Several deputies came within its application, and particularly one named Job Aymé, member for La Drôme, who had excited to violence the electoral assembly of his department, and who was accused of belonging to the Company of Jesus. A member of the Five Hundred ventured to move the abrogation of the law. This proposition caused all parties to emerge from the reserve they had hitherto observed. A contention, similar to those which so often divided the convention, occurred in the Council of Five Hundred. Louvet, always true to the revolutionary cause, eagerly ascended the tribune to defend the law. Tallien, who had enacted so conspicuous a part since the 9th Thermidor, and whom the lack of personal consideration had alone prevented from attaining a seat in the Directory, here showed himself the stanch upholder of the revolution, and delivered a discourse which produced a great sensation. The opponents of the law of Brumaire had dwelt upon the circumstances under which it was passed; they had appeared to insinuate that it was an abuse of the victory gained on the 13th Vendémiaire with regard to the vanquished of that day; and they had spoken largely of Jacobins and their revived effrontery. "Let men cease to alarm us," exclaimed Tallien, "by descanting on terror, by recalling epochs totally different from the one of the present time, and by leading us to dread their return. Assuredly, the times are greatly changed: at the epochs to which they so affectedly revert, the royalists had not raised an audacious front; fanatical priests and returned emigrants were not protected; Chouan chiefs were not acquitted. Wherefore, then, compare circumstances which have nothing in common? It is too evident they would arraign the 13th Vendémiaire, the measures which followed that memorable day, and the men who, in those great dangers, saved the republic. So be it! Let our enemies mount this tribune: the friends of the republic will defend us from it. The very men who, during those disastrous occurrences, urged a deluded multitude to the cannon's mouth, would reproach us for the efforts we required to make in order to repel that multitude; they would fain revoke the measures the most pressing danger forced you to adopt: but no, they will not succeed! The law of the 3d Brumaire, the most important of those measures, will be maintained by you, forasmuch as it is necessary to the constitution; and surely you will maintain the constitution." "Yes, yes! we will!" cried numerous voices. Tallien subsequently proposed the exclusion of Job Aymé. Several members of the new third vigorously opposed this exclusion. The debate was characterised by extreme warmth. Eventually the law of the 3d Brumaire was ratified by a renewed sanction, and Job Aymé definitively expelled. Moreover, the scrutiny was ordered to be continued as to such members of the new third whom the provisions of that law similarly affected.

The next subject of discussion was relative to emigrants, and their right to successions not yet fallen. A law of the convention, passed to prevent emigrants from receiving succours, seized their patrimonies and declared the successions to which they had rightful claims, fallen by anticipation, and devolved to the republic. In consequence, a sequestration had been placed on the property of the parents of emigrants. A resolution was submitted to the Five Hundred, authorising a partition, and the abstraction of the part due to emigrants, in order that the sequestration might be raised. A vigorous opposition was offered by the new third. They essayed to combat the proposal, which partook undoubtedly of the revolutionary character, by reasons drawn from common law; they alleged it involved a violation of the rights of property. The council, nevertheless, adopted the resolution. It fared otherwise with the Ancients. This latter council, from the mature age of its members, from its attributes as supreme examiner, naturally acted with more deliberation and circumspection than that of the Five Hundred. It was less influenced by the adverse passions; it was less revolutionary than the majority, and much more so than the minority. Like every intermediate body, its tendencies were of a medium nature; and it rejected the measure, because it would promote the execution of a law it deemed unjust. The councils subsequently decreed that the Directory should be empowered to adjudicate supremely upon demands of erasure from the list of emigrants. They renewed all the laws against the priests who had not taken the oath, or who had retracted it, and against those whom the departmental administrations had condemned to expatriation. They enacted that those priests should be treated as returned emigrants if they reappeared on the French soil. They abated their rigour only in behalf of such as were infirm and unable to transport themselves abroad, who were enjoined to seclusion.

Another topic yet more violently agitated the councils, and provoked a passionate explosion. Fréron continued his mission in the southern departments, where he compounded the administrations and tribunals of ardent revolutionists. The members of the Companies of Jesus, and the counter-revolutionists of every grade, who had indulged in assassinations since the 9th Thermidor, found themselves in their turn exposed to reprisals, and uttered vehement outcries. The deputy Siméon had already urged temperate remonstrances. The deputy Jourdan of Aubagne, a man of ungovernable impulses, and the ex-Girondist Isnard, now vented the most bitter complaints in the Council of Five Hundred, and occupied several sittings with their declamations. The two parties were violently excited. Jourdan and Talot commenced to quarrel in the assembly itself, and almost committed themselves to a pugilistic encounter. Their colleagues happily interfered and separated them. A committee was nominated to frame a report on the state of the South.

These different scenes of contention brought forth the antagonist parties in more distinct array. The majority was considerable in the councils, and actuated congenially with the Directory. The minority, though overborne, daily evinced additional hardihood, and openly manifested its spirit of reaction. This was an exaggerated phasis of the feeling more or less predominant since the 9th Thermidor, which had at first most justly declared against the enormities illustrative of the reign of terror, but had from day to day grown more encroaching and impassioned, until it finally called in question the whole revolution. A few members of the conventional two-thirds voted with the minority, and certain of the new third with the majority.

The conventionalists seized the occasion furnished them by the approaching anniversary of the 21st January, to subject their colleagues suspected of royalism to a painful ordeal. They proposed to hold a festival every 21st of January, commemorative of the last king's death, on which day every individual member of the two councils and the Directory should take an oath of hatred to royalty. This formality of an oath, so often enforced by the ruling parties, could never be regarded as a guarantee; it was simply a vexation of the conquerors, who derived a malicious pleasure from constraining the vanquished to perjure themselves. The project was adopted by the two councils. The conventionalists were all impatience for the sitting of the 1st Pluviose year 4 (21st January 1796), to enjoy the spectacle of their colleagues of the new third passing up to the tribune to anathematise their supposed opinions. Each council assembled that day with extraordinary pomp and ceremony. A festival was prepared in Paris, at which the Directory and all the authorities were appointed to assist. When the time arrived for taking the oath, some of the newly elected betokened embarrassment. The ex-constituent Dupont de Nemours, a member of the Ancients, who retained in advanced age great asperity of temper, and always evinced a spirit of determined hostility to the present government, could not altogether dissemble his chagrin, and as he pronounced the words, "I swear hatred to royalty," he added, "and to every species of tyranny." It was a mode he selected of avenging himself for the refined torture, and of swearing hatred to the Directory in indirect terms. Loud murmurs arose, and Dupont de Nemours was obliged to restrict himself to the official formula. In the Council of Five Hundred, a member named André would have abjured with the same addendum, but was in like manner confined to the strict phraseology of the oath. The president of the Directory delivered an energetic harangue, and the whole government thus solemnly published a profession of faith purely and unequivocally revolutionary.

At this period it occurred that the deputies who had been exchanged for the daughter of Louis XVI. made their appearance in Paris. Their names were, Quinette, Bancal, Camus, Lamarque, Drouet, and Beurnonville, ex-minister of war. They gave a detailed statement of their sufferings in captivity; their words were heard with lively indignation, testimonies of affectionate sympathy were accorded them, and, amidst general satisfaction, they assumed the seats the convention had reserved for them in the two councils. It had been already decreed, in fact, that they should be as of right members of the legislative body.

Thus things stood with the government and parties during the winter of the year 4 (1795-1796.)

France, which desired above all things a stable government and the re-establishment of laws, was beginning to cherish the new state of things, and would have altogether approved it, but for the efforts still required of her for the salvation of the republic. The rigorous execution of the edicts regulating the conscription, the forced loan, the levy of every thirtieth horse, and the wretched condition of the fundholders paid in assignats, were grave subjects of complaint; without such topics of grievance, the new government would have been found excellent. It is only the nobler portion of a nation that is truly sensible to glory, to liberty, to lofty and generous ideas, and consents to undergo sacrifices in their name. The mass sighs for sluggish repose, and cries aloud to be spared sacrifices. There are moments, doubtless, when that opaque and inert mass is animated—stirred by grand and rooted passions: so we saw it in 1789, when liberty was to be achieved, and in 1793, when liberty was to be defended. But, exhausted by these efforts, the great majority of Frenchmen were averse to renew or continue them. It indeed required a government of surpassing ability and vigour to obtain from them the resources necessary to the consolidation of the republic. Fortunately, the youthful generation, always allured by the prospective charms of wild adventure, presented a teeming source for recruiting the armies. The conscripts manifested at first some repugnance to leave their homes and kindred, but they yielded after a slight resistance. Transported to the camps, they quickly acquired a decided taste for war, and distinguished themselves by prodigies of valour. The stagnant community, from whom contributions of money were exacted, was much more difficult to subdue and to reconcile with the government.

The enemies of the revolution took as their staple text the new sacrifices imposed upon France, and declaimed in their journals against the conscription, the forced loan, the forcible levy of horses, the state of the finances, the distress of the fundholders, and the ruthless execution of the edicts regarding emigrants and priests. They affected to consider the government as still based on revolutionary principles, and possessing all their inherent despotism and violence. The nation, they held, could not yet place confidence in it, or confide with security in the future. They inveighed especially against the design of a fresh campaign; they pretended that the tranquillity, the fortunes, and the lives of the citizens, were sacrificed to the vain ambition of conquests, and evinced regret that the revolution should have reaped the honour of giving Belgium to France. At the same time, it was not surprising, they said, that the government should be actuated by such a spirit, or indulge in such projects, when it was remembered that the Directory and the councils were filled with the members of an assembly blackened by the perpetration of hideous crimes.

The patriots, who, in the art of reproaching and recriminating, were equally practised adepts, found on the other hand the government too feeble, and showed a palpable tendency to accuse it of undue concession to the counter-revolutionists. Their complaints were, that emigrants and priests were allowed to return, that the conspirators of Vendémiaire were daily acquitted, that the young men of the requisition were not remanded to the armies with sufficient severity, and that the forced loan was collected with laxity. They especially disapproved of the financial system the government appeared disposed to adopt. We have previously learned that the idea of suppressing assignats had irritated them, and that they had demanded an immediate recurrence to the revolutionary expedients which, in 1793, had rallied the paper to par. The design of having recourse to financial companies, and of establishing a bank, awakened all their prejudices. The government, they said, was about to throw itself into the hands of stockjobbers; by the institution of a bank, it would ruin the assignats, and utterly destroy the paper-money of the republic, for the advantage of a private paper, the creation of stockjobbers. The suppression of rations also roused their indignation. They deemed it an attack on the revolution to restore articles of consumption to free traffic, and to cease the further alimenting of Paris: it betrayed the purpose of starving the people and driving them to despair. On this point the journals of the royalists coincided with those of the Jacobins, and the minister Benezech was assailed with vituperations from both parties.

The wrath of the patriots against the new government was inflamed to the highest pitch by an additional circumstance. The law of the 3d Brumaire, which amnestied all offences having reference to the revolution, nevertheless excepted particular crimes, as robberies and assassinations, which were still amenable to the application of the laws. Thus, the proceedings commenced during the latter days of the convention against the perpetrators of the massacres of September,* were continued as ordinary indictments against murder. The conspirators of Vendémiaire were, at the same time, put upon their trial and almost universally acquitted. The process against the authors of September, on the contrary, was prosecuted with extreme rigour. The patriots were incensed to fury. A certain Babœuf, a rabid Jacobin, already incarcerated in Prairial, and who now owed his liberty to the law of amnesty, had started a journal, in imitation of Marat, under the title of the Tribune of the People. What the imitation of such a model would be is easy of conjecture. More violent than that of Marat, the journal of Babœuf was distinguished not so much by its cynicism as its loathsome vulgarity. The accidents extraordinary circumstances had provoked were here reduced into system, and upheld with a blindness and frenzy hitherto unexampled. When peculiar ideas, which have been paramount for a while, verge to depression, they remain imbedded in certain heads, and resolve themselves into mania and imbecile aberration. Babœuf was the leader of a sect of infatuated creatures, who maintained that the massacre of September had been incomplete, that it ought to be renewed and rendered general, so as to be made definitive. They openly advocated an agrarian law, from which the Hébertists themselves had shrunk, and called into requisition a new term, "the general happiness," to express the aim of their system. The phrase alone was sufficient to characterise them as arrived at the last stage of demagogical absolutism. The pages of Babœuf excited a shudder on their perusal. Men of honest intentions pitied his extravagance; the alarmists feigned to believe in the advent of a new terror; and, sooth to say, the meetings of the society of the Pantheon furnished a specious pretext for their fears. It was in the spacious edifice of Saint-Geneviève that the Jacobins had virtually reopened their club, as we have previously intimated. More numerous than ever, they mustered nearly forty thousand souls, vociferating with united clamour into the still hours of night. They had gradually overstepped the constitution, and had assumed all it prohibited, that is to say, a bureau, a president, and tickets; in short, they had resumed the character of a political assemblage. The standard themes of declamation in this boisterous congregation were afforded by emigrants, priests, stockjobbers—the blood-suckers of the people—the project of a bank, the suppression of assignats, and the proceedings instituted against the patriots.

General Bonaparte

Engraved by J. Freeman

A. Fullarton & Co. London & Edinburgh

The Directory, which found itself daily more firmly consolidated and less exposed to dread counter-revolution, inclined more obviously to conciliate the approbation of all moderate and reasonable men. Acting upon a due sense of its position, it determined to repress this violent outbreak on the part of the Jacobin faction. It possessed the means in the constitution and the existing laws: it resolved to enforce them. In the first place, it caused several numbers of Babœuf's journal to be seized, as provoking to the subversion of the constitution; and in the next place, it closed the society of the Pantheon and some others formed by the gilded youth, in which the journals were read and balls held. These latter were located in the Palais-Royal and on the Boulevard des Italiens, under the titles of the Chess Club, the Salon des Princes, and Salon des Arts. They were not at all formidable, and were comprehended in the measure merely as an evidence of impartiality. The ordinance on the subject was published and executed on the 8th Ventôse (27th February 1796). An edict obtained from the councils appended a condition to those already imposed on popular societies by the constitution: henceforth the number of members in any such society was restricted to sixty.

The minister Benezech, attacked with virulence by both parties, tendered his resignation. The Directory refused to accept it, and wrote him a letter laudatory of his services. This letter was made public. The new system concerning provisions was resolutely maintained; the indigent, the fundholders, and the public functionaries whose incomes were below one thousand specie francs, alone received rations. A further mea- of relief was considered just towards the unfor- lte fundholders, who were still paid in assignats. councils decreed they should be paid in assignats er the ratio of ten to one; an augmentation utterly inadequate, by the way, for assignats scarcely commanded the two-hundredth portion of their nominal value.

The Directory accompanied these measures by the recall of the conventional deputies on missions. It replaced them by commissioners of the government. These commissioners, accredited to the armies or provincial administrations, were to represent the Directory and superintend the execution of the laws. They were not invested, as formerly, with unlimited powers in the armies; but in pressing cases, where the power of the general was insufficient, as in the instance of requisitions either for provisions or troops, they might issue an order of urgency, which was to be provisionally executed, and afterwards submitted to the approbation of the Directory. Frequent complaints having arisen against sundry of the functionaries nominated by the Directory immediately after its installation, it directed its civil commissioners to keep a watchful eye upon their proceedings, to gather the complaints urged against them, and to forward to it the names of those whose dismissal they deemed expedient.

With the view of more narrowly observing the factions, which, now driven from their public resorts, would prosecute their schemes in secret, the Directory conceived the project of creating a special ministry of police.

The police is an important object in unsettled and troubled times. The three preceding assemblies had each assigned a numerous committee to exercise its functions; and the Directory, now considering they ought not to be left among the accessory attributes of the minister of the interior, proposed to the two councils the establishment of a special ministry. The opposition objected that it would prove an inquisitorial institution, in which they judged correctly; but it was unhappily an evil inseparable from a period of factious turbulence, and especially from one wherein stubborn and inveterate factions were perforce restricted to furtive machinations. The directorial proposition received the legislative sanction. The deputy Cochon was intrusted with the duties of this new ministry.

Moreover, additional laws fettering the liberty of the press were desired by the Directory. The constitution declared that liberty unlimited, save such provisions as might be rendered necessary to curb its excesses. But the two councils, after a solemn discussion, rejected the whole project of restrictive law. The parts were again reversed upon this subject. The partisans of the revolution, who ought to have been advocates of illimitable freedom, upheld measures of repression; and the opposition, whose secret bias inclined much more to monarchy than to the republic, declared for unrestricted liberty—so completely are parties governed by interest! At the same time, the decision was commendable. The press may be left unshackled without danger: truth alone is formidable; falsehood is powerless, and the more it exaggerates the more does its influence dwindle. No government that ever existed has perished through sheer mendacity. Little moment that a Babœuf celebrated the virtues of an agrarian law, or that a Quotidienne depreciated the grandeur of the revolution, calumniated its heroes, and strove to restore banished princes. The government had simply to contemn their declamatory effusions: a week of exaggeration and falsehood exhausts the pens of pamphleteers and libellists. But experience and the light of philosophy are needed before governments will admit these axioms. The time had perhaps not arrived for the convention to risk their practical efficacy. The Directory, however, which was more tranquil and more securely seated, ought to have comprehended their force and acted in accordance therewith.

The last measures of the Directory, to wit, the closing of the society of the Pantheon, the refusal to accept the resignation of Benezech, the recall of the conventionalists on missions, and the dismissal of certain obnoxious functionaries, produced the happiest effect; they tended to reassure those who conscientiously feared the revival of terror, condemned to silence those who malevolently affected to dread it, and satisfied reflective minds anxious to see the government hold a position paramount to all sub-agitating factions. The coherency and activity manifested by the Directory in its labours, combined with other considerations to command esteem. Hopes of permanent repose, confidence in the durability of the actual order of things, gradually gained ground. The five directors had assumed a certain outward state. Barras, more prone to the relaxations of pleasure than his colleagues, dispensed the honours of the Luxembourg, and in some degree impersonated the whole Directory. Society presented almost the same aspect as during the preceding year, exhibiting a singular medley of conditions and origins, great freedom of manners, an insatiable thirst for pleasures, and an inordinate luxury. The saloons of the director were crowded with generals whose education and fortune had been acquired within two years, contractors and other business men who had enriched themselves by speculations and embezzlements, exiles who had returned and now strove to attach themselves to the government, men of talent who, beginning to have faith in the republic, desired to attain place and station therein, finally, intriguers on the alert for confidences and favours. Women of all origins flocked to display their charms in those saloons, and to exert their influence, at a time when all was to be solicited and obtained. If sometimes manners lacked that reserve and dignity which are so much affected in France, and which are the fruits of a polished, calm, and exclusive society, there reigned an extreme liberty of thought, and that fertility of ideas, that grasp of intellect, which the spectacle and habitual handling of momentous affairs naturally impart. The men who composed that society were enfranchised from the enervating thraldom of routine, and the dull monotony of insignificant traditions; all their acquirements were due to native hardihood and to personal experience. They had witnessed the grand events of modern history—they had taken and were taking part therein; and it is easy to imagine how such things must have stimulated the young, the ambitious, the buoyant in hope. There glittered in the first rank the youthful Hoche, who, from a private soldier in the French guards, had become in one campaign general-in-chief, and had, in the course of two years, given himself a finished education. Endowed with personal grace and beauty, renowned as one of the first captains of his day, and scarcely twenty-seven years of age, he was the hope of the republicans and the idol of the women, always smitten with external comeliness, talent, and glory. Beside him was already remarked the young Bonaparte, who had not yet gained fame, but whose services at Toulon and on the 13th Vendémiaire were appreciated, whose character and mein occasioned observation as pourtraying singularity, whilst his mind evinced its striking qualities of originality and vigour. In this society, where Madame Tallien shed the lustre of her beauty, Madame Beauharnois of her grace, Madame de Staël diffused the rays of genius, exalted by the inspiring influences of circumstances and of liberty.

These young men, called to pre-eminence in the state, selected their consorts, sometimes from amongst the females of antiquated rank, who deemed themselves honoured by their choice, and sometimes in the families of those who had reaped wealth amidst the disasters of the epoch, who were delighted to ennoble fortune by an alliance with reputation. Bonaparte had recently espoused the widow of the unfortunate General Beauharnois. The paths to distinction were multiform; each prepared to throw himself into the destiny befitting his qualifications, already spurred by anticipations of a brilliant future. War on the continent, war at sea, the legislature, the magistracy—a great republic, in short, to defend and govern—such the objects held up to inflame desires. The government had lately made a precious acquisition, in the person of an ingenious and profound writer, who devoted his rising talents to reconcile opinion with the new republic. M. Benjamin Constant had just published a work entitled "On the Force of Government," which had produced a powerful impression. He therein demonstrated the necessity of upholding a government on which hung the sole hopes of France and of all parties.

The harassing subject of the finances still chiefly occupied the attention of the government. The last measures had merely proved an adjournment of the difficulties. They had conferred on the government a certain quantity of domains for immediate sale, the power of leasing the large forests, and the levy of a forced loan, whilst the engraving of assignats had been left to it as an extreme resource. To anticipate the produce of these various resources, it had, as we have seen, created sixty millions of rescriptions, upon the model of exchequer bills or royal bonds, payable with the first specie which should fall into the coffers of the state. But these rescriptions had been negotiated slowly and arduously. The bankers, assembled to concert a scheme of territorial bank based on the national domains, had dispersed on hearing the outcries of the patriots against stockjobbers and revenue-farmers. The forced loan was collected much more tardily than had been expected. The assessment had proceeded upon purely arbitrary bases, inasmuch as the loan was to be levied on the most affluent classes; every one appealed, and each quota of the loan was contested with those appointed to gather it. Scarcely a third had reached the treasury in two months. A few millions in bullion, and a few thousand millions in paper, had been at length amassed. Utterly inadequate, therefore, in its results, the government had been driven to the extreme resource left to it in the failure of the others, the graving-plate of assignats. The issues had been increased within the last two months to the unparalleled sum of forty-five thousand millions (£1,890,000,000 sterling). Twenty thousand millions had scarcely produced one hundred millions of specie, for the assignats bore only the two-hundredth fraction of their value. The public was obviously unwilling to take any more of them, as they were no longer available for any purpose. They could not be used in liquidation of debts, for that coercive process was suspended; in the payment of land-rents and taxes they were only valuable for the half, since the other moiety was exigible in kind; they were refused in the markets, or accepted according to their actual reduced worth; lastly, they were taken in purchases of domains only at the rate of the market value, as the system of auctions always drove up offers in proportion to the depreciation of the paper. It was impossible to employ them, therefore, in any manner capable of eliciting value. An emission of unascertained extent caused extraordinary amounts to dwindle into insignificant sums. Thousands of millions signified at the utmost millions. That absolute depression whereof we have spoken when animadverting on the refusal to interdict auctions in the sale of national property,* was now realised.

Men in whom the revolution had left its prejudices implanted—for all systems and all modes of authority engender such, to be long harboured—desired that assignats should be enhanced, by assigning a vast quantity of domains in hypothecation, and resorting to violent measures to give them currency. But there is nothing more impracticable in the world than to re-establish the credit of a paper-money. Assignats were to be abandoned as hopeless.

It may be asked, why not abolish the paper-money at once, by reducing it to its real value, which was two hundred millions at the uttermost, and by exacting the taxes and payments for national property either in specie or in assignats at the standard of value? Specie, in fact, was reappearing, and even somewhat abundantly, especially in the provinces; thus demonstrating the futility of the apprehensions entertained of its great scarcity; the fact itself being avouched by the circumstance of the paper holding a place in the circulation merely to the extent of two hundred millions: but other considerations prevented the sudden renunciation of a paper currency. The only wealth of the state, it must always be borne in mind, consisted in the national domains. Their sale appeared neither certain nor proximate. Unable to wait, therefore, until their worth came spontaneously to the treasury by purchases, the government must needs forestall it by paper, and make issues to be redeemed hereafter: in short, the value of those domains was to be expended before it was received. This necessity of disbursing before selling suggested the creation of a new paper.

The schedules, which contemplated a special hypo-

* Vide page 510 of this History.

thee on particular properties, would have occasioned tedious delays, as they must have contained a special description of each hereditament; besides, they were dependent on the inclination of individuals, and failed to obviate the real substantial difficulty. The paper now imagined was, under the name of mandats, to represent a determinate amount of property. The domains were made subject to purchase, without auction and by simple agreement, at prices in mandats equivalent to the valuation of 1790, which was calculated at twenty-two years' purchase. Of these mandats two thousand four hundred millions were to be created, and domains of corresponding value, according to the estimate of 1790, were to be forthwith assigned in specific security. Thus, these mandats could undergo no variation apart from the domains themselves, since they represented a fixed quantity. They could not, it is true, attain the standard of bullion, for the domains were not worth so much as in 1790; but they would necessarily bear the value of the domains.

It was resolved to employ a portion of these mandats in retiring the assignats. The copperplate of the assignats was finally broken on the 30th Pluviose year 4 (19th February.) By that time it had served to manufacture forty-five thousand five hundred millions. By means of different payments, arising from the forced loan and outstanding arrears, the floating mass had been reduced to thirty-six thousand millions, and would be shortly still further reduced to twenty-four thousand millions. These twenty-four thousand millions, divided by thirty, represented eight hundred millions: it was decreed they should be exchanged for eight hundred millions of mandats, which was a liquidation of the assignat at the rate of one-thirtieth of its nominal value. An additional quantity of six hundred millions of mandats was to be issued for the public service; and the remaining one thousand millions were to be deposited in a coffer with three keys, and abstracted under the authority of decrees as emergency demanded.

This creation of mandats was a re-impression of assignats, varying only in the figure, the denomination, and the peculiarity of possessing a determinate value in relation to property. It was as if, beyond the twenty-four thousand millions remaining in circulation, other forty-eight thousand millions had been added, making in the whole seventy-two thousand millions; and as if these seventy-two thousand millions were to be received in payment of national domains, at thirty times the valuation of 1790, which supposed two thousand four hundred millions' worth of lands assigned in hypothecation. Thus the figure was lowered, the relation to property fixed, and the name changed.

The mandats were decreed on the 26th Ventôse (16th March.) The domains were to be forthwith exposed to sale, and delivered to the bearer of mandats on simple contracts. One-half of the price was to be paid in the first decade, and the other within three months. The national forests were set apart, and the two thousand four hundred millions' worth of property was taken from the estates of less than three hundred acres. Contemporaneous with the emission, such measures were enacted as the adoption of a paper-money necessitates. The mandat being the money of the republic, all payments were to be made in that currency. Obligations stipulated upon a metallic basis, house and farm rents, interest on loans, taxes, excepting taxes in arrear, dividends on state-stocks, pensions, salaries of public functionaries—all were to be paid in mandats. A long discussion occurred on the subject of the land-tax. Those who foreboded that mandats would decline after the manner of assignats, maintained that, in order to assure the state a certain receipt, the land-tax should be continued exigible in kind. The difficulties of the collection were objected in rejoinder, and a resolution was eventually passed that it should be paid in mandats, as likewise the customs-duties, dues of enrolment, stamp-duties, postages, &c. Nor were these the only regulations deemed requisite. It was judged essential to accompany the creation of the new paper with those stringent provisions accessory to the employment of forced values. It was ordained that gold and silver should no longer be considered in the light of merchandise, or allowed to be sold against paper, and vice versâ. After the lessons experience had taught, this was a preposterous measure. Another equally so was adopted at the same time, which greatly injured the Directory in public opinion—namely, the closing of the Bourse or Stock Exchange. It might have been well aware that shutting up a public mart will not prevent a thousand being opened elsewhere.

In making mandats a new currency, and rendering them in all cases the substitute of specie, the government committed a grave error. Even though it sustained its value, the mandat could never equal the standard of money. The mandat was worth, we will allow, as much as the land, but it could not be worth more. Now, the land was not worth the half of the price estimated in 1790: a property, even in fee, of one hundred thousand francs, would not bring fifty thousand in specie. How, then, were one hundred thousand francs in mandats to be worth one hundred thousand in specie? This difference, therefore, ought at all events to have been taken into account. So, independently of all other causes of depreciation, the government had to encounter a preliminary objection, arising from the fall in the value of land.

So pressing were the exigencies, that promises of mandats were put into circulation, until the mandats themselves should be ready for emission. From the first moment, these promises circulated at a rate inferior to their nominal value. Great alarm ensued; the fear was general that the new paper, on which such expectations had been built, was about to fall like the assignats, and leave the republic utterly without resource. There was a cause, however, for this decline, which might be soon remedied. It was requisite to frame instructions for the guidance of the local administrations, with the view of regulating the very complicated cases which must necessarily arise from the sale of domains on simple contract; and this operation required considerable time, and retarded the commencement of the sales. During this interval the mandat fell, and many alleged its value would decline so rapidly that the state would not open the sales at all, and abandon the domains for a nominal equivalent; that the mandats would fare as the assignats before them—they would be depressed to nullity, and then they would be received in payment of domains, not at their emitted but at their sunken value. Malignants thus endeavoured to inculcate that the new paper was a mere decoy, that the domains were never intended to be alienated, and that the republic purposed to reserve them as an ostensible and everlasting pledge for every variety of paper fabrication it might choose to issue. Nevertheless, the sales were opened. Numerous applicants subscribed their names. The mandat of one hundred francs had fallen to fifteen. It rallied successively to thirty, forty, and in some localities to eighty-eight francs. Thus for a while the success of the new operation was confidently anticipated.

It was amidst factions secretly conspiring against it, that the Directory devoted its energies to these arduous toils. The agents of royalty continued their furtive machinations. The death of Lemaitre had not discouraged them. Brottier, having been acquitted, had become the head of the agency; Duverne de Presle, Laville-Heurnois, and Despomelles, were conjoined with him, and formed the clandestine royal committee. These personages possessed no greater influence than in times past: they intrigued, clamoured lustily for money, boasted of numerous correspondences, and promised marvels. They were still the medium of communication between the pretender and La Vendée, where they had divers agents. They persisted in their former opinions, and, seeing the insurrection quelled by Hoche and on the point of dying away, they were still more confirmed in the plan of effecting every thing at Paris, by a movement in the interior. They professed, as in the days of the convention, to be in relation with several deputies of the new third; and maintained that the expedient course was to temporise, work upon opinion through journals, disparage the government, and perfect such preparations as might secure the return of deputies essentially counter-revolutionary in the elections of the succeeding year. They thus flattered themselves they should destroy the republican constitution by means of the constitution itself. This plan was undoubtedly the least chimerical they had formed, and is that which gives the most favourable idea of their intelligence.

The patriots, on their part, concocted plots with equal diligence, and, from the means they held at disposal, of a more formidable character. Driven from the Pantheon and completely discountenanced by the government, which had separated from them and dismissed them from their employments, they had declared against it, and become its irreconcilable enemies. Perceiving themselves the objects of vigilant supervision, they had found it necessary to envelop their proceedings in the deepest secrecy, and to observe such arrangements as might keep the leaders of the conspiracy altogether unknown. They had chosen four persons to form a directory of public welfare; Babœuf and Drouet were of the number. This secret directory was intended to communicate with twelve principal agents unacquainted and unconnected with each other, and charged to organise societies of patriots in all the quarters of Paris. These twelve agents, thus acting in their respective circuits, were strictly enjoined not to allow the names of the four members composing the secret directory to transpire; they were instructed to speak and enforce obedience in the name of a mysterious and supreme authority, instituted to direct the efforts of the patriots towards the attainment of general happiness, as their ultimate aim was expressed. In this manner the ramifications of the conspiracy were almost impenetrable; for, supposing one of the agents was seized, the others would still remain unknown. This organisation was perfected in accordance with the plan imagined by Babœuf: societies of patriots were formed throughout Paris, which, through the medium of the twelve principal agents, received the impulse of an unknown authority.

Babœuf and his colleagues, meanwhile, canvassed the mode whereby what they called the deliverance was to be accomplished, and the parties in whom power should be vested after they had dispatched the Directory, dispersed the councils, and put the people in possession of their sovereignty. They were too doubtful of the provinces and of opinion in general to incur the hazards of an election and to summon a new assembly. They determined, therefore, to nominate one composed of the most trusty Jacobins in each department, the selection to be made by themselves. This assembly they purposed to complete by adding all the Mountaineers of the old convention who had not been re-elected. Yet even these Mountaineers appeared to them deficient in the essential guarantees, for many had adhered, in the latter days of the convention, to what they stigmatised as liberticide measures, and had even accepted offices from the Directory. They finally agreed, however, to allow the admission, into the new assembly, of sixty-eight of those displaced deputies who were deemed the most pure. This assembly was to wield all the powers of government, until the general happiness was secured.

In prosecution of these views, it was necessary to enter into communication with the non-elected conventionalists, of whom the greater part were in Paris. Babœuf and Drouet accordingly opened conferences with them. The choice of measures afforded the principal subject of discussion. The conventionalists found those proposed by the insurrectionary directory somewhat too extravagant: their voice was given for the re-establishment of the late convention, with the organisation prescribed by the constitution of 1793. Eventually, the parties came to an understanding, and the insurrection was prepared for the month of Floreal (April-May). The means the secret directory contemplated calling into requisition were truly appalling. In the first place, it held correspondence with the principal towns of France, for the purpose of rendering the projected revolution simultaneous and identical in all quarters. At the appointed time, the patriots were to muster, with banners flying, on which was to be inscribed the following motto:—"Liberty—Equality—Constitution of 1793—General Happiness." Whoever should resist the sovereign people was doomed to death. The five directors, certain members of the Five Hundred, and the general of the army of the interior, were preliminarily marked for slaughter. The Luxembourg, the Treasury, the Telegraph, the arsenals, and the depôt of artillery at Meudon, were to be seized. With the view of stimulating the people to rise, and of no longer feeding them with vain promises, all the inhabitants in competent circumstances were to be compelled to lodge, clothe, and maintain every man who had taken part in the insurrection. The bakers and wine-dealers were to furnish bread and liquids to the people, receiving an indemnity from the republic, under pain of being hanged at the lantern in case of refusal. Every soldier who should join the ranks of the insurgents was to retain his accoutrements in full ownership, receive a sum of money, and enjoy the privilege of returning to his family. It was hoped that these inducements would gain over all those who served with reluctance. To seduce the soldiers who had an actual partiality for war, the houses of the royalists were offered them for pillage. In order that the armies might be kept at their full complement, and those replaced who should return to their homes, it was intended to confer on recruits such advantages as would infallibly ensure a spontaneous levy of many thousands.

Such were the terrible and desperate schemes contemplated by these infuriated men. They purposed Rossignol, formerly general in La Vendée, to command the Parisian army of insurrection. They had already tampered with the legion of police, which formed part of the army of the interior, and was entirely composed of patriots, gendarmes of the tribunals, and old French guardsmen. The legion, in fact, mutinied, but too prematurely, and was dissolved by the Directory. The minister of police Cochon, who followed the progress of the conspiracy, which was divulged to him by an officer belonging to the army of the interior who had been urged to co-operate therein, allowed it to proceed in order to trace all its ramifications. On the 20th Floreal (9th May), Babœuf, Drouet, and the other leaders and agents, were to meet at the house of a carpenter in the Rue Bleue. Some officers of police, stationed in the environs, seized the conspirators and immediately conducted them to prison. Others apprehended at the same time the ex-conventionalists Laignelot, Vadier, Amar, Ricord, Choudieu, the Piedmontese Buonarotti, Anotenelle, ex-member of the Legislative Assembly, and Lepelletier of Saint-Fargeau, the brother of him who had been assassinated. The Directory applied to the two councils for a decree of accusation against Drouet, who was a member of the Five Hundred, and it consigned the whole band to the high national court, which was not yet organised, but the necessary steps were forthwith taken for that purpose. Babœuf, whose effrontery rivalled his fanaticism, wrote a singular letter to the Directory, which fully pourtrayed the delirious state of his intellect. "I am a power," so he expressed himself to the five directors; "fear not, therefore, to treat with me as an equal. I am the chief of a formidable sect, which you will not destroy by sending me to death, and which, after my execution, will only be the more incensed and dangerous. You have but one link in the conspiracy; it is nothing your having arrested a few individuals; leaders will continually start up again. Spare yourselves an useless effusion of blood: you have not yet created any great sensation; avoid doing so, and treat with the patriots; they remember you were formerly sincere republicans; they will forgive you, if you will act in concert with them for the welfare of the republic."

The Directory vouchsafed no attention to this extravagant effusion, and ordered the indictments to be preferred. The process must necessarily occupy a lengthened interval, for it was determined to proceed in strict adherence to formalities. This last act of vigour tended most materially to strengthen the Directory in public opinion. The end of winter was approaching; the factions were vigilantly watched and curbed; the administration was directed with zeal and assiduity; the remodelled paper-money alone occasioned disquietude; it had, nevertheless, furnished temporary resources towards the preparations for the campaign about to open. The season for military operations had in fact arrived. The British minister, always astute in his policy, had made the advance to the French government which the general feeling of his nation imposed as a duty. He had instructed his agent in Switzerland, Wickham, to address certain preposterous questions to Barthélemy, the minister of France. This overture, made on the 17th Ventôse (7th March 1796), had for object to demand whether France was disposed to peace, whether she would consent to a congress for the purpose of discussing its conditions, and whether she would intimate in advance the principal bases on which she was resolved to treat. Such a proceeding was merely an idle concession of Pitt to the growing discontent of the British nation, in order to gain a pretext, founded on the refusal of France, for requiring fresh sacrifices. If Pitt had been really sincere, he would not have intrusted this overture to an agent without powers; he would not have demanded an European congress, which, from the complication of questions, must have been engaged in interminable negotiations, and which, moreover, France had already refused to Austria through the medium of Denmark; finally, he would not have inquired on what bases the negotiation was to open, since he was well aware that, according to the constitution, the Austrian Netherlands had become an integral portion of the French territory, which the present government was not competent to detach. The Directory, in no mood to be duped, caused Wickham to be answered, that neither the form nor the object of his communication was of a nature to impress belief in the sincerity of the advance; but, to evince its pacific intentions, it consented to reply to questions that did not merit the condescension, and declared its readiness to treat on the bases fixed by the constitution. This was tantamount to a definitive announcement that France would never renounce Belgium. The letter of the Directory, couched in firm and temperate terms, was forthwith published together with that of Wickham. It presented the first example of a diplomacy at once frank and firm, and free from any vainglorious assumption.

The conduct of the Directory was approved by the whole nation, and on both sides vigorous preparations were made for recommencing hostilities. Pitt solicited from parliament an additional loan of seven millions sterling, and he attempted to negotiate another for the emperor of three millions. He had been for some time past labouring to arouse the King of Prussia from his neutrality, and to drag him again into the contest; he offered him funds, and represented to him that, coming in at the close of the war, when all parties were exhausted, he would wield an incontestible superiority. The King of Prussia, however, too sapient to relapse into his former error, turned a deaf ear to the delusive proposal, and adhered to his neutrality. A part of his army was stationed in Poland, to complete the incorporation of the recent acquisitions; the other was ranged along the Rhine, ready to defend the line of neutrality against either of the powers that should violate it, and to afford protection to such of the states of the empire as should claim the mediation of Prussia. Russia, always profuse in promises, prudently abstained from sending troops, and occupied herself in organising the share of Poland she had taken under her dominion.

Austria, inflated by her successes at the close of the last campaign, prepared for war with zest, and indulged in the most presumptuous hopes. The general to whom she had been indebted for that transient gleam of returning fortune, was nevertheless superseded, despite the lustre of his glory. Clairfayt, having given offence to the Aulic Council, was replaced in the command of the army of the Lower Rhine by the young Archduke Charles, of whom great expectations were formed, without his eminent talents, however, being as yet discerned. He had exhibited, in the preceding campaigns, the qualities of an excellent officer in subordinate commands. Wurmser was still at the head of the army of the Upper Rhine. To confirm the King of Sardinia in his warlike intentions, a considerable reinforcement had been detached to the imperial army battling in Piedmont, and the command conferred on General Beaulieu, who had achieved a high reputation in the Low Countries. Spain, commencing to reap the benefits of peace, had her attention fixed on the impending struggle; and, now more enlightened as to her real interests, offered up vows for the success of France.

The Directory, inspired with all the zeal of a new government, and eager to illustrate its administration, meditated great designs. It had placed the armies in a respectable state as to force; but, whilst forwarding them men, it had been unable to furnish other requisite supplies. All Belgium had been put under contribution to aliment the army of the Sambre-and-Meuse; extraordinary efforts had been necessary to enable that of the Rhine to exist amidst the mountains of the Vosges. Still they were both deficient in the means of transport and in horses for the cavalry, without the utmost exertions of the government being available to repair the evil. The army of the Alps had subsisted on the magazines taken from the Austrians after the battle of Loano; but it was devoid of raiment and shoes, and the pay was in arrear. The victory of Loano had thus remained without result. The armies in the western provinces, owing to the precautions of Hoche, were in a better condition than any of the others, but even they were not provided with all they needed. Yet, notwithstanding this destitution, the French armies, inured to suffering, accustomed to rely on precarious expedients, and thoroughly imbued with the martial spirit in the course of their glorious campaigns, were animated with all the aspirations heralding great achievements.

The Directory contemplated, we say, vast projects. It desired to finish the war of La Vendée before the advance of spring, and subsequently assume the offensive on all points. Its combined aim was to propel the armies on the Rhine into Germany, in order to blockade and besiege Mayence, complete the submission of the princes of the empire, isolate Austria, transport the theatre of the war into the heart of her hereditary dominions, and provide subsistence for the troops, at the expense of the enemy, in the rich valleys of the Maine and the Neckar. With regard to Italy, it cherished yet grander schemes, suggested by General Bonaparte. As the French had not profited by the victory of Loano, they must, according to the views of that officer, gain a second, compel the King of Sardinia to conclude peace or wrest from him his territories, then cross the Po, and proceed to pluck from Austria the brightest jewel in her crown, Lombardy. That was the decisive field of action; there the most sensible blow was to be inflicted on Austria—an equivalent conquered to requite her surrender of Belgium, peace to be won, and perhaps fair Italy enfranchised. Moreover, the most impoverished of the armies would be nourished and recruited in that most fertile region of the globe.

The Directory, pondering on these ideas, made certain alterations in the command of the armies. Jourdan retained the command he had so well merited of the army of the Sambre-and-Meuse. Pichegru, who had betrayed his country, and whose treason was already suspected, was superseded by Moreau, who commanded in Holland. Pichegru was offered the embassy to Sweden, which he declined. Beurnonville, recently returned from captivity, succeeded Moreau in the command of the French army in Holland. Schérer, whose failure to profit by the victory of Loano had caused dissatisfaction, was superseded. A young enterprising general was needed to prosecute a bold campaign. Bonaparte, who had already distinguished himself in the army of Italy, and who, moreover, manifested so keen a perception of the advantages to accrue from a march beyond the Alps, appeared the most eligible man to replace Schérer. He was accordingly promoted from the command of the army of the interior to that of the army of Italy. He immediately departed to join his troops at Nice. Full of ardour and joy, he said on starting that in a month he would be at Milan or at Paris. Such exuberance might betoken rashness; but in a young soldier, appointed to a hazardous enterprise, it was of good augury.

Equally important changes were effected in the three armies which guarded the insurgent provinces. Hoche, summoned to Paris in order to concert with the Directory a plan calculated to put an end to the civil war, had been received with justly merited favour and the most flattering testimonies of esteem. The Directory, duly estimating the sagacity of his projects, had approved them all; and in order that none might thwart their execution, it had amalgamated the three armies of Cherbourg, Brest, and the West, into one, under the title of the army of the coasts of the ocean, and invested him with the supreme command thereof. It was the principal army belonging to the republic, for it amounted to one hundred thousand men, extended over several provinces, and required in the generalissimo a junction of civil and military powers almost unprecedented. So vast a command was the greatest proof of confidence that could be given to a general. It was assuredly not misplaced in Hoche. Possessing in his twenty-seventh year that rare union of civil and military talents which often proves dangerous to liberty, and even stirred by lofty ambition, he had not that culpable audacity of mind which prompts an illustrious captain to aspire to something beyond the quality of citizen; he was a sincere republican, and rivalled Jourdan in patriotism and disinterestedness. Liberty might applaud his triumphs without fear, and wish him victories in full reliance on his unabated allegiance.

Hoche had scarcely passed a month at Paris. He had hastened his return into La Vendée, in order to consummate the pacification of that country, if possible, by the end of winter or the commencement of spring. His plan of disarmment and pacification was reduced into form and converted into a decree by the Directory. According to this plan, it was arranged that a cordon of disarmment should be extended around all the insurgent provinces, and sweep them successively. Pending their complete pacification, they were subjected to martial law. All the towns were declared in a state of siege. In principle, it was affirmed that the army was to live at the cost of the insurgent country; consequently, Hoche was authorised to collect the taxes and the forced loan, either in kind or in specie, as he might deem fitting, and to form magazines and chests for the use and support of the army. The towns exposed to suffer famine from the hostile determination of the cultivators to keep back supplies, were to be provisioned after military usage, by columns attached to the principal amongst them. Pardon was offered to all the rebels who should lay down their arms. As to the chiefs, they who were taken in actual hostilities were appointed to be shot, whilst they who submitted were to be incarcerated or detained under surveillance in specified towns, or conducted forth of France. The Directory, coinciding with the suggestion of Hoche that La Vendée should be tranquillised before any steps were taken with regard to Brittany, empowered him to terminate his operations on the left bank of the Loire before concentrating his troops on the right bank. So soon as La Vendée was entirely subjugated, a line of disarmment was intended to embrace all Brittany, from Granville even to the Loire, and to move forward, traversing the whole Breton peninsula, to the extremity of Finistère. It was left to the discretion of Hoche to fix the period when the provinces, appearing to him subdued, should be relieved from martial law and restored to the constitutional system.

Hoche, who reached Angers towards the end of Nivôse (mid-January), found his operations sadly deranged during his absence. The success of his plan depending chiefly on the manner in which it was executed, his presence was indispensably requisite. General Willot had supplied the want inefficiently. The line of disarmment had made little progress. Charette had broken it, and passed to the rear. The regular system enjoined for gathering provisions having been ill observed, and the army having often lacked necessaries, it had again relapsed into defective discipline, and committed acts calculated to alienate the inhabitants. Sapinaud, after having attempted an aggression upon Montaigu, as previously recorded, had obtained from General Willot terms of peace so flagrantly absurd as to render their ratification by Hoche impossible. Stofflet, still enacting the prince, and Bernier the prime-minister, incorporated the deserters who fled from Charette, and carried on secret preparations. The towns of Nantes and Angers laboured under a deplorable scarcity. The patriots, chased from the surrounding districts, had taken refuge within their walls, and, filling the clubs, gave vent to the most furious declamations, worthy of Jacobins in their most palmy days. The belief was current that Hoche had been called to Paris to be deprived of his command. Some alleged him to have been superseded as a royalist, others attributed his disgrace to the fact of his being a Jacobin.

His return dispelled all doubts, and retrieved the evils caused by his absence. He reorganised the line of disarmment, stocked the magazines, and provisioned the towns, declaring them all in a state of siege. Authorised henceforth to exercise a military dictatorship, he shut up the Jacobin clubs formed by the refugee patriots, and especially a society known at Nantes under the title of Chambre Ardente. He refused to sanction the peace granted to Sapinaud; he caused his country to be occupied, and gave him the option of leaving France or lurking in the woods, under the promise of being shot if taken. He pressed more closely upon Stofflet than before, and recommenced the pursuit of Charette. He confided to Adjutant-General Travot, who combined great intrepidity with all the activity of a marauding partisan, the charge of following Charette with several columns of light infantry and cavalry, with directions to allow him no repose or gleam of hope.

Charette, in fact, hunted day and night, had no chance of escaping. The inhabitants of the Marais, disarmed and watched, could afford him no succours. They had already delivered up seven thousand muskets and more, sundry pieces of ordnance, and forty barrels of powder, so any resumption of arms on their part was almost impossible. Moreover, had their capabilities been ever so ample, inclination would have restrained them, for they found themselves happy in the enjoyment of the tranquillity now assured to them, and shuddered at the thoughts of exposing themselves to fresh devastations. The peasants, indeed, came voluntarily forward to divulge to the republican officers the roads taken by Charette, and the retreats he sought to repose his wearied body for a while; and when they could surprise any of those who accompanied him, they conveyed them to the army. Charette, escorted by scarcely a hundred devoted adherents, and followed by certain females whom he reserved for his private gratifications, still spurned all idea of surrender. Tormented by suspicions, he occasionally put his hosts to death, if the fear of being betrayed by them was suggested to his mind. He is stated to have caused the murder of a parish priest whom he suspected had denounced him to the republicans. Travot more than once encountered him, slew sixty of his men, several of his officers, and amongst the rest his brother. Then there remained around the wandering chief but forty or fifty men.

Whilst Hoche thus harassed Charette without remission, and prosecuted his plan of disarmment, Stofflet suddenly cast his eyes about him in dismay, and became convinced that, encompassed on all sides as he was, when Charette and Sapinaud were destroyed and all the Chouans subjugated, the species of principality he had carved for himself in Upper Anjou must be doomed to speedy annihilation. He held it would be folly to wait until all the royalists were exterminated: so, alleging as his pretext a regulation of Hoche, he again raised the standard of revolt and resumed hostilities. Hoche was at that moment on the banks of the Loire, purposing to visit Calvados, that he might judge in person the state of affairs in Normandy and Brittany. He immediately postponed his journey, and made preparations to overwhelm Stofflet, before his revolt could attain any formidable progress. In truth, he was well pleased that Stofflet himself supplied an opportunity of breaking the pacification. This additional warfare gave him little uneasiness, and enabled him to treat Anjou like the Marais and Brittany. He moved his columns from several points simultaneously—from the Loire, the Layon, and the Sèvre-Nantaise. Stofflet, assailed on all sides, was unable to withstand the shock. The peasants of Anjou were even more sensible to the blessings of peace than those of the Marais; they had not responded to the appeal of their old leader, and had left him to commence the war with the evil-disposed of the district and the emigrants abounding in his camp. Two bands he had mustered were dispersed, and himself obliged, like Charette, to scour the woods. But he had neither the indefatigability nor the dexterity of that chieftain, and his country was fortunately not so well adapted for concealing a troop of fugitive marauders. He was betrayed by his own adherents. Enticed into a farm-house under pretence of a conference, he was seized, pinioned, and delivered to the republicans. We are assured that his faithful minister, the Abbé Bernier, aided and abetted in the treacherous act. The capture of this chief was highly important, from the moral effect it was fitted to produce on the rebellious districts. He was conducted to Angers, and, after undergoing an interrogatory, shot on the 7th Ventôse (26th February), in presence of an immense concourse.

This intelligence caused a transport of joy, giving presage that the civil war would soon terminate in those unfortunate provinces. Hoche, amidst the painful anxieties inseparable from such a system of warfare, was distressed by accumulated annoyances. The royalists, as was to be expected, called him a miscreant and a blood-drinker, although he used legitimate means only to subjugate them; but the patriots themselves tormented him with their calumnies. The refugees of La Vendée and Brittany, whose turbulence he repressed, and whose sloth he crossed by withdrawing from them support when their farms might be safely occupied and tilled, denounced him in virulent terms to the Directory. The authorities of the towns he declared in a state of siege exclaimed against the establishment of the military system, and likewise denounced him. The rural communes, made amenable to penalties for transgressions, or to the military collection of the taxes, also raised the voice of complaint. There was one incessant din of abuse and remonstrance. Hoche, whose disposition was irritable, was several times urged to desperation, and formally demanded his recall. But the Directory refused his application, and soothed him by repeated assurances of unalterable esteem and confidence. It presented him, in the name of the nation, with two superb steeds, a gift not only acceptable as a recompense but prized as an indispensable succour. This young general, who relished the fascinations of pleasure, who was at the head of an army counting one hundred thousand men, and who administered the revenues of several provinces, nevertheless often suffered the extremest privations. His appointments, paid in paper, were valueless. He was devoid of horses, bridles, saddles, and he craved permission to appropriate, reimbursing their worth, six bridles, six saddles, some horse-shoes, a few bottles of rum and loaves of sugar, from the magazines left by the English at Quiberon: an admirable example of delicacy, which the republican generals frequently gave, but which was to become every day more rare, in proportion as the range of conquest extended, and martial virtues gave way before the seductions of abundant spoils and the contamination of courtly habits.

Encouraged by the government, Hoche continued his efforts to consummate his task in La Vendée. An universal pacification now depended solely on the capture of Charette. That chief, reduced to extremities, sent to solicit from Hoche permission to retire into England. Hoche acceded to the request, in accordance with the authority vested in him by the edict of the Directory relative to the chiefs embracing the option of submission. But Charette had made this demand merely for the purpose of obtaining a short respite, and he refused to profit by Hoche's acquiescence. On the other hand, the Directory was averse to extend mercy to Charette, inasmuch as it considered that famous chieftain would always remain a source of disturbance in the district; and it consequently enjoined Hoche to grant him no accommodation. But when Hoche received these fresh instructions, Charette had already avowed that his proposal was a mere feint to gain an interval of repose, and declared that he would accept no pardon from the republicans. He had again committed himself to the mazes of the forests.

It was impossible for Charette much longer to baffle the pursuit of the republicans. Encircled by columns of infantry and cavalry, watched by soldiers disguised as peasants, betrayed by the inhabitants, who desired to preserve their province from devastation, tracked through the woods like a wild beast, he fell on the 2d Germinal (22d March) into an ambuscade laid for him by Travot. Armed to the teeth, and surrounded by a few brave followers who strove to cover him with their bodies, he defended himself like a lion at bay, and finally sunk on the ground weltering from several sabre wounds. He declined to surrender his sword except to the intrepid Travot, who treated him with all the regard due to his indomitable courage. He was conducted to the republican head-quarters, and admitted to the table of Hédouville, chief of the staff. He conversed with great serenity, and manifested no regret for the fate awaiting him. Transferred at first to Angers, he was subsequently removed to Nantes, to yield up his life at the place which had been the scene of his triumphal entry. He underwent an interrogatory, wherein he replied with fortitude and becoming calmness. He was questioned as to the alleged secret articles in the treaty of La Jaunaye, and he confessed that none existed. He sought neither to palliate his conduct nor to disguise his motives; he avowed that he was the servant of royalty, and that he had laboured with all his force to subvert the republic. He bore himself with dignity and stern indifference. Led to execution amidst a vast assemblage of people, who were not sufficiently generous to forgive him the calamities they had suffered during the civil war, he retained all his composure. He was still covered with blood; he had lost three fingers in his last conflict, and carried his arm in a scarf. His head was bandaged with a kerchief. He refused to allow his eyes to be covered, or to kneel. Remaining erect, he drew his arm from the scarf and gave the signal. He was instantly stretched lifeless. The 9th Germinal marks the date.

Thus ended this celebrated man, whose invincible courage entailed many evils on his country, and who merited distinction in some other and better career. Compromised by the last descent attempted on his coasts, he flung away all idea of peace, and battled to the last with the energy of despair. He evinced, it is affirmed, a vivid resentment against the princes for whom he had struggled, deeming himself cruelly abandoned.

The death of Charette occasioned an exultation as great as could the most signal victory over the Austrians. It decided the suppression of the civil war. Hoche, considering that nothing remained to be done in La Vendée, withdrew the bulk of his troops to move them beyond the Loire and disarm Brittany. He left, nevertheless, a sufficient body of troops to check the isolated marauders who usually survive the termination of civil wars, and to complete the disarming of the country. Before proceeding into Brittany, he had to quell a movement of revolt which occurred in the vicinity of Anjou, towards Berry. It was the occupation of but a few days. He thereafter marched with twenty thousand men into Brittany, and, adhering strictly to his plan, encircled it with a vast cordon, stretching from the Loire to Granville. The unfortunate Chouans were utterly incapable of withstanding so mighty and well-concerted an effort. Scépeaux, between the Vilaine and the Loire, was the first to tender his submission. He delivered up a considerable quantity of arms. In proportion as they were driven towards the ocean, the Chouans became more stubborn. Destitute of ammunition, they fought man to man, with dagger, sword, and bayonet. Ultimately they were hurled to the very shores of the sea. Then Morbihan, which had long been severed from Puisaye, surrendered its arms. The other divisions followed this example one after the other. In a short while all Brittany was subjugated, and Hoche had merely to distribute his hundred thousand men into a multitude of cantonments, to keep watch over the country, and to draw supplies more easily. The task remaining for him to accomplish involved only the cares of administration and police; he required a few months more of mild and able government to allay animosities and re-establish concord. Despite the furious outcries of factions, Hoche was feared, beloved, respected in the provinces, and the royalists began to pardon a republic so worthily represented. The clergy, above all, whose confidence he had studiously laboured to conciliate, were entirely devoted to him, and held him exactly instructed in all he was interested to know. Every thing, therefore, presaged the continuance of peace and the final cessation of calamitous warfare.

England could now no longer rely on the western provinces as the means of assailing the republic in its vital parts. She beheld, on the contrary, an army of 100,000 men arrayed on their coasts, whereof 50,000 had become disposable, and might be employed in some enterprise of fatal moment to herself. Hoche, in fact, meditated a grand design, which he reserved for the middle of summer. The government, grateful for the services he had just rendered, and desirous of compensating him for the repulsive duties he had so magnanimously performed, prompted the legislature to proclaim, in solemn edict, as for armies which gained great victories, that the army of the ocean and its general had deserved well of the country.

Thus La Vendée was pacified by the month of Germinal, before any of the armies had taken the field. The Directory was at liberty to attend without disquietude to its stupendous operations abroad, and even to draw, in emergency useful reinforcements from the coasts of the ocean.

CHAPTER XLVII.

CAMPAIGN OF 1796.—CONQUEST OF PIEDMONT AND LOMBARDY BY GENERAL BONAPARTE.—BATTLES OF MONTENOTTE AND MILLESIMO.—PASSAGE OF THE BRIDGE OF LODI.—MILITARY OPERATIONS IN THE NORTH.—BATTLES OF RADSTADT AND ETTLINGEN.—THE ARMY OF ITALY ON THE ADIGE AND THE DANUBE.

The fifth campaign of liberty was on the eve of commencement. It was appointed to open on the finest military theatres in Europe—on the most varied in impediments, in accidents of conformation, in lines of defence and attack. On the one hand were the great valley of the Rhine and the two transversal valleys of the Maine and the Neckar; on the other were the Alps, the Po, and Lombardy. The armies to be ranged under the banners of the republic were more perfectly inured to war than any ever mustered in arms; they were sufficiently numerous to occupy the ground on which they were to act, but not sufficiently so to render combinations needless, and reduce the war to a mere torrent of invasion. They were commanded by young generals, free from the trammels of antiquated routine, free from slavish adherence to long-descended traditions, but instructed, nevertheless, and glowing with the enthusiasm aroused by mighty circumstances. All combined, therefore, to ensure a struggle, obstinate, varied, fertile in combinations, and fitted to absorb the contemplation of men.

The design of the French government, as we have intimated, was to invade Germany, for the purpose of subsisting its armies in the enemy's country, detaching the princes of the empire from the coalition, investing Mayence, and menacing the hereditary states of Austria. It purposed, at the same time, to attempt a bold experiment in Italy, with the view of nourishing its troops on that fertile soil and wresting it from the grasp of the house of Hapsburg.

Two superb armies, of seventy to eighty thousand men each, were confided to two celebrated commanders on the Rhine. Thirty thousand famished soldiers were abandoned to a young man, unknown, but of daring mind, to tempt fortune beyond the Alps.

Bonaparte reached the head-quarters at Nice on the 6th Germinal year 4 (26th March). He found every thing in a deplorable state. The troops were in the last condition of misery. In rags and shoeless, penniless, and often destitute of food, they still bore up with marvellous courage against their accumulated sufferings. Thanks to that active, industrious spirit which characterises the French soldier, they had organised a system of foraging, and descended in alternate bands into the plains of Piedmont to gather provisions. An absolute deficiency of horses for the artillery existed. The cavalry, for the convenience of pasturage, had been sent to the rear on the banks of the Rhone. The thirtieth horse and the forced loan had not been levied in the southern departments, on account of the troubles prevailing. The whole resources placed at the disposal of Bonaparte consisted of two thousand louis in gold and a million in bills, whereof a part had been already protested. To retrieve affairs in some degree, a negotiation had been opened with the Genoese government. The French had not yet received any satisfaction for the outrage committed on the frigate La Modeste; and, in reparation of that violation of neutrality, they demanded, on the part of the senate of Genoa, the advance of a loan and the surrender of the fortress of Gavi, which commanded the road from Genoa to Milan. They likewise insisted on the recall of the Genoese families expatriated for their attachment to France.

Such was the situation of the army when Bonaparte arrived to assume the command. It presented a very different aspect with reference to men. They were, for the most part, soldiers hurried to the armies at the period of the national levy, in vigorous manhood, perfectly disciplined, accustomed to privations, and hardened to war in the rugged conflicts amid the heights and gorges of the Alps and Pyrenees. The generals partook the qualities of their soldiers. The principal were Massena, a young Nissard, of uncultivated mind, but of quick and accurate perception amidst dangers, and of indomitable tenacity; Augereau, formerly a fencing-master, whom eminent valour and the art of animating soldiers had carried to the highest grades; Laharpe, an expatriated Swiss, in whom courage was combined with information; Serrurier, a major of the olden time, methodical and brave; lastly, Berthier, whom his activity, his precision in arranging details, his topographical erudition, his rapidity of measurement with the eye, either as to the extent of particular ground or to the numerical force of a column, eminently adapted for the post of chief of the staff.

This army had its depôts in Provence. It was ranged along the chain of the Alps, connected by its left with the forces under Kellermann, guarding the Col di Tende, and extending towards the Apennines. The active army amounted to upwards of thirty-six thousand men. Serrurier's division was stationed at Garessio, beyond the Apennines, watching the Piedmontese in their intrenched camp of Ceva. The divisions of Augereau, Massena, and Laharpe, forming a mass of about thirty thousand men, were on this side the Apennines.

The Piedmontese, to the number of twenty or twenty-two thousand men, and under the orders of Colli, were encamped at Ceva, on the reverse of the mountains. The Austrians, thirty-six or thirty-eight thousand strong, were advancing by the routes from Lombardy towards Genoa. Beaulieu, who commanded them, had achieved distinction in Flanders. He was a veteran burning with all the ardour of youth. The enemy, therefore, could oppose about sixty thousand soldiers to the thirty thousand that Bonaparte had to place in line; but the Austrians and Piedmontese were weakened by discord. Agreeably to the old plan, Colli's object was to cover Piedmont, Beaulieu's to maintain his communication with Genoa and the English.

Such the respective force of the two parties. Although Bonaparte was already favourably known to the army of Italy, in the camp his appointment to the command at so early an age gave rise to many rude comments. Stunted and attenuated in form, with nothing striking but his Roman features and a piercing, sparkling eye, neither his person nor his past life presented much to dazzle the minds of men. He was received with comparative coldness. Massena already bore him ill-will, for having acquired a paramount influence over Dumerbion, in 1794. Bonaparte, however, addressed his army in energetic and inspiriting language. "Soldiers," he said, "you are half-starved and almost wholly naked. The government owes you much, but can do nothing for you. Your patience and courage are honourable to you, but they procure you neither advantage nor glory. I am about to lead you into the most fertile valleys of the world; you will there find flourishing cities and teeming provinces; you will there reap honour, glory, and riches. Soldiers of Italy, will you lack courage?" The army hailed this language with beaming pleasure: young officers, who all had their fortunes yet to carve, adventurous and needy soldiers, asked nothing better than to behold those fair regions thus temptingly indicated. Bonaparte completed an arrangement with a purveyor, and procured for his troops a part of the pay so far in arrear. He distributed to each of his generals four louis in gold, whereby the state of the finances at that time may be estimated. He afterwards transferred his head-quarters to Albenga, and drew all the services along the shore, exposed to the fire of the English gunboats.

The plan to follow was the same which had so forcibly offered itself the previous year on occasion of the battle of Loano. To penetrate by the lowest ridge of the Apennines, and separate the Austrians from the Piedmontese, by strongly deploying on their centre, was the simple idea suggested to Bonaparte on a view of the localities. He commenced operations so promptly, that he indulged hopes of surprising the enemy, and throwing him into disorder. However, he failed in his purpose of anticipating him. Before his arrival, General Cervoni had been pushed on Voltri, near to Genoa, in order to intimidate the senate of that city, and constrain it to acquiesce in the demands of the Directory. Beaulieu, dreading the result of this movement, hastened to enter on action, and marched his army on Genoa, partly on one flank, partly on the other flank of the Apennines. Bonaparte's plan, therefore, was still feasible, except so far as the intention of surprising the Austrians was concerned. Several routes conducted from the back of the Apennines to their maritime flank; first that leading by the Bocchetta to Genoa, next that of Acqui and Dego, which crosses the Apennines by the ridge of Montenotte, and opens into the basin of Savona. Beaulieu left his right wing at Dego, moved his centre, under Argenteau, towards the height of Montenotte, and proceeded in person, with his left, by the Bocchetta and Genoa, on Voltri, skirting the sea. Thus, his position was that of Dewins at Loano. A part of the Austrian army was between the Apennines and the sea; the centre, under Argenteau, was on the very summit of the Apennines at Montenotte, connected with the Piedmontese encamped at Ceva, on the other side of the mountain chain.

The two armies, breaking ground at the same time, came into collision on the road, on the 22d Germinal (11th April.) Upon the coast, Beaulieu encountered the vanguard of Laharpe's division, which had been detached on Voltri to alarm Genoa, and repulsed it. Argenteau, with the centre, traversed the ridge of Montenotte, intending to fall at Savona upon the centre of the French army during its supposed march on Genoa. He found at Montenotte only Colonel Rampon, at the head of 1200 men, and obliged him to take refuge in the old redoubt of Montelegino, which barred the route from Montenotte. This intrepid colonel, feeling the importance of the threatened post, intrenched himself in the redoubt, and resisted with determined obstinacy all the efforts of the Imperialists. Thrice he was attacked by the whole Austrian infantry, and thrice he repelled its assault. Amidst the most murderous fire, he made his soldiers swear to die in the redoubt rather than abandon it. The soldiers took the oath, and remained all night under arms. This act of heroism averted the derangement of General Bonaparte's plans, and perhaps the failure of the entire campaign.

Bonaparte was at this moment at Savona. He had not intrenched the height of Montenotte, because, when the resolution is taken to assume the offensive, such a proceeding is rarely necessary. He was speedily apprised of what had occurred during the day at Montelegino and Voltri. He instantly discerned that the moment was come for putting his plan in execution, and he manœuvred accordingly. During the same night he drew back his right, formed by Laharpe's division, which had been engaged with Beaulieu along the coast, and moved it, by the route to Montenotte, in front of Argenteau. He directed Augereau's division on the same point, to support Laharpe. Finally, he ordered Massena to march by a by-path over the Apennines, so as to plant himself on the rear of Argenteau. On the 23d (12th April), by dawn, all his columns were in motion. Stationed on an elevated point, he beheld Laharpe and Augereau marching on Argenteau, whilst Massena, winding along the chain, struggled to attain his rear. The Austrian infantry resisted with courage; but, enveloped on all sides by superior forces, it was put to flight, leaving two thousand prisoners, and several hundreds of dead and wounded. It retreated in disorder on Dego, where the remainder of the army was located.

Thus Bonaparte, to whom Beaulieu attributed the design of defiling along the coast on Genoa, had suddenly diverged, and, pouring up the roads traversing the Apennines, had broken the Austrian centre, and debouched victoriously beyond the rampart of the mountains.

Bonaparte deemed it of little moment to have overwhelmed the enemy's centre, unless the Austrians were definitively separated from the Piedmontese. That very day (23d) he advanced to Carcare, in order to render his position more central between the two allied armies. He was in the valley of the Bormida, which flows south through Italy. Lower down, confronting him, at the bottom of the valley, were the Austrians, who had rallied at Dego, guarding the route by Acqui into Lombardy. On his left, he had the gorges of Millesimo, which join the valley of the Bormida, and in which were stationed the Piedmontese, guarding the route by Ceva into Piedmont. Thus, on his left he required to force the gorges of Millesimo, in order to open the route to Piedmont, and in front to carry the position of Dego, in order to gain possession of the route by Acqui, conducting into Lombardy. Then, master of the two routes, he would irrevocably separate the allies, and be enabled at will to fall upon either. On the morning of the following day (13th April), he moved his army forward: Augereau, on the left, attacked Millesimo, whilst the divisions of Massena and Laharpe advanced into the valley on Dego. The impetuous Augereau assailed the gorges of Millesimo with such vigour, that he forced their entrance, won his way through them, and gained their extremity, before General Provera, who was planted on a height, had time to fall back. That commander was posted in the ruins of the castle of Cossaria. Perceiving himself surrounded, he prepared to defend his position; Augereau encircled it, and summoned him to surrender. Provera attempted to parley and open a negotiation. It was important not to be delayed by this obstacle, and the French immediately mounted to the assault of his post. The Piedmontese hurled a deluge of stones on their heads, rolled down immense fragments of rock, and crushed whole lines. Nevertheless, the brave Joubert animated his soldiers, and scaled the height at their head. Arrived within a short distance, he fell pierced by a bullet. At this accident, the soldiers recoiled. The French were compelled to encamp in the evening at the foot of the height; they threw up intrenchments of fallen trees, and kept watch during the night to prevent the escape of Provera. Meanwhile, the divisions charged to act in the bottom of the valley of the Bormida had marched on Dego, and carried the approaches. The next day was to witness the decisive struggle.

On the 25th (14th April), accordingly, the attack was renewed on all points. On the left, Augereau, in the gorge of Millesimo, repulsed all the efforts made by Colli to disengage Provera, fought the whole day, and reduced Provera to despair. That general at length laid down his arms at the head of 1500 men. Laharpe and Massena, on their side, fell on Dego, where the Austrian army had been reinforced, during the 22d and 23d, by the corps recalled from Genoa. The assault was terrific; after several charges, Dego was stormed. The Austrians lost a part of their artillery, and left 4000 prisoners, of whom twenty-four were officers.

During this action, Bonaparte had remarked young officer, named Lannes, mounting to the breach with extraordinary intrepidity: he made him colonel on the field of battle.

The army had been now engaged for four days, and it stood in need of repose. Scarcely, however, had the soldiers rested from the fatigues of fighting, ere the din of arms was again heard. Six thousand grenadiers entered Dego, and wrested from the French that position which it had cost them such efforts to conquer. It proved to be one of the Austrian corps which had remained on the maritime flank of the Apennines, and which were now repassing the mountains. The disorder was so great, that this corps had fallen, without suspecting it, into the midst of the French army The gallant Wukassovich, who commanded these six thousand grenadiers, deeming his only hope of safety to rest on a bold surprise, had attacked and carried Dego. Hence it became necessary to renew the battle and repeat the efforts of the previous day. Bonaparte galloped to the spot, rallied his columns, and propelled them on Dego. They were checked by the Austrian grenadiers; but they returned to the charge, and, inspirited by Adjutant-General Lanusse, who raised his hat on the point of his sword, they re-entered Dego, and recovered their conquest, making several hundred prisoners.

Thus Bonaparte was master of the valley of the Bormida. The Austrians fled towards Acqui on the road to Milan; the Piedmontese, after having lost the gorges of Millesimo, retired on Ceva and Mondovi. He was in possession of all the avenues, had taken nine thousand prisoners, and spread consternation before him. Skilfully manœuvring the mass of his forces, and bearing it now on Montenotte, now on Millesimo and Dego, he had on every occasion overwhelmed his foe, by rendering himself superior on each individual point. The moment was come for deciding his future course. The plan sketched by Carnot enjoined him to neglect the Piedmontese and hasten after the Austrians. Bonaparte considered the Piedmontese army too formidable to be left on his rear; he felt, moreover, that another blow would suffice to destroy it; and he deemed his more prudent course was to consummate the ruin of the Piedmontese. Accordingly, he abstained from further entangling himself in the valley of the Bormida or descending towards the Po, in the track of the Austrians; he diverged to the left, plunged into the gorges of Millesimo, and followed the route to Piedmont. The division under Laharpe alone was appointed to remain in the camp of San-Benedetto, commanding the course of the Belbo and the Bormida, in order to observe the Austrians. The French soldiers were exhausted with fatigue; they had fought on the 22d and 23d at Montenotte, on the 24th and 25th at Millesimo and Dego, lost and retaken Dego on the 26th, enjoyed the 27th only as a day of rest, and were now, on the 28th, again in full march on Mondovi. Amidst these rapid movements, there had been no time for making regular distributions; they were destitute of food, and had given way to some acts of pillage. Bonaparte, indignant at this breach of discipline, punished the pillagers with the utmost rigour, and exhibited equal energy in repressing disorders as in pursuing the enemy. He had acquired in these few days the entire confidence of his soldiers. The generals of division were subdued. They heard with attention, already with admiration, the concise and graphic language of the young captain. From the heights of Monte-Zemoto, which it was necessary to clear in order to reach Ceva, the army beheld the smiling plains of Piedmont and Italy. It contemplated, flowing in their tranquil beds, the Tanaro, the Stura, the Po, and all the streams which meander towards the Adriatic; it discerned in the background the majestic Alps girdled with snow; it was seized with rapture as it gazed on the alluring expanse of *the promised land. Bonaparte was at the head of his soldiers: he felt a lively emotion. "Hannibal," he exclaimed, "crossed the Alps; we have turned them!" In this short phrase stood the whole campaign revealed. How bright the destinies that then dawned upon France!

Colli defended the intrenched camp of Ceva only long enough to retard for a moment the march of the French. That excellent officer had contrived to re-invigorate his troops and to restore their drooping courage. He no longer indulged the hope of defeating his redoubtable opponent; but he determined to contest his retreat inch by inch, and to afford the Austrians time to come to his succour by a circuitous march, in performance of the promise they had given. He paused behind the Cursaglia, in front of Mondovi. Serrurier, who, at the commencement of the campaign, had been left at Garessio to observe Colli, had now rejoined the main army. Thus it gained an additional division. Colli was protected by the Cursaglia, a deep and rapid river, which sweeps into the Tanaro. Joubert attempted to pass it on the right, but he was nearly drowned without succeeding in his object. In the centre, Serrurier endeavoured to cross the bridge of Saint-Michel. He succeeded; but Colli, allowing him to advance, fell upon him unawares with his best troops, drove him back on the bridge, and compelled him to repass the river in disorder. The position of the army became disquieting. It had in the rear Beaulieu, who was reorganising his forces; it was of essential moment to reach Colli with the utmost despatch. Nevertheless, the position seemed almost impregnable, if it were vigorously defended. Bonaparte ordered a fresh attack for the morrow. On the 2d Floreal (21st April), the French marched to the brink of the Cursaglia, and found the bridges abandoned. Colli had resisted on the eve merely to delay the retreat. He was surprised in line at Mondovi. Serrurier decided the victory by the capture of the principal redoubt, that of La Bicoque. Colli left three thousand men killed or prisoners on the field, and continued his retreat. Bonaparte arrived at Cherasco, a place weakly defended, but important from its situation at the conflux of the Stura and Tanaro, and easily fortified with the artillery taken from the enemy. In this position, Bonaparte was twenty leagues from Savona, his point of departure, ten from Turin, and fifteen from Alessandria.

Great was the confusion in the councils of Turin. The king, who was stubborn in temper, repudiated the idea of yielding. The ministers of England and Austria besieged him with exhortations, urging him to shut himself up in Turin, to send his army beyond the Po, and thus to imitate the great examples of his ancestors. They strove to alarm him by depicting the revolutionary influence the French would exercise in Piedmont; they demanded for Beaulieu the three fortresses of Tortona, Alessandria, and Valenza, in order that he might intrench and defend himself in the triangle which they form with the barrier of the Po. This proposal was extremely repugnant to the feelings of the king. To surrender into the hands of his ambitious neighbour in Lombardy the three principal strongholds of his dominions, was an insupportable idea. Cardinal Costa prevailed upon him to throw himself into the arms of the French. He pointed out to him the impossibility of withstanding so rapid a conqueror, the danger of exasperating him by a prolonged resistance, and the probability of thereby driving him to revolutionise Piedmont—and all to serve the alien and even antagonist ambition of Austria. The king acquiesced in the justice of these observations, and directed overtures to be made, through the medium of Colli, to the French general. These reached Cherasco on the 4th Floreal (23d April). Bonaparte had no powers to sign a peace; but he was competent to grant an armistice, and he determined to act upon that authority. He had contravened the plan of the Directory in order to complete the reduction of the Piedmontese; but, at the same time, he had no intention of conquering Piedmont, his object being simply to secure his rear. To subjugate Piedmont, he must have taken Turin, and he had neither the necessary battering train, nor forces sufficient to form a blockading corps and leave an active army disposable. Besides, the catastrophe of the campaign would then have sunk into a mere siege. By concluding an agreement with Piedmont, under essential guarantees, he would be enabled to pursue the Austrians in security, and drive them forth of Italy. There were those about him who held that no conditions ought to be granted; that a king, the kinsman of the Bourbons, should be at all hazards dethroned, and the French revolution diffused through Piedmont. Such, indeed, were the opinions of many soldiers, officers, and generals in the army, and especially of Augereau, who was born in the Faubourg Saint-Antoine, and had inhaled all its sentiments. Bonaparte thought differently; he comprehended the difficulty of revolutionising a monarchy firmly based on military principles, and wherein old habits and ideas had remained stagnant for ages; he deemed it of infinite moment to clear all obstructions from his progress; in short, his great aim was to achieve the rapid conquest of Italy, which depended on the annihilation of the Austrians and their expulsion beyond the Alps. He was determined, therefore, to avoid aught that might complicate his situation or retard his onward course.

Accordingly, he consented to an armistice. But in conceding this favour he added, that, considering the respective positions of the armies, an armistice would be fatal to him, unless certain guarantees were given him for the safety of his rear; in consequence, he demanded the delivery into his hands of the three fortresses of Coni, Tortona, and Alessandria, with all the magazines they contained, which should be taken for the service of the army, reserving the repayment for subsequent stipulation with the republic. He insisted, moreover, that the routes through Piedmont should be thrown open to the French, which would considerably abridge the distance from France to the banks of the Po; that stores should be accumulated on such routes for the use of the troops passing along them; and, lastly, that the Sardinian army should be dispersed into garrisons, in such a manner as to obviate all apprehensions on the part of the French army. These conditions were accepted, and the armistice was signed at Cherasco, on the 9th Floreal (28th April), with Colonel Lacoste and the Count Latour.

It was agreed that plenipotentiaries should immediately depart for Paris, in order to negotiate a definitive treaty. The three fortresses specified were surrendered, with immense magazines. From that moment, the army had its line of operation covered by the three strongest fortifications in Piedmont; it had sure and commodious roads, much shorter than those passing by the Genoese coast, and provisions in abundance; it was reinforced by many soldiers, who, on the cheering reports of victory, hurried from the hospitals; it possessed a numerous artillery, captured at Cherasco and in different places, and horses in great number; in short, it was provided with every thing it could desire, and the promises of the general were amply redeemed. During the first days of its entry into Piedmont, it had pillaged, because, in its rapid marches, it had received no distributions of food. Plenty reigning instead of destitution, order was restored. The Count de Saint-Marsan, the Piedmontese minister, visited Bonaparte, and ingratiated himself in his good opinion; even the son of the king journeyed to behold the young conqueror, and testified his esteem with a cordiality that affected him. Bonaparte adroitly repaid the flatteries he received; he sought to dispel alarm as to the intentions of the Directory and the impending danger of revolution. He was sincere in his protestations, for he already cherished an idea, which he partially allowed to transpire in his different conferences. Piedmont had derogated from all her interests when allying herself to Austria; it was to France she ought to cling—to France which was her natural friend; for France, separated from Piedmont by the Alps, could never harbour designs hostile to her independence; on the contrary, it would defend her against the ambition of Austria, and perhaps even procure her aggrandisement. Bonaparte could not promise that the Directory would consent to give any part of Lombardy to Piedmont; for it was not yet subjugated, and the purpose which rendered its conquest desirable was to obtain possession of an equivalent for the cession of the Austrian Netherlands; but vague anticipations of aggrandisement might dispose Piedmont to join in alliance with France, which would thereby gain a reinforcement of twenty thousand excellent troops. He gave no distinct pledges, but he understood how to stimulate, by a few artful hints, the cupidity and hopes of the cabinet of Turin.

* An expression of Bonaparte.

Bonaparte, who joined to a mind of the most positive order a strong and brilliant imagination, and who loved to stir emotions, adopted a novel and impressive mode of announcing his successes: he sent his aid-de-camp Murat to make a solemn tender to the Directory of twenty-one banners he had taken from the enemy. He subsequently addressed to his soldiers the following proclamation:—

"Soldiers!—In fifteen days you have gained six victories, taken twenty-one standards, fifty-five pieces of cannon, several fortified places, and conquered the richest part of Piedmont. You have made fifteen thousand prisoners,* slain or wounded more than ten thousand men. You had hitherto contended for sterile rocks, illustrated by your courage, but useless to the country; you now rival by your achievements the armies of Holland and the Rhine. Devoid of all aids, you have shown how to dispense with them. You have won battles without artillery, you have passed rivers without bridges, made forced marches without shoes, bivouacked without brandy and often without bread. Republican phalanxes, the soldiers of liberty, were alone capable of enduring what you have suffered: all praise be rendered unto you, soldiers! A grateful country will owe to you its prosperity; and if, as conquerors of Toulon, you heralded the immortal campaign of 1793, your present victories presage one still more glorious. The two armies which formerly attacked you with bold assurance, fly panic-struck before you; the malignant men who derided your misery and rejoiced in prognostications of the triumphs of your enemies, are confounded and struck with trepidation. But, soldiers, you have done nothing, whilst any thing remains to be done. Neither Turin nor Milan is yours: the ashes of Tarquin's conquerors are still trampled by the assassins of Basseville! Is it true there are some amongst you whose courage slackens—who would prefer returning to the peaks of the Apennines and the Alps? No, I will not believe it. The victors of Montenotte, of Millesimo, of Dego, of Mondovi, burn to carry yet farther the glory of the French nation!"

As tidings of these events, these trophies and proclamations, arrived successively at Paris, the feeling of joy rose to exuberance. One day announced a victory which opened the Apennines and gave two thousand prisoners; another, a more decisive victory, which severed the Piedmontese from the Austrians, and gave six thousand prisoners. The following days brought still more propitious intelligence—the destruction of the Piedmontese army at Mondovi, the submission of Piedmont at Cherasco, and the certainty of an approaching peace, the sure harbinger of others. The rapidity of the success, the number of the prisoners, surpassed all that had been yet witnessed. The language of the proclamations, glowing with the reminiscences of antiquity, electrified the imagination. Men, marvelling, asked each other whence came this young general, whose name, known to certain appreciators and unknown to France, now burst forth with such sudden lustre. It was yet strange in their ears; and fervid congratulations were exchanged that the republic thus beheld new talents emerging daily to glorify and defend it. The councils three several times resolved, by solemn edicts, that the army of Italy had deserved well of the country, and decreed a festival to Victory, in celebration of the auspicious commencement of the campaign. The aid-de-camp detached by Bonaparte presented the banners to the Directory. The ceremony was singularly imposing. On the same day several foreign ambassadors were received, and the government appeared encircled with a new halo of consideration.

Piedmont subdued, General Bonaparte was free to march in pursuit of the Austrians, and advance to the conquest of Italy. The victories of the French had profoundly agitated the populations of that country. Circumstances rendered it of essential moment that he who was about to enter it, at the head of an invading army, should possess the qualities of an able politician as well as those of a great captain, to act with the requisite prudence. It is known how Italy presents itself to one coming from the Apennines. The Alps, the highest mountains of Europe, after describing a vast semicircle, within which they enclose Upper Italy, return upon themselves, and abruptly shoot in an oblique line towards the south, thus forming a long peninsula bathed by the Adriatic and the Mediterranean. Bonaparte, arriving from the west, and having cleared the chain at the point where it begins to dwindle, and continues, under the name of the Apennines, to vein the peninsula, had in front the fertile semicircle of Upper Italy, and on his right the long and narrow peninsula which constitutes Lower Italy. A number of petty states divided that country, which has always sighed after union, without which there can never be a great national existence.

Bonaparte had traversed the territories of Genoa, which are situated on this side the Apennines, and advanced into Piedmont, which lies beyond. Genoa, an ancient republic, founded by Doria, had alone, of all the Italian governments, preserved the traces of former energy. Planted between the two belligerent armies for the last four years, it had contrived to maintain its neutrality, and had thus secured all the advantages of commerce. It contained, in its capital and on the coast, nearly one hundred thousand inhabitants; it usually supported a force of from three to four thousand troops; in emergency it could arm the peasants of the Apennines, and thereby muster an excellent militia; in fine, it enjoyed large revenues. Two parties divided it: the party opposed to France held the superiority, and had expelled several families. The Directory purposed to demand the recall of those families, and an indemnity for the outrage committed on the French frigate La Modeste.

On quitting Genoa, and proceeding to the right into the peninsula, along the southern range of the Apennines, first appears Tuscany, a happy region, stretching on both sides of the Arno, basking under the most genial of climates, and reposing in one of the best sheltered parts of Italy. A portion of this district formed the small republic of Lucca, peopled by one hundred and forty thousand inhabitants; the remainder constituted the grand-dutchy of Tuscany, recently governed by the Archduke Leopold, and now by the Archduke Ferdinand. In this country, the most enlightened and polished of Italy, the philosophy of the eighteenth century had mildly germinated. Leopold had distinguished his rule by admirable legislative reforms, and attempted with success experiments the most honourable to humanity. The Bishop of Pistoia had even commenced a species of religious reform, by propagating the Jansenist doctrines. Although the French revolution had alarmed the gentle and timid minds of Tuscany, yet it was there that France had the most appreciators and friends. The archduke, albeit an Austrian, had been one of the first potentates in Europe to acknowledge the republic. He possessed a million of subjects, six thousand troops, and a revenue of fifteen millions. Unfortunately, Tuscany, of all the Italian principalities, was the least capable of defending itself.

* Ten or eleven thousand only.

After Tuscany come the states of the Church. The provinces subjected to the Pope, extending on both flanks of the Apennines, reaching from the Mediterranean to the Adriatic, were the worst administered in Europe. They had merely their excellent system of agriculture, handed down from remote tradition, which is common to all Italy, and supplies the wealth of manufacturing industry, long banished from its confines. Excepting in the legations of Bologna and Ferrara, where a profound contempt prevailed for the government of priests, and at Rome, the ancient seat of learning and of arts, where a few nobles had imbibed the philosophy of their class throughout Europe, the human intellect had remained in the most disgraceful barbarism. A superstitious and savage multitude, lazy and ignorant monks, composed the population of two millions and a half of subjects. The army consisted of four or five thousand soldiers, of what quality it is unnecessary to mention. The reigning pope, an arrogant personage, fond of magnificence, jealous of his authority and of that of the holy see, entertained an inveterate antipathy to the philosophy of the eighteenth century; he thought to redeem for the chair of St Peter a portion of its former influence by displaying an extraordinary pomp, and he extended his patronage to works calculated to advance the arts. Relying on the sanctity of his person and the fascination of his eloquence, which was great, he had formerly undertaken a journey to the court of Joseph II., to confirm his wavering faith in the doctrines of the church, and to exorcise the philosophy which seemed unhappily to have taken root in the mind of that prince. That journey had not proved particularly propitious. The pontiff, seized with holy horror at the French revolution, had launched an anathema against it, and preached a crusade; he had even suffered the assassination of the French agent, Basseville, in the city of Rome itself. Instigated by the monks, his subjects partook his hatred against France, and imprecated with fanatical frenzy on learning the success of her arms.

The extremity of the peninsula and Sicily composed the kingdom of Naples—the most powerful in Italy, the most analogous, by ignorance and barbarism, to the states of the Church, and even worse governed, if it were possible. There reigned a Bourbon, a soft and imbecile prince, devoted to a single object of solicitude—fishing. That pursuit absorbed all his time, and whilst he gave himself madly to the gratification of this darling passion, the government of his kingdom was abandoned to his wife, an Austrian princess, the sister of Marie-Antoinette, Queen of France. This princess, capricious and dissolute, had a favourite suborned by the English, the minister Acton, and therefore conducted affairs in the most insensate manner. England, whose policy was always directed to gain a footing on the continent, by swaying the petty states bordering on the sea, had attempted to spread her enthralling patronage over Naples, as she had long done in Portugal and Holland. She stimulated the hatred of the queen against France, and inflamed her moreover with the ambition of preponderating supremely in Italy. The population of the kingdom of Naples amounted to 6,000,000. The army counted 60,000 men; but, very different from the brave and docile soldiers of Piedmont, the Neapolitan soldiers, true lazzaroni, without cohesion and without discipline, were characterised by the usual cowardice of armies devoid of organisation. The court of Naples had always promised to add 30,000 men to the army of Dewins, but had dispatched only 2400 cavalry, a well-mounted and sufficiently creditable troop.

Such were the principal states situated in the peninsula to the right of Bonaparte. Confronting him, in the semicircle of Upper Italy, his eye first embraced, on the slope of the Apennines, the dutchy of Parma, Placentia, and Guastalla, comprising 500,000 inhabitants, supporting 3000 men under arms, furnishing four millions of revenue, and governed by a Spanish prince, an old pupil of Condillac, but who, despite the soundness of his education, had fallen under the yoke of priests and monks. A little farther to the right, still on the slope of the Apennines, appeared the dutchy of Modena, Reggio, and Mirandola, containing a population of 400,000 souls, maintaining a standing army of 6000 men, and groaning under the authority of the last descendant of the illustrious house of Este. This morbid prince had conceived such dread of the spirit of the age, that he had become a prophet through the pure force of fear, and had foretold the revolution. His predictions were now cited. Actuated by his deadly terrors, he had resolved to fortify himself against the strokes of fortune, and had amassed immense wealth by grinding his dominions. Avaricious and timid, he was held in contempt by his subjects, who are amongst the most intelligent and satirical of the Italians, and irresistibly disposed to embrace the new ideas. Farther onward, beyond the Po, gleamed Lombardy, governed by an archduke as an Austrian viceroy. That balmy, luxuriant region, bounded by the Alps, whose streams fertilise its soil, and by the Adriatic, whose waters bear to it the wealth of the East, covered with cornfields, rice-plantations, meadows, flocks, and rich beyond all the provinces of the world, was discontented under its foreign masters. It was still Guelph,* notwithstanding its long slavery. It contained 1,200,000 inhabitants. Milan, the capital, was one of the most enlightened cities in Italy; less favoured with regard to the arts than Florence or Rome, it was nearer the illumination of the north, and it contained a great number of men who sighed for the civil and political regeneration of their countrymen.

The last state of Upper Italy was the ancient republic of Venice. That republic, with its old oligarchy enrolled in the Golden Book, its state-inquisition, its sombre silence, its distrustful and astute policy, was no longer a formidable power either for its subjects or its neighbours. With its territories on the mainland, situated at the foot of the Tyrol, and those of Illyria (Dalmatia), it counted nearly three millions of subjects. It could raise 50,000 Sclavonian troops, excellent soldiers, inasmuch as they were well formed, well disciplined, and well paid. It was rich in the wealth of other days; but it is known that, for the last two centuries, its commerce had passed into the ocean, and carried its treasures to the insular populations of the Atlantic. It scarcely retained a few vessels, and the passages of the canals were almost choked. Nevertheless, it was still endowed with ample revenues. Its policy consisted in amusing the people, in repressing their energies by pleasure and somniferous repose, and in observing the strictest neutrality in its foreign relations. The nobles on the mainland were jealous, however, of the Golden Book, and bore with impatience the yoke of the oligarchy seated on the canals. In Venice itself, a burgher class sufficiently opulent began to exercise reflection. In 1793, the coalition had constrained the senate to declare against France; it had yielded, but it reverted to its neutral policy the moment other powers commenced to treat with the French republic. As we have previously recorded, it had hastened to concur with Prussia and Tuscany in sending an ambassador to Paris. Now again, yielding to the instances of the Directory, it had recently enjoined the head of the house of Bourbon, Louis XVIII., to quit Verona. That prince obeyed; but, on his departure, he demanded the restitution of a suit of armour presented by his ancestor Henry IV. to the senate, and the erasure of his family name from the pages of the Golden Book.

* [The Guelphs and Ghibellines are the traditional factions of Italy. The Guelphs opposed, the Ghibellines upheld, the predominance of the German emperors in Italy, who claimed over most of its states a feudal superiority.]

Such at that time was Italy. The general spirit of the age had penetrated it, and found numerous proselytes. The inhabitants were far from wishing a revolution, especially those who pondered on the frightful scenes which had sullied the French; but all, though in different degrees, desired a reform, and there was not a heart which did not throb with emotion at the idea of the independence and consolidation of the Italian nation. That population of agriculturists, burghers, artists, nobles, the priests excepted, who knew the church only as their country, was animated with the hope of seeing all the divisions of the country united in one aggregate, under an identical government, republican or monarchical, but Italian. Surely twenty millions of men, with an admirable soil, a large extent of coast, excellent harbours, and magnificent cities, might compose a glorious and puissant state! But, alas! they had no army. Piedmont alone, always engaged in the wars of Europe, possessed brave and disciplined troops. Doubtless nature had not refused natural courage to the other regions of Italy; but natural courage is of no avail without a strong military organisation. Italy had not a regiment which could support the view of the French or Austrian bayonets.

At the approach of the French, the opponents of political reform were filled with dismay—its partisans with joy. The great mass was uneasy and anxious; it had vague, uncertain presentiments; it knew not whether it ought to fear or hope.

The design and the orders of Bonaparte on entering Italy tended simply to drive out the Austrians. His government desiring, as we have intimated, to procure peace, meditated the conquest of Lombardy merely to restore it to Austria, obtaining from her in return the absolute cession of the Low Countries. It was no part of Bonaparte's scheme, therefore, to enfranchise Italy, and, indeed, with little more than thirty thousand men, the enforcement of a political regeneration might well seem chimerical. At the same time, the Austrians once repulsed beyond the Alps, and his power well assured, he might exercise great influence, and, according to circumstances, attempt important modifications. If, for example, the Austrians, beaten on all points—on the Po, the Rhine, and the Danube—were obliged to cede Lombardy itself; if the inhabitants, really inspired with the love of liberty, spontaneously declared for it on the approach of the French armies, then high destinies might open for Italy. But, meanwhile, Bonaparte was bound to assign no such object, lest he should thereby exasperate the princes whom he left on his rear. His determination, consequently, was to abstain from manifesting any revolutionary projects, but equally so from damping the ardour of imagination, and to await the effect produced by the presence of the French upon the Italian people.

It was thus that he had refrained from encouraging the malecontents of Piedmont, because he saw a country difficult to revolutionise, a strong government, and an army whose co-operation might be rendered available.

No sooner was the armistice of Cherasco signed, than he put his army in motion. Many of his officers and soldiers disapproved a march in advance. "What!" said they, "we are but thirty and a few thousand strong—we have revolutionised neither Piedmont nor Genoa—we are leaving behind us those governments, our secret enemies, and we are about to attempt the passage of a great river like the Po, to push through Lombardy, and probably induce, by our appearance, the republic of Venice to throw fifty thousand men into the scale against us!" Bonaparte had orders to advance, and he was not the man to flinch from the execution of a daring commission; but, in truth, he was prepared to execute it, because it corresponded with his own views, which were founded on substantial reasons. "Piedmont and Genoa," he said, "would embarrass us much more if they were thrown into a state of revolution. Thanks to the armistice, we have a route secured by three strong fortresses; all the governments of Italy will submit, if we succeed in driving the Austrians beyond the Alps; Venice will tremble, if we are victorious at her side; the roar of our cannon will even decide her to ally herself with us. It behoves us, therefore, to advance not only beyond the Po, but beyond the Adda, the Mincio, even to the line of the Adige; there we will besiege Mantua, and make all Italy quake behind us." The young general, his ideas inflamed by his progress, revolved even more gigantic projects than those he avowed to his army. He designed, after having annihilated Beaulieu, to plunge into the Tyrol, repass the Alps, and pour into the valley of the Danube, there to unite with the armies from the banks of the Rhine. This colossal and imprudent scheme was inspired by the twofold presumption of youth and success acting upon a vast and comprehensive mind, insatiable for results. He wrote to his government for authority to execute it.

He had opened the campaign on the 20th Germinal (9th April); the submission of Piedmont was consummated on the 9th Floreal (28th April) by the armistice of Cherasco: the operation had occupied eighteen days. He proceeded forthwith in pursuit of Beaulieu. He had stipulated with Piedmont for the surrender of Valenza to secure the passage of the Po; but this condition was a feint, since it was not at Valenza he intended to cross that river. Beaulieu, on learning the particulars of the armistice, had resolved to seize by surprise the three fortresses of Tortona, Valenza, and Alessandria. He succeeded in capturing Valenza alone, into which he threw the Neapolitans. After this achievement, perceiving Bonaparte advancing rapidly, he hastily repassed the Po, in order to place the river between him and the French army. He proceeded to encamp at Valleggio, at the conflux of the Po and the Tecino, towards the apex of the angle formed by those two streams. He reared some intrenchments to strengthen his position and to oppose the passage of the French army.

Bonaparte, on quitting the territories of the King of Sardinia, and entering those of the Duke of Parma, received envoys from that prince, who came to propitiate the clemency of the conqueror. The Duke of Parma was the relative of Spain; it was prudent, therefore, to treat him with consideration, a course which, on other grounds, coincided with the views of the general. But it was allowable to exercise upon him some of the rights of war. Bonaparte met his envoys at the passage of the Trebbia; he affected to be indignant that the Duke of Parma had not seized the moment to make his peace when Spain, his kinsman, was negotiating with the French republic. Eventually he granted an armistice, exacting a subsidy of two millions in specie, whereof the army-chest was in great need, sixteen hundred horses, necessary for the artillery and the baggage-waggons, a considerable quantity of wheat and oats, authority to traverse the dutchy, and the establishment of hospitals for his invalids at the cost of the prince. The general did not limit himself to these terms. He loved and appreciated the arts as an Italian; he was sensible how much they added to the splendour of an empire, and how great the effect they produce on the imaginations of men: he demanded twenty pictures, to be selected by French commissioners, for transportation to Paris. The envoys of the duke, too happy to disarm, at this price, the anger of the general, consented to all his proposals, and hastened to execute the conditions of the armistice. They offered a million, however, to save the picture of Saint-Jerome. Bonaparte addressed his army:—"This million we shall soon have spent, and we shall find many others to receive. A masterpiece of art is eternal; it will embellish our country." The million was refused.

Bonaparte, after thus obtaining the advantages of conquest without its delays or difficulties, continued his march. The condition expressed in the armistice of Cherasco, relative to the passage of the Po at Valenza, together with the direction of the principal French columns towards that town, led to the belief that Bonaparte purposed to attempt the passage of the river in its vicinity. Whilst the bulk of his army was already concentrated on the point where Beaulieu was lying in wait, on the 17th Floreal (6th May), he diverged, with a corps of 3500 grenadiers, his cavalry, and twenty-four pieces of cannon, skirted the banks of the Po, and arrived on the morning of the 18th at Placentia, after a march of sixteen leagues and thirty-six hours. The cavalry had seized on the road all the boats that were found on the shore of the river, and carried them to Placentia. It had captured, moreover, a considerable quantity of forage, and the medicine-chest of the Austrian army. A ferry-boat transported the vanguard, commanded by Colonel Lannes. The moment that officer reached the opposite bank, he fell with his grenadiers on some Austrian detachments which were scouring the left side of the river, and dispersed them. The residue of the grenadiers successively crossed the Po, and the construction of a bridge was hastily commenced for the passage of the army, which had received orders to descend in like manner to Placentia. Thus, by means of a feint and a bold march, Bonaparte found himself beyond the Po, and with the advantage of having turned the Tecino. If, in fact, he had passed higher up the river, besides the difficulty of doing so in presence of Beaulieu, he would have come upon the Tecino, and must have effected a second passage. But, at Placentia, that obstacle was averted, for the Tecino has there blended with the Po.

On the 18th Floreal, the division under Liptai, being the first apprised of the French manœuvre, had moved on Fombio, a short distance from the Po, on the road to Pizzighitone. Bonaparte, careful not to allow it to establish itself in that position, where the whole Austrian army might rally, and where he might be afterwards compelled to give battle with the Po at his back, instantly resolved to attack with the force he had with him. He accordingly charged the division, which had intrenched itself, dislodged it, after a sanguinary conflict, and made two thousand prisoners. The remnant of the division, gaining the road to Pizzighitone, threw itself into that place.

On the evening of the same day, Beaulieu, informed of the passage of the Po at Placentia, arrived to the succour of Liptai's division. Ignorant of the discomfiture of that division, he fell foul of the French advanced posts, was warmly received, and obliged to recoil in all haste. Unfortunately, the gallant Laharpe, so serviceable to the army by his intelligence and intrepidity, was slain by his own soldiers amidst the obscurity of the night. The whole army regretted that brave Swiss, whom the tyranny of Berne had driven into France.

The Po cleared, the Tecino turned, Beaulieu beaten and unable to keep the field, the route to Milan lay open. It was natural that the youthful conqueror should be impatient to enter it. But, above all things, Bonaparte desired to complete the destruction of Beaulieu. With that view, it was not enough to have defeated him, he desired also to turn him, cut off his retreat, and oblige him, if possible, to lay down his arms. To attain this object, he required to forestall him at the passages of the rivers. Numerous streams descend the Alps, and flow through Lombardy on their course to the Po and the Adriatic. After the Po and the Tecino, come the Adda, the Oglio, the Mincio, the Adige, and several others. Bonaparte had now before him the Adda, which he could not turn like the Tecino, because for that purpose he must have crossed the Po at Cremona. The Adda was to be passed at Pizzighitone; but the wreck of Liptai's division had thrown itself into that place. Bonaparte hastened to ascend the Adda, to reach the bridge of Lodi. Beaulieu was there long before him; therefore he could not be anticipated in the passage of the river. But Beaulieu had at Lodi only twelve thousand infantry and four thousand cavalry. Two other divisions, under Colli and Wukassovich, had made a detour upon Milan, to throw a garrison into the citadel, and were afterwards to return upon the Adda and cross it at Cassano, considerably below Lodi. By attempting, therefore, to clear the Adda at Lodi, despite the presence of Beaulieu, the French might reach the other bank before the two divisions, which were to pass at Cassano, had accomplished their prescribed movement. In such case, there would be every probability of intercepting them.

Bonaparte arrived before Lodi on the 20th Floreal (9th May). This town is situated on the same side of the river as that whereby the French army approached. Bonaparte caused a sudden attack to be made upon it, and carried it in spite of the Austrians. They, thereupon quitting the town, retired by the bridge, and proceeded to join the bulk of their army on the opposite bank. It was this bridge the French had to cross, upon leaving Lodi, in order to clear the barrier of the Adda. Twelve thousand infantry and four thousand cavalry were drawn up on the opposite bank; twenty pieces of artillery enfiladed the bridge; a swarm of sharpshooters lined the shore. It was not customary in war to brave such defences; a bridge defended by sixteen thousand men and twenty pieces of ordnance, presented an obstacle never sought to be surmounted. The French army was placed under shelter from the fire behind the walls of Lodi, awaiting orders from the general. Bonaparte issued from the town, traversed the margin of the river amidst a shower of balls and grape, and, after deciding on his plan, returned into Lodi to put it in execution. He directed his cavalry to ascend the course of the river, and attempt to pass at a ford above the bridge. He then assembled a column of six thousand grenadiers; he went through their ranks, encouraged them, and communicated to them, by his presence and words, an extraordinary courage. He ultimately ordered them to debouch by the gate opening on the bridge, and to advance at full speed. He calculated that, from the rapidity of the movement, the column would not have time to suffer very severely. This formidable column closed its ranks and emerged, rushing along the bridge with intrepid ardour. A terrible fire opened upon it; the front ranks were all laid prostrate. Still it advanced: arrived on the middle of the bridge, it wavered; but the generals animated it by their voice and example. It took fresh courage, moved onwards, flew upon the pieces, and cut down the artillerymen who essayed to defend them. At this instant, the Austrian infantry approached to support the artillery;

but after what it had just achieved, the indomitable column contemned mere bayonets; it charged upon the Austrians precisely as the French cavalry, which had found a ford, appeared to menace their flanks: it worsted and dispersed them, securing two thousand prisoners.*

This stroke of transcendent hardihood struck the Austrians with amazement; but unfortunately it proved useless. Colli and Wukassovich had succeeded in gaining the Brescia highway, and were beyond the reach of interception. If the main object had failed, the line of the Adda at least was carried; the courage of the soldiers was exalted to the highest pitch of enthusiasm, and their devotion to their general rendered boundless.

In their exuberant gaiety they conceived a singular idea, which strikingly pourtrays the national character. The oldest soldiers mustered one day, and, finding their general very young, resolved to make him pass through all the grades: for his conduct at Lodi they appointed him a corporal, and saluted him, when he appeared in the camp, with the title, since so famous, of the Little Corporal (Petit Caporal). We shall see them hereafter confer others, as he was judged to have deserved them.

The Austrian army was assured of its retreat into the Tyrol: there was no further inducement to follow it. Bonaparte, therefore, determined to return into the Milanese, in order to take possession and commence the organisation of his conquest. The remnant of Liptai's division had intrenched itself at Pizzighitone, and might convert it into a stronghold. He moved upon that post and expelled it. He subsequently dispatched Massena to precede him at Milan. Augereau retrograded to occupy Pavia. Bonaparte desired to impress that spacious city, celebrated for its university, with a vivid sense of the French power. and sent to overawe it one of the finest divisions of the army. The divisions of Serrurier and Laharpe were left at Pizzighitone, Lodi, Cremona, and Cassano, to guard the Adda.

At length Bonaparte made ready to visit Milan. At the approach of the French army, the partisans of Austria, and all others who were alarmed at the reports current of the French soldiers, who were represented to be quite as barbarous as courageous, had fled, and covered the roads to Brescia and the Tyrol. The archduke had taken his departure; he had been observed to shed tears on quitting his superb capital. The great majority of the Milanese gave way to sanguine hopes, and awaited the advent of the French in the most favourable dispositions. When they had received the first division, commanded by Massena, and saw those soldiers, whose reputation was so formidable, respect property and persons, and manifest all that benevolence so natural to their character, they were transported with joy, and loaded them with their choicest benefits. The patriots, who had hurried from all parts of Italy, impatiently expected the young victor whose exploits were so rapid and dazzling, and whose Italian name was so dulcet in their ears. The Count de Melzi was commissioned to meet Bonaparte with a formal tender of submission. A national guard was formed, attired in the three colours, green, red, and white, and the command thereof intrusted to the Duke of Serbelloni. A triumphal arch was reared to receive the French general. On the 26th Floreal (15th May), one month after the opening of the campaign, Bonaparte made his entry into Milan. The entire population of that metropolis assembled to witness

* [The battle of Lodi was in itself a useless effusion of blood, but it is celebrated in history not only as a surprising feat of arms, but as the achievement which first rendered Bonaparte the idol of the French soldiers, and opened to him the road to future greatness. The account of the battle as given in the text avoids all notice of Bonaparte's personal prowess, upon which the admiration of his troops was founded; and we have consequently deemed it expedient to subjoin a description of the battle, taken from Bourrienne's Memoirs, which enters more into detail.

"It now remained to cross the river; but thirty pieces of cannon, placed in battery, some at the further end of the old bridge, and some a little above, and others a little below it, on the left bank, in order to produce a cross fire, seemed to render such an enterprise next to impossible. More than one brave republican general recommended a pause, which must have ended in a retreat; but Bonaparte, keeping his eyes fixed, and his hand pointing to the bridge, said—'That is the way to Milan—to Rome—to the possession of all Italy; we must cross, let it cost what it may. It must not be said that the tributary Adda stopped those heroes who had forced the Po!' On this occasion the French were pretty well supplied with artillery, and their first operation was to open a heavy fire across the river on the enemy's guns. General Beaumont, who commanded their cavalry, was sent to pass the Adda at a ford about a league above the bridge; and he took with him some flying artillery, with which he was to cannonade the right flank of the Austrians. By an inconceivable imbecility, the ford was not sufficiently guarded, and Beaumont, though not without difficulty, passed through it with his horses and guns. As soon as Bonaparte saw that the heads of the French cavalry were forming on the left bank of the Adda, and that the manœuvre gave great uneasiness to the Austrians, he pointed his sword at the bridge and sounded the charge. It was on the 10th May, and about six o'clock in the evening, when 4000 picked men, shouting 'Vive la Republique!' advanced on the bridge, which was literally swept by the enemy's guns. The first effect was tremendous; the French were involved in a murderous hailstorm of cannon-balls, grape-shot, and musket-balls; they stopped—for a moment they wavered. Then Bonaparte, and Lannes, and Berthier, and Massena, and Cervoni, and D'Allemagne, and Dupas, threw themselves at the head of the columns, which dashed across the bridge, and up to the mouths of the enemy's guns. Lannes was the first to reach the left bank of the Adda, Bonaparte the second. The Austrian artillerymen were bayoneted at their guns before Beaulieu could get to their rescue, for this doomed old general had kept his infantry too far in the rear of the bridge. By this means, also, the French infantry were allowed time to debouch from the tete du-pont, and form in pretty good order. The battle, however, was not over. Though stupid, Beaulieu was brave, and the Austrian troops had not yet lost their dogged obstinacy. They concentrated a little behind the river—they put their remaining artillery in battery, and for some minutes it seemed doubtful whether they would not drive their foes back to the blood-covered bridge, or into the waters of the Adda. But, in addition to Beaumont, who acted with the cavalry on their right flank, Augereau now came up from Borghetto to the opportune assistance of his comrades. Then Beaulieu retreated, but in such good order that the French made but few prisoners. The shades of night closed over a scene of horror: between the town and the bridge of Lodi, and the scene of the prolonged action on the left bank, 2500 men and 400 horses, on the side of the Austrians, lay dead or wounded; and the French could not have left fewer than 2000 men in the same condition, although Bonaparte owned only to the loss of 400.

This battle, which he used to call 'The terrible passage of the bridge of Lodi,' carried his fame to the highest pitch, while the great personal bravery he displayed in it endeared him to the troops. The men, who cannot always appreciate military genius and science, know perfectly well how to estimate courage, and they soon idolise the commander that shows himself ready to share in their greatest dangers. It was on this occasion that the soldiers gave Bonaparte the honorary and affectionate nickname of 'the little corporal!' He was then slight in figure, and had almost an effeminate appearance. 'It was a strange sight,' says a French veteran, 'to see him on that day on foot on the bridge, under a feu d'enfer, and mixed up with our tall grenadiers: he looked like a little boy!' Those men of routine and prescription, the Austrian officers, who adhered to the old system of warfare, could not comprehend his new conceptions and his innovations. 'This beardless youth ought to have been beaten over and over again,' said poor Beaulieu; 'who ever saw such tactics?' A day or two after the battle of Lodi, an old Hungarian officer, who did not know his person, was brought in prisoner to the French commander-in-chief. 'Well,' said Bonaparte, 'what do you think of the state of the war now?' 'Nothing can be worse on your side,' replied the old martinet. 'Here you have a youth who absolutely knows nothing of the rules of war; to-day he is in our rear, to-morrow on our flank, next again in our front. Such gross violations of the principles of the art of war are not to be supported!'"] his arrival. The national guard was marshalled and under arms. The municipality came in procession to deliver him the keys of the city. Acclamations accompanied his progress even to the Serbelloni palace, where preparations had been made for his reception. At this moment the imagination of the Italians was wound up in him equally with that of his own soldiers, and he could henceforth act by moral, as efficaciously as by physical force.

It was not his intention to remain at Milan longer than he had tarried at Cherasco after the submission of Piedmont. He merely proposed to sojourn a sufficient time to organise provisionally the province, draw from it the resources necessary for his army, and regulate all things upon his rear. His grand design still was to hasten on the Adige and Mantua, and, if it were possible, into the Tyrol and beyond the Alps.

The Austrians had left two thousand men in the citadel of Milan. Bonaparte caused it to be immediately invested. It was agreed with the governor of the castle that he should not fire upon the city, for it formed an Austrian possession he was interested in saving from destruction. The works of the siege were commenced without delay.

Bonaparte, without irrevocably committing himself to the Milanese, and without promising them an independence he could not ensure them, inspired them, nevertheless, with sufficient hopes to stimulate their patriotism. He held to them an energetic language, telling them that, to procure liberty, they must merit it by aiding him to deliver Italy for ever from Austria. He instituted provisionally a municipal administration. He caused the formation of national guards in all quarters of the country, in order to give a commencement to the military organisation of Lombardy. He subsequently directed his attention to the wants of the army, and was obliged to impose a contribution of twenty millions on the Milanese. This measure he adopted reluctantly, because it was calculated to operate prejudicially on the public mind; but it occasioned less discontent than might have been anticipated, and, moreover, it was indispensable. Owing to the magazines obtained in Piedmont and to the corn furnished by the Duke of Parma, the army enjoyed provisions in great abundance. The soldiers improved palpably in appearance: they subsisted on excellent bread and meat, and drank good wine. They were quite content, and observed the strictest discipline. The only want yet left unsatisfied was that of raiment. Clad in the old clothes they had so long worn on the Alps, they were tattered and in rags, and could strike beholders with awe only from their glory, their martial firmness, and their admirable discipline. Bonaparte speedily found additional resources. The Duke of Modena, whose territories skirt the Po, below those of the Duke of Parma, dispatched envoys to solicit from him the same conditions as those granted to the Duke of Parma. This old avaricious prince, seeing all his predictions realised, had sought refuge in Venice, carrying with him his treasures, and abandoning the government of his dominions to a regency. Not willing, however, to lose them altogether, he craved leave to negotiate. Bonaparte was not competent to conclude treaties, but he could grant armistices which were equivalent therewith, and which, as he framed them, rendered him master of destinies in Italy. He demanded ten millions, supplies of all kinds, horses, and pictures.

With these resources obtained in the country, he established on the banks of the Po large magazines, and hospitals provided with the paraphernalia requisite for fifteen thousand invalids, and filled all the chests of the army. Deeming himself sufficiently affluent, he forwarded to Genoa a few millions for the Directory. Furthermore, as he was aware the army of the Rhine languished for lack of funds, and was retarded by that deficiency in taking the field, he transmitted through Switzerland a million to Moreau This act evinced the kindly spirit of a comrade in arms, and was equally honourable and advantageous to him, since so timely a remittance would enable Moreau to enter upon the campaign and restrain the Austrians from moving their principal forces into Italy.

Meditating on the aspect of affairs, Bonaparte was more than ever confirmed in his original views. He considered it was not necessary to march against the potentates of Italy; it behoved him to act against the Austrians alone: so that they were effectually resisted and debarred from returning into Lombardy, all the Italian states, trembling under the ascendancy of the French army, would submit one after the other. The Dukes of Parma and Modena had already succumbed: Rome and Naples would follow their example, if he remained master of the great avenues of Italy. In like manner, he was called upon to observe neutrality with regard to the populations, and, taking no steps to subvert the existing governments, to wait until the subjects themselves unequivocally declared their sentiments.

But amidst these sagacious reflections and multitudinous labours, he was perplexed by a counteraction of the most baneful tendency. The Directory was charmed with his services; but Carnot, on reading his dispatches, written with energy and precision, and also with extreme imaginative ardour, was alarmed at his gigantic projects. He deemed, with reason, that the proposal to traverse the Tyrol and cross the Alps a second time, was too hazardous and even impracticable a scheme: but, essaying to amend the project of the young captain, he in his turn conceived one infinitely more dangerous. According to Carnot, the course for the French to adopt, after the conquest of Lombardy, was to fall back into the peninsula, and proceed to punish the Pope and the Bourbons of Naples, and to chase the English from Leghorn, where the Duke of Tuscany allowed them to domineer. Under this persuasion, Carnot ordered, in the name of the Directory, that the forces in Italy should be divided into two parts, whereof one was to be left in Lombardy, under the orders of General Kellermann, and the other to march on Rome and Naples, under the orders of Bonaparte. This disastrous project contemplated a repetition of the self-same error the French have always committed, a precipitate advance into the peninsula before the complete reduction of Upper Italy. It was not with the pope or the King of Naples they had to contend for the mastery of Italy, but with the Austrians. Consequently, the line of operations was not at that time on the Tiber, but on the Adige. The impatience to grasp advantages has always impelled the French to Rome and Naples; and whilst sweeping through the peninsula, they have invariably found the route closed upon them. It was natural that republicans should burn with desire to inflict chastisement on a pope and a Bourbon; but they relapsed into the flagrant error of the old kings of France.

Bonaparte, when forming his plan of penetrating into the valley of the Danube, had fixed his eye on the Austrians solely; it was an exaggeration, doubtless, of the true aim, arising in a mind of profound judgment, but tinged with youthful impetuosity; yet, after arriving at this his firm conviction, he could not consent to march into the peninsula; moreover, feeling the importance of concentrated control on a scene of action requiring in equal degrees the display of political and military genius, he could not brook the idea of dividing the command with an old general, brave, but mediocre and self-sufficient. He was swayed by that legitimate egotism of genius, which insists upon executing its task alone, because it feels itself alone capable of accomplishing it. He here conducted himself as if on a field of battle; he risked all his future fortunes, and tendered his resignation in a letter equally firm and respectful. He might surmise the Directory would not venture to accept it; but it is certain that he preferred resignation to obedience, for he would not consent to ruin both his own fame and his army by executing a vicious plan.

Opposing the most luminous train of reasoning to the false deductions of Carnot, he showed that it was still necessary to make head against the Austrians, and to attend to them alone; that a mere division, defiling backwards on the Po and on Ancona, would suffice to alarm the peninsula, and oblige Rome and Naples to crave mercy. He instantly prepared to depart from Milan, to hasten on the Adige, and commence the siege of Mantua. He proposed to await there the new orders of the Directory, and an answer to his last dispatches.

Meanwhile, he published a new proclamation to his soldiers, eminently adapted to stir their minds, and likewise to make a strong impression upon those of the pope and the King of Naples.

"Soldiers!—You have rushed as a torrent from the summit of the Apennines; you have overthrown and dispersed all who would have opposed your march. Piedmont, delivered from Austrian tyranny, has reverted to its natural sentiments of peace and friendship for France. Milan is yours, and the republican flag waves over all Lombardy. The Dukes of Parma and Modena owe their political existence to your generosity alone. The army which so proudly menaced you no longer finds a barrier to sustain it against your courage; the Po, the Tecino, the Adda, have failed to check you a single day; those vaunted bulwarks of Italy have proved insufficient; you have cleared them as rapidly as the Apennines. Such successes have carried joy into the heart of our native land; your representatives have decreed a festival dedicated to your victories, to be celebrated in all the communes of the republic. There, your mothers, your wives, your sisters, your lovers, rejoice over your achievements, and boast with pride of their relationship to you. Yes, soldiers, you have done much; but does nothing, therefore, remain for you to do? Shall it be said that we have known how to conquer, but that we have not known how to profit by victory? Shall posterity reproach you with having found a Capua in Lombardy? But I already see you flying to arms. Let us go, then! We have yet forced marches to make, enemies to subdue, laurels to gather, injuries to avenge. Let those who have whetted the daggers of civil war in France, who have basely assassinated our ministers, burnt our vessels at Toulon, tremble! The knell of vengeance has sounded. But let the nations be without disquietude! We are the friends of all nations, and more especially of the descendants of Brutus, of the Scipios, and of the great men whom we have taken as models. To restore the Capitol, to place there with honour the statues of the heroes who have rendered it so renowned, to awaken the Roman people, benumbed by several centuries of slavery—such will be the fruit of our victories. They will form an epoch for posterity: you will reap the immortal glory of changing the aspect of the finest region of Europe. The French people, free, respected by the whole world, will give to Europe a glorious peace, which will indemnify it for the sacrifices of all kinds it has made during the last six years. You will then return to your homes, and your fellow-citizens will say, pointing to you, He belonged to the army of Italy!"

He tarried but eight days at Milan; he left it on the 2d Prairial (21st May), to proceed by Lodi upon the Adige.

Whilst Bonaparte pursued his march, an unexpected event suddenly recalled him to Milan. The nobles, the monks, the retainers of the fugitive families, and numerous creatures of the Austrian government, had prepared a revolt against the French army. They circulated rumours that Beaulieu, strongly reinforced, was advancing with sixty thousand men; that the Prince of Condé was pouring through Switzerland on the rear of the republicans, and that they would be infallibly destroyed. The priests, exerting their influence over some peasants who had suffered from the passage of the army, excited them to take up arms. Bonaparte's departure from Milan was deemed to present the favourable moment for effecting the revolt and arousing all Lombardy in his rear. The garrison in the citadel of Milan gave the signal by a sally. The tocsin was immediately rung in all the surrounding districts, and armed peasants flocked to Milan in order to dislodge the French. But the division which Bonaparte had left to blockade the citadel gallantly repulsed the garrison within its walls, and dissipated the peasants who appeared with hostile intentions. In the environs of Pavia, the insurgents were more successful. They entered that city, and gained possession of it, despite the efforts of three hundred men whom Bonaparte had posted there as a garrison. Those three hundred men, exhausted with fatigue and sickness, shut themselves up in a fort to avoid being massacred. The insurgents surrounded the fort, and summoned them to surrender. A French general, who chanced to be passing through Pavia at the moment, was seized, and compelled, with the dagger at his throat, to sign an order for the garrison to open the gates. The order was transmitted and obeyed.

This revolt might have led to disastrous consequences; it might have provoked a general insurrection, and conduced to the ruin of the French army. The public spirit of a nation is always more advanced in towns than in the country. Whilst the population of the Italian cities declared almost unanimously for the French, the peasants, instigated by the priests, and injured by the passage of the armies, were malevolently inclined. Bonaparte was at Lodi, when, on the 4th Prairial (23d May), he learnt the events that had occurred at Milan and Pavia. He instantly retraced his steps, with three hundred cavalry, a battalion of grenadiers, and six pieces of artillery. Order was already re-established at Milan. He continued his march on Pavia, sending to herald his approach the Archbishop of Milan. The insurgents had pushed an advanced guard to the village of Binasco. Lannes dispersed it. Bonaparte, deeming he ought to act with decision and vigour, to check the evil in its birth, set fire to this village, with the view of affrighting Pavia by the sight of the conflagration. On his arrival before that city, he paused. It contained thirty thousand inhabitants; it was surrounded by an old wall, and occupied by seven or eight thousand armed peasants. They had closed the gates and manned the walls. To take a large town under such circumstances, with three hundred troopers and a battalion, was no easy task; and yet he could afford to lose no time, for the army was already on the Oglio, and in need of its general. During the night, he caused a threatening proclamation to be affixed to the gates of Pavia, wherein he stated that a deluded multitude, destitute of any effective means of resistance, was defying an army triumphant over kings, and hazarding the welfare of the Italian people; that, adhering to his intention of not making war on nations, he was willing to pardon this delirium, and leave a door open to repentance; but that those who refused to lay down their arms on the instant should be treated as rebels, and their villages burnt. The flames of Binasco, he added, might serve them as a warning. In the morning, the peasants, who preponderated in the city, rejected all overtures of surrender. Bonaparte thereupon caused the walls to be swept by grape and shells, and then sent forward his grenadiers, who broke open the gates with hatchets. They penetrated into the city, and sustained a sanguinary conflict in the streets. However, the resistance they encountered was not of long duration. The peasants fled, and abandoned the unfortunate Pavia to the rage of the conquerors. The soldiers demanded leave to pillage with loud outcries. Bonaparte, to give a severe example, granted them three hours' pillage. They scarcely counted a thousand men, and could not perpetrate any great enormities in a city so considerable as Pavia. They rushed upon the goldsmiths' shops, and seized a large quantity of jewellery. The most censurable act was the pillage of the Mont-de-Piété; but happily, in Italy as wherever there are poor and ostentatious grandees, the pawnbroking establishments were stored with articles belonging to the higher classes of the community. The houses of Spallanzani and Volta were preserved by the officers, who guarded in person the abodes of those illustrious benefactors of science—an example doubly honourable for France and for Italy!

Bonaparte subsequently let loose upon the country his three hundred horse, who put numbers of the rebellious peasants to the sword. This prompt suppression restored obedience throughout the Milanese, and awed the party in Italy opposed to liberty and France. It is mournful to be obliged to employ such means; but Bonaparte was constrained by overruling necessity, if he wished to save his army and the destinies of Italy from sacrifice. The party of the monks trembled with excessive fear; the misfortunes of Pavia, narrated from mouth to mouth were heightened by exaggeration, and the French army was reinvested with its terrible reputation.

This enterprise being thus terminated, Bonaparte instantly departed to rejoin his army, which was upon the Oglio, and about to enter the Venetian territory.

At the approach of the French army, the question, so often canvassed at Venice, as to the part to be taken in the contest between Austria and France, was anew anxiously discussed by the senate. A few old oligarchs, whom a spirit of fortitude still actuated, advised an immediate alliance with Austria, the natural patron of all venerable despotisms; but Austrian ambition inspired dread for the future, and French thunder for the moment. Besides, this resolution would have entailed the necessity of assuming arms, a course extremely repugnant to an enervated government. Certain of the younger senators, equally energetic but less infatuated than their older compeers, likewise upheld a courageous line of action; they proposed to arm upon a formidable scale, but to preserve neutrality, threatening with fifty thousand men whomsoever of the two belligerents should presume to violate the Venetian territory. This was a strong resolution, but in truth too strong to be adopted. Divers sagacious men, on the contrary, recommended a third course, to wit, an alliance with France. The senator Battaglia, of mind acute, comprehensive, and equanimous, propounded a series of weighty deductions, which, now recorded, seem almost as if inspired by the spirit of prophecy. As he represented, neutrality, even if armed, was the worst of all possible determinations. Venice would be unable to enforce respect, whatever strength she might deploy; and having attached neither party to her cause, she would be sacrificed sooner or later by both. It was therefore necessary to decide either for Austria or for France. Austria was for the moment expelled from Italy; and even supposing her to possess the means of returning, she could not do so within two months, pending which interval the republic might be utterly destroyed by the French army; moreover, the ambition of Austria was constantly the most formidable for Venice. That power had always envied her provinces in Illyria and Upper Italy, and would seize the first opportunity of wresting them from her. The sole safeguard against this ambition was to be found in France, which had nothing to covet from Venice, and would always be interested in defending her. True, France entertained principles repulsive to the Venetian nobility; but the time had at length come when some sacrifices to the spirit of the age—when some concessions to the nobles of the mainland, by which alone they could be firmly attached to the republic, or reconciled with the Golden Book—were absolutely indispensable. With certain slight modifications on the ancient constitution, the senate might gratify the desires of all classes of Venetian subjects, and conciliate France; if, furthermore, it took up arms for that power, it might hope, perhaps, that in recompense of its services the spoils of Austria in Lombardy would be conceded to it. In every case, however, the senator Battaglia reiterated, neutrality was the course most fraught with evil.

This counsel, whereof time has demonstrated the sagacity, offended too profoundly the pride and prejudices of the old Venetian aristocracy to meet approbation. It must be allowed, at the same time, that the senate regarded the stability of the French power in Italy as too problematical to warrant an alliance with it. There was an ancient Italian maxim which taught that Italy was the grave of Frenchmen; and it feared being eventually exposed, without defence, to the vengeance of Austria.

These three plans were all finally repudiated for one more convenient, more suited to the sleepy routine and effeminacy of this antiquated government—a disarmed neutrality. It was decided that envoys should be dispatched to meet Bonaparte, commissioned to protest the neutrality of the republic, and to claim the respect due to the Venetian territory and subjects. A feeling of intense alarm prevailed with respect to the French; but they were known to be of easy disposition, and sensible to good treatment. Orders were given to all the agents of government to receive and accommodate them with every earnest of good will, and in particular to court the generals and officers, so as to propitiate their friendship.

Upon passing the Venetian frontier, Bonaparte had as much need of prudence as Venice itself. That power, although in the hands of a feeble government, was still great; policy enjoined him to refrain from irritating it so far as to force it into a hostile attitude, for in such case Upper Italy would be rendered untenable for the French; but, at the same time, whilst observing the limits of neutrality, he must compel Venice to suffer them on her territory, to allow them to fight within its confines, and even to subsist them if possible. She had granted a passage to the Austrians: that was the ground to be alleged for taking every advantage, for urging every demand, albeit remaining within the bounds of neutrality.

Bonaparte, on entering Brescia, published a proclamation, wherein he stated that, in traversing the Venetian territory for the essential purpose of pursuing the imperial army, which had received permission to cross it, he would respect the dominions and inhabitants of the republic of Venice, that he would cause his army to observe the strictest discipline, that all it took should be reimbursed, and that he was not unmindful of the ancient ties which united the two republics. He was most affably received by the Venetian proveditore of Brescia, and continued his march. He had cleared the Oglio, which flows after the Adda; he now came upon the Mincio, which issues from the Lake of Garda, meanders in the Mantuan plain, forms, after a course of several leagues, a fresh lake, in the midst of which stands the city of Mantua, and finally proceeds to join the Po. Beaulieu, reinforced by ten thousand men, had planted himself on the line of the Mincio, with the intention of defending it. A vanguard of four thousand foot and two thousand horse was stationed in front of the river, at the village of Borghetto. The main army was placed beyond the Mincio, in the position of Valeggio; the reserve was stationed a little to the rear, at Villa-Franca; detached corps guarded the course of the Mincio, above and below Valeggio. The Venetian town of Peschiera is situated on the Mincio, as it issues from the lake of Garda. Beaulieu, who desired to possess that place to strengthen the right of his line, deceived the Venetians; under pretext of obtaining a passage for fifty men, he surprised the town, and placed in it a strong garrison. It had a bastioned circuit, pointed with eighty pieces of cannon.

Bonaparte, advancing upon this line, neglected Mantua, which was on his right, and the time for blockading which had not yet arrived, and pushed on his left towards Peschiera. His design was to pass the Mincio at Borghetto and Valeggio. For that purpose it was requisite to beguile Beaulieu touching his real intention. He operated here as on the passage of the Po; he directed a corps on Peschiera and another on Lonato, so as to disquiet Beaulieu respecting the Upper Mincio, and lead him to suppose that he intended either to pass at Peschiera or to turn the lake of Garda. At the same time, he directed his more serious attack on Borghetto. This village, situated in advance of the Mincio, was, as we have stated, guarded by four thousand infantry and two thousand cavalry. On the 9th Prairial (28th May), Bonaparte commenced the engagement. He had hitherto experienced difficulty in bringing his cavalry into action. It was little accustomed to charge, because the use previously made of it had been inconsiderable, and it was, moreover, intimidated by the high reputation of the German cavalry. Bonaparte determined at all hazards to put it to the test, as he attached great importance to the services it might render. In advancing on Borghetto, he distributed his grenadiers and carabineers on the right and left of his cavalry, planted the artillery in the rear, and, after thus enclosing it, spurred it on the enemy. Supported on all sides, and inspirited by the impetuous Murat, it performed prodigies, and put to flight the Austrian squadrons. The infantry afterwards assailed the village of Borghetto, of which it secured possession. The Imperialists, on retiring by the bridge leading from Borghetto to Valeggio, attempted to destroy it. They succeeded, in fact, in breaking an arch. But some grenadiers, conducted by General Gardanne, plunged into the stream of the Mincio, which was fordable at several points, and crossed it, holding their weapons above their heads, and braving the fire from the opposite heights. The Austrians thought they beheld the column of Lodi, and retreated without completing the destruction of the bridge. The broken arch was re-established, and the army enabled to pass. Bonaparte proceeded without delay to ascend the Mincio with the division under Augereau, in order to give chase to the Austrians; but they declined an engagement during the whole day. He thereupon left Augereau's division to continue the pursuit, and returned to Valeggio, where Massena's division was posted, preparing at the moment to boil soup. Suddenly the charge was heard to sound, and the Austrian hussars galloped into the middle of the village. Bonaparte had scarcely time to save himself. He sprang on horseback, and speedily ascertained that the surprise came from one of the enemy's corps stationed to guard the Lower Mincio, which was remounting the river to join Beaulieu in his retreat towards the mountains. Massena's division flew to arms, and rushed in pursuit of this corps, which contrived, nevertheless, to rejoin Beaulieu.

The barrier of the Mincio, therefore, was surmounted. Bonaparte had a second time induced the retreat of the Imperialists, who recoiled definitively into the Tyrol. He had gained an important advantage in having brought his cavalry to bear the brunt of action, and dissipated its dread of that of the Austrians. He attached great value to this circumstance. Little use was made of cavalry before this period, and he had judged it might be rendered eminently serviceable when employed to cover artillery. He had calculated that light artillery and cavalry, employed on fitting occasions, might produce the effect of a mass of infantry ten times the strength. He already regarded with affection young Murat, who possessed the talent of leading squadrons into battle, a merit he then considered extremely rare in officers of that service. The surprise which had placed his person in danger suggested to him another idea: this was to form a corps of picked men, who, under the name of guides, were to accompany him at all times and places. His personal safety was but a secondary object in his eyes; he discerned the advantage of having always near him a devoted corps, capable of the most daring deeds. We shall, in fact, hereafter see him decide a critical event by an opportune charge of twenty-five of those brave men. He gave the command of this new-formed corps to a cavalry officer, distinguished for his cool intrepidity, and well known under the name of Bessières.

Beaulieu had evacuated Peschiera when ascending into the Tyrol. A conflict had occurred with the Austrian rearguard, and it cost the French a severe engagement to make good their entry into the town. The Venetians having been unable to secure it from Beaulieu, it had ceased to be neutral ground, and the French were authorised to establish themselves therein. Bonaparte was well aware that the Venetians had been deceived by Beaulieu, but he resolved to avail himself of the circumstance to obtain from them all he desired. He wanted the line of the Adige, and particularly the important city of Verona, which commands that river; above all, he wanted facilities for provisioning his troops.

The proveditore Foscarelli, an old Venetian oligarch, deeply imbedded in prejudices and actuated by a lively hatred against France, was instructed to visit the head-quarters of Bonaparte. He had been warned that the general was excessively wroth at the affair of Peschiera, and report announced that his ebullitions of wrath were fearful to encounter. Binasco and Pavia attested his severity; two armies overthrown, and Italy conquered, attested his power. The proveditore came to Peschiera, full of terror; on starting for his mission, he had written to his government in a very desponding strain. "May God in his mercy," he exclaimed, "accept me as a sacrifice!" The especial object of his embassy was to prevent the French from entering Verona. That city, which had afforded an asylum to the pretender, was plunged in harrowing solicitude. Bonaparte, who was liable to violent gusts of passion, and could feign them likewise in emergency, omitted nothing to aggravate the terror of the proveditore. He inveighed with vehemence against the Venetian government, which professed to be neutral and yet knew not how to make its neutrality respected; which, allowing the Austrians to seize Peschiera, had subjected the French army to the loss of many brave men before that place. He said that the blood of his companions in arms cried aloud for vengeance, and that it should be his care to render it signal. The proveditore laboured to exculpate the Venetian authorities, and eventually introduced the essential topic which brought him to the camp—Verona. He asserted that he had orders to bar its access to both the belligerent powers. Bonaparte, in reply, informed him his communication was too late; that Massena had already proceeded thither; and that, perhaps, as they were now conferring, he had set it on fire, to punish a city which had exhibited the unparalleled effrontery to regard itself for a time as the capital of the French empire. The proveditore supplicated more earnestly, and Bonaparte, feigning to relent, stated that he could at the utmost, supposing Massena had not already entered by main force, grant a delay of twenty-four hours, after which he would put in requisition the terrors of bombardment.

The proveditore withdrew in consternation. He returned to Verona, where he proclaimed the necessity of receiving the French. At their approach, the wealthiest inhabitants, apprehensive that the sojourn of the pretender in their city would be visited on them as an inexpiable offence, fled tumultuously into the Tyrol, bearing with them their most precious commodities. The Veronese, however, speedily regained confidence on beholding the French, and convincing themselves, with their own eyes, that those republicans were not so barbarous as fame depicted them.

Two other Venetian envoys arrived at Verona to parley with Bonaparte. The senate had selected for the mission two of its members, Erizzo and Battaglia. The latter was the same of whom we have spoken as advocating an alliance with France; and hopes were entertained at Venice that these ambassadors would succeed better than Foscarelli in assuaging the anger of the general. He, in fact, received them much more affably than Foscarelli; and now that he had attained the object of his views, he affected greater placability and consented to hear reason. The further points he desired to compass were periodical supplies of provisions, and if possible an alliance of Venice with France. It behoved him alternately to impress with awe and win by blandishment: he acquitted himself with consummate art. "The first law for men," he said, "is to live. I would willingly spare the republic of Venice the care of victualling us; but since the fate of war has compelled us to come thus far, we are constrained to live where we chance to find ourselves. Let the republic of Venice furnish my soldiers with what they require; it can subsequently account with the French republic." It was agreed that a Jew contractor should procure for the army all that was necessary for it, and that Venice should secretly pay this contractor, in order that it might not appear to violate the neutrality by provisioning the French. Bonaparte afterwards opened the question of an alliance. "I have just occupied the Adige," he said; "I have done so because I wanted a barrier, because that line is the best, and because your government is incapable of defending it. Let it arm 50,000 men, let it place them on the Adige, and I will restore it its fortresses of Verona and Porto-Legnago. At the same time," he added, "you ought to see us here with pleasure. What France sends me to perform in these countries is altogether coincident with the interest of Venice. I come to drive the Austrians beyond the Alps, perhaps to constitute Lombardy an independent state: can any thing be more advantageous to your republic? If it will unite with us, it would probably receive a high reward for such service. We make war on no government: we are the friends of all who will assist us in confining the Austrian power within its proper bounds."

The two Venetians retired, struck with the commanding genius of their young dialogist, who, by turns menacing and caressing, now imperious now ingratiating, discoursing on all topics, military or political, with equal profoundness and eloquence, evinced that the statesman was as precociously developed in him as the warrior. "This man," they said in writing to Venice, "will one day exercise a great influence over his country." *

Bonaparte was at length master of the line of the Adige, which possession he had long considered as of essential importance. He attributed all the faults committed during the earlier campaigns of the French in Italy, to the injudicious selection of a defensive line. The lines are numerous in Upper Italy, for sundry rivers traverse it from the Alps to the sea. The largest and most celebrated, the line of the Po, which passes through all Lombardy, appeared to him objectionable, as too extended. An army, in his opinion, was incapable of defending fifty leagues of barrier. A feint could always open the passage of a great river. He himself had cleared the Po a few leagues from Beaulieu. The other rivers, such as the Tecino, the Adda, the Oglio, falling into the Po, were confounded with it and liable to the same exceptions. The Mincio was fordable, and, besides, it likewise joined the Po. The Adige alone, issuing from the Tyrol and flowing into the sea, barred access into Italy. It was deep, and had but one short channel from the mountains to the sea. It was commanded by two places, Verona and Porto-Legnago, very near each other, and which, without being strong, were capable of resisting a first attack. Lastly, after leaving Legnago, it passed amidst impracticable marshes, which protected the lower part of its course. The rivers, further onward in Upper Italy, such as the Brenta, the Piave, the Tagliamento, were fordable, and furthermore turned by the great road from the Tyrol, which opens to their rear. The Adige, on the contrary, had the advantage of being placed at the gorge of that route, which proceeds along its own valley.

Such were the reasons that decided Bonaparte to prefer this line, and a memorable campaign has demonstrated the soundness of his judgment. The line being occupied, it behoved him to think of commencing the siege of Mantua.

That city, situated on the Mincio, lay behind the Adige, and was protected by that river. It was usually regarded as the bulwark of Italy. Seated in the midst of a lake formed by the waters of the Mincio, it communicated with the mainland by five dykes or causeways. Notwithstanding its great reputation, this fortress had inconveniences which diminished its real strength. In the first place, standing amid marshy exhalations, it was exposed to pestilence; and, secondly, when the causeway-heads were carried, the besieged must retreat into the place, and might be there blockaded by a corps much inferior to the garrison. Bonaparte relied upon taking it before a new army could arrive to the succour of Italy. On the 15th Prairial (3d June), he attacked the causeway-heads, one of which was formed by the suburb of Saint-George, and carried them. From that moment, Serrurier could blockade, with eight thousand men, a garrison which was composed of fourteen, whereof ten were under arms and four in the hospitals. Bonaparte caused the works of the siege to be commenced, and the whole lines of the Adige put in a state of defence. Thus, in less than two months, he had conquered Italy. It now remained for him to defend it. But as to his capacity in that respect, serious doubts were entertained, and all eyes were fixed on him as now to undergo his testing ordeal.

The Directory had recently replied to the observations submitted by Bonaparte on the plan of dividing the army and marching into the peninsula. The ideas of Bonaparte were so just and so forcibly expounded, that they could not fail to strike the mind of Carnot, and his services too signal to allow his resignation to be accepted. The Directory hastened to apprise him that his views were approved, to confirm him in the command of all the forces acting in Italy, and to assure him of the unlimited confidence reposed in him by the government. If the magistrates of the republic had possessed the gift of prophecy, they would have done well to accept the resignation of this young man, although he was right in the opinion he upheld, and although his retreat would have deprived the republic of Italy and of a great captain. But at this moment his youth, his genius, his victories, dazzled all understandings, and the interest and deference they were fitted to inspire naturally weighed with the rulers of the country.

Only one condition did the Directory venture to impose on Bonaparte, which was to make Rome and Naples feel the might of the republic. All the sincere patriots in France ardently desired this manifestation. The pope, who had anathematised France, preached a crusade against her, and permitted the assassination of her ambassador in his capital, assuredly merited chastisement. Bonaparte, now free to act as he listed, purposed to achieve this result without quitting his line of the Adige. Whilst one part of the army guarded that line, and another blockaded Mantua and the citadel of Milan, he determined, with a simple division thrown back upon the Po, to overawe the whole peninsula and compel the pontiff and the Queen of

* This prediction is dated 5th June 1796.

Naples to implore the clemency of the republic. He was informed that a great army, detached from the Rhine, was approaching to dispute the possession of Italy with its conquerors. This army, which must traverse the Black Forest, the Vorarlberg, and the Tyrol, could not arrive in less than a month. He had consequently time to accomplish all his designs in the interior, without removing too far from the Adige, and so as to be able, by a short retrograde march, to return in face of the enemy.

It was high time, in fact, that he turned his attention to the rest of Italy. The presence of the French army had tended to develop opinions through the peninsula with singular rapidity. The Venetian provinces were ready to discard the aristocratic yoke under which they groaned. The city of Brescia manifested an unequivocal disposition to revolt. In all Lombardy, and especially at Milan, public spirit was fermenting with accelerated progress. The dutchies of Modena and Reggio, the legations of Bologna and Ferrara, bore impatiently the sway of their duke and the pope. On the other hand, the contrary party was becoming more hostile. The Genoese aristocracy, in particular, was animated with the worst spirit, and meditated sinister projects on the rear of the French. The Austrian minister Gerola was the secret instigator of those designs. The dominions of Genoa were largely composed of petty fiefs holding of the empire. The Genoese nobles invested with these fiefs collected the deserters, the bandits, the Austrian prisoners who had contrived to escape, the Piedmontese soldiers who had been disbanded, and formed companies of partisans known under the name of Barbets. These infested the Apennines on the points by which the French army had entered; they stopped the couriers, pillaged the convoys, massacred the French detachments when they were not sufficiently numerous to defend themselves, and rendered the communications with France precarious and hazardous. In Tuscany the English had become masters of the port of Leghorn, owing to the protection of the governor, and French commerce was harassed and banished. Lastly, Rome was making hostile preparations, England having promised it several thousand men; and Naples, constantly kept in agitation by the caprices of a violent queen, threatened a formidable demonstration. The imbecile king, quitting for a moment his ignoble pursuits, had publicly implored the Divine assistance; in a solemn ceremony, he had divested himself of the royal insignia and consecrated them at the foot of the altar. The whole Neapolitan population had applauded the monarch and rent the air with vengeful vociferations; a multitude of blustering caitiffs, incapable of handling a musket or confronting a French bayonet, demanded arms, and vowed to march against the invaders of Italy.

Although these movements portended nothing very alarming for Bonaparte, so long as he wielded a disposable force of six thousand men, he was urged to repress them before the arrival of the new Austrian army, which would require the presence of all his forces on the Adige. He began to receive reinforcements from the army of the Alps, which enabled him to employ fifteen thousand men in the blockade of Mantua and the castle of Milan, to station twenty thousand for the defence of the Adige, and to move a division on the Po to execute his plans in the south of Italy.

He forthwith repaired to Milan with the view of opening the trenches around the citadel and hastening its reduction. He ordered Augereau, who was on the Mincio, very near the Po, to pass that river at Borgo-Forte, and advance on Bologna. He directed Vaubois to march from Tortona to Modena, with four or five thousand men arrived from the Alps. In this manner, he was enabled to move eight or nine thousand men into the legations of Bologna and Ferrara, and thence to menace the whole peninsula.

He waited for a few days until the inundations on the Lower Po had subsided, before putting his column in motion. Meanwhile, the court of Naples, as fickle as it was violent, had passed from fury to dejection. On learning the last victories of the French in Upper Italy, it had dispatched the Prince of Belmonte-Pignatelli with tenders of submission to the conqueror. Bonaparte referred the question of peace to the Directory, but deemed it fitting to grant an armistice. He was not prepared to advance to the gates of Naples with a few thousand men, and especially at a moment when expecting the arrival of the Austrians. It was sufficient for his immediate purpose to disarm that power, deprive Rome of its support, and embroil it with the coalition. He could not impose contributions on it, as on the other petty princes he had at his mercy, but he wrung from it engagements to open all its ports to the French, withdraw from England five ships and several frigates it had furnished to the naval force of that state, and, finally, recall from the Austrian army the two thousand four hundred cavalry serving in its ranks. This troop of horse was to remain in the hands of Bonaparte, with authority to constitute it captive on the first violation of the armistice. Bonaparte was well assured that such conditions would not satisfy his government; but, at the moment, it behoved him to secure tranquillity in his rear, and he demanded only what he thought he could obtain. The submission of the King of Naples would disable the pope from making any effectual resistance; thus, the expedition on the right of the Po would dwindle, as he wished, into an affair of a few days, and he could return with security to the Adige.

After signing this armistice, he took his departure for the Po, intending to put himself at the head of the two columns he had directed upon the States of the Church, the one under Vaubois, recently arrived from the Alps to reinforce him, and the other under Augereau, which had retrograded from the Mincio on the Po. He viewed with considerable uneasiness the dispositions evinced by Genoa, because it commanded one of the two routes leading into France, and because its senate had always been distinguished for energy in its determinations. He felt that he would have to demand the expulsion of twenty families, the feudatories of Austria and Naples, in order to ensure the preponderance of France in its councils; but he had no orders on this point, and he was moreover repugnant to adopt steps savouring of revolution. He consequently contented himself with writing a letter to the senate, in which he required that the governor of Novi, who had protected the brigands, should be punished in an exemplary manner, and that the Austrian minister should be expelled from Genoa. He furthermore insisted upon a categorical explanation. "Can you, or can you not," he asked, "deliver your territory from the assassins who infest it? If you are unable to take measures, I will take them for you. I will have the towns and villages burnt where a murder is committed; I will have the houses burnt which afford asylum to murderers, and signal chastisement inflicted on the magistrates who tolerate their presence. The murder of a Frenchman shall bring desolation on whole communes that have not prevented it." As he was acquainted with diplomatic procrastination, he detached his aid-de-camp Murat to bear his letter and read it in person to the senate. "We must use a mode of communication," he wrote to the minister Faypoult, "which will electrify those lofty personages." He dispatched Lannes at the same time, with twelve hundred men, to ravage the imperial fiefs. The mansion of Augustin Spinola, the chief instigator of the revolt, was burnt to the ground. The Barbets taken with arms in their hands were shot without mercy. The senate of Genoa, intimidated at these portents, superseded the governor of Novi, dismissed the minister Gerola, and undertook to guard the routes with its own troops. It sent Vincent Spinola to Paris, in order to arrange with the Directory all subjects of dispute—the indemnity due for the frigate La Modeste, the expulsion of the feudatory families, and the recall of the exiled families.

Bonaparte subsequently marched on Modena, where he arrived on the 1st Messidor (19th June); Augereau entered Bologna on the same day.

The inhabitants of Modena exhibited the utmost enthusiasm. They poured forth to greet his arrival, and appointed a deputation to congratulate him in glowing terms. The principal amongst them besieged him with solicitations, and earnestly besought him to emancipate them from the yoke of their duke, who had carried his accumulated extortions to Venice. Inasmuch as the regency left by the duke had adhered faithfully to the conditions of the armistice, and as Bonaparte had no grounds of justification warranting him to exercise the rights of conquest on the dutchy, he could not satisfy the wishes of the Modenese: their requests, moreover, involved a question policy rendered it expedient to adjourn. He contented himself with fostering hopes, and in the interim recommended tranquillity. He departed for Bologna. The fortress of Urbino stood on his route; it was the first place belonging to the pope. He summoned it to surrender, and the garrison capitulated. It contained sixty pieces of cannon of large calibre and a few hundred men. Bonaparte caused this heavy artillery to be transported to Mantua, as an auxiliary battering train for the siege of that city. He then advanced to Bologna, where Augereau's division had preceded him. The joy of the inhabitants was boundless. Bologna is a city containing fifty thousand souls, magnificently embellished, and celebrated for its artists, its men of science, and its university. Affection towards France and detestation of the Holy See were the paramount sentiments. Here Bonaparte had no motives for checking ebullitions of revolutionary feeling, as he was in the dominions of an avowed foe, the pope, and he was justified in exercising the right of conquest. The two legations of Ferrara and Bologna commissioned deputies to urge their entreaties: he granted them a provisional independence, promising to procure its recognition on the conclusion of peace.

The Vatican was in dismal alarm, and it hastily dispatched a negotiator to intercede in its favour. The Spanish ambassador, D'Azara, remarkable for his vigorous understanding and his predilection for France, and the minister of a friendly power withal, was chosen as the fittest agent to execute this mission. He had already negotiated for behoof of the Duke of Parma. On his arrival at Bologna, he placed the tiara at the feet of the victorious republic. Faithful to his plan, which consisted as yet in neither subverting nor erecting, Bonaparte was content to demand that the legations of Bologna and Ferrara should remain independent, the town of Ancona receive a French garrison, and the pope furnish twenty-one millions, supplies of corn and cattle, and one hundred pictures or statues. These conditions were accepted. Bonaparte conversed much with the minister D'Azara, and inspired him with an enthusiastic admiration. He transmitted a letter, in the name of the republic, to the celebrated astronomer Oriani, and requested an interview. The modest scholar was abashed in presence of the young conqueror, and rendered him only the touching homage of embarrassment. Bonaparte neglected no opportunity of honouring Italy, of awakening its pride and its patriotism. He was not a barbarous conqueror come to scourge and ravage it, but a hero of liberty, rekindling the fire of genius on its pristine soil, in the ancient land of civilisation. He left Monge, Bertholet, and the brothers Thouin, whom the Directory had commissioned to him, to select the articles destined for the museums of Paris.

On the 8th Messidor (26th June), he passed the Apennines with Vaubois' division, and entered Tuscany. The duke, in terror, sent to him his minister Manfredini. Bonaparte tranquillised him as to his intentions, which, however, he kept profoundly secret. Meanwhile his column moved by forced marches on Leghorn, in which city it made an unexpected appearance, and confiscated the English factory. The governor, Spannochi, was seized, thrust into a close carriage, and dismissed to the grand-duke, with a letter explaining the motives of this act of hostility committed towards a friendly power. The grand-duke was told that his governor had violated all the laws of neutrality by oppressing the French commerce, and by affording asylum to emigrants and other enemies of the republic. It was likewise intimated that, from respect for his authority, the care of punishing this faithless minister was referred to himself. This act of vigour demonstrated to all neutral states that the French general would regulate their police, if they were unmindful of the duty themselves. The French had been unable to seize all the vessels belonging to the English, but their commerce suffered a severe blow. Bonaparte left a garrison in Leghorn, and appointed commissioners to sequestrate all the property appertaining to subjects of England, Austria, and Russia. He subsequently proceeded in person to Florence, where the grand-duke gave him a magnificent reception. After tarrying there a few days, he repassed the Po, and returned to his head-quarters at Roverbella, near Mantua. Thus, an interval of less than three weeks, and a single division deployed on the right bank of the Po, had sufficed him to overawe the princes of Italy, and to ensure peace and quiet during the struggles he had yet to sustain against the Austrian power.

Whilst the army of Italy was performing with such glory the task which had been assigned it in the general plan of the campaign, the armies on the German frontier had not yet been able to move forward. The difficulty of organising their commissariat services, and of procuring horses, had hitherto retained them in inaction. On her part, Austria, who had the strongest motives for promptly taking the initiative, had evinced an inconceivable tardiness in making her preparations, and was not in a condition to commence hostilities before the middle of Prairial (end of May). Her armies were on a formidable footing, and greatly superior to the French. But the successes of the latter in Italy had obliged her to detach Wurmser with thirty thousand of her best troops from the Rhine, for the purpose of rallying and reorganising the wrecks of Beaulieu's forces. Thus, besides its conquests, the army of Italy rendered the important service of relieving from their incubus the armies on the frontier of Germany. The Aulic Council, which had determined to assume the offensive, and to carry the war into the heart of the French provinces, thenceforth thought only of guarding the defensive and opposing an invasion. It would even have willingly allowed the armistice to continue; but its expiry was notified, and hostilities were appointed to commence on the 12th Prairial (31st May).

We have already given a sketch of that theatre of war. The Rhine and the Danube, issuing, the one from the Great Alps and the other from the Suabian Alps, after approximating in the vicinity of the Lake of Constance, separate and proceed on their respective courses, the first towards the north, the latter towards the east of Europe. Two transversal and almost parallel valleys, those of the Maine and the Neckar, form, as it were, two avenues, leading on the one hand into the valley of the Danube through the massive chain of the Suabian Alps, or on the other from the valley of the Danube into that of the Rhine.

This theatre of war, and the plan of operations adapted to it, were not then so well known as now, elucidated as they have since been by great examples. Carnot, who directed the French plans, had adopted a theory based on the celebrated campaign of 1794, which had gained him so vast a renown in Europe.

At that period, the centre of the enemy, being intrenched in the forest of Mormale, in a position defying attack, the French had defiled on his wings, and, by outflanking them, had compelled him to retreat. This result had sunk deep in the memory of Carnot. Endowed with a mind of great originality, but prone to systematise, he had modelled his views upon the incidents of that campaign, and he was persuaded that it was always proper to act simultaneously on the two wings of an army, and strive at all times to outflank them. Military men have regarded this idea as an undoubted progress in the art of war, and as much preferable to the system of cordons disposed to assail the enemy on all points; but it had resolved itself, in the mind of Carnot, into a settled and dangerous system. The circumstances now presenting themselves to him, conduced still more to confirm him in the resolution of pursuing this favourite plan. The army of the Sambre-and-Meuse, and that of the Rhine and Moselle, were both stationed on the Rhine, at two points far distant from one another, and two valleys started from those points, opening the way to the Danube. Here the reasons were all-sufficient for Carnot to form the French into two columns, whereof one ascending by the Maine, the other by the Neckar, they would thus tend to outflank the wings of the imperial armies, and oblige them to retrograde on the Danube. He accordingly enjoined the two generals, Jourdan and Moreau, to proceed, the first from Dusseldorf, the second from Strasburg, and advance separately into Germany. As a great captain and a great critic have both remarked, and as facts subsequently proved, to form into two corps was instantly to give the enemy the faculty and the idea of concentrating his forces, and overwhelming with the entire mass one or other of those two corps. Clairfayt had partially executed that manœuvre in the preceding campaign, by first repulsing Jourdan upon the Lower Rhine, and then throwing himself on the lines of Mayence. Even were the antagonist general not a superior man, he must be thereby constrained to adopt that course; and the thought which genius alone would have inspired, became palpably suggested to his mind.

The invasion, therefore, was planned on this vicious principle. The mode of execution was as injudiciously conceived as the project itself. The line which separated the armies ascended the Rhine from Düsseldorf to Bingen, then described an arc from Bingen to Manheim by the foot of the Vosges, and rejoined the Rhine up to Basle. Carnot directed that the army under Jourdan, debouching by Düsseldorf and the tête-de-pont of Neuwied, should pass, to the number of 40,000 men, on the right bank, in order to draw the attention of the enemy to that point; whilst the rest of his army, 25,000 strong, starting from Mayence under the orders of Marceau, should ascend the Rhine, and, defiling to the rear of Moreau, effect by stealth the passage of the river in the vicinity of Strasburg. Generals Jourdan and Moreau combined in representing to the Directory the evil tendencies of this evolution. Jourdan, reduced to 40,000 men on the Lower Rhine, might be overwhelmed and cut off, whilst the residue of his army would lose incalculable time in ascending from Mayence to Strasburg. It seemed much more natural to allow the passage of the river near Strasburg to be executed by Moreau's extreme right. This manner of proceeding permitted quite as much secrecy as the other, and obviated the loss of a precious interval of time. This modification was admitted. Jourdan, profiting by the two têtes-de-pont he had at Düsseldorf and Neuwied, was first to pass, in order to draw the enemy towards his army, and thus distract attention from the Upper Rhine, where Moreau had a passage to effect by main force.

The plan being thus definitively fixed, preparations were made for putting it in execution. The armies of the hostile nations were nearly equal in strength. Since the departure of Wurmser, the Austrians had along the extensive line of the Rhine one hundred fifty and some odd thousand men, cantoned from Basle to the environs of Düsseldorf. The French had as many, without counting 40,000 men specifically assigned for the defence of Holland, and maintained at its cost. There were certain discrepancies, nevertheless, between the two armies. The Austrians, in their 150,000 men, mustered almost 38,000 horse and 115,000 foot soldiers; whereas the French had upwards of 130,000 foot, and only 15,000 or 18,000 horse at the utmost. This superiority in cavalry gave the Imperialists a decided advantage, especially in retreats. They possessed the still greater advantage of obeying a single general. Since the removal of Wurmser, the two Imperial armies had been placed under the supreme command of the young Archduke Charles, who had already distinguished himself at Turcoing, and from whose talents happy auguries were drawn. The French had two excellent generals, but acting separately, at a great distance from each other, and under the direction of a cabinet seated two hundred leagues from the theatre of war.

The armistice expired on the 11th Prairial (30th May). Hostilities commenced by a general reconnaissance on the advanced posts. Jourdan's army extended, as we are aware, from the environs of Mayence to Düsseldorf. At the latter place he had a tête-de-pont for debouching on the right bank, after which he might ascend between the line of Prussian neutrality and the Rhine to the banks of the Lahn, with the eventual intention of moving from the Lahn on the Maine. The Austrians had fifteen or twenty thousand men scattered from Mayence to Düsseldorf, under the orders of the Prince of Wurtemburg. Jourdan caused Kléber to debouch by Düsseldorf with 25,000 men. That general drove back the Austrians, worsted them at Altenkirchen on the 16th Prairial (4th June), and ascended the right bank between the line of neutrality and the river. When he had reached the height of Neuwied and covered that point, Jourdan, profiting by his tête-de-pont, crossed the river with a part of his forces, and rejoined Kléber on the opposite bank. He thus found himself on the Lahn with about 45,000 men, on the 17th Prairial (5th June). He had left Marceau with 30,000 men before Mayence. The Archduke Charles, who was in the vicinity of Mayence, on learning that the French were repeating the enterprise of the preceding year, and again debouching by Düsseldorf and Neuwied, recoiled with a portion of his troops on the right back, to oppose their march. Jourdan proposed to attack the corps under the Prince of Wurtemburg before he was reinforced; but, being obliged to defer the operation for a day, he lost the opportunity, and was himself attacked at Wetzlar on the 19th (7th June). He skirted the Lahn, having his right on the Rhine and his left at Wetzlar. The archduke, acting with the mass of his forces on Wetzlar, defeated his extreme left, composed of Lefebvre's division, and compelled it to fall back. Jourdan, worsted on the left, was constrained to retire on his right, which touched the Rhine, and thus found himself thrown towards that river. To avoid being forced into it, he must attack the archduke, or, in other words, give battle with the Rhine at his back. He would thus expose himself, in case of defeat, to the difficulties of a retreat on his bridges at Neuwied and Düsseldorf, and perhaps to a disastrous rout. A battle was therefore dangerous, and even useless, since he had fulfilled his object by attracting the enemy to him, and inducing a diversion of the Austrian forces from the Upper to the Lower Rhine. He consequently deemed it prudent under the circumstances to recoil, and gave orders for a retreat, which was conducted with order and firmness. He repassed at Neuwied, and directed Kléber to descend to Düsseldorf, and there likewise cross the Rhine. He recommended him to march leisurely, but to shun any serious action. Kléber, feeling himself too closely pressed at Ukerath and carried away by his martial instinct, suddenly faced his enemy and inflicted on him a severe but fruitless blow, and regained his intrenched camp at Düsseldorf. Jourdan, in thus advancing subsequently to return, had performed an ungrateful task for the benefit of the army of the Rhine. Ill-informed persons, in fact, might regard this operation as a defeat but the zeal of that brave general made him superior to personal considerations, and he waited with composure until the army of the Rhine should have profited by the diversion he had effected, to resume the offensive.

Moreau, who had evinced exemplary prudence, firmness, and imperturbability, in the operations wherein he had been previously employed towards the North completed his dispositions to perform the task now assigned him. He had resolved to cross the Rhine at Strasburg. That large city formed an excellent point of departure. He could concentrate within it a considerable number of troops. The woody islands, which break the current of the Rhine at that point, facilitated the passage. The fort of Kehl, situated on the opposite bank, might be easily surprised; once occupied, it would become available as a protection to the bridge intended to be thrown before Strasburg.

All arrangements being made in furtherance of this design, and the attention of the enemy directed towards the Lower Rhine, Moreau ordered, on the 26th Prairial (14th June), a general attack on the intrenched camp of Manheim. The object of this attack was to fix on Manheim the attention of General Latour, who commanded the troops on the Upper Rhine under the Archduke Charles, and to confine the Austrians within their line. The attack, conducted with ability and vigour, was completely successful. Immediately afterwards, Moreau directed a part of his forces on Strasburg; a report was circulated that they were proceeding into Italy to reinforce the army there; and, in order to strengthen the rumour, stores of provisions were accumulated on the routes through Franche-Comté. Other troops started at the same time from the environs of Huningen to descend on Strasburg and as to these, it was pretended they were going into garrison at Worms. These movements were so concerted, that the troops should arrive at the prescribed point on the 5th Messidor (23d June). On that day, in fact, 28,000 men were assembled in the polygon of Strasburg and in the environs, under the command of General Desaix. Ten thousand men were to attempt the passage below Strasburg, in the vicinity of Gambsheim, and 15,000 were to cross from Strasburg to Kehl. On the same evening, the gates of Strasburg were closed, in order that advice of the passage might not be conveyed to the enemy. During the night the troops marched in silence towards the river. The boats were conveyed into the Mobile branch, and thence into the Rhine. The large isle of Ehrlen-Rhein presented an intermediate point favourable to the passage. The boats landed on its shore 2600 men. Fearful of giving the alarm by the report of fire-arms, those brave soldiers charged at the point of the bayonet the troops distributed in the isle, put them to flight, and allowed them no time to break down the little bridges which conducted from the isle to the right bank. These bridges they passed in pursuit; and although neither artillery nor cavalry could follow them, they ventured to debouch alone on the great plain which abuts on the river, and approached Kehl. The Swabian contingent was encamped at a short distance from that place, at Wilstett. The detachments which arrived thence, especially the cavalry, rendered very perilous the situation of the French infantry, which had thus so daringly debouched on the right bank. It hesitated not, however, to send back the boats which had transported it, and thereby to cut off the hope of retreat, in order to bring fresh detachments in aid. Additional troops, in fact, arrived; the French advanced on Kehl, assailed the intrenchments with the bayonet, and stormed them. The artillery found in the fort was instantly turned upon the hostile troops arriving from Wilstett, and they were repulsed. Thereupon a bridge was constructed between Strasburg and Kehl, which was finished the following day, 7th Messidor (25th June). The whole army passed over it. The 10,000 men sent to Gambsheim had not been able to attempt the passage, on account of the flooded state of the river. They remounted to Strasburg, and crossed the stream by the bridge just thrown over it.

This operation had been executed with secrecy, precision, and hardihood. However, the dissemination of the Austrian troops from Basle to Manheim detracted considerably both from the difficulty and the merit. The Prince of Condé was located at Brisach on the Upper Rhine with 3800 men; the contingent of Swabia, to the number of 7500, was at Wilstett, nearly opposite Strasburg; and 8000 men, or thereabouts, under Starrai, were encamped between Strasburg and Manheim. The Austrian forces, therefore, were not very formidable in this quarter; but that very advantage was owing to the secrecy of the passage, and the secrecy again to the prudence with which it had been arranged.

In this situation an opportunity was presented for effecting a series of brilliant achievements. If Moreau had acted with the rapidity of the conqueror of Montenotte, he might have fallen on the corps scattered along the river, destroyed them one after the other, and even succeeded in overwhelming Latour, who was repassing from Manheim on the right bank, and could have at the moment scarcely thirty-six thousand men under his command. He would thus have extinguished the army of the Upper Rhine before the Archduke Charles could have returned from the banks of the Lahn. History shows that promptitude and rapidity are all-powerful in war, as in all situations of life. The enemy, anticipated on all points, is cut off in detail; suffering blow after blow, he has no time to recover himself, becomes demoralised, and loses at once understanding and courage. But this rapidity, whereof we have witnessed such signal examples on the Alps and the Po, supposes more than simple activity; it supposes a grand design, a master mind to form it, great passions impelling to the daring pretension. Nothing great in this world is accomplished without passions—without the ardour and boldness they impart to thought and resolution. Moreau, a man of lucid apprehension and of fortitude, had not that inspiring glow, which, in the tribune or in war, in all situations, elevate men and lead them in their own despite to mighty consummations.

Moreau employed the interval between the 7th and 10th Messidor (25th and 28th June) in collecting his divisions on the right bank of the Rhine. That of Saint-Cyr, which he had left at Manheim, was advancing by forced marches. Whilst awaiting that division, he had at hand 53,000 men, whereas around him were disseminated but 20,000 of the enemy. On the 10th (28th June), he attacked 10,000 Austrians intrenched on the Renchen, defeated them, and took 60 prisoners. The remains of that corps recoiled on Latour, who was ascending the right bank. On the 12th (30th June), Saint-Cyr having arrived, the whole army was on the German side of the river. It counted 63,000 foot soldiers and 6000 horse, forming a total of 71,000 men. Moreau gave the right to Ferino, the centre to Saint-Cyr, and the left to Desaix. He found himself at the base of the Black Mountains.

The Swabian Alps form a barrier which throws, as we know, the Danube to the east, the Rhine to the north: it is through this chain the Neckar and the Maine wind their course to the Rhine. They are mountains of moderate elevation, covered with wood, and traversed by narrow defiles. The valley of the Rhine is separated from that of the Neckar by a ridge called the Black Mountains. Moreau, now clear of the Rhine, was at their base. He must surmoun them to debouch into the valley of the Neckar. Th Swabian contingent and the corps of Condé ascende towards Switzerland to guard the upper passes of th Black Mountains. Latour, with the principal corps, was returning from Manheim to guard the lowe passes by Rastadt, Ettlingen, and Pforzheim. Morea might, without danger, have neglected the detach ments retiring in the direction of Switzerland, an moved, with the entire mass of his forces, on Latour he must infallibly have overwhelmed him. Then he would have debouched victoriously into the valle of the Neckar, before the Archduke Charles. But, as a circumspect general, he confided to Ferino the task of following with his right the detached corps of Swabia and Condé, whilst he sent Saint-Cyr, with th centre, directly towards the mountains, to occupy certain heights, and skirted in person their base, to reacl Rastadt and meet Latour. This march was doubly enjoined him by his own caution and the plans o Carnot. He wished to cover himself on all points and at the same time to extend his line towards Switzerland, to be prepared to support by the Alps th army of Italy. He commenced his movement on th 12th (30th June). He marched between the Rhine an the mountains, in a broken country, intersected witl wood and ploughed by torrents. He advanced with discretion, and only arrived at Rastadt on the 15th (3d July). There was still time to overwhelm Latour, who had not been yet joined by the Archduke Charles. That prince, on being apprised of the passage over the Rhine, had started with a reinforcement of 25,000 men, proceeding by forced marches. He left 36,000 on the Lahn, and 27,000 before Mayence, to kee Jourdan in check, the whole under the orders of General Wartensleben. He was hastening to the scene of action with all possible dispatch; but his heads of columns were as yet far distant. Latour, after having left a garrison in Manheim, had at the utmost 36,00 men under his command. He was drawn up on the Murg, which flows into the Rhine, having his left at Gernsbach, in the mountains; his centre, at their foot, towards Kuppenheim, a little in advance of the Murg; his right in the plain, skirting the woods of Neiderbuhl, which stretch to the bank of the Rhine; and his reserve at Rastadt. It was imprudent in Latour to engage before the arrival of the archduke. But his position inspiring him with confidence, he determined to resist, in order to cover the great road which, fron Rastadt, opens on the Neckar.

Moreau had with him only his left wing; his centre, under Saint-Cyr, had remained behind to take possession of some posts in the Black Mountains. This circumstance reduced the inequality of force. He attacked Latour on the 17th (5th July). His troops conducted themselves with distinguished valour, carried the position of Gernsbach on the Upper Murg, and penetrated to Kuppenheim, towards the centre of the enemy's position. But in the plain his divisions experienced difficulty in debouching, under the heavy fire of the artillery and in presence of the numerous Austrian cavalry. Nevertheless, the French attained Niederbuhl and Rastadt, and succeeded in rendering themselves masters of the Murg on all points. They made a thousand prisoners.

Moreau halted on the field of battle, without attempting to pursue the enemy. The archduke had not arrived, and he might yet have annihilated Latour; but he found his troops fatigued, he felt the necessity of drawing Saint-Cyr to his assistance, in order to act with a greater mass, and he waited until the 21st (9th July) before hazarding a fresh attack. This interval of four days allowed the archduke to come up with a reinforcement of 25,000 men, and the Austrians to give battle on equal terms.

The respective positions of the two armies were nearly the same. They were both on a line perpendicular to the Rhine, a wing in the mountains, the centre at their base, the other wing in the woody and marshy plain skirting the river. Moreau, on whom appreciation dawned slowly but always in time, as he preserved the calmness requisite to rectify his errors, had become sensible, during the conflict at Rastadt, of the importance of making his principal effort in the mountains. He, in fact, who was master of them, possessed the avenues into the valley of the Neckar, the main object of dispute; he might, moreover, outflank his adversary, and push him into the Rhine. Moreau had an additional reason for fighting in the mountains, namely, his superiority in infantry and his inferiority in cavalry. The archduke equally felt the importance of establishing himself on them; but he had, in his numerous squadrons, a reason for also keeping on the plain. He amended the position assumed by Latour: he threw the Saxons into the mountains to outflank Moreau; he reinforced the plateau of Rothensohle, where his left rested; and he deployed his centre at the foot of the mountains in front of Malsch, and his cavalry in the plain. He purposed to attack on the 22d (10th July). Moreau anticipated him, and attacked on the 21st (9th July).

General Saint-Cyr, whom Moreau had countermanded, and who now formed the right, assailed the plateau of Rothensohle. He displayed all that precision and ability in manœuvring which distinguished him during his eminent career. Finding himself unable to dislodge the enemy from that formidable position, he surrounded him with sharpshooters, made a spirited charge, and pretended to fly, in order to induce the Austrians to quit their position and rush in pursuit of the French. This stratagem succeeded. The Austrians, seeing the French advance and then fly in disorder, plunged after them. Saint-Cyr, who had troops in readiness, thereupon propelled them on the Austrians, who had quitted their position, and rendered himself master of the plateau. After this achievement, he advanced, intimidated the Saxons destined to outflank the French right, and obliged them to fall back. At Malsch, in the centre, Desaix engaged the Austrians in an animated action, took and lost that illage, and concluded the day by moving on the last heights which wind along the foot of the mountains. In the plain, the French cavalry had not engaged, Moreau having kept it on the skirts of the woods.

The battle, therefore, was indecisive, except in the mountains. But that was the important point; for Moreau, by pursuing his success, might extend his ight wing around the archduke, wrest from him the avenues of the valley of the Neckar, and push him into he Rhine. It is true that the archduke, if he lost the nountains, which were his base, might, in his turn, deprive Moreau of the Rhine, which was the French base; he might renew his effort in the plain, defeat Desaix, and, advancing along the Rhine, set Moreau, s it were, adrift in a hostile country. On such ocions, it is the least adventurous who is compromised; e who deems himself cut off, is so in fact. The archuke considered it incumbent on him to retire, that he night not endanger, by a hazardous evolution, the Austrian monarchy, whose only support rested on his rmy. He has been blamed for this resolution, which ed to the retreat of the Imperial armies, and exposed Germany to an invasion. We may admire those dazzling and daring flights of genius, which achieve great results at the risk of great perils; but we cannot mould them into precedents. Prudence is a stern uty, in such a situation as that of the archduke; and e cannot be justly censured for having retrograded, n order to forestall Moreau in the valley of the Neckar. nd thus protect the hereditary states. His determiation was promptly taken to abandon Germany. which no line could now cover, and to move, by asending the Maine and the Neckar, on the grand line guarding the hereditary states, that of the Danube, This river, defended by the two fortresses of Ulm and Ratisbon, was the surest bulwark of Austria. There, concentrating his forces, the archduke was close upon his resources, and in possession of a great river, with forces equal to those of the enemy, with the power of manœuvring on both banks, and of overwhelming one of the two invading armies. The enemy, on the contrary, would be far from his resources, at an immense distance from his base, without that superiority of strength which obviates the danger of such removal, with the disadvantage of a most difficult country to traverse, either for invading or retreating, and finally, with the inconvenience of being divided into two armies and commanded by two generals. Thus the Imperialists gained by approximating to the Danube all that the French forfeited. But, to ensure all these advantages, the archduke must reach the Danube without suffering the calamity of a defeat; consequently his course henceforward was to retire with firmness, but avoiding the hazard of an engagement.

The archduke therefore ordered Wartensleben, after leaving garrisons in Mayence, Ehrenbreitstein, Cassel, and Manheim, to retire gradually by the valley of the Maine, and to gain the Danube, engaging the enemy sufficiently day by day to sustain the moral courage of his troops, but not sufficiently to compromise them in a general action. He adopted the same plan with his own army; he moved it from Pforzheim into the valley of the Neckar, and there delayed only the time necessary to collect his parks and to secure them leisure to retire. Wartensleben retrograded with 30,000 foot and 15,000 horse, the archduke with 40,000 infantry and 18,000 cavalry, which made 103,000 men in all. The remainder was in the fortresses, or had defiled by the Upper Rhine into Switzerland before General Ferino, who commanded Moreau's right wing.

As soon as Moreau had constrained the Austrians to retreat, the army under Jourdan again passed the Rhine at Düsseldorf and Neuwied, manœuvring as it had previously done, and advanced on the Lahn, with the view of subsequently debouching into the valley of the Maine. The two French armies, therefore, marched forward in two columns, along the Maine and the Neckar, following the two imperial armies, which effected their retreat in admirable order. The numerous squadrons of the Austrians, hovering in the rear, kept the French in check, covered their infantry from insult, and rendered futile all efforts to force it into battle. Moreau, having had no fortress to mask when detaching himself from the Rhine, led on 71,000 men. Jourdan, having been obliged to blockade Mayence, Cassel, and Ehrenbreitstein, and to assign 27,000 men to conduct those operations, advanced with but 46,000, being a mere trifle superior to Wartensleben.

In accordance with the vicious plan of Carnot, the French generals still deemed it imperative to outflank the wings of the enemy, that is to say, to derogate from the essential object—the junction of the two armies. This junction would have enabled the French to bear down upon the Danube in a mass of 115,000 or 120,000 men, an overwhelming, enormous mass, which would have destroyed all the calculations of the archduke, rendered nugatory all his endeavours to concentrate his forces, passed the Danube before his eyes, carried Ulm, and, with that basis, menaced Vienna and shaken the imperial throne.*

Conformably, then, with this plan of Carnot, Moreau was to bear towards the Upper Rhine and the Upper Danube, and Jourdan towards Bohemia. Moreau was supplied with an additional reason for keeping in that direction, namely, the possibility of communicating with the army of Italy by the Tyrol, which presumed the execution of Bonaparte's gigantic plan, justly discountenanced by the Directory. As Moreau desired, at the same time, not to be too far detached from Jourdan, but to give him his left hand whilst he extended the right to the army of Italy, he was seen, on the banks of the Neckar, occupying a line of fifty leagues. Jourdan, on his part, charged to outflank Wartensleben, was compelled to remove from Moreau; and as Wartensleben, a general of the old routine school, failed to comprehend the idea of the archduke, and instead of approximating to the Danube diverged towards Bohemia in order to cover it, Jourdan, striving to outflank him, was forced to expand still more widely. Thus it chanced that the antagonist armies did, each for itself, the contrary of what they ought to have done. There was, however, this difference between Wartensleben and Jourdan, that the first derogated from an excellent order, and that the latter was obliged to follow a bad one. The fault of Wartensleben was exclusively his own, that of Jourdan was chargeable on the director Carnot.

Moreau fought with the enemy at Canstadt to gain the passage of the Neckar, and subsequently plunged into the defiles of the Alb, a chain of mountains which separates the Necker from the Danube, as the Black Mountains separate it from the Rhine. He cleared those defiles, and finally debouched into the valley of the Danube, towards the middle of Thermidor (end of July), after a month's march. Jourdan, after having passed from the banks of the Lahn to those of the Maine, and met the enemy in conflict at Freidberg, halted before the city of Frankfort, which he threatened to bombard unless it were instantly delivered into his hands. The Austrians consented to this surrender on condition of obtaining an armistice for two days. By this suspension of arms they would be enabled to cross the Maine and gain a considerable advance; but it would save from destruction a flourishing city, whose resources might be serviceable to the army. Jourdan assented to the proposition. The place was surrendered on the 28th Messidor (16th July). Jourdan imposed contributions upon Frankfort, but evinced great moderation in the levy, and even displeased his army by the regard he manifested for a hostile country. The report of the abundance amidst which the army of Italy revelled had inflamed the desires of the French soldiers, and they panted for the like profusion in Germany. Jourdan afterwards ascended the Maine, took possession of Wurzburg on the 7th Thermidor (25th July), and eventually debouched beyond the mountains of Swabia, on the banks of the Naab, which falls into the Danube. He was almost parallel with Moreau, and at the same period, that is to say, towards the middle of Thermidor (commencement of August). Swabia and Saxony had acceded to a neutrality, sent agents to Paris to treat for peace, and consented to pay contributions. The Saxon and Swabian troops accordingly withdrew, and thus weakened the Austrian army by twelve thousand men, who had been in fact of little use, having fought without energy or zeal.

Thus, in the middle of summer, the French armies, masters of Italy, which they wholly ruled, and of one-half of Germany, which they had overrun as far as the Danube, held the most menacing of attitudes towards Europe. For two months La Vendée had been hushed and subdued. Of the one hundred thousand men distributed over the western provinces, fifty thousand might be detached and moved on any point at pleasure. The pledges of the Directorial government could not have been more gloriously redeemed.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

NTERNAL STATE OF FRANCE IN THE MIDDLE OF 1796. —FINANCIAL EMBARRASSMENTS.—RENEWAL OF THE FAMILY-COMPACT WITH SPAIN, AND PROJECT OF QUADRUPLE ALLIANCE.—PROJECTED EXPEDITION INTO IRELAND.—BATTLES OF LONATO AND CASTIG-

* On this subject may be consulted the deductions which Napoleon has drawn, and which he has accredited by such memorable examples.

LIONE IN ITALY.—OPERATIONS ON THE DANUBE BATTLE OF NERESHEIM.—MARCH OF BONAPARTE ON THE BRENTA; BATTLES OF ROVEREDO, BASSANO, AND ST GEORGE.—BATTLE OF WURZBURG; RETREAT OF MOREAU AND OF JOURDAN.

France had never worn a more imposing external aspect than during this summer of 1796; but its domestic situation bore little analogy with its outward splendour. Paris, in particular, offered a singular spectacle. The patriots, deeply incensed at the arrest of Babœuf, Drouet, and their other leaders, execrated the government, and no longer rejoiced at the victories of the republic, since they conduced to the advantage of the Directory. The avowed enemies of the revolution obstinately denied them altogether; whilst men tired of and estranged from it seemed to place but little credence in them. Certain newly enriched individuals, who owed their wealth to stockjobbing or to contracts, displayed an unbridled luxury, and manifested a most ungrateful indifference for that revolution which had raised them to affluence. This morbid condition was the inevitable result of a general fatigue in the nation, of inveterate passions in parties, and of cupidity stimulated by a financial crisis. But, happily, there were still many Frenchmen enthusiastic republicans, whose sentiments had not varied—whose hearts were gladdened by the victories of the armies —who, far from denying them, hailed the tidings with transport, and who pronounced with zealous affection and admiration the names of Hoche, Jourdan, Moreau, and Bonaparte. These desired that additional efforts should be made—that the malignants and the lukewarm should be compelled to contribute, with all their means, to the glory and grandeur of the republic.

To obscure the lustre of the victories, the factions applied themselves to decry the generals. They were especially envenomed against the youngest and most brilliant, Bonaparte, whose name, in the short space of two months, had become so famous. On the 13th Vendémiaire he had struck terror into the royalists, and they treated him with corresponding asperity in their journals. It was known that he had exhibited a sufficiently imperious character in Italy; attention had been peculiarly drawn to the manner in which he acted with regard to the states of that country, granting or refusing at his pleasure armistices which determined the question of peace or war; and it was moreover ascertained that, without using the medium of the treasury, he had remitted funds to the army of the Rhine. Hence a malicious pleasure was taken in averring him to be intractable, and in circulating assurances that he was to be superseded. Thus a great general was to be lost to the republic—an importunate glory to be abruptly stifled. In this spirit the malignants disseminated rumours of the most preposterous description; they even ventured to assert that Hoche, who was then at Paris, was on the eve of starting to arrest Bonaparte in the midst of his army. The government deemed it fitting to write a letter to Bonaparte contradicting these reports, and in which it reiterated the expression of its entire confidence. It caused this letter to be published in all the journals. The gallant Hoche, incapable of any base jealousy towards a rival who in two months had placed himself above the first generals of the republic, likewise wrote to repudiate the part malevolence assigned to him. The letter he penned on this occasion, so honourable to both the young heroes, is worthy of record; it was addressed to the minister of police, and was made known through the usual channels of publicity.

"Citizen minister—Men who, concealed or unknown during the first years of the foundation of the republic, now appear in it only to seek the means of destroying it, and speak of it only to calumniate its firmest upholders, have for the last few days circulated reports most injurious to the armies and to one of the general officers who command them. Is it then no longer sufficient for them, in order to attain their object, to correspond openly with the conspiring horde domesticated at Hamburg? Must they, in order to obtain the favour of the masters they would fain give to France, degrade the leaders of our armies? Do they think that the latter, as weak as in times past, will allow themselves to be slandered without daring to reply—to be accused without defending themselves? Why, then, is Bonaparte the object of these men's fury? Is it because he has defeated their friends and themselves in Vendémiaire? Is it because he dissolves the armies of kings, and furnishes to the republic the means of gloriously terminating this honourable war? Ah! intrepid youth, what republican soldier burns not with desire to imitate thee? Courage, Bonaparte! Lead our victorious armies to Naples and to Vienna; reply to thy personal enemies by humbling kings—by investing our arms with a new lustre; and leave us to take care of thy glory!

I have smiled with pity on seeing a man, who in other respects has great intelligence, profess disquietude, which he feels not, concerning the powers granted to the French generals. You know them all indifferently well, citizen minister. Which of them, even supposing him to possess sufficient influence over his army to make it march against the government—which of them, I ask, could attempt to do so, without being instantly overpowered by his colleagues in command? The generals scarcely know each other, rarely correspond together. Their number ought to inspire confidence as to the designs gratuitously attributed to one of them. Are we ignorant of the sway exercised over men by envy, ambition, hatred, I may add, I think, love of country and honour? Dismiss your fears, then, good republicans.

Some journalists have carried absurdity to the point of sending me into Italy to arrest a man whom I esteem, and of whom the government has the greatest reason to be proud. They may be assured that in the times in which we live, few general officers would undertake to discharge the duties of gendarmes, although many are disposed to combat factions and the factious.

Since my residence at Paris I have seen men of all opinions; I have been able to appreciate some at their just value. There are those who think that the government cannot go on without them: these bellow to get places. Others, although no one concerns himself about them, think that their destruction has been sworn: they bellow to render themselves interesting. I had seen emigrants, more Frenchmen than royalists, weep for joy at the recital of our victories; I have since seen Parisians cast doubts on their reality. It has appeared to me that an audacious party, but devoid of means, would subvert the actual government to substitute anarchy in lieu; that a second, more dangerous, more astute, having friends in all quarters, labours for the overthrow of the republic, to confer on France the hobbling constitution of 1791 and a thirty years' civil war; lastly, that a third, if it continues to despise the two others and wield over them the empire with which the laws invest it, will vanquish them, because it is composed of sincere, indefatigable, and honest republicans, whose means are talents and virtues—because it counts in the number of its partisans all the good citizens, and the armies, which have assuredly not conquered for the last five years to allow their country to be enslaved."

These two letters dissipated all sinister reports, and imposed silence on the malevolent.

In the midst of its glory, the government inspired pity by its indigence. The new paper-money had sustained its credit but a short period, and its fall deprived the Directory of an important resource. We remember that, on the 26th Ventôse (16th March), two thousand four hundred millions of mandats had been created, and hypothecated on a corresponding value in national domains. Part of those mandats had been devoted to the redemption of the twenty-four thousand millions of assignats remaining in circulation, and the remainder to meet growing exigencies. It was in some sort, as we have stated, a re-issue of the old paper, with a new title and a new figure. The twenty-four thousand millions of assignats were replaced by eight hundred millions of mandats; and, instead of issuing other forty-eight thousand millions of assignats, sixteen hundred millions of mandats were created. The difference was therefore in the name and the amount. There was a great distinction, also, in the hypothecation; for the assignats, from the effect of auctions, did not represent a determinate value of property; the mandats, on the contrary, being exchangeable against property on the simple offer of the valuation of 1790, did actually represent the sum of two thousand four hundred millions. This advantage, however, failed to prevent their depreciation, which was the result of different causes. France was altogether adverse to paper, and refused to put any faith in it. Now, however solid may be the guarantees, when no heed is given to them, they are as if they existed not. Moreover, the amount of the paper, although reduced, was not sufficiently so. Twenty-four thousand millions of assignats were converted into eight hundred millions of mandats, thereby reducing the old paper to the thirtieth part; whereas it ought to have been reduced to the two-hundredth part, in strict relation to the actual circumstances, for twenty-four thousand millions were worth at the utmost but one hundred and twenty millions. To reproduce them in the circulation to the extent of eight hundred millions, by changing them into mandats, was an error. It is true that an equivalent amount of property was allocated for them; but an estate which in 1790 was worth one hundred thousand francs, would now command but twenty-five or thirty thousand francs; consequently, the paper bearing this new title and figure, had it even exactly represented the domains, could be worth, like them, but the third of the value. Therefore, the endeavour to give it circulation at par, was again to uphold a fiction. Thus, even had it been possible to revive confidence in paper, the exaggerated supposition of its value must always have caused it to decline. Accordingly, although its circulation was forced by legislative provision, it was accepted for a very brief interval. The violent measures which had intimidated in 1793, were inoperative at the present time. All transactions were conducted on a metallic basis. The specie, which had been deemed buried or exported abroad, appeared abundantly in circulation. Such as had been concealed was again brought forth, such as had been carried out of France was re-imported. The southern provinces were filled with dollars, which came from Spain, drawn thither by the demand. Gold and silver flow, like all articles of merchandise, where a demand exists for them; only their price is higher, which is kept up until the supply be adequate and the want be satisfied. There were still certain frauds committed by liquidations in mandats, because the laws, giving a forced currency to the paper, permitted its employment in acquittances of bygone engagements; but few ventured to take advantage of the enactment, and all fresh bargains were universally made in specie. Nothing but gold or silver was seen in the markets; the wages of the labouring population were paid exclusively in coin. It might have been imagined that no paper-money existed in France. The mandats were found only in the hands of speculators, who received them from the government, and sold them to intending purchasers of national property.

In this manner, the financial crisis, although still subsisting for the state, had almost ceased for individuals. Commerce and industry, profiting by the first interval of repose, and the partial communications reopened with the continent in consequence of the victories of the republic, began to resume some activity. It is not necessary, as governments have the folly to allege, that production should be encouraged to become prosperous; all it requires is not to be cramped. It seizes the first moment to develop itself with wonderful activity. But if individuals recovered at this period a degree of competence, it was otherwise with the government, that is to say, with its heads, its agents of all kinds, military, administrative, or magisterial, and its creditors, who were reduced to the direst misery. The mandats given to them were useless in their hands; their only mode of turning them to account was to dispose of them to the speculators in paper, who took them at the rate of six for one hundred, and afterwards resold them to the purchasers of national domains. Thus the stockholders were perishing in absolute destitution; the functionaries of government threw up their situations; and, contrary to usage, instead of soliciting employments, men shunned or resigned them. The armies of Germany and Italy, living in the enemy's country, were excepted from the common misery; but the armies in the interior were in a deplorable state of distress. Hoche subsisted his soldiers solely by the provisions collected in the western provinces, and he was obliged to maintain the military system in those districts, that he might be enabled to levy contributions in kind. As to the officers and himself, they had not wherewithal to clothe themselves. The supply of magazines established in France for troops marching through it, had often failed, because the contractors would advance nothing more. The detachments sent from the coasts of the ocean to reinforce the army of Italy were stopped on the road. On some occasions even hospitals had been closed, and the unfortunate soldiers who occupied them expelled from the asylum the republic owed to their infirmities, because neither medicines nor aliment could be provided for them. The gendarmerie was entirely disorganised. Being neither clad nor equipped, it scarcely performed any duty. The gendarmes, wishing to save their horses, which were not replaced, no longer protected the routes; brigands, who abound at the close of civil wars, infested them. They scoured the country, and even penetrated into towns, committing murder and robbery with unparalleled audacity.

Such, then, was the internal state of France. The particular characteristic of this new crisis was the destitution of the government amidst a return of comparative affluence amongst individuals. The Directory drew its means of livelihood from the proceeds of paper alone, eked out by certain remittances sent it by the armies from abroad. General Bonaparte had already transmitted to it thirty millions, together with one hundred carriage-horses, to contribute somewhat to its pomp.

It was now proposed to demolish the whole fabric of paper-money. For that purpose all forced currency must be abrogated, and the taxes received only in real worth. It was accordingly declared, on the 28th Messidor (16th July), that every one might bargain as he pleased, and stipulate in money of his own choosing; that mandats should be receivable only at their current value; and that the rate of exchange should be daily ascertained and published by the treasury. The resolution was at length hazarded, also, that the taxes should be gathered in specie, or in mandats at the par of exchange; the only exception was with regard to the land-tax. Since the creation of mandats, it had been rendered leviable in paper and not in kind. Experience had shown it would have been better to have continued its receipt in kind, because, amidst all the depreciations of the paper, provisions would at least have been collected. It was decided, therefore, after prolonged discussions, and several projects successively rejected by the Ancients, that, in the frontier departments, or those adjoining the stations of armies, the collection might be exacted in kind; but that in the others it should be taken in mandats on a corn standard. Thus, wheat was valued at ten francs the quintal in 1790; it was now valued at eighty francs in man-dats. Every ten francs of assessment, representing a quintal of wheat, was now to be paid by eighty francs in mandats. It would have been much more simple to exact the payment in specie or in mandats at the par of exchange; but this was too bold a measure. A return, therefore, was commenced to reality, but with hesitation.

The forced loan was not yet collected. The government no longer possessed that despotic energy which might have ensured the prompt execution of such a measure. There remained nearly three hundred millions to receive. It was decreed that, in payment of the loan and of taxes, mandats should be accepted at par and assignats at the rate of one for a hundred, but merely during fifteen days, after which period the paper was to be receivable only at the course of exchange. This was an inducement to encourage the discharge of arrears.

The downfall of mandats being declared, it was no longer possible to receive them in full payment for the national domains specifically allocated in their behalf; and the bankruptcy which had been predicated with respect to them, as previously to assignats, became inevitable. It had been announced, in fact, that, the mandats issued for two thousand four hundred millions having fallen far below that value, and being worth no more than two or three hundred millions, the state would not continue to give the promised amount of property, that is to say, two thousand four hundred millions' worth of land. The contrary had been maintained for a while, in the hope that mandats would retain a certain value; but one hundred francs falling to five or six, the state could no longer give a property, say worth one hundred francs in 1790 and thirty or forty at the present time, for five or six francs. This was the species of bankruptcy the assignats had undergone, the nature of which we have previously explained. The state did then what a sinking-fund does now, which redeems at the price of the day, and which, in case of an extraordinary decline, might happen to redeem at fifty what had been issued at eighty or ninety. Accordingly, it was enacted, on the 8th Thermidor (26th July), that the fourth instalment for the national domains, subscribed for since the law of the 26th Ventôse (that creating the mandats), should be liquidated in mandats at the course of exchange, and in six equal payments. As applications had been made for eight hundred millions' worth of domains, this fourth amounted to two hundred millions.

The paper-money, therefore, was progressing to extinction. It may be asked, why this second issue of mandats was adventured—a new paper so short-lived and unsuccessful. In general, measures of this kind are judged too independently of the circumstances that have commanded them. The apprehension of a total deficiency of specie had doubtless contributed to induce the creation of mandats; and if there had been no other reason, it would have been a very foolish measure, as specie cannot fail altogether in such a country as France; but the principal cause was the imperious necessity of living by the domains and of anticipating their sale. It was indispensably requisite to put their value in circulation before realising it, and for that purpose to emit it in the form of a paper-money. Certainly the resource had not proved considerable, as the mandats had declined so rapidly; but still the state had existed for other four or five months. And was that nothing? The mandats must be considered as a new discount of the value of the national domains—as an expedient pending the actual sale of those domains. We shall see the government pass through many paroxysms of distress ere the moment arrived when that sale could be effectuated in the precious metals.

The treasury was not destitute of resources immediately exigible; but it was with those resources as with the national domains—the difficulty was to render them available. It had yet to receive three hundred millions of the forced loan; three hundred millions for the land-tax of the current year, that is to say, the whole amount of that impost; twenty-five millions of miscellaneous taxes; all the rents of the national domains, and the arrears of those rents, amounting in all to sixty millions; different military contributions; the produce of the moveables of emigrants; divers arrears; eighty millions of paper on foreign countries. All these items, added to the two hundred millions from the last instalment of the price of sold domains, amounted to eleven hundred millions, an enormous sum, but difficult to realise. The treasury only required, to complete its year, that is say, to manage until the 1st of Vendémiaire, four hundred millions; if it could forthwith realise them out of the eleven hundred millions due, its exigencies would be met. For the following year, it had the ordinary contributions, which were all expected to be paid in specie, and which, amounting to five hundred and some odd millions, would cover what was called the ordinary expenditure. For the expenses of the war, in case of a fresh campaign, it had the residue of the eleven hundred millions, of which it was to absorb this year but four hundred millions, and it had, moreover, all further sales of national domains. But the difficulty still consisted in grasping these sums. The disposable funds must come from the products of the year; yet it was almost impracticable to gather all simultaneously from the forced loan, the land and assessed taxes, and the sale of domains. Meanwhile, increased exertions were to be used in collecting the various contributions, and the Directory was invested with the extraordinary power of pledging the Belgian property for one hundred millions in specie. The rescriptions, a species of exchequer bills designed to forestall the receipts of the year, had partaken the fate of all the paper. Being unable to make use of that expedient, the minister paid contractors in ordinances of liquidation, which were to be made good out of the first receipts.

Such were the distresses of this government, so glorious in its outward aspect. The two parties, meanwhile, had never ceased from agitating in the interior. The submission of La Vendée had greatly reduced the hopes of the royalist faction; but the agents at Paris were only the more convinced of the excellence of their old plan, which consisted in refraining from the employment of civil war, and in corrupting opinions and gradually gaining possession of the councils and other authorities. They laboured through their journals to attain these objects. As to the patriots, they had reached the highest pitch of indignation. They had facilitated the flight of Drouet, who had contrived to escape from prison; and they meditated fresh plots, notwithstanding the recent discovery of that formed by Babœuf. Sundry old conventionalists and Thermidorians, heretofore warm partisans of the government they had themselves constituted on the morrow of the 13th Vendémiaire, began to be discontented. By an existing law, ex-conventionalists and all superseded functionaries were enjoined to quit Paris. The police, through inadvertence, sent mandates of withdrawal to four conventionalists, members of the legislative body. These mandates were denounced with acrimony in the Council of Five Hundred. Tallien, who, since the discovery of Babœuf's conspiracy, had strongly declared his adhesion to the system of the government, inveighed with vehemence against the police of the Directory, and against the suspicions with which the patriots were regarded and harassed. His habitual adversary, Thibaudeau, replied to him, and after an animated discussion, mingled with much recrimination, the feeling of resentment was left only rankling the more bitterly. The minister Cochon, his agents and spies, were in an especial degree the objects of detestation on the part of the patriots, who had been the first to experience the effect of their surveillance. The course of the government was meanwhile distinctly traced; if it had unequivocally declared against the royalists, it had also totally separated from the patriots, that is to say, from that portion of the revolutionary party which desired to revert to a more democratic republic, and which deemed the existing system too mild towards aristocrats. But, setting aside the state of the finances this position of the Directory, holding aloof from all parties and curbing them with a vigorous hand, whilst deriving support from victorious armies, was upon the whole cheering and auspicious.

The patriots had already made two attempts and suffered two discomfitures since the installation of the Directory. They had essayed to recompose the Jacobin Club at the Pantheon, and had found themselves excluded from that edifice by the government. They had afterwards concocted a mysterious plot under the direction of Babœuf; they had been discovered by the police and deprived of their new leaders. They still pursued their projects, nevertheless, and proposed to hazard a last enterprise. The opposition in the two councils, by again assailing the law of the 3d Brumaire, aroused in them a redoubled inveteracy of rage, and impelled them to a final explosion. They strove to corrupt the legion of police. That legion had been dissolved, and converted into a regiment forming the 21st dragoons. This regiment they now tampered with, hoping that, if they gained it, they would draw after it the entire army of the interior, encamped in the plain of Grenelle. They purposed at the same time to excite a movement in Paris, by discharging muskets and throwing white cockades into the streets, raising shouts of The king for ever! and thus leading to the supposition that the royalists were arming and preparing to subvert the republic. Their intention was to take advantage of this pretext, fly to arms, seize upon the government, and induce the camp of Grenelle to declare in their favour.

On the 12th Fructidor (29th August), they executed a part of their scheme, firing petards and scattering white cockades in the streets. But the police, being forewarned, had taken such precautions that they were unable to incite any movement. They were not discouraged, however; and a few days afterwards, on the 22d (9th September), they determined to accomplish their design. Thirty of the principal patriots met at Gros-Caillou, and resolved to form a muster that very night in the quarter of Vaugirard. This quarter, adjacent to the camp of Grenelle, was full of gardens and intersected by stone walls; it presented ramparts behind which they might gather and resist, in case they were attacked. In the evening, accordingly, they assembled to the number of seven or eight hundred, armed with muskets, pistols, sabres, and sword-sticks. This party comprised all the most determined characters in the patriot faction. There were amongst them a few superseded officers, who appeared at the head of the assemblage in their uniforms, and wearing epaulettes. Certain ex-conventionalists in the costume of representatives also formed part of the group; and even Drouet, it is alleged, who had remained since his escape concealed in Paris, was present. An officer of the Directorial guard, at the head of ten horsemen, was patrolling through Paris, when he received intelligence of the muster organised at Vaugirard. He hastened thither at the head of this feeble detachment; but, on his arrival, he was saluted with a volley of musketry and assaulted by two hundred armed men, whereupon he retreated at full gallop. He immediately proceeded to place under arms the Directorial guard, and dispatched an officer to the camp of Grenelle to give the alarm. The patriots lost no time after this flagrant outrage, but repaired in all haste to the plain of Grenelle, counting several hundreds. They advanced towards the quarter of the 21st dragoons, late the legion of police, and sought to gain the regiment by assurances that they had come to fraternise with it. Colonel Malo, who commanded this corps, rushed from his tent, half-clad, sprang on horseback, gathered around him some officers and all the dragoons he encountered, and charged sword in hand upon those who thus proposed to fraternise with his men. This example decided the soldiers: they hurried to their horses, fell upon the crowd, and quickly dispersed it. They slew or wounded a great number of the insurgents, and apprehended one hundred and thirty-two. The noise of the combat aroused the whole camp, which was placed under arms, and spread alarm through Paris. But confidence was speedily restored, on the result and folly of the enterprise being made known. The Directory caused the prisoners to be immured, and demanded from the two councils authority to institute domiciliary visits, for the purpose of seizing, in particular quarters, divers seditious persons whom their wounds prevented from leaving Paris. Having taken part in an armed assemblage, they were amenable to military judicatories, and were consigned to a commission, which promptly commenced by condemning certain of the number to be shot. The organisation of the High National Court was not yet completed; its installation was now accelerated, in order to open the proceedings against Babœuf.

This rash and ill-concerted outbreak was regarded in its true light, namely, as one of those reckless proceedings which characterise an expiring party. The enemies of the revolution alone affected to consider it of importance, that they might found thereon a pretence for renewed clamours repecting terror, and for disseminating alarming rumours. Little apprehension was felt by the community in general; and this abortive enterprise proved, more than all the other successes of the Directory, that its establishment was definitive, and that the factions must renounce all hope of subverting it.

Such were the circumstances presently illustrating the interior of France.

Whilst beyond its confines fresh collisions were about to ensue, important negotiations were proceeding in Europe. The French republic was at peace with several powers, but in alliance with none. The malignants who had asserted it would never be recognised, now boasted it would ever remain without allies. To repel these malevolent insinuations, the Directory sought to renew the Family-Compact with Spain, and projected a quadruple alliance between France, Spain, Venice, and the Ottoman Porte. Such an alliance, composed of the powers of the south in opposition to that existing amongst the powers of the north, would command the Mediterranean and the east, give disquietude to Russia, menace the rear of Austria, and raise up a new maritime enemy to England. Furthermore, it would be productive of great advantages to the army of Italy, by ensuring it the support of the Venetian galleys and of thirty thousand Slavonian soldiers.

Spain was the easiest to decide amongst the powers. She had grievances against England dating from the commencement of the war. The principal were the conduct of the English at Toulon, and the secrecy observed towards the Spanish admiral at the period of the expedition to Corsica. She had still greater causes of complaint since the peace with France; the English had insulted her flag, stopped munitions destined for her ports, violated her territory, captured posts menacing to her possessions in America, outraged the customs-regulations of her colonies, and openly endeavoured to excite them to revolt. These grounds of dissatisfaction, combined with the brilliant offers of the Directory, which led her to anticipate possessions in Italy, and with the victories of the French armies, which warranted a reliance on the accomplishment of such offers, induced Spain to sign, on the 2d Fructidor (19th August), a treaty of alliance offensive and defensive with France, on the bases of the Family-Compact. By the terms of this treaty, the two powers mutually guaranteed all their respective possessions in Europe and in the Indies; they promised a reciprocal aid of eighteen thousand infantry and six thousand cavalry, of fifteen first-rates, fifteen seventy-fours, six frigates, and four corvettes. These succours were to be furnished on the requisition of either of the two powers unhappily involved in war.

Instructions were forwarded to the French ambassadors at Constantinople and Venice, to impress upon the Sublime Porte and the republic the advantages necessarily accruing to them from a concurrence in the proposed alliance.

The French republic, therefore, was no longer isolated, and it had provided England with a new naval foe. Indications were positive that the declaration of war by Spain against England would speedily follow the treaty of alliance with France.

The Directory was preparing at the same time embarrassments of a different nature for Pitt. Hoche was at the head of a hundred thousand men, distributed along the coasts of the ocean. La Vendée and Brittany being subjugated, he ardently desired to employ these forces in a manner worthy of his talents, and to add fresh laurels to those he had won at Weissembourg and Landau. He suggested to the government a scheme he had long revolved—namely, an expedition into Ireland. Now, he urged, that civil war had been repelled from the coasts of France, it was fitting to visit that pestilence on the shores of England, and requite her, by arousing the Catholics of Ireland, for the evils she had inflicted on France by abetting the Poitevins and Bretons. The moment was favourable: the Irish were more than usually irritated by the oppression of the English government; the whole population of the British Islands was suffering dreadfully from the war, and, an invasion occurring to fill the measure of calamity, it might be driven to the verge of desperation. The finances of Pitt, too, were in a tottering state. Thus, such an enterprise, directed by Hoche, might lead to momentous consequences. The project was heartily approved. The minister of marine, Trugnet, an excellent republican and able minister, promoted it with all his energies. He collected a squadron in the harbour of Brest, and used every exertion compatible with the state of the finances to equip it efficiently. Hoche mustered all the best troops in his army, and drew them near Brest in readiness to embark. Care was taken to spread various reports as to their destination: now an expedition to Saint-Domingo, now a descent at Lisbon, to drive the English out of Portugal, in concert with Spain, was alleged to be in contemplation.

England, suspecting the object of these preparations, was in serious alarm. The treaty of offensive and defensive alliance between Spain and France foreboded her new dangers, whilst the defeats of Austria inspired the dread of losing her last and powerful ally. Her finances, moreover, were in a gloomy condition: the bank had contracted its discounts; capital began to fail; and the loan opened for the emperor had been closed, in order that additional funds might not be extracted from the circulation. The Italian ports were shut against English vessels; the Spanish were on the eve of being so; those of the ocean, as far as the Texel, were already barred. Thus the commerce of Great Britain was materially crippled. To all these sinister circumstances were superadded the disorders attendant upon a general election; for the parliament, verging upon its seventh year, had been dissolved. The elections were conducted amidst clamorous maledictions against Pitt and the war.

The empire had almost wholly abandoned the cause of the coalition. The dutchies of Baden and Wurtemburg had recently signed a definitive peace, permitting to the belligerent armies the right of passage over their dominions. Austria was in great trepidation, on beholding two French armies upon the Danube, and a third upon the Adige, apparently blocking ingress into Italy. She had dispatched Wurmser with 30,000 men, to marshal several reserves in the Tyrol, to rally and reorganise the wrecks of Beaulieu's army, and to descend into Lombardy with 60,000 men. On that side she deemed herself less in danger, and felt but little solicitude; whereas she was greatly alarmed for the Danube, and fixed on it her most anxious attention. To prevent untoward rumours, the Aulic Council had prohibited at Vienna all allusion to political events; it had organised a levy of volunteers, and laboured with indefatigable industry to equip and arm fresh troops. Catherine, who always promised and never fulfilled, rendered a solitary service she guaranteed the Gallicias to Austria, which permitted the latter to withdraw the troops stationed in those provinces, and march them towards the Alps and the Danube.

Thus France intimidated her enemies in all quarters, and the result of the coming shock along the Danube and the Adige was impatiently awaited by expectant mortals. On the immense line stretching from Bohemia to the Adriatic, three armies arrayed against other three were about to engage in deadly conflict, and the fate of Europe hung upon the issue.

In Italy, negotiations had been actively prosecuted pending the resumption of hostilities. Peace had been concluded with Piedmont, a treaty having succeeded the original armistice. This treaty stipulated the definitive cession of the dutchy of Savoy and the county of Nice to France; the destruction of the forts of Susa and Brunette, situated at the gorge of the Alps; the occupation during the war of the fortresses of Coni, Tortona, and Alessandria; a free passage for the French troops through the territories of Piedmont, and the purveyance of what was necessary for those troops during the transit. The Directory, at the instigation of Bonaparte, would have contracted, moreover, an offensive and defensive alliance with the King of Sardinia, in order to procure an auxiliary force of 10,000 or 15,000 men from his army. But that potentate, in return, demanded Lombardy, of which France could not yet dispose, and which indeed she still purposed to use as an equivalent for the Low Countries. This concession being accordingly refused, the king declined to accede to an alliance.

The Directory had not yet brought the negotiation with Genoa to a termination; the subjects of dispute continued to be the recall of the exiled families, the expulsion of the families feudatories of Austria and Naples, and the indemnity for the frigate La Modeste.

With Tuscany, the relations were amicable; nevertheless, the measures that had been employed towards the Leghorn merchants, to wring forth revelations of merchandise belonging to the enemies of France, had created a feeling of dissatisfaction. Rome and Naples had sent envoys to Paris, conformably to the terms of the armistice; but the negotiations for peace proceeded languidly. It was evident the Italian diplomatists were awaiting the issue of events in the field, ere finally committing themselves to conditions. The populations of Bologna and Ferrara were still animated with their pristine enthusiasm for the liberty they had provisionally acquired. The regency of Modena and the Duke of Parma were quiescent. Lombardy was absorbed in intense anxiety for the result of the campaign. The French had addressed repeated applications to the senate of Venice, for the purpose of inducing it to concur in the project of a quadruple alliance, and thereby securing a useful auxiliary for the army of Italy. Besides these direct overtures, their ambassadors at Constantinople and Madrid had indirectly, through the Venetian legations at those cities, enforced the advantages to accrue from the proposed alliance; but all such representations had proved ineffectual. Venice detested the French, now that she saw them planted on her territory and their principles becoming diffused amongst her population. She no longer adhered to an unarmed neutrality; on the con-

R. ff   L I   S. Freeman sc.

The People at the Convention
20th May 179

A. Fullarton & Co. London & Edinburgh

trary, she was arming with activity. She had given orders to the commandants of the isles to send the disposable galleys and troops into the canals, and she had called sundry Slavonian regiments from Illyria. The podestat of Bergamo was engaged in secretly arming the brave and superstitious peasants of the Bergamasco. Funds were collected by the twofold expedient of contributions and voluntary gifts.

Bonaparte held that, for the present, the policy of the French was to temporise on all sides, to spin out negotiations, to conclude nothing definitively, and to affect ignorance of all hostile manifestations, until fresh military events had decided either their expulsion from or their establishment in Italy. He deemed it advisable to adjourn the questions they had to settle with Genoa, and to persuade her they were content with the concessions already granted, in order that she might be found friendly in the adverse predicament of a retreat. The Duke of Tuscany, also, ought not to be irritated by the conduct of the French agents at Leghorn. Bonaparte assuredly did not esteem it fitting to leave a brother of the emperor in that dutchy, but he was desirous that he should not be alarmed too prematurely. The commissioners of the Directory, Garreau and Salicetti, having issued an ordinance banishing the French emigrants from the environs of Leghorn, Bonaparte addressed to them a letter, wherein, without much regard for their quality, he severely reprimanded them for having exceeded their powers and vexed the Duke of Tuscany by presuming to arrogate a sovereign authority within his dominions. With regard to Venice he was equally disposed to observe the status quo. Only, he complained loudly of certain assassinations committed on the roads, and of the preparations he saw making around him. His object in harbouring grounds of quarrel was that he might continue to draw supplies of provisions and have an excuse for mulcting the republic in a penalty of several millions, if he triumphed over the Austrians. "If I conquer," he wrote, "a simple estafette will suffice to rid me of all the difficulties rearing against me."

The citadel of Milan had fallen into his power. The garrison had surrendered as prisoners of war; the whole artillery had been transported to Mantua, where he had collected a considerable train. He would have willingly finished the siege of that city before the new Austrian army came up to relieve it; but his hopes of succeeding in that design were slender. He employed in the blockade only so many troops as were indispensably necessary, on account of the fevers epidemic in the vicinage. Nevertheless, he pressed the place closely, and projected one of those surprises which, according to his own expression, depend upon a goose or a dog; but the fall of the waters in the lake prevented the passage of the boats destined to convey a body of disguised troops. Thenceforth he relinquished the idea for the time of rendering himself master of Mantua. The approach of Wurmser, moreover, summoned him to a scene of more imminent danger.

The army, which entered Italy with thirty and a few thousand men, had received but feeble reinforcements to retrieve its casualties. Nine thousand men had reached it from the Alps. The divisions drawn from the army under Hoche had been unable to traverse France. Owing to that reinforcement of 9000 men and to the invalids who had emerged from the depôts in Provence and Var, the army had replaced its losses, and even gained strength. It counted nearly 45,000 men, spread along the Adige and around Mantua, at the moment when Bonaparte returned from his march into the peninsula. The complaints which attacked the soldiers before Mantua reduced it again to 40,000 or 42,000 men. This was its force in the middle of Thermidor (end of July). Bonaparte had left mere depôts at Milan, Tortona, and Leghorn. Two armies, one of Piedmontese and one of Austrians, he had already scattered to the winds; now he had to confront a third more formidable than the preceding.

Wurmser marched at the head of 60,000 men: 30,000 were draughts from the Rhine, all excellent soldiers. The remainder was composed of Beaulieu's discomfited divisions, and battalions drawn from the interior of Austria. More than 10,000 men were immured in Mantua, without including the sick. Thus the entire army constituted a force exceeding 70,000 men. Bonaparte had nearly 10,000 around Mantua, and could oppose only about 30,000 to the 60,000 on the point of debouching from the Tyrol. With such an inequality of strength, it required infinite prowess in the soldiers, and a most fertile genius in the general, to restore the balance.

The line of the Adige, to which Bonaparte attached so much value, was to become the scene of the struggle. We have already detailed the reasons which induced him to prefer it before all others. The Adige had not the length of the Po, or of the rivers which, flowing into the Po, mingle their lines with it; it passed directly into the sea, after a course of moderate extent; it was not fordable, and could not be turned in the Tyrol, like the Brenta, the Piave, and the rivers more advanced towards the extremity of Upper Italy. This river has been the theatre of such great events, that we have felt bound to describe its course with some minuteness.

The waters of the Tyrol form two lines, that of the Mincio and that of the Adige, almost parallel, and each a barrier to the other. Part of those mountain streams compose in the mountains themselves a large and longitudinal lake, which is called the Lake of Garda; they afterwards issue from it at Peschiera and traverse the Mantuan plain, become the Mincio, form a new lake around Mantua, and finally proceed to join the Lower Po. The Adige, formed by the waters of the upper valleys of the Tyrol, flows beyond the preceding line; it descends through the mountains parallel with the Lake of Garda, emerges into the plain in the environs of Verona, then runs parallel with the Mincio, hollows out a broad and deep bed as far as Legnago, and, at a few leagues from that town, ceases to be confined, and is converted into impassable morasses, which intercept the entire space comprised between Legnago and the Adriatic. Three routes were at the option of the advancing Austrians: the first, crossing the Adige abreast of Roveredo, before the formation of the Lake of Garda, winded round that lake, and conducted to its rear at Salo, Gavardo, and Brescia. Two other routes, starting from Roveredo, followed the two banks of the Adige in its course parallel with the Lake of Garda. The one, skirting the right bank, proceeded between that river and the lake, passed through the mountains, and opened into the plain between the Mincio and the Adige. The other, following the left bank, conducted into the plain towards Verona, and thus fell on the front of the defensive line. The first of the three, that which crossed the Adige above the Lake of Garda, combined the advantages of turning both the two lines of the Mincio and the Adige, and of leading to the rear of the army guarding them. But it was not very practicable, being accessible only to light artillery, and therefore suitable for a diversion, but not for a main operation. The second, descending from the mountains between the lake and the Adige, passed the river at Rivalta or Dolce, points where it was weakly defended; but it meandered in the mountains through positions easily defended, such as those of La Corona and Rivoli. The third and last, winding beyond the river into the midst of the plain, debouched on its farther bank and fell on the best defended part of its course, from Verona to Legnago. Thus all the three routes presented peculiar obstacles. The first could be pursued by a detachment simply; the second, passing between the lake and river, encountered the positions of La Corona Rivoli; the third plunged on the Adige, which between Verona and Legnago, in a broad and deep channel, and is defended by two fortresses only eight leagues asunder.

Bonaparte had planted General Sauret with 3000 men at Salo, to guard the route conducting to the rear of the Lake of Garda. Massena, with 12,000, intercepted the route winding between the Lake of Garda and the Adige, and occupied the positions of La Corona and Rivoli. Despinois, with 5000, was in the environs of Verona; Augereau, with 8000, at Legnago; and Kilmaine, with 2000 horse and the light artillery, was in reserve, occupying a central position at Castel-Nuovo. It was here that Bonaparte had fixed his head-quarters, in order that he might be equidistant from Salo, Rivoli, and Verona. Attaching great value to Verona, which commanded three avenues over the Adige, and suspecting the intentions of Venice, he determined to drive out the Slavonian troops garrisoned within it. Pretending they were hostile to the French troops, under pretext of preventing collisions, he issued orders for their evacuation. The proveditore obeyed, and the French garrison alone remained in Verona.

Wurmser had pitched his head-quarters at Trent and Roveredo. He detached 20,000 men under Quasdanovich to take the route turning the Lake of Garda, and to debouch on Salo: 40,000 he kept under his own command, distributing them on the two routes skirting the Adige, one division being intended to attack La Corona and Rivoli, and the other to debouch on Verona. He thus expected to envelop the French army, which, being assailed concomitantly on the Adige and to the rear of the Lake of Garda, might be forced on its front and cut off from its line of retreat.

The renown of Wurmser had outstripped his arrival. Throughout all Italy his approach was the topic of speculation, and the party adverse to Italian independence exhibited an exulting gladness and hardihood. The Venetians were unable to restrain their satisfaction within the bounds of moderation. The Slavonian soldiers thronged the public places, and, stretching out their hands to the passers-by, demanded the price of the French blood they were about to shed. At Rome, the agents of France were insulted; the pope, emboldened by the prospect of a speedy deliverance, stopped the carriages conveying the first instalment of the contribution that had been imposed on him; he even sent back his legate to Ferrara and Bologna. The court of Naples, also, abandoned to the counsels of folly, spurned the conditions of the armistice, and marched troops to the frontiers of the papal dominions. A painful solicitude, on the contrary, prevailed in the cities devoted to France and liberty. Tidings from the Adige were awaited with impatience. The Italian imagination, so prone to magnify, had exaggerated the discrepancy of strength. Wurmser was reported to command two armies, the one of 60,000, the other of 80,000 men; and it was asked how such a handful of French could possibly resist so overpowering a mass. The famous proverb was in all mouths—"Italy is the grave of the French."

On the 11th Thermidor (29th July), the Austrians came in presence of the French posts, and surprised them all. The detachment sent to turn the Lake of Garda arrived at Salo and thence repulsed General Sauret. General Guyeux alone stood his ground with a few hundred men, and immured himself in an old building, whence he refused to move, although he had neither bread nor water, and but a scanty supply of munitions. On the two routes skirting the Adige, the Austrians advanced with equal success; they forced the important position of La Corona between the Adige and the Lake of Garda, and they surmounted the obstacles of the third route, and debouched into the plain before Verona. Bonaparte received tidings of these reverses at his head-quarters of Castel-Nuovo. Couriers arrived in quick succession; and in the course of the following day, 12th Thermidor (30th July), he learnt that the Austrians had pushed on from Salo to Brescia, and that his retreat on Milan was consequently barred; that the position of Rivoli was forced like that of La Corona; and that the Austrians were on the point of crossing the Adige. In this alarming situation, having lost his defensive line and his line of retreat, it was natural he should feel somewhat dismayed. It was his first visitation of misfortune. Either influenced by the enormity of the peril, or, having already resolved to adopt a daring course of action, he wished to share the responsibility with his generals, he summoned a council of war, and, for the first time, asked the opinion of his officers. All declared for a retreat. Without support in front, and one of the two routes into France being intercepted, none deemed it consistent with prudence to hold their ground. Augereau alone, whose conduct at this period was the most glorious of his life, strongly insisted upon an appeal to the fortune of arms. He was young and ardent; he had learnt in the faubourgs to speak the language of camps, and he declared that he had sturdy grenadiers who would not retire without fighting. Little capable of estimating the resources which the situation of the armies and the nature of the ground still afforded, he spoke only upon the impulse of courage, and tended by his martial ardour to animate the genius of Bonaparte. He, the latter, dismissed the generals without intimating his opinion; but his plan was fixed. Although the line of the Adige was forced, and that of the Mincio and the Lake of Garda was turned, the ground was such as still to offer many resources to a man of genius and resolution.

The Austrians, divided into two corps, were descending both banks of the Lake of Garda: their junction was to be effected at the termination of the lake, and, arrived there, they would have 60,000 men to overwhelm 30,000. But, by concentrating at the point of the lake, their junction might be prevented. By rapidly forming a main mass, the French might overpower the 20,000 who had turned the lake, and immediately afterwards return to the 40,000 who had defiled between the lake and the Adige. But, to occupy the extremity of the lake, it was necessary to call in all the troops from the Lower Adige and the Lower Mincio; Augereau must be withdrawn from Legnago and Serrurier from Mantua, for so extensive a line was no longer tenable. This involved a great sacrifice, for Mantua had been besieged during two months, a considerable battering train had been transported before it, the fortress was on the point of capitulating, and, by allowing it to be revictualled, the fruit of these vigorous efforts, an almost assured prey, escaped his grasp. Bonaparte, however, did not hesitate; between two important objects, he had the sagacity to seize the most important and sacrifice to it the other—a simple resolution in itself, but one which displays not alone the great captain but the great man. It is not in war merely, it occurs in politics and in all the situations of life, that men encounter two objects, and, aiming to compass both, fail in each. Bonaparte possessed that rare and decisive vigour which prompts at once the choice and the sacrifice. Had he persisted in guarding the whole course of the Mincio, from the extremity of the Lake of Garda to Mantua, he would have been pierced; by concentrating on Mantua to cover it, he would have had 70,000 men to cope with at the same time—60,000 in front and 10,000 in the rear. He sacrificed Mantua, and concentrated at the point of the Lake of Garda. Orders were forthwith dispatched to Augereau to quit Legnago, and to Serrurier to quit Mantua, for the purpose of concentrating their forces towards Valeggio and Peschiera upon the Upper Mincio. During the night of the 13th Thermidor (31st July), Serrurier burnt his artillery-frames, spiked his cannon, buried his projectiles, and threw his powder into the water, preparatory to his departure to rejoin the active army.

every moment of time, determined to march in the first place on the hostile corps the most advanced, and the most dangerous from the position it had taken up. This was the army o 20,000 men under Quasdanovich, which had debouched by Salo, Gavardo, and Brescia, on the rear of the Lake of Garda, and threatened the communication with Milan. On the very day that Serrurier abandoned Mantua, the 13th (31st July), Bonaparte retrograded with the intention of falling upon Quasdanovich, and repassed the Mincio, at Peschiera, with the greater part of his forces. Augereau recrossed it at Borghetto, by the bridge that had been the scene of so glorious an action at the period of the first conquest. The rearguards were left to watch the progress of the enemy, who had passed the Adige. Bonaparte ordered General Sauret to advance and extricate General Guyeux, who was shut up in an old building with 1700 men, without water or provisions, and who had heroically defended himself for two days. He resolved to march in person on Lonato, whither Quasdanovich had already pushed forward a division; and he directed Augereau to move on Brescia, in order to restore the communication with Milan. Sauret succeeded in disengaging General Guyeux, repelled the Austrians into the mountains, and took from them several hundred prisoners. Bonaparte, with the brigade of Allemagne, was not in time to attack the Austrians at Lonato; he was anticipated. But after a vigorous engagement, he repulsed the enemy, made his way into Lonato, and captured 600 prisoners. Augereau, meanwhile, marched on Brescia; he entered it the following day (1st August), without encountering opposition, delivered some prisoners taken by the Austrians, and forced the latter to recoil towards the mountains. Quasdanovich, who expected to have reached the rear of the French army and surprised it, was astonished to find imposing masses on all points, confronting him with such impetuosity. He had lost but few men either at Salo or Lonato; but he deemed it incumbent to halt and avoid engaging himself further, before learning what had become of Wurmser with the principal Austrian army. He accordingly paused.

Bonaparte stopped short, also, on his part. Time was precious in this direction; it behoved him not to push success beyond the strictly essential point. It was enough to have awed Quasdanovich; he was now to return and make head against Wurmser. He retrograded with the divisions of Massena and Augereau. On the 15th (2d August), he planted Massena's division at Ponte-San-Marco, and Augereau's at Monte-Chiaro. The rearguards he had left on the Mincio became by this evolution his advanced guards. His arrival was not too early, for the 40,000 men under Wurmser had crossed not only the Adige but the Mincio. The division under Bayalitsch, having masked Peschiera by a detachment, and passed the Mincio, was advancing on the road to Lonato. The division under Liptai had cleared the Mincio at Borghetto, and driven General Valette from Castiglione. Wurmser had proceeded, with two divisions of infantry and one of cavalry, to raise the blockade of Mantua. On beholding the French gun-carriages in ashes, their artillery spiked, and all the traces of an extreme precipitation, he discerned, not the calculation of genius, but the result of a panic; he was filled with joy, and entered in triumph the city he had come to deliver. This event occurred on the 15th Thermidor (2d August).

Bonaparte, returned to Ponte-San-Marco and Monte-Chiaro, allowed himself no interval of repose. His troops had been constantly in motion; he himself had never been off horseback; nevertheless, he determined to give battle on the following morning. He had before him Bayalitsch at Lonato and Liptai at Castiglione, presenting a front of 25,000 men. The object was to attack them before Wurmser returned from Mantua. Sauret had a second time abandoned Salo: Bonaparte again detached thither Guyeux, to retake the position and keep Quasdanovich in check. After these precautions on his left and rear, he resolved to march forward to Lonato with Massena, and to throw Augereau on the heights of Castiglione, forsaken the preceding day by General Valette. He deprived that general of his command before the whole army, in order to impress upon his lieutenants the duty of firmness. On the morrow, the 16th (3d August), all the French forces were in motion. Guyeux re-entered Salo, which rendered still more impracticable any communication between Quasdanovich and the main Austrian army. Bonaparte advanced on Lonato; but his vanguard was worsted, some pieces were captured, and General Pigeon remained a prisoner. Bayalitsch, flushed with this success, pushed forward with confidence, and extended his wings around the French division. He had two objects in executing this manœuvre—first, to surround Bonaparte, and, secondly, to extend his right so as to enter into communication with Quasdanovich, whose cannon he heard at Salo. Bonaparte, relieved from apprehensions touching his rear, allowed himself to be outflanked with imperturbable coolness; he threw some tirailleurs on his threatened wings, and then drawing up the eighteenth and thirty-second demi-brigades of infantry, he ranged them in close column, assigned a regiment of dragoons to support them, and charged impetuously on the centre of the enemy, who had weakened by expanding himself. He overthrew all opposition with this brave infantry, and pierced the Austrian line. The Imperialists, thus cut in two, lost their presence of mind; one part of this division under Bayalitsch fled in all haste towards the Mincio, but the other, which had stretched out to communicate with Quasdanovich, found itself driven towards Salo, where Guyeux was in force. Bonaparte caused it to be pursued with the utmost promptitude, in order to place it between two fires. Junot led the pursuit with a regiment of cavalry. He rushed forward at full speed, slew six troopers with his own hand, and fell covered with sabre wounds. The fugitive division, taken between the corps stationed at Salo and that following from Lonato, broke rank, fled in disorder, and left at every step hundreds of prisoners. Whilst the pursuit was thus proceeding, Bonaparte moved to the right, to Castiglione, where Augereau had been fighting since the morning with admirable intrepidity. His orders were to carry the heights on which Liptai's division had planted itself. After an obstinate conflict, several times renewed, he had eventually succeeded in his aim; and Bonaparte, on his arrival, found the enemy retiring on all points. Such was the battle known as that of Lonato, fought on the 16th Thermidor (3d August).

Its results were considerable. The French had captured twenty pieces of cannon, taken 3000 prisoners from the division cut off and thrown back on Salo, and pursued the scattered remnants into the mountains. They had made 1000 or 1500 prisoners at Castiglione; slain or wounded 3000 men; and effectually terrified Quasdanovich, who, finding the French army before him at Salo, and hearing it in the distance at Lonato, deemed it omnipresent. They had almost disorganised the divisions of Bayalitsch and Liptai, who recoiled on Wurmser. This general now arrived with 15,000 men, rallied around him the two worsted divisions, and commenced to deploy in the plains of Castiglione. Bonaparte, on the morning of the 17th (4th August), perceived him put himself in line to receive battle. He resolved to assail him once more, and engage in a final conflict to decide the fate of Italy. But, for that purpose, it was requisite he should concentrate at Castiglione all his disposable troops. He consequently deferred till the morrow this decisive battle. He started off at a gallop for Lonato, in order to accelerate in person the movement of his troops. He had in the last few days completely exhausted five horses. He trusted implicitly to none for the execution of his orders; he saw and verified all with his own eyes infused animation every where by his presence. It is thus a great mind communicates its impulse to a vast mass, and quickens it with its fire. He arrived at Lonato about noon. His orders were already in the course of execution; part of the troops was in march for Castiglione, and another portion had moved towards Salo and Gavardo. One thousand men at the utmost remained at Lonato. Scarcely had Bonaparte entered that place ere an Austrian herald presented himself with a summons to surrender. The general, greatly surprised, was at a loss to comprehend how by possibility he could be in presence of the Austrians. The enigma was however shortly explained. The division cut off at the battle of Lonato and driven back on Salo, had been partly captured; but a corps of about four thousand men had wandered all night in the mountains, and, perceiving Lonato almost abandoned, had conceived the design of penetrating into it, and thus opening a passage to the Mincio. Bonaparte possessed only a thousand men to oppose this corps, and above all, he had no time to spare for an engagement. He caused all the officers who were with him to mount on horseback, and then ordered the herald to be led forward and the bandage removed from his eyes. The German officer was seized with amazement on beholding so numerous a staff. "Unfortunate man," said Bonaparte, addressing him, "are you ignorant then that you are in the presence of the general-in-chief, and that he is here with all his army? Go, tell those who sent you that I give them but five minutes to surrender, or I will put them to the edge of the sword, as a just chastisement for the insult they have presumed to pass upon me." He immediately directed the artillery to be brought forward, threatening to open a cannonade upon the columns that were advancing. The herald returned to report what he had seen and heard, and the four thousand men laid down their arms before one thousand.* Bonaparte, saved by this opportune display of his presence of mind, distributed his orders for the coming struggle. He added fresh troops to those already detached on Salo. The division under Despinois was united with that under Sauret, and the two combined, profiting by the ascendancy of victory, were enjoined to attack Quasdanovich, and drive him definitively into the mountains. He recalled all the rest to Castiglione. He returned there during the night, and, without allowing himself an instant of repose, mounted another horse, and visited the field of battle to make his final dispositions. The ensuing day was to decide the destiny of Italy.

The plain of Castiglione was appointed as the scene of this memorable conflict. A series of heights, formed by the last ridges of the Alps, run from the Chiesa to the Mincio, by Lonato, Castiglione, and Solferino. At the foot of these heights extends the plain which was to serve as the field of battle. The two armies were drawn up in opposite array, perpendicularly to the line of heights, upon which both rested a wing. Bonaparte touched them with his left, Wurmser with his right. The former commanded 22,000 men at most; the latter 30,000. Wurmser had an additional advantage: his wing in the plain was covered by a redoubt placed on the detached eminence of Medolano. Thus he was supported on both flanks. To counterbalance the advantages of number and position, Bonaparte relied on the ascendancy of victory and on the dexterity of his evolutions. Wurmser would naturally tend to prolong his right, which rested on the line of heights, in order to open a communication towards Lonato and Salo. It was thus Bayalitsch had acted two days before, and the same course was imperative on Wurmser; for his main object was necessarily to effect a junction with his large detachment. Bonaparte resolved to encourage this movement, from which he hoped to derive important benefit. He had now at disposal the division under Serrurier, which, pursued by Wurmser since it had quitted Mantua, had been hitherto unable to enter into line. It was coming up by Guidizzola. Bonaparte ordered it to debouch towards Cauriana, on the rear of Wurmser. He awaited its fire to begin the battle.

By break of day the two armies entered on action. Wurmser, impatient to attack, moved his right along the heights; Bonaparte, to encourage this movement, drew back his left, which was formed by Massena's division; he kept his centre immoveable in the plain. Shortly he heard the fire of Serrurier. Thereupon, whilst he continued to draw back his left, and Wurmser to extend his right, he caused the redoubt of Medolano to be attacked. He in the first place directed twenty pieces of light artillery upon that redoubt, and, after vigorously cannonading it, detached General Verdier, with three battalions of grenadiers, to storm it. That gallant officer advanced, supported by a regiment of cavalry, and carried the redoubt. The left wing of the Austrians was then uncovered, at the very moment that Serrurier, arrived at Cauriana, spread alarm on their rear. Wurmser immediately threw a part of his second line to his left, thus deprived of support, and placed it in aid to make head against the French about to debouch from Medolano. He moved the residue of his second line to the rear, in order to cover Cauriana, and thus continue to oppose the progress of the enemy. But Bonaparte, seizing the moment with his accustomed promptitude, now ceased to refuse his left and centre; he instantly gave Massena and Augereau the signal they were impatiently awaiting. Massena with the left and Augereau with the centre fell upon the weakened line of the Austrians, and charged it with impetuosity. Attacked so abruptly on his whole front, menaced on his left and rear, the enemy began to yield ground. The ardour of the French redoubled. Wurmser, seeing his army compromised, gave the signal for retreat. His foe pursued, capturing sundry prisoners. To put him completely to rout, the French must have used redoubled celerity, and driven him in disorder on the Mincio. But, for the last six days, the troops had been fighting and marching without intermission, they were unable to advance, and slept on the field of battle. Wurmser lost this day but 2000 men; but he had not the less lost Italy.

On the following day, Augereau pushed on to the bridge of Borghetto and Massena to Peschiera. Augereau opened a cannonade, which was followed by the retreat of the Austrians; and Massena engaged in a rearguard action with the division which had masked Peschiera. The Mincio was abandoned by Wurmser; he retook the road to Rivoli, between the Adige and the Lake of Garda, in order to regain the Tyrol. Massena followed him to Rivoli and to La Corona, and resumed his former positions. Augereau presented himself before Verona. The Venetian proveditore, with the intention of affording the Austrians time to evacuate the city and save their baggage, demanded an interval of two hours before opening the gates: Bonaparte shivered them into fragments with cannon-balls. The Veronese, who were devoted to the cause of Austria, and had unequivocally expressed their sentiments at the moment of the French retreat, dreaded the wrath of the conqueror; but he caused the greatest forbearance to be observed towards them.

On the side of Salo and the Chiesa, Quasdanovich effected a difficult retreat behind the Lake of Garda. He ventured to halt and defend the defile of Rocca d'Anfo; but he was worsted, and lost 1200 men. Ere long the French had again taken up all their former positions.

* This fact has been called in question by an historian, M. Botta; but it is corroborated by all the accounts, and I have received an assurance of its authenticity from the quartermaster-general of the active army, M. Aubernon, who passed the four thousand prisoners in review.

This campaign had occupied six days. In that interval, thirty and a few thousand men had put sixty thousand to flight. Wurmser had lost twenty thousand men, of whom seven or eight thousand were killed and wounded, twelve or thirteen thousand taken prisoners. He was repulsed into the mountains, and rendered incapable of keeping the field. Thus had vanished that formidable host before a handful of heroes. Such extraordinary results, unparalleled in history, were due to the promptitude and vigour of resolution displayed by the young captain. Whilst two numerous armies covered both shores of the Lake of Garda, and the courage of all was shaken, he had contrived to reduce the campaign to a single contingency—the junction of those two armies at the extremity of the Lake of Garda; he had not hesitated to make a mortifying sacrifice, giving up the blockade of Mantua to concentrate his forces on the decisive point; and, falling irresistibly on each of the hostile masses in turn, at Salo, Lonato, and Castiglione, he had successively disorganised them, and repelled them into the mountains whence they had issued.

The Austrians were overcome with terror, the French were transported with admiration of their young general. Zeal and confidence in him animated every breast. A battalion felt competent to make three fly. The old soldiers, who had nominated him corporal at Lodi, saluted him as sergeant at Castiglione. Throughout Italy a profound sensation reigned. Milan, Bologna, Ferrara, the towns in the dutchy of Modena, and all the friends of liberty, were in ecstacies of joy. Grief pervaded convents and antiquated aristocracies. The governments which had been betrayed into indiscretions—Venice, Rome, Naples—were in trepidation.

Bonaparte, correctly appreciating his position, did not deem the contest terminated, albeit he had deprived Wurmser of 20,000 men. The veteran marshal had retreated into the Alps with 40,000. There he would repose, reanimate and recruit his forces, and it was to be presumed would again fall on Italy. Bonaparte had lost several thousand men, prisoners, killed, or wounded; he had a great number in hospital: he judged it expedient still to temporise, to keep his eyes on the Tyrol, his feet on the Adige, and to content himself with overawing the Italian powers, until he enjoyed the opportunity of chastising them. Thus he merely intimated to the Venetians that he was aware of their preparations, and continued to supply his army at their expense, postponing the negotiations for an alliance. He had learnt the arrival at Ferrara of a legate from the pope, commissioned to resume possession of the legations; him he summoned to his head-quarters. This legate, by name Cardinal Mattei, fell at his feet, ejaculating, "Peccavi." Bonaparte placed him under arrest in a seminary. He wrote to M. d'Azara, who was his intermediary with the courts of Rome and Naples, complaining of the imbecility and bad faith of the papal government, and announcing his purpose of speedily returning to the south, should circumstances constrain him. As to the court of Naples, he held yet more menacing language. "The English," he said to M. d'Azara, "have persuaded the King of Naples that he is somebody; I will prove to him that he is nobody. If he persist, despite the armistice, in collecting troops, I bind myself, in presence of Europe, to march against his pretended seventy thousand men with six thousand grenadiers, four thousand horse, and fifty pieces of cannon."

He addressed a conciliatory but firm note to the Grand-Duke of Tuscany, who had allowed the English to take possession of Porto-Ferrajo, and apprised him that France would be justified in punishing him for such negligence by occupying his territories, but that, in consideration of ancient amity, she would refrain from enforcing the right. He changed the garrison of Leghorn, in order to intimidate the Tuscans by a movement of troops. He was silent with Genoa. He dispatched an energetic remonstrance to the King of Sardinia, who tolerated the Barbets in his dominions, and detached a roving military commission to seize and shoot the Barbets found on the roads. The population of Milan had evinced the most friendly dispositions towards the French. He forwarded a letter to that city, couched in delicate and noble terms, expressive of his gratitude. His late victories inspiring stronger hopes of retaining Italy, he considered he might commit himself more frankly with the Lombards; he granted them arms, and permission to levy a legion at their own charge, the ranks whereof were eagerly filled up by the Italians favourable to liberty, and by the Poles wandering through Europe since the last partition. Bonaparte testified his satisfaction to the populations of Bologna and Ferrara. The people of Modena craved to be delivered from the regency established by the duke. Bonaparte had already certain motives for breaking the armistice, inasmuch as the regency had caused provisions to be conveyed to the garrison of Mantua; but he determined to wait yet a while. He solicited succours from the Directory to repair his losses, and consolidated himself at the portals of the Tyrol, ready to fall on Wurmser and destroy the remnant of his army the moment he learnt that Moreau had crossed the Danube.

Whilst these great events were passing in Italy, others of almost equal moment were progressing in Germany. Moreau had gradually driven back the archduke, and arrived about the middle of Thermidor (early part of August) on the Danube. Jourdan had reached the Naab, which falls into that river. The chain of the Alb, which separates the Neckar from the Danube, is composed of mountains of moderate elevation, terminating in table-lands, and traversed by defiles narrow as the fissures of rocks. It was by these defiles Moreau had debouched on the Danube, into a broken country, intercepted by ravines and covered with wood. The archduke, who cherished the design of concentrating himself on the Danube, and retrieving his strength on that powerful barrier, suddenly formed a resolution which placed in needless jeopardy his sagacious plan. He learnt that Wartensleben, instead of falling back on him, as near to Donawerth as possible, was recoiling on Bohemia, with the preposterous intention of covering it; and he became apprehensive lest the army of the Sambre-and-Meuse, taking advantage of this false movement, which uncovered the Danube, should attempt to effect its passage. He resolved, therefore, to pass it himself, defile rapidly on the other bank, and confront Jourdan. But the river was lined with his magazines, and time was required for emptying them; moreover, he was unwilling to execute the passage under the eyes of Moreau, and liable to his assaults; wherefore he conceived the project of removing him from his vicinity, by giving him battle with the Danube at his back—a faulty conception, for which he afterwards severely blamed himself, since it exposed him to the risk of being forced into the river, or at least of not making good his arrival on it entire, a condition indispensable for the success of his ulterior designs.

On the 24th Thermidor (11th August), he halted before the positions of Moreau, intending to make a general attack upon him. Moreau was at Neresheim, occupying the positions of Dunstelkingen and Dischingen by his right and centre, and that of Nordlingen by his left. The archduke, wishing in the first place to remove him from the Danube, next to cut him off, if possible, from the mountains through which he had debouched, and lastly, to prevent him communicating with Jourdan, attacked him, in order to achieve all his aims, on all points simultaneously. He succeeded in turning Moreau's right, by dispersing his flanking corps; he advanced even to Heidenheim, almost on his rear, and occasioned so much alarm that all the ammunition magazines were hastily carried back. In the centre, he essayed a vigorous attack, but it was not sufficiently decisive. On the left, towards Nordlingen, he made threatening demonstrations. Moreau was not intimidated either by the demonstrations made on his left or by the excursion beyond his right; and, judging with reason that the essential point was in the centre, he acted in opposition to the tactics deemed sacred by ordinary generals, always in extreme terror when their enemy threatens to outflank them: he weakened his wings to the profit of the centre. His precaution and foresight were justified by the event. The archduke, redoubling his efforts on the centre, towards Dunstelkingen, was repulsed with loss. Both armies reposed on the field of battle.

Moreau found himself the following day in a disagreeable predicament, by the retrograde movement of his magazines, which left him without munitions. However, he determined to put a bold front on the matter, and manifest an intention to attack. But the archduke, anxious to repass the Danube, felt no inclination to renew the combat: he continued his retreat, with infinite firmness, on the river, crossed it without being incommoded by Moreau, and broke down the bridges as far as Donawerth. He now received intelligence of what had passed between the two armies which had operated by the Maine. Wartensleben had not thrown himself into Bohemia as he feared; he had rested on the Naab in presence of Jourdan. The young Austrian prince thereupon formed a very admirable resolution, the consequence, in some measure, of his long retreat, and well calculated to decide the campaign. His object in falling back on the Danube had been to concentrate himself on that river, in order that he might be enabled to act against one or other of the two French armies with a superior mass of troops. The battle of Neresheim might have compromised this plan, if, instead of being indecisive, it had proved altogether adverse. But, having retired unbroken on the Danube, he might now profit by the separation of the French armies, and fall upon one of the two. Accordingly, he resolved to leave General Latour with 36,000 men to occupy Moreau, and to move in person with 25,000 towards Wartensleben, in order to overwhelm Jourdan by their junction. Jourdan's army was the weakest of the two French armies. At an equally great distance from its base, it scarcely counted upwards of 45,000 men. It was obvious it could offer no effectual resistance, and might even be exposed to great disasters. Jourdan beaten and driven back on the Rhine; Moreau, on his part, unable to remain in Bavaria; and the archduke possibly enabled to advance on the Neckar and intercept him in his line of retreat—such the conception, which has been esteemed by far the brightest amongst those distinguishing the Austrian generals during these long wars: like the combinations illustrating the genius of Bonaparte in Italy at the time, the idea originated with a very young man.

The archduke left Ingolstadt on the 29th Thermidor (16th August), five days after the battle of Neresheim. Jourdan, posted on the Naab, between Naaburg and Schwandorf, was unprepared for the storm about to burst on his head. He had detached General Bernadotte to Neumarkt on his right, with the view of putting himself in communication with Moreau—an object impossible to accomplish, and for which a detached corps was uselessly jeopardised. The archduke, arriving from the Danube, necessarily encountered this detachment. General Bernadotte, attacked by superior forces, offered an honourable resistance, but was obliged to repass with rapidity the mountains through which the army had debouched from the valley of the Maine into that of the Danube. He retreated to Nuremberg. The archduke, after detaching a corps to pursue him, moved with the rest of his forces on Jourdan. The latter, warned of the arrival of a reinforcement, and apprised of the danger Bernadotte had incurred, and of his retreat to Nuremberg, likewise prepared to repass the mountains. At the moment he was getting under march, he was attacked by both the archduke and Wartensleben; he had an arduous combat to sustain at Amberg, and lost his direct route upon Nuremberg. Thrown with his parks, his cavalry, and his infantry, into cross-roads, he ran the greatest danger, and prosecuted, during a period of eight days, a most difficult retreat, reflecting equal credit on himself and his troops. He regained the Maine at Schweinfurt on the 12th Fructidor (29th August), and proposed to direct his march on Wurtzburg, there to halt, rally his corps, and once more try the fortune of arms.

Whilst the archduke was executing this brilliant movement against the army of the Sambre-and-Meuse, he afforded Moreau an opportunity of effecting a similar evolution, equally brilliant and decisive. An enemy never attempts a bold manœuvre without uncovering himself, and without opening many excellent chances to his antagonist. Moreau, having only 38,000 men before him, might have easily overwhelmed them by acting with moderate vigour and promptitude. He might have done more (in the opinion of Napoleon and the Archduke Charles): he might have attempted a movement promising results altogether transcendent. He ought himself to have followed the march of the enemy, wheeled upon the archduke, as that prince had wheeled upon Jourdan, and fallen suddenly upon his rear. The archduke, taken between Jourdan and Moreau, must have incurred incalculable hazards. But, for that purpose, he required to execute a very extended movement, promptly change his line of operation, and throw himself from the Neckar on the Maine; above all, he must have derogated from the instructions of the Directory, which enjoined him to diverge towards the Tyrol, in order to outflank the wings of the enemy and open a communication with the army of Italy. The youthful conqueror of Castiglione would not have hesitated to make this bold march, and to commit an act of disobedience calculated to decide the campaign in a victorious manner: but Moreau was incapable of such a determination. He remained several days on the banks of the Danube, ignorant of the archduke's departure, and slowly exploring a ground which was then but little known. Eventually apprised of the movement his enemy had just operated, he felt misgivings for the fate of Jourdan; but, not venturing to adopt an energetic determination, he resolved to clear the Danube and advance into Bavaria, in the hope of thereby drawing the archduke back, adhering at the same time to the plan of the Directory. He might have readily concluded, however, that the archduke would not quit Jourdan before he had driven him out of the field, and would not be diverted from the execution of a decisive project by an inroad into Bavaria. Moreau, nevertheless, crossed the Danube, in the wake of Latour, and approached the Lech. Latour evinced an intention of disputing the passage of the Lech; but, too extended to sustain himself on its banks, he was obliged to abandon it, after maintaining an unfortunate rencounter at Friedberg. Moreau subsequently moved on towards Munich: on the 15th Fructidor (1st September) he took up positions at Dachau, Pfaffenhofen, and Geisenfeld.

Thus fortune began to frown on the French in Germany, in consequence of that vicious plan which, by dividing their two armies, exposed them to the hazard of being separately defeated. Meanwhile, events of importance were occurring in Italy.

We have seen that Bonaparte, after having repulsed the Austrians into the Tyrol and resumed his former positions on the Adige, meditated fresh projects against Wurmser, whom he was not content to have weakened by 20,000 men; his army he desired utterly to destroy. This consummation was necessary for the fulfilment of the various designs he entertained. Wurmser annihilated, he might push onwards even to Trieste, ruin that sea-port so valuable to Austria, afterwards return upon the Adige, dictate terms to Venice, Rome, and Naples, whose malevolence was still manifest as ever, and, lastly, hoist the standard of liberty in Italy, by constituting Lombardy, the legations of Bologna and Ferrara, perhaps even the dutchy of Modena, into an independent republic. Revolving such projects, he determined to advance into the Tyrol, assured now of being seconded by the presence of Moreau on the other flank of the Alps.

Whilst the French troops employed a respite of three weeks in recovering from their fatigues, Wurmser was engaged in reorganising and reinforcing his army. Fresh detachments, draughted from Austria and the Tyrolean militia, enabled him to augment his army to nearly 50,000 men. The Aulic Council sent him another chief of the staff, Lauer, general of engineers, with new instructions as to the plan to be followed for carrying the line of the Adige. Wurmser was to leave 18,000 or 20,000 men under Davidovich to guard the Tyrol, and to descend with the residue, through the valley of the Brenta, into the plains of Vicenza and Padua. The Brenta takes its rise not far from Trent, diverges from the Adige in the form of a curve, again runs parallel with that river in the plain, and finally flows into the Adriatic. A causeway, starting from Trent, leads into the valley of the Brenta, and proceeds through Bassano into the plains of Vicenza and Padua. Wurmser was to traverse this valley, debouch into the plain, and attempt the passage of the Adige between Verona and Legnago. This plan was not more judiciously conceived than the preceding, since it again embodied the evil principle of dividing the forces into two corps, and placing Bonaparte in the midst.

Wurmser commenced operations simultaneously with Bonaparte. The latter, ignorant of Wurmser's designs, but foreseeing with rare sagacity that during his inroad into the depths of the Tyrol the enemy might possibly move to try the line of the Adige, left General Kilmaine at Verona with a reserve of nearly 3000 men, and with capabilities of resistance for at least two days. General Sahuguet remained with a division of 8000 men before Mantua. Bonaparte set off with 28,000, and ascended by the three routes of the Tyrol—by that which winds behind the Lake of Garda, and by the two which skirt the Adige. On the 17th Fructidor (3d September), Sauret's, now become Vaubois' division, after having fought several actions in its devious course behind the Lake of Garda, reached Torbole, the upper extremity of the lake. On the same day, the divisions under Massena and Augereau, who at first skirted the two banks of the Adige but had subsequently united on one by the bridge of Golo, arrived before Serravalle. Their vanguard became embroiled with the enemy, and took from him sundry prisoners.

The French had now to ascend a deep and narrow valley: on their left was the Adige, on their right lofty mountains. Frequently the river, sweeping to the foot of the mountains, left only the breadth of the road, and thus formed dismal defiles for an army to surmount: of such there were several to clear before penetrating into the Tyrol. But the French, bold and nimble, proved equally adapted for this kind of warfare as for that they had carried on in the spacious plains of Mantua.

Davidovich had stationed two divisions, the one at the camp of Mori, on the right bank of the Adige, to make head against Vaubois, advancing along the highway from Torbole to Roveredo, after leaving the Lake of Garda; the other at San-Marco, to guard the defile against Massena and Augereau. On the 18th Fructidor (4th September), the French descried the Austrian division posted under Wukassovich to defend the defile of San-Marco. Bonaparte, promptly adopting the tactics suitable to the locality, formed two corps of light infantry, and distributed them to the right and the left on the neighbouring heights, then, after harassing the Austrians a while, he drew up the eighteenth demi-brigade in close column by battalions, and ordered General Victor to force the pass at its head. A furious conflict ensued: the Austrians resisted with obstinacy, but Bonaparte decided the engagement by commanding General Dubois to charge at the head of the hussars. That brave officer rushed on the Austrian infantry, broke it, and fell pierced by three bullets. He was removed in the arms of death. "Before I die," he said to Bonaparte, "let me know if we are victorious." On all sides the Austrians fled and retreated to Roveredo, situated a league from San-Marco: they were pursued at racing speed. Roveredo is a short distance from the Adige; Bonaparte detached Rampon, with the thirty-second, towards the ground separating the river from the town; he urged Victor, with the eighteenth, on the town itself. The latter entered the principal street of Roveredo at full charge, swept the Austrians before him, and reached the further extremity of the town at the instant Rampon accomplished its outer circuit. Whilst the main army thus carried San-Marco and Roveredo, Vaubois arrived at Roveredo with his division by the other bank of the Adige. The Austrian division under Reuss had disputed with him the camp of Mori, but he had stormed it the same morning; and now all the French divisions were united towards the middle of the day abreast of Roveredo, on both banks of the Adige. But the most difficult part of the undertaking yet remained for achievement.

Davidovich had rallied his two divisions on his reserve in the defile of Calliano, a formidable pass, far more dangerous than that of Marco. At that point, the Adige, encroaching on the mountains, left between its channel and their base the mere breadth of the road. The gorge of the defile was closed by the castle of La Pietra, which connected the mountain with the river, and was crowned with artillery.

Bonaparte, pursuing the same course of tactics, distributed his light infantry to the right, on the acclivities of the mountain, and to the left on the bank of the river. His soldiers, born on the banks of the Rhone, the Seine, or the Loire, rivalled in agility and daring the famed hunters of the Alps. Some clambered from rock to rock, attained the summit of the mountain, and opened a fire overhead upon the enemy. Others, not less intrepid, crept along the river, gaining a footing wherever they could, and so turned the fort of La Pietra. General Dammartin planted happily a battery of light artillery, which told with great effect: the castle was won. Thereupon the infantry passed through it, and charged in close column upon the Austrian army amassed in the defile. Artillery, cavalry, and infantry, became all amalgamated inextricably, and fled in horrible disorder. Young Lemarois, aid-de-camp of the general-in-chief, undertook to stop the flight of the Austrians: he galloped forward at the head of fifty hussars, pressed along the side of the Austrian mass, and, turning quickly round, attempted to check the fugitive van. He was thrown from his horse, but he spread terror through the ranks of the Austrians, and gave time to the cavalry, which was rushing in pursuit, to secure several hundred prisoners. Here finished this series of engagements, which conferred on the French the defiles of the Tyrol, the town of Roveredo, the whole Austrian artillery, and four thousand prisoners, omitting from the calculation the dead and wounded. Bonaparte classed the events of this day under the title of the battle of Roveredo.*

* [An animated and succinct account of Bonaparte's progress into the Tyrol occurs in the Annual Register for 1796, rather an unfavourable record of his exploits in general:—

"As the republicans moved forward, they successively drove the Austrian outposts from Alla and Serravalle, and compelled them to retire, with the loss of three or four hundred men, to Marco and Mori. At six in the morning, the two latter posts

On the morrow, 19th Fructidor (5th September), the French entered Trent, the capital of the Italian Tyrol. The bishop had previously taken to flight. Bonaparte, with the view of tranquillising the Tyrolese, who were strongly attached to the house of Austria, addressed them in a proclamation, wherein he invited them to lay down their arms, and to refrain from committing hostilities against his army, upon which conditions he promised their property and public establishments should be respected. Wurmser was not found at Trent. Bonaparte had surprised him at the very moment he was commencing his march to put his plan into execution. Perceiving the French entangle themselves in the Tyrol, with the intention, perhaps, of communicating with Germany, Wurmser was only the more fortified in his resolution of descending by the Brenta, in order to force the Adige during their absence. He even hoped that, by a rapid circuit, which would lead him to Verona, he might shut up the French in the upper valley of the Adige, and thus at once envelop and cut them off from Mantua. He had set out two days earlier, and must have already reached Bassano: Bonaparte instantly formed a most daring resolution. He determined to leave Vaubois in charge of the Tyrol, and push on through the gorges of the Brenta in pursuit of Wurmser. He could take with him but 20,000 men, and Wurmser had 30,000; he might be cooped up in those fearful ravines, if Wurmser held him at bay; he might likewise arrive too late to fall on Wurmser's rear, and the Austrians might have had time to pass the Adige: all these contingencies were possible. But, on the other hand, his 20,000 were equivalent to the 30,000 of his adversary; if Wurmser attempted to make head, and to shut him up in the gorges, he would ride roughshod over his body; if he had twenty leagues to accomplish, he would do so in two days, and arrive in the plain as soon as Wurmser. Then he would drive him either on Trieste or on the Adige. If he drove him on Trieste, he would pursue him, and burn that port before his eyes; if he drove him on the Adige, he would enclose him between his army and that river, and thus envelop the enemy who vainly dreamt of ensnaring him in the gorges of the Tyrol.

This young soldier, whose conceptions were formed and acted upon with the rapidity of lightning, ordered Vaubois, the very day of his arrival at Trent, to march on the Lavisio, and wrest that position from Davidovich's rearguard. He superintended in person the execution of this enterprise, pointed out to Vaubois the positions he was to guard with his 10,000 men, and prepared to advance with the 20,000 remaining, and plunge into the ravines of the Brenta.

He started at dawn on the 20th (6th September), and slept that evening at Levico. The following morning he resumed his march, and arrived before another defile, known as the pass of Primolano, where Wurmser had posted a division. He employed the same manœuvres as before, throwing riflemen on the heights and on the bank of the Brenta, and then charging in column along the road. The defile was carried. A small fort stood beyond: it was surrounded and stormed. Some hardy soldiers, scouring the road, got in front of the fugitives, retarded their flight, and afforded the army time to come up and capture them. Three thousand prisoners were taken by the French, who arrived the same evening at Cismone, having travelled twenty leagues in two days. Bonaparte was eager to advance still further, but the soldiers were unable; he himself was overcome with fatigue. He had outstripped his staff, and found himself without retinue or provisions; he divided a piece of ration-bread with a soldier, and threw himself on the ground, impatiently awaiting the break of day.

This extraordinary and unexpected march appalled Wurmser. He had never imagined his enemy would adventure into such gorges, at the imminent hazard of being enveloped; he now proposed to take advantage of the position of Bassano, which closes them, and bar their outlet with his whole army. If he succeeded in keeping him at bay, Bonaparte would be cooped up in the curve of the Brenta. He had already detached the division under De Mezaros to try Verona, but he countermanded it in order to contend on this point with all his forces: it was not probable, however, the order would arrive in time. The town of Bassano is situated on the left bank of the Brenta, communicating with the right bank by a bridge. Wurmser planted the two divisions of Sebottendorf and Quasdanovich on the two banks of the Brenta, in advance of the town. He disposed six battalions as a vanguard in the defiles which precede Bassano and shut in the valley.

On the morning of the 22d (8th September), Bonaparte left Cismone and advanced on Bassano. Massena marched on the right bank, and Augereau on the left. The French carried the defiles and debouched in presence of the hostile army, drawn up on both banks of the Brenta. Wurmser's troops, disconcerted by the temerity of the French, failed to resist with the courage they had exhibited on so many occasions they faltered, broke, and retired into Bassano. Augereau pushed on to the entrance of the town. Massena, from the opposite bank, had to force a passage over the bridge; he carried it in close column, as had been the bridge of Lodi, and reached the town at the same time as Augereau. Wurmser, whose head-quarters were still at Bassano, had scarcely time to save himself, leaving in the hands of the French 4000 prisoners and immense military stores. Bonaparte's plan, therefore, was executed; he had debouched into the plain as soon as Wurmser, and it now only remained for him to envelop the Austrians by driving them on the Adige.

Wurmser, in the disorder of so precipitate a movement, found himself separated from the remains of the division under Quasdanovich. That division retired towards Friuli, whilst he, pressed by the divisions of Massena and Augereau, which closed against him the road to Friuli and repelled him on the Adige, formed the resolution of cutting his way across the Adige and throwing himself into Mantua. He had drawn to him the division under De Mezaros, which had been making fruitless efforts to carry Verona. His force did not exceed 14,000 men, of which 8000 were infantry and 6000 excellent cavalry. He skirted the Adige in quest of a point to effect a passage. Luckily for him, the post which guarded Legnago had been moved to Verona, and a detachment, sent to occupy that town, had not yet arrived. Wurmser, seizing this fortunate hazard, secured Legnago. Being now certain of regaining Mantua, he granted some repose to his troops, who were exhausted with fatigue.

Bonaparte followed him without respite. He was deeply chagrined on learning the omission which had saved Wurmser; however, he did not yet despair of forestalling him at Mantua. He threw Massena's division to the other bank of the Adige by the ferry of Ronco, and directed it on Sanguinetto, to bar the road were attacked by the French, and by noon the Austrians were not only expelled from them, but were pursued through Roveredo, as far as the defile of Calliano. Bonaparte did not pause for a moment. He ordered the division of Massena to advance immediately against this almost impregnable pass. The order was obeyed, the defile was carried, and the troops which defended it were thrown into utter confusion with astonishing rapidity. By nightfall the routed Austrian army was driven beyond Trent; having, in the course of the day, suffered, independently of the killed and wounded, a loss of five thousand men taken prisoners, twenty-five pieces of cannon, seven standards, and a profusion of ammunition and baggage. On the following morning the republicans entered Trent, to which place no French army had ever before been able to penetrate. From Trent a division was dispatched against the position of Lavis, which was mastered with as little trouble as either of the former."]

to Mantua. He sent Augereau on Legnago itself. Massena's vanguard, outstripping his division, entered Cerea on the 25th (11th September), at the moment of Wurmser's arrival from Legnago, with all his army. This vanguard of cavalry and light infantry, commanded by Generals Murat and Pigeon, made an heroic resistance, but was overpowered; Wurmser cut it down, and continued his march. Bonaparte came galloping up alone during the action; he narrowly escaped being taken, and had to save himself in all haste.

Wurmser passed through Sanguinetto, and learning that all the bridges over the Molinella were broken down, except that of Villa Impenta, he descended to that point, there cleared the river, and pushed rapidly for Mantua. General Charton attempted to stop him with 300 men formed in square; those brave men were cut to pieces or taken. Wurmser thus arrived at Mantua on the 27th (13th September). These slight advantages afforded some consolation for the previous disasters of the intrepid and veteran general. He spread himself in the environs of Mantua, and kept the field for an interval, owing to his numerous and well-appointed cavalry.

Bonaparte arrived with breathless celerity, furious against the negligent officers who had caused him to lose so glorious a prize. Augereau had retaken Legnago and captured the Austrian garrison, 1600 strong. Bonaparte ordered him to proceed to Governolo, on the Lower Mincio. He then engaged Wurmser in sundry skirmishes, with the view of drawing him out of the fortress; and during the night of the 28th-29th (14th-15th September), he took up a position in the background, in order to induce Wurmser to show himself in the plain. The old general, elated with his petty successes, did in fact deploy out of Mantua, between the citadel and the suburb of Saint-George. Bonaparte attacked him on the 3d complementary day of the year 4 (19th September). Augereau, advancing from Governolo, formed the left; Massena, moving from Due-Castelli, formed the centre; Sahuguet, with the blockading corps, composed the right. Wurmser had still 21,000 men in line. He was worsted on all points, and driven into the fortress with the loss of 2000 men. A few days afterwards he was completely cooped up within the walls of Mantua. The numerous cavalry he had brought with him, become of no use, served merely to augment the number of unprofitable consumers. He killed and salted all the horses. His garrison consisted of twenty and some thousand men, of whom several thousand were in hospital.

Thus, although Bonaparte had failed to reap all the fruits of his daring march on the Brenta, and to compel the marshal to surrender at discretion, he had entirely ruined and dispersed his army. A few thousand men were chased into the Tyrol under Davidovich; a few thousand had fled into Friuli under Quasdanovich; Wurmser, with twelve or fourteen thousand, had shut himself up in Mantua. Thirteen or fourteen thousand were prisoners; six or seven thousand killed and wounded. The Austrian army had accordingly again suffered a loss of twenty thousand men in ten days, besides a considerable train of artillery. Bonaparte had lost seven or eight thousand, of whom fifteen hundred were prisoners, the residue killed, wounded, or sick. Thus, to the armies of Colli and Beaulieu, destroyed on entering Italy, was now to be added that of Wurmser, twice scattered, first in the plains of Castiglione, and secondly on the banks of the Brenta. The trophies of Montenotte, Lodi, Borghetto, Lonato, and Castiglione, were outshone by the recent glories of Roveredo, Bassano, and Saint-George: at what period of history had such great results been witnessed, so many enemies slain, so many prisoners, standards, pieces of ordnance captured! The tidings diffused fresh joy through Lombardy, and terror through other portions of the peninsula. France was in raptures of admiration for the general of the army of Italy.

On the [illegible] less propitious for the French. Moreau had advanced on the Lech, as we have seen, in the hope that his progress would bring back the archduke and disengage Jourdan. Such an expectation was groundless, for the archduke must have been ignorant of the importance of his movement, if he were deterred from its execution by considerations prompting him to return towards Moreau. The campaign depended upon the events that were to occur on the Maine. If Jourdan were defeated and driven back on the Rhine, the progress of Moreau would only tend to compromise him the more, and expose him to lose his line of retreat. The archduke, accordingly, contented himself with detaching General Nauendorff, with two regiments of cavalry and some battalions, to reinforce Latour, and continued his pursuit of the army of the Sambre-and-Meuse.

That valiant army retired with the most poignant regret, retaining all the consciousness of power. It was the same that had performed many glorious deeds during the first years of the revolution; the same that had conquered at Watignies, at Fleurus, and on the banks of the Ourthe and the Röer. It had unlimited confidence in its general and in itself. The retreat had not discouraged it, for it was well persuaded that it yielded only to superior combinations, and to the mass of the opposing forces. It ardently desired an opportunity of coping with the Austrians, and retrieving the honour of its flag. Jourdan was actuated by the same sentiment. The Directory had written to him that he must at all hazards maintain himself in Franconia, on the Upper Maine, both to secure his winter-quarters in Germany, and above all, to cover Moreau, who had advanced even to the gates of Munich. Moreau, on his own part, had just communicated to Jourdan, under date of the 8th Fructidor (25th August), his march beyond the Lech, the advantages he had gained, and the project he had formed of still proceeding onwards in order to bring back the archduke. All these reasons decided Jourdan to try the fate of a battle, although he was confronted by very superior forces. He would have deemed himself wanting to the dictates of honour if he had quitted Franconia without fighting, and left unaided his colleague in Bavaria. Deceived, moreover, by the movement of General Nauendorff, Jourdan surmised that the archduke had actually set out to regain the banks of the Danube. He halted, therefore, at Wurtzburg, a place which he judged it important to preserve, but the citadel of which alone had been retained by the French. He gave some rest to his troops, made certain changes in the distribution and command of his divisions, and announced his intention of engaging the enemy. The army evinced the greatest ardour in carrying all the positions Jourdan considered it advisable to occupy before joining battle. He had his right resting on Wurtzburg, and the rest of his line on a series of positions stretching along the Maine as far as Schweinfurth. The Maine separated him from the enemy. One part only of the Austrian army had crossed that river, which confirmed him in the idea that the archduke had returned to the Danube. He placed at the extremity of his line, at Schweinfurth, Lefebvre's division, to assure his retreat on the Saal and Fulda, in case the battle should cause him to lose the road to Frankfort. He thus deprived himself of a second line and a corps of reserve; but he deemed it fitting to make that sacrifice to the necessity of ensuring his retreat. He determined to attack on the morning of the 17th Fructidor (3d September).

In the course of the preceding night, the archduke, apprised of his adversary's design, rapidly passed the remainder of his army beyond the Maine, and deployed his superior forces before the eyes of Jourdan. The battle began with advantage to the French; but their cavalry, assailed in the plain stretching along the Maine by a formidable force of cavalry, was broken, rallied, was again broken, and found shelter only behind the lines and well-supported fire of their infantry. If his reserve had not been so far removed from him, Jourdan might have gained the victory; to summon Lefebvre he dispatched some officers, who were unable to penetrate through the numerous hostile squadrons. He hoped, however, that Lefebvre, seeing that Schweinfurth was not menaced, would march to the point of danger; but he hoped in vain, and drew back his army to protect it from the redoubtable cavalry of the enemy. The retreat was conducted in good order on Arnstein. Jourdan, the victim of the Directory's vicious plan, and of his zeal towards his colleague, now felt it incumbent to recoil on the Lahn. He continued his march without intermission, sent orders to Marceau to retire from before Mayence, and arrived behind the Lahn on the 24th Fructidor (10th September). His army, in this arduous march to the frontiers of Bohemia, had only lost some five or six thousand men. It sustained a serious loss in the death of young Marceau, who was pierced by the bullet of a Tyrolian ranger, and who could not be borne from the field of battle. The Archduke Charles caused him to be tended with the greatest care, but he soon expired. The young hero, regretted by both armies, was interred amid salvos of artillery from the hostile camps.*

Whilst these events were passing on the Maine, Moreau, still beyond the Danube and the Lech, was impatiently awaiting tidings from Jourdan. None of the officers detached to convey him intelligence had arrived. He remained inactive, without venturing to adopt a decisive resolution. In the interval, his left, under the orders of Desaix, sustained a rude encounter with Latour's cavalry, which, united with that of Nauendorff, suddenly debouched by Langenbrück. Desaix made such excellent and prompt dispositions, that he repulsed the numerous squadrons of the enemy, and dispersed them in the plain, after subjecting them to considerable carnage. Moreau, yet tormented by uncertainty, at length determined, after a delay of twenty days, to attempt a movement in quest of information. He resolved to approach the Danube, in order to extend his left wing to Nuremberg, and either obtain news of Jourdan or carry him succour. On the 24th Fructidor (10th September), he repassed the Danube with his left and centre, leaving his right alone beyond that river, towards Zell. The left, under Desaix, advanced as far as Aichstatt. In this singular situation, he stretched his left towards Jourdan, who, at the moment, was sixty leagues from him; he had his centre on the Danube, and his right beyond it, exposing one of those three corps to certain destruction, if Latour had known how to profit by their isolation. All military authorities have censured Moreau for this movement, as one of those half measures which involve all the peril of great ones without any of their advantages. In fact, Moreau having failed to seize the occasion of rapidly wheeling on the archduke, when that prince diverged on Jourdan, he could only compromise himself the more effectually by thus placing himself astride the Danube.

* [" The flying French were eagerly pursued by the Austrians. On the 19th, Lieutenant-General Hotze came up, at Hochstebach, with their rearguard under General Marceau, who made a stand, to give the rest of the army time to pass the defiles of Altenkirchen. After a gallant resistance, Marceau was defeated, mortally wounded, and made prisoner. Every care and attention was lavished by the Austrian chiefs on the captive general, who, though only twenty-seven years of age, was one of the most accomplished, intelligent, and brave of the French officers; and was not less humane than able and courageous. On the 21st he expired, and his body was restored to his countrymen by the Archduke, on condition that the Austrians should have notice of the time of his funeral, that they might join in paying to him those military honours which he justly deserved. He was buried in the intrenched camp at Coblentz; and, during the interment, discharges of artillery were fired by the hostile armies on the opposite banks of the Rhine."—Annual Register for 1796, p. 195.]

Eventually, after tarrying four days in this anomalous position, he felt its danger, again removed his army over the Danube, and resolved to ascend its course in order to approximate towards his basis of operations. He now learned the forced retreat of Jourdan on the Lahn, and no longer doubted that, after having driven back the army of the Sambre-and-Meuse, the archduke would hasten on the Neckar, to bar the return of the army of the Rhine. He was likewise apprised of an attempt made by the garrison of Manheim on Kehl, with the view of destroying the bridge by which the French army had debouched into Germany. In this state of affairs, his hesitation was at an end, and a march to regain France became imperative. His position was extremely perilous. Entangled in the midst of Bavaria, obliged to repass the Black Mountains to return on the Rhine, having in front Latour with 40,000 men, and exposed to encounter the archduke on his rear with 30,000, he might justly anticipate the direst disasters. But if he were devoid of the vast and fiery genius his rival displayed in Italy, he possessed that firmness of mind which rendered him superior to the dejection wherewith men of more ardent temperaments are sometimes stricken. He commanded a superb army, sixty and some thousand men strong, unshaken by the demoralising effect of a defeat, and placing in its chief an unbounded confidence. Duly estimating so invaluable a possession, he was not alarmed at his position, and prepared to pursue his route with tranquillity. Reflecting that the archduke, after beating back Jourdan, would in all probability return upon the Neckar, he feared that he should find that river already occupied; he consequently ascended the valley of the Danube, intending to make straightway for that of the Rhine by the route of the Forest Towns. Those avenues being the most distant from the point actually occupied by the archduke, seemed to him the safest.

Remaining beyond the Danube, therefore, he composedly ascended it, resting one of his wings on the river. His artillery and baggage-waggons proceeded before him, without confusion, and every day his rearguards bravely repulsed the enemy's vanguards. Latour, instead of passing the Danube, and endeavouring to anticipate Moreau at the entrance of the defiles, was content to follow him step by step, without venturing to bring him into action. When he had arrived near the lake of Feder See, Moreau deemed it fitting to pause. Latour had divided his force into three corps: he had given one to Nauendorff, and sent him to Tubingen, on the Upper Neckar, by which Moreau had no intention of passing; he was at Biberach in person with the second; and the third was stationed at a considerable distance, at Schussenried. Moreau, who was approaching the Valley of Hell (the Höllenthal), through which he purposed to retire, felt the importance of not being too closely pressed during the passage of that defile; therefore, seeing behind him Latour insulated, and aware that a victory would give firmness to his troops for the remainder of the retreat, he halted on the 11th Vendémiaire, year 5 (2d October), in the vicinity of the lake of Feder See, not far from Biberach. The country was mountainous, woody, and intersected with valleys. Latour was ranged on different heights, which might be isolated and turned, and which, moreover, had at the back a deep ravine, that of the Riss. Moreau attacked him on all points, and, skilfully contriving to penetrate through his positions, assailing some in front and turning others, drove him back, and threw him into the Riss, taking from him four thousand prisoners. This important victory, known as that of Biberach, repelled Latour a considerable distance, and singularly invigorated the spirit of the French army. Moreau resumed his march, and approached the defiles. He had already gone past the routes which traverse the valley of the Neckar and open into that of the Rhine; there remained to him the road which, proceeding by Tuttlingen and Rothweil, towards the sources of the Neckar, follows the valley of the Kintzig, and terminates at Kehl; but Nauendorff had already occupied it. The detachments from Manheim had joined the latter, and the archduke was also drawing nigh. Moreau preferred to ascend a little higher, and proceed through the Valley of Hell, which, traversing the Black Forest, formed certainly a long elbow, but led to Brisach, a point more distant from the archduke. In consequence, he posted Desaix and Ferino with the left and right towards Tuttlingen and Rothweil, in order to cover himself on the side of the defiles occupied by the principal Austrian forces; and he sent the centre, under Saint-Cyr, to force the Valley of Hell. At the same time, he dispatched his great parks on Huningen, by the route of the Forest Towns. The Austrians had surrounded him with a number of small corps, as if they had hoped to envelop him, and had nowhere placed themselves in force to resist him. Saint-Cyr merely encountered a detachment in the Valley of Hell, passed without difficulty to Neustadt, and arrived at Friburg. The two wings immediately followed him, and debouched through that dismal defile into the valley of the Rhine, with the attitude of a victorious army rather than with that of an army in retreat.*

Moreau reached the valley of the Rhine on the 21st Vendémiaire (12th October.) Instead of repassing the Rhine by the bridge of Brisach, and skirting the river on the French bank to Strasburg, he resolved to advance along the right bank to Kehl, in presence of the whole Austrian army. Whether he desired to make a more imposing return, or he hoped to maintain himself on the right bank and cover Kehl by moving straightway on it, in either case he had insufficient grounds for hazarding a battle. By recrossing the Rhine at Brisach, he might have proceeded without obstacle to Strasburg, and once more debouched by Kehl. That tête-de-pont was capable of resisting long enough to afford him time to arrive. To march, on the contrary, in face of the hostile army, now wholly assembled under the archduke, and thus expose himself to a general battle with the Rhine at his back, was an inexcusable imprudence, when there was no longer any motive for assuming the offensive, or any necessity for protecting the retreat. On the 28th Vendémiaire (19th October), the two armies confronted each other on the banks of the Eltz, from Waldkirch to Emmendingen. After a sanguinary and varying conflict, Moreau perceived the impossibility of penetrating to Kehl along the right bank, and took a resolution to proceed over the bridge of Brisach. Deeming it impracticable, however, to pass all his army over that bridge without the confusion of overcrowding, and being very solicitous to forward troops with the utmost dispatch to Kehl, he detached Desaix with the left on Brisach, and returned towards Huningen with the centre and right. This determination has been judged equally imprudent with that which led to the battle of Emmendingen; for Moreau, weakened by one-third of his army, incurred the hazard of being effectually compromised. He relied, it is true, upon a very admirable position, that of Schliengen, which covers the avenue of Huningen, upon which he might halt and fight, in order to render the passage more tranquil and safe. He accordingly recoiled upon that point, halted there on the 3d Brumaire (24th October), and sustained an obstinate and drawn battle. After securing his baggage leisure to traverse the stream by this day's conflict, he evacuated the position during the night, regained the left bank, and moved in the direction of Strasburg.

Thus ended this celebrated campaign, and this still more celebrated retreat. The result sufficiently pourtrays the fundamental error of the plan. If, as Napoleon, the Archduke Charles, and General Jomini have demonstrated—if, instead of forming two armies, advancing in isolated columns, under two independent generals, with the paltry intention of outflanking the wings of the enemy, the Directory had constituted a single army of one hundred and sixty thousand men, whereof a detachment of fifty thousand would have besieged Mayence, and the remaining one hundred and ten thousand, united in a single corps, would have invaded Germany by the valley of the Rhine, the Valley of Hell, and Upper Bavaria, the imperial armies must have been compelled constantly to retrograde, without being enabled to concentrate advantageously against a mass inordinately superior. The famous evolution of the young archduke would have been impossible, and the republican flag have been borne to the gates of Vienna. Under the prescribed plan, Jourdan was an involuntary scapegoat. His operations, uniformly unfortunate, were those of constrained devotedness, both when he cleared the Rhine for the first time, in order to draw upon him the forces of the archduke, and also when he advanced into Bohemia and fought at Wurtzburg. Moreau alone, with his fine army, might have in part retrieved the vices of the plan, either by hurrying on and crushing all before him at the moment he debouched by Kehl, or by closing on the rear of the archduke when he moved on Jourdan. He was either afraid or incompetent to adopt any such steps; but we are to allow, that if he failed to evince a ray of genius—if to a decisive and victorious manœuvre he preferred a retreat —he at all events displayed in that retreat an excellent judgment and an indomitable firmness. It was doubtless not so difficult as it has been represented, but it was conducted nevertheless in a very imposing manner.

The young archduke was indebted to the absurdity of the French plan for a brilliant conception, which he realised with prudence; but, like Moreau, he lacked that ardour, that audacity, if you will, which might have rendered the blunder of the French government fatal to its armies. Conceive what would have happened if on either side had been engaged the impetuous genius which had annihilated three armies beyond the Alps! If the 70,000 men of Moreau, at the moment they debouched from Kehl, or if the Imperialists, at the moment they quitted the Danube to wheel on Jourdan, had been conducted with the vigour and promptitude exhibited in the Italian campaign, assuredly the war would have been forthwith terminated most disastrously for one of the two powers.

The campaign endowed the young archduke with a resplendent fame in Europe. In France, a grateful feeling was engendered towards Moreau, for having led back in safety the army compromised in Bavaria. The greatest anxiety had been felt respecting that army, especially from the time when, Jourdan being repelled, the bridge of Kehl menaced, and the communications through Swabia intercepted by a multitude of detached corps, nothing was known of its operations or its fate. But when, after an interval of poignant disquietude, it was seen debouching into the valley of the Rhine in so perfect an attitude, men were enchanted with the general who had so auspiciously redeemed it. His retreat was extolled as a masterpiece of art, and straightway compared to that of the Ten Thousand. None ventured, indeed, to oppose it to the brilliant triumphs of the army of Italy; but as there are always many whom superior genius and high fortune mortify, and whom less shining merit rather gratify, all such declared for Moreau, vaunted his consummate prudence and ability, and esteemed it preferable to the electric hardihood of young Bonaparte. From this period, Moreau had for partisans all who prefer secondary to transcendent talents; and, it must be confessed, in a republic we almost pardon such enemies of genius, when we see how that genius can become culprit towards the liberty which has quickened, fostered, and raised it to the pinnacle of glory.

* [The Valley of Hell crosses the Black Mountains between Neustadt and Friburg. It is a gloomy and terrible defile, six miles in length, shut in on each hand by lofty, pointed, woody rocks, and in some places not more than a few fathoms wide. At the bottom rushes a torrent. It is curious that the pass by which Moreau thus saved his army had appalled the celebrated Villars in 1702. When urged to traverse it by the Elector of Bavaria, he replied, "Pray, excuse me; I am not quite devil enough to go by such a road."]

CHAPTER XLIX.

INTERNAL AND EXTERNAL SITUATION OF FRANCE AT THE COMMENCEMENT OF THE YEAR 5.—OVERTURES BY ENGLAND TOWARDS A NEGOTIATION WITH THE DIRECTORY.—ARRIVAL OF LORD MALMESBURY AT PARIS.—PEACE WITH NAPLES AND GENOA; FRUITLESS NEGOTIATIONS WITH THE POPE; DEPOSITION OF THE DUKE OF MODENA; FOUNDATION OF THE CISPADAN REPUBLIC.—NEW EFFORTS OF THE AUSTRIANS IN ITALY; PERILOUS POSITION OF THE FRENCH ARMY BATTLE OF ARCOLE.

THE result of the German campaign proved highly prejudicial to the republic. Its enemies, who persisted in denying its victories or predicting for it cruel reverses of fortune, deemed their prognostics fulfilled, and exulted with undisguised malevolence. Those rapid conquests in Germany, they said, had then no stability. The Danube and the talents of a young prince had brought them to a speedy termination. There was little doubt the rash army of Italy, which appeared so firmly established on the Adige, would be thence scourged in its turn, and chased over the Alps as the armies of Germany over the Rhine. It is true, the conquests of General Bonaparte seemed to rest on a somewhat more solid basis. He had not merely driven Colli and Beaulieu before him; he had annihilated them: he had not merely repulsed the new army of Wurmser; he had first disorganised it at Castiglione, and eventually dissipated it on the Brenta. Thus there were better hopes of holding ground in Italy than in Germany; but a malicious pleasure was taken in disseminating sinister reports. Numerous forces were arriving, it was confidently alleged, from Poland and Turkey, destined for the Tyrol; the imperial armies of the Rhine could now send additional detachments; and, with all his genius, General Bonaparte, having constantly fresh enemies to encounter, must finally reach the limit of success, were it only from the exhaustion of his own army. It was natural that, under actual circumstances, such conjectures should be formed; for imagination, after exaggerating successes, inevitably tends to exaggerate reverses.

The armies of Germany had retired without sustaining any material damage, and yet held the line of the Rhine. There was nothing so very disastrous in this, save that the army of Italy was thereby left without support, which was doubtless a serious calamity. Moreover, the two principal armies, by their return upon the French territory, must become chargeable upon the national finances, which were still in a deplorable state: and herein lay the cruellest dilemma. The mandats, having ceased to possess a forced currency, had sunk interminably; and even had that not been the case, they were nearly all expended, few remaining at the disposal of government. They were held chiefly at Paris, by certain speculators, who sold them to the purchasers of national domains. The arrears due to the state were still considerable, but were not paid; the taxes and the forced loan were collected with difficulty; the national domains, taken under contracts of purchase, were paid for only in part; the instalments still due were not yet exigible according to the law; and the additional sales effected from time to time were not sufficiently numerous to supply the treasury. It was upon the funds arising from such sales, however, together with the proceeds of the loan and articles obtained upon ministerial promises of reimbursement, that the services of government were carried on. The budget for the year 5 had recently been prepared, divided into ordinary and extraordinary expenses. The ordinary expenses amounted to 450 millions; the extraordinary to 550 millions. The land-tax, the customs, the stamp-duty, and other sources of income, were assigned to bear the ordinary expenditure. The 550 millions of extraordinaries would be sufficiently covered by the arrears of taxes due the preceding year, and of the forced loan, and by the payments still to make for domains purchased. There was in addition the resource of the domains yet possessed by the republic; but all these items were to be realised—the old and inveterate difficulty. The contractors, remaining unpaid, refused to continue their supplies, and all the services were in destitution. The public functionaries and fundholders received no salaries or dividends, and lacked the necessaries of life.

Thus, the isolation of the army of Italy, and the miserable state of the finances, were calculated to inspire the enemies of France with sanguine hopes. The scheme of a quadruple alliance, formed by the Directory, between France, Spain, the Porte, and Venice, had hitherto ripened only into an alliance with Spain. This last-named power, induced by the offers of France, and her brilliant fortune in the middle of summer, had determined, as we have seen, to renew the family-compact with the republic, and had recently issued a declaration of war against Great Britain. Venice, notwithstanding the instances of Spain and the invitations of the Porte, and despite the victories of Bonaparte in Italy, had declined to unite herself with the republic. It was vainly urged upon her that Russia regarded with a covetous eye her colonies in Greece, and Austria her provinces in Illyria; that her union with France and the Porte, who envied none of her possessions, would guarantee her from those ambitious foes; that the repeated victories of the French upon the Adige ought to satisfy her touching a return of the imperial armies and the vengeance of the emperor; that the co-operation of her forces and navy would render that return still more improbable; that neutrality, on the contrary, would leave her without a friend or protector, and perhaps expose her to serve as spoils of accommodation between the belligerent powers. Venice, blinded with antipathy towards the French, and engaged in preparations evidently intended against them, since she consulted the Austrian minister upon the choice of a general, repudiated for the second time the alliance pressed upon her. She clearly discerned the danger of Austrian ambition; but that of French principles was the greatest and most urgent in her eyes, and she replied to all the overtures, that she would adhere to her unarmed neutrality, which was false, as she was arming with the utmost diligence. The Porte, staggered by the refusal of Venice, and influenced by the suggestions of Vienna and London, had not acceded to the project of alliance. There consequently remained but France and Spain, whose union might contribute to wrest the Mediterranean from the English, but might likewise endanger the Spanish colonies. Pitt, in fact, was revolving plans to induce their revolt against the mother country, and he had already commenced his intrigues in Mexico. The negotiations with Genoa were not yet brought to a close, for the points at issue were at once the payment of a sum of money, the expulsion of certain families, and the recall of certain others. Neither were they more advanced with Naples, since the Directory insisted upon a contribution, and the Queen of Naples, who treated with repugnance, refused to consent to that condition. The peace with Rome was not concluded, on account of an article enforced by the Directory; it required the Holy See to revoke all the briefs issued against France since the commencement of the revolution, which wounded the pride of the aged pontiff in a peculiar degree. He convoked a conclave of cardinals, who decided that the revocation could not be made. The negotiations were broken off. They were recommenced at Florence, where a congress was opened. The nuncios of the Pope having declared that the bulls were irrevocable, and the French commissioners having intimated, on the other hand, that the revocation was a condition sine qua non, the parties separated in a few minutes. The expectation of succour from the Kings of Naples and England encouraged the pontiff in his refusal. He had previously dispatched Cardinal Albani to Vienna, in order to implore the aid of Austria, and to concert with her his measures of resistance.

Such were the relations of France with Europe. Her enemies, on their side, were greatly exhausted. Austria felt comforted, it is true, by the retreat of the French armies which had advanced to the Danube; but she was in grievous alarm for Italy, and was making fresh preparations to recover it. England was reduced to a sad state. Her establishment in Corsica was precarious, and the speedy loss of that island seemed to her inevitable. The object of the French government was to close all the ports in Italy against her, and another victory won by General Bonaparte would suffice to provoke her total exclusion from that country. The war with Spain threatened to drive her from the Mediterranean and to jeopardise Portugal. The whole coast, as far as the Texel, was inaccessible to her. The expedition preparing by Hoche in Brittany disquieted her regarding Ireland. Her finances were in peril, her bank was shaken, and the people clamoured for peace; the opposition had gained strength in the recent elections. These constituted reasons sufficiently urgent to recommend ideas of peace, and the late reverses of France might suggest hopes that she would be constrained to accept any offers of a pacific tendency. But the royal family and the aristocracy had a great repugnance to treat with France, since in their eyes it involved an approval of the revolution. Pitt, less wedded to aristocratical principles, and solely occupied with the promotion of English interests, would have willingly concluded peace, but under a condition, indispensable to his views and inadmissible for the republic—the restitution of the Low Countries to Austria. Pitt, as we have already remarked, was a true Englishman, in pride, ambition, and prejudices. The greatest offence of the revolution was, in his estimation, not so much the birth of a colossal republic as the union of the Low Countries with France.

The Low Countries, in fact, constituted an important acquisition for France. It conferred upon her the possession of provinces the richest and most fertile on the continent, and above all of a manufacturing country; it gave her the mouths of the most important rivers for the commerce with the north of Europe—the Scheldt, the Meuse, and the Rhine; a considerable augmentation of coast, and consequently of shipping; excellent and advantageous ports, especially that of Antwerp; and, lastly, a prolongation of maritime frontier in the most dangerous direction for the English frontier, opposite the defenceless coasts of Essex, Suffolk, Norfolk, and Yorkshire. In addition to these positive benefits, the acquisition of Belgium had a further value for France: Holland fell under her immediate influence when no longer separated by Austrian provinces. Thus the French line became extended, not only as far as Antwerp, but even to the Texel, and the shores of England were enveloped by a range of hostile coast. When we reflect, moreover, on the family-compact with Spain, at that time a powerful and well-organised kingdom, we can readily comprehend that Pitt must have felt solicitude touching the naval power of England. It is a principle with every Englishman, thoroughly imbued with national ideas, that England ought to rule at Naples, Lisbon, and Amsterdam, in order to maintain a footing on the continent, and to break the long line of coasts which may prove adverse to her. This tenet was as firmly rooted in 1796 as that which taught every injury inflicted on France to be a benefit secured for England. Accordingly, to procure a momentary respite for his finances, Pitt would have consented to a temporary peace, but on condition that Belgium was restored to Austria. He was well inclined, therefore, to open a negotiation on that basis. He could scarcely hope that France would admit such a preliminary, for Belgium was the principal acquisition of the revolution, and the constitution actually debarred the Directory from treating for its alienation. But Pitt was little acquainted with the continent; he sincerely believed France to be ruined; and it was in perfect good faith that he came forward every year to announce the exhaustion and fall of the republic. He thought that if France had ever been disposed for peace, she must be so at the present moment, both on account of the depreciation of mandats, and on account of the retreat of her armies from Germany. Besides, whether he deemed the condition admissible or not, an importunate motive urged him to open a negotiation. This was the necessity of satisfying public opinion, which imperiously demanded peace. In fact, to obtain a levy of 60,000 militia and 15,000 seamen, he required to prove, by a signal demonstration, that he had done his utmost to conclude a treaty. Another consideration of equal moment weighed with him: by taking the initiative, and commencing a solemn negotiation at Paris, he would bring into discussion the general interests of Europe, and prevent Austria from opening a separate negotiation. This latter power, in truth, was less concerned for the recovery of the Low Countries than England to restore them to her. Belgium was for her a distant province, detached from the centre of her dominions, exposed to continual invasions from France, and deeply inoculated with revolutionary ideas—a province she had several times endeavoured to exchange for other possessions in Germany or Italy, and which she had retained solely because Prussia had always opposed her aggrandisement in Germany, and no combinations had ever been feasible admitting the cession of an equivalent in Italy. Pitt held that a formal negotiation, opened at Paris on behalf of all the allies, would obviate individual arrangements, and prevent any accommodation relative to the Low Countries. He desired, furthermore, to have an agent in France, who might judge her more nearly, and obtain certain information touching the expedition preparing at Brest. Such were the motives which, without even the expectation of concluding a peace, induced Pitt to make an advance towards the Directory. He was not content, as in the preceding year, with directing a trifling communication through Wickham to Barthélemy; he sent to demand passports for an envoy invested with powers from Great Britain. This extraordinary step on the part of the most implacable enemy of the republic, had something glorious for it. The English aristocracy was so far humbled as to solicit peace from the regicide republic. The passports were immediately granted. Pitt made choice of Lord Malmesbury, formerly Sir James Harris, and son of the author of "Hermes." This individual was not known as the friend of republics; he had contributed to the oppression of Holland in 1787. He arrived at Paris with a numerous suite on the 2d Brumaire (23d October 1796).

The Directory appointed the minister Delacroix to represent it. The two negotiators met at the Foreign Office on the 3d Brumaire year 5 (24th October 1796.) The French minister exhibited his credentials. Lord Malmesbury announced himself as the plenipotentiary of Great Britain and her allies, empowered to negotiate a general peace. He subsequently delivered in his powers, which were signed by England alone.

The French minister thereupon inquired whether he held a commission from the allies of Great Britain to treat in their name. Lord Malmesbury replied, that so soon as the negotiation was opened, and the principle on which it might be based admitted, his Britannic Majesty was assured of obtaining the concurrence and sanction of his allies. He then submitted to Delacroix a note from his court, in which it prescribed the principle on which the negotiation was to be based. This principle was that of reciprocal restitution of conquests by the belligerents. The note stated that England had made conquests in the French colonies; France had made conquests on the continent from the allies of England; there were consequently subjects of restitution on each side: but the principle of mutual compensation must be first conceded ere explanations were given touching the objects to be compensated. The English cabinet obviously shunned any premature and positive explication respecting the retrocession of the Low Countries, and put forward this general principle in order that the negotiation might not be broken off at its very commencement. The minister Delacroix replied, that he would refer the subject to the consideration of the Directory.

The Directory could not relinquish the Low Countries; such a surrender was beyond its powers, and even had it been otherwise, paramount obligations forbade it. France had pledged her honour towards those provinces, and could not expose them to the vengeance of Austria, by restoring them, without disgrace. Besides, she was entitled to indemnities for the unjust war so long waged against her; she had a right to receive some equivalent for the aggrandisements of Austria, Prussia, and Russia, in Poland, obtained by a flagrant crime; it behoved her, in fine, to persist in the design of recovering her natural barrier: for all which reasons, it had become imperative on her to retain Belgium, and uphold the provisions of the constitution. The Directory, firmly resolved to perform its duty in this respect, might have abruptly closed a negotiation, the clear intent of which was to demand the abandonment of the Low Countries, and to prevent an arrangement with Austria but it would thereby have afforded ground for the allegation that it did not desire peace, accomplished one of the principal intentions of Pitt, and furnished him with excellent reasons for requiring additional sacrifices from the English nation. It replied on the very following day. France, it stated, had already treated separately with the majority of the powers composing the coalition, without their having invoked the concurrence of all the allies; that to render the negotiation general was to render it interminable, and to justify the belief that the present negotiation was not more sincere than the overture made the preceding year through the medium of the minister Wickham. Moreover, the English envoy was not provided with credentials from the allies in whose name he professed to speak. Lastly, the principle of compensations was intimated in too vague and general a form to permit either its admission or rejection. The application of such a principle must always depend on the nature of the acquisitions and the capacity of the respective belligerents to preserve them. Thus, the Directory added, the French government might have dispensed with returning any answer; but, to prove its inclination for peace, it declared its perfect readiness to entertain every specific proposition, whenever Lord Malmesbury should be invested with authority by the powers in behalf of whom he claimed to treat.

Having nothing to conceal in this negotiation, but being, on the contrary, enabled to act with the utmost frankness, the Directory resolved to render it public, and to publish in the newspapers the notes of the British envoy and the replies of the French minister. It accordingly ordered the immediate publication of Lord Malmesbury's memorial and the answer it had made thereto. This mode of proceeding was calculated to disconcert somewhat the tortuous policy of the British cabinet, but it did not necessarily infringe propriety by deviating from usage. The rejoinder of Lord Malmesbury was to the effect that he would apply to his government for further instructions. He must be deemed a singular plenipotentiary who possessed such inadequate powers, that, at the occurrence of each difficulty, he was obliged to refer its elucidation to his court. The Directory might have in this detected a subterfuge, and a design to spin out the negotiation under a vain semblance of treating; nor could it view with satisfaction the prolonged sojourn of a foreigner, whose intrigues might prove dangerous, and who had come to discover the secret of the armaments preparing in the French ports. Nevertheless, it manifested no displeasure; it allowed Lord Malmesbury to await the answer of his court, and, in the interim, to observe the different parties, estimate their strength, and speculate on that of the government. The Directory, in sooth, had little to dread from the scrutiny.

Meanwhile, the situation of the French was becoming perilous in Italy, notwithstanding the recent triumphs of Roveredo, Bassano, and Saint-George. Austria was making gigantic preparations to recover Lombardy. The assurances given by Catherine of Russia, guaranteeing the safety of the Gallicias, had permitted the emperor to transport the troops in Poland towards the Alps. The confident hope of preserving peace with the Ottoman Porte had, in like manner, prompted him to uncover the Turkish frontier, and all the reserves of the Austrian empire were directed upon Italy. A numerous and loyal population, moreover, afforded copious means of recruitment. The Imperial government displayed extraordinary zeal and activity in enrolling new soldiers, incorporating them in veteran regiments, arming and equipping them. An excellent army was thus mustered in Friuli, comprising the wrecks of Wurmser, the troops drawn from Poland and Turkey, the detachments from the Rhine, and the recruits. Marshal Alvinzy was commissioned to undertake the command. Sanguine expectations were indulged that this third army would be more fortunate than the two preceding, and finally wrest Italy from its youthful conqueror.

Bonaparte, during the interval, was importunate in demanding succours and in urging pacifications with the Italian powers on his rear. He earnestly exhorted the Directory to treat with Naples, to renew the negotiations with Rome, to conclude with Genoa, and to arrange an offensive and defensive alliance with the King of Sardinia, in order that he might obtain aid in Italy, if none could be forwarded to him from France. He desired permission to proclaim the independence of Lombardy and of the dominions under the Duke of Modena, with the view of securing partisans and auxiliaries devotedly attached to his cause. The policy he recommended was most expedient, and the distress of his army fully warranted his strenuous entreaties. The rupture of the negotiations with the pope had a second time caused the contribution imposed by the armistice of Bologna to be countermanded. One instalment only had been transmitted. The contributions levied on Parma, Modena, and Milan, were exhausted, either by the expenses of the army or by the remittances sent to the government. Venice furnished provisions in an adequate ratio, but the pay of the troops was in arrear. The funds exigible from the foreign commerce of Leghorn were still under litigation. Amidst the richest regions of the earth, the army began to experience privations. But its most serious calamity was the hollowness of its ranks, thinned by the Austrian fire. It had not destroyed so many enemies without undergoing grievous emaciation. It had received reinforcements to the extent of 9000 or 10,000 men since the commencement of the campaign, whereby the number of Frenchmen led into Italy had been increased to nearly 50 000; but at the present moment it contained only thirty and a few thousands, so great had been the havoc of war and pestilence. Twelve battalions had recently arrived from La Vendée, but deplorably crippled by desertions; the other detachments promised were not forthcoming. General Willot, who held command in the southern departments, and who was instructed to direct several regiments upon the Alps, detained them to quell the disturbances his own incapacity and truculent spirit had provoked in the provinces under his rule. Kellermann could scarcely weaken his line, for his first duty was to be constantly prepared to repress Lyons and the environs, where the Companies of Jesus still murdered and devastated. Bonaparte solicited the eighty-third and fortieth demi-brigades, comprising nearly 6000 good troops, and stated that all his apprehensions would be dissipated if they came up in time.

He complained that the negotiation with Rome had not been confided to him, as he would have delayed the communication of an ultimatum until the payment of the contribution. "So long as your general," he said, "is not the centre of all in Italy, every thing will go wrong. I may easily be accused of ambition; but I am in truth satiated with honours. I am ill; I can scarcely sit on horseback; courage alone remains to me, which is not enough for the post I occupy. People begin to enumerate us," he added; "the prestige of our might is wearing away. Troops—or Italy is lost."

The Directory, feeling the importance of detaching Naples from Rome and securing the rear of Bonaparte, eventually concluded a treaty with the King of the Two Sicilies. It waived all objectionable demands, and the Neapolitan court, which the late victories of the French had intimidated, which saw Spain making common cause with France, and which feared that the English would be speedily driven from the Mediterranean, acceded to the treaty. The peace was signed on the 19th Vendémiaire (10th October). It was stipulated that his Sicilian majesty should withhold succours of every kind from the enemies of France, and close his ports against the armed ships of the belligerent powers. The Directory subsequently brought the negotiations with Genoa to a close. An untoward circumstance accelerated their termination: Nelson captured a French vessel in sight of the Genoese batteries. This violation of the neutrality egregiously compromised the republic of Genoa; the French party within it assumed a bolder tone—the adverse party shrunk into timidity; the determination was carried to conclude an alliance with France. The Genoese ports were shut against the English. Two millions were paid to France as an indemnity for the frigate La Modeste, and two millions more furnished as a loan. The feudatory families were not exiled, but all the partisans of France, expelled from the country and the senate, were recalled and reinstated. Piedmont was again urged to accept an offensive and defensive alliance. Its monarch had recently expired; his young successor, Charles-Emanuel, evinced friendly dispositions towards France, but he was not satisfied with the advantages she offered him as the price of his alliance. The Directory undertook to guarantee his dominions, which he held by an uncertain tenure amidst the general convulsion and the various republics ready to start into existence. But the reigning king, like his predecessor, demanded the cession of Lombardy, which the Directory could not promise, having to husband equivalents for treating with Austria. The Directory afterwards empowered Bonaparte to resume the negotiations with Rome, and conferred upon him full powers for that purpose.

The papal court had previously dispatched Cardinal Albani to Vienna. It had built lofty hopes on Naples, and, in the delirium of its rage, had insulted the Spanish legation. Naples suddenly failing it, and Spain manifesting her high displeasure, it was in the agonies of alarm, and presented a favourable moment for renewing overtures of peace. Bonaparte desired, in the first place, to wring from it money; next, although he contemned its temporal power, he regarded with uneasiness its moral influence over populations. The two Italian parties, procreated by the French revolution, and stimulated into development by the presence of the French armies, were daily growing in mutual exasperation. If Milan, Modena, Reggio, Bologna, and Ferrara, were the strongholds of the patriot party, Rome was the centre of the monkish and aristocratic party. It was still possible for the Vatican to arouse fanatical fury and greatly harass and perplex the French, especially now that the struggle for mastery with the Austrian army was about to be decided. Bonaparte felt that it was yet incumbent on him to temporise. Of free and independent mind, he despised all the fanaticisms which depress the human intellect; but, as a man of action, he dreaded the power unassailable by force, and preferred to elude rather than contend with it. Besides, although educated in France, his birth had occurred in the heart of Italian superstition, and he was far from partaking that disgust towards the Catholic religion which prevailed so deeply and universally amongst the French at the close of the eighteenth century. Thus he entertained no such repugnance to treat with the Holy See as existed at Paris. By gaining time, he would avoid the necessity of a retrograde march into the peninsula, avert priestly anathemas, and possibly recover the sixteen millions countermanded to Rome. He accordingly instructed the minister Cacault to disavow the demands of the Directory as to religious concerns, and to insist only on the material conditions. He selected Cardinal Mattei, whom he had immured in a convent, as an envoy to Rome; setting him at liberty, he charged him to convey his exhortations to the ear of the Pope himself. "The court of Rome," he wrote to him, "wishes war; it shall have it; but, previously, I owe it to my country and humanity to make a last effort to recall the Pope to reason. You know, my lord cardinal, the strength of the army I command: to destroy the temporal power of the Pope, the will is all I need. Go to Rome, see the holy father, enlighten him as to his true interests; release him from the intriguers who surround him, and who would ruin both him and Rome itself. The French government yet permits me to hear the words of peace. All may be accommodated. War, so disastrous to nations, brings fearful results on the vanquished. Save the Pope from the calamities which threaten him. You are well aware how sincerely I desire to conclude by peace a contest which war would terminate for me without glory as without peril."

Whilst employing such means "to deceive," as he expressed it, "the old fox," and to guard against the consequences of fanaticism, Bonaparte sought to foment the spirit of liberty in Upper Italy, so that he might oppose patriotism to superstition. The whole of Upper Italy was in a ferment: the Milanese, wrested from Austria, the provinces of Modena and Reggio, impatient under the yoke fastened upon them by their old absent duke, and the legations of Bologna and Ferrara, protected from the galling servitude of the Pope, loudly demanded their independence and their establishment as republics. He could not proclaim the independence of Lombardy, for victory had not yet sufficiently decided its fate; but he gave it hopes and encouragement. As to the provinces of Modena and Reggio, they lay immediately on the rear of his army—their confines touching Mantua. He had grounds of complaint against the regency, which had forwarded provisions to the garrison; and he had recommended the Directory not to grant peace to the Duke of Modena, but to rest satisfied with the armistice, in order to reserve the power of punishing him in case of necessity. Circumstances becoming every day more difficult, he determined, without consulting the Directory, to adopt a resolute course of action. It was unquestionable that the regency had again recently proved delinquent, and infringed the armistice, by furnishing supplies to Wurmser, and affording an asylum to one of his detachments. He instantly declared the armistice broken; and, by virtue of the rights of conquest, he drove away the regency, and pronounced the Duke of Modena deposed and his states free. The enthusiasm of the inhabitants of Reggio and Modena was excited to the highest pitch. Bonaparte organised a municipal government, to administer the country provisionally, until it was definitively constituted. Bologna and Ferrara had already formed themselves into a republic, and were commencing to levy troops. Bonaparte planned the union of these legations with the Dutchy of Modena, in order to mould them into a single republic, which, wholly seated on this side the Po, should be styled The Cispadan Republic. He conceived, that if, on the conclusion of peace, the restoration of Lombardy to Austria were unavoidable, it might be possible to prevent the restitution of the Modenese and the legations to the Duke of Modena and the Pope; and that thus a republic, the offspring and ally of the French republic, would be erected beyond the Alps, to serve as the focus of French principles, and the asylum of persecuted patriots, whence liberty might one day expand over the whole of Italy. He was not sufficiently sanguine to believe that the enfranchisement of Italy could be accomplished at one blow; he deemed the French government too much exhausted to effect it at the present moment; but thought that he ought at all events to plant the germs of liberty in this first campaign. That object would be fulfilled by incorporating Bologna and Ferrara with Modena and Reggio. The spirit of locality was adverse to such junction; but he hoped to surmount that obstacle by his all-powerful influence. He visited the different cities, in all of which he was received with enthusiasm, and decided them to send one hundred deputies from the various districts of their territory to Modena, there to form a national assembly, charged to constitute the Cispadan Republic. This convention, accordingly, met at Modena on the 25th of Vendémiaire (16th October). It was composed of advocates, landowners, and merchants. Awed by the presence of Bonaparte, and directed by his counsels, it evinced an exemplary discretion. It voted the amalgamation into a single republic of the two legations and the dutchy of Modena; it abolished feudalism, and decreed civil equality; it nominated a commissioner, empowered to organise a legion of 4000 men, and ordained the formation of a second assembly, which was appointed to meet on the 5th Nivôse (25th December), in order to frame a constitution. The Reggians displayed an unbounded zeal. An Austrian detachment having sallied out of Mantua, they flew to arms, surrounded, captured, and conducted it to Bonaparte. Two Reggians were slain in the encounter, and were the first martyrs to Italian independence.

Lombardy was jealous and alarmed at the favours granted to the Cispadan states, and drew therefrom an evil augury for itself. It was feared that, since the French constituted the legations and the dutchy without constituting Lombardy, they harboured the intention of restoring it to Austria. Bonaparte again strove to encourage the Lombards, pointed out to them the difficulties of his position, and repeated to them that they must gain independence by vigorously sustaining him in his arduous struggle. They resolved to increase to 12,000 men the two Italian and Polish legions, of which they had already commenced the organisation.

Bonaparte thus secured friendly governments around him, prepared to direct all their efforts to support him. Their troops, doubtless, were of little value; but they were capable of forming the police of the conquered countries, and in this manner would render disposable the detachments he was obliged to employ for that service. They might, aided by a few hundreds of French, resist a first attempt of the pope, if he had the folly to make one. Bonaparte endeavoured, at the same time, to reassure the Duke of Parma, whose dominions abutted on the new republic; his friendship might be useful, and his kinsmanship with Spain enjoined deference and forbearance. He flattered him with the prospect of possibly acquiring certain towns amidst the dismemberments of territory. He thus availed himself of the resources of policy, to supply that deficiency of strength which his government could not replenish; and, in so doing, he performed his duty towards France and Italy, and executed his task, too, with all the consummate tact of a veteran diplomatist.

Corsica had just been emancipated by his exertions. He had collected the principal refugees at Leghorn, given them arms and officers, and boldly thrown them into the island to uphold the revolt of the inhabitants against the English. The expedition succeeded; his native land was rescued from English thraldom, and the Mediterranean would, in all probability, soon enjoy the like deliverance. It might be reasonably anticipated, that the Spanish squadrons, united with those of France, would for the future close the Straits of Gibraltar against the fleets of England, and reign paramount throughout the Mediterranean.

He had, therefore, employed the time elapsed since the events on the Brenta in ameliorating his position in Italy; but if he had somewhat less to dread from the princes of that country, the danger on the side of Austria was only becoming more alarming, and his forces to parry it were lamentably inadequate. The eighty-third and fortieth demi-brigades he had so urgently requested, were still detained in the south of France. He had 12,000 men in the Tyrol, under Vaubois, planted in advance of Trent on the banks of the Lavisio; about 16,000 or 17,000 under Massena and Augereau, on the Brenta and the Adige; lastly, 8000 or 9000 before Mantua; so that his army consisted of 36,000 or 38,000 men. Davidovich, who had remained in the Tyrol after the discomfiture of Wurmser, with a few thousand men, now commanded 18,000. Alvinzy was advancing from Friuli on the Piave with about 40,000. Bonaparte was consequently in extreme jeopardy; for to resist 60,000 men he had but 36,000, fatigued by a triple campaign, and daily diminished by the fevers they caught in the rice plantations of Lombardy. He wrote despondingly to the Directory, and warned it he was about to lose Italy.

The Directory, discerning the full extent of the peril menacing Bonaparte, and being unable to forward him succours with sufficient celerity, formed the design of suspending hostilities by means of a negotiation. Lord Malmesbury was at Paris, as we have mentioned: he was awaiting the reply of his government to the communications of the Directory, which had insisted upon his producing credentials from all the powers, and expressing himself more clearly respecting the principle of compensation. The English ministry, after an interval of nineteen days, had at length, on the 24th Brumaire (14th November), intimated in rejoinder that the pretensions of France were unprecedented, and that it was usual for a belligerent to demand to treat in the name of its allies, before possessing their formal authority; that England was assured of obtaining such authority, but that it was previously necessary for France to give a frank explanation touching the principle of compensation, which was the sole basis whereon the negotiation could be opened. The British cabinet added, that the answer of the Directory was filled with unbecoming insinuations as to the intentions of his Britannic majesty, which it was beneath his dignity to rebut, and that he would refrain from dwelling on them, to avoid impeding the progress of the negotiations. On the same day, the Directory, determined to be prompt and categoric, replied to Lord Malmesbury that it admitted the principle of compensation, but required him forthwith to specify the objects to which he would apply that principle.

The Directory was competent to return this answer without committing itself too far, since, albeit refusing to cede Belgium and Luxembourg, it had at its disposal Lombardy and sundry other small territories. For the rest, the negotiation itself was obviously illusory; the Directory could anticipate no real result therefrom; and it resolved to baffle the subtlety of England by dispatching an envoy direct to Vienna, empowered to conclude a separate accommodation with the emperor. The first proposition this envoy would submit, established an armistice in Germany and Italy, to continue for at least six months. The Rhine and the Adige were to divide the armies of the two powers. The sieges of Mantua and Kehl were to be suspended. The provisions necessary for the diurnal consumption of Mantua might be daily introduced, so as to leave the two parties in their present state at the close of the armistice. France would thus secure the preservation of Kehl, and Austria that of Mantua. A negotiation was to be immediately opened for the conclusion of peace. The conditions offered by France were the following:—Austria to cede Belgium and Luxembourg to France; France to restore Lombardy to Austria, and the Palatinate to the Empire, thus relinquishing, on the latter point, the barrier of the Rhine; and to consent, moreover, with the view of indemnifying Austria for the loss of the Low Countries, to the secularisation of several bishoprics included in the Germanic empire. The emperor to undertake that he would neither directly nor indirectly interfere in the affairs between France and the Pope, and lend his influence to procure for the Stadtholder indemnities in Germany. This last was a condition essential to the tranquillity of Holland, and to the satisfaction of the King of Prussia, whose sister had espoused the deposed stadtholder. These terms were singularly moderate, and proved the desire felt by the Directory to terminate the horrors of warfare, and its lively solicitude for the army of Italy.

The Directory selected as the bearer of these propositions General Clarke, who was employed in the offices of the war department under Carnot. His instructions were signed on the 26th Brumaire (16th November). But before he could prepare for his mission, reach Vienna, and obtain a reception or a hearing, some considerable interval must elapse, and, meanwhile, events followed each other with wondrous rapidity in Italy.

Marshal Alvinzy, having thrown bridges over the Piave, had moved towards the Brenta by the 11th Brumaire (1st November). The plan of the Austrians, upon this occasion, was to attack concurrently by the mountains of the Tyrol and by the plain. Davidovich was to chase Vaubois from his positions, and descend the two banks of the Adige to Verona. Alvinzy, on his part, was to cross the Piave and the Brenta, advance on the Adige, enter Verona with the bulk of his army, and effect a junction with Davidovich. The two Austrian armies were intended to start from that point, and march in concert to the deblockade of Mantua and the deliverance of Wurmser.

Alvinzy, after passing the Piave, moved on the Brenta, where Massena was posted with his division. He, Massena, having ascertained the strength of the enemy, thereupon recoiled. Bonaparte marched to his aid with the division of Augereau. He enjoined Vaubois, at the same time, to check Davidovich in the valley of the Upper Adige, and to wrest from him, if he could, his position on the Lavisio. He proceeded in person to meet Alvinzy, resolved, despite the disproportion of forces, to attack him impetuously, and disperse his army at the very commencement of the campaign. He arrived on the morning of the 16th Brumaire (6th November) in sight of the enemy. The Austrians had taken up positions in front of the Brenta, from Carmignano to Bassano; their reserves had remained in the rear, beyond the Brenta. Bonaparte directed upon them all his forces. Massena attacked Liptai and Provera before Carmignano; Augereau attacked Quasdanovich before Bassano. The actions were animated and sanguinary; the troops displayed an indomitable prowess. Liptai and Provera were driven beyond the Brenta by Massena; Quasdanovich was repulsed on Bassano by Augereau. Bonaparte desired to have penetrated into Bassano that very day; but the approach of the Austrian reserves prevented him. It became necessary to postpone the assault until the following day. The unfortunate tidings reached him during the night that Vaubois had sustained a reverse on the Upper Adige. That general had bravely attacked the positions of Davidovich, and success was already dawning on his efforts; but suddenly a panic had seized upon his soldiers, notwithstanding all their approved valour, and they fled in disorder. He had eventually rallied them in that famous defile of Calliano, where the army had evinced such signal intrepidity in the invasion of the Tyrol. Whilst trusting to maintain himself in that rugged pass, Davidovich, directing a corps on the other bank of the Adige, turned Calliano, and doubled the position. Vaubois sent to apprise Bonaparte that he must retire to avoid being cut off, and expressed his fears lest Davidovich should forestall him in the important positions of La Corona and Rivoli, which cover the route into the Tyrol between the Adige and the Lake of Garda.

Bonaparte instantly discerned the danger of further pressing upon Alvinzy, when Vaubois, who was with his left in the Tyrol, might probably lose La Corona, Rivoli, even Verona, and be driven back into the plain. He would then have been cut off from his principal wing, and placed with 15,000 or 16,000 men between Davidovich and Alvinzy. He consequently took an instant resolution to retrograde. He directed a trusty officer to fly to Verona, there collect all the troops he could muster, and move them to Rivoli and La Corona, so as to anticipate Davidovich in those posts, and secure Vaubois leisure to reach them.

On the morrow, 17th Brumaire (7th November), he wheeled back, and passed through the town of Vicenza, whose inhabitants were greatly amazed to behold the French army in retreat after the successful combats of the eve. He repaired to Verona, at which place he concentrated his army. He ascended alone to Rivoli and La Corona, where he had the satisfaction of finding Vaubois's troops rallied and prepared to make head against a fresh attack of Davidovich. He determined to impress a stern lesson on the thirty-ninth and eighty-fifth demi-brigades, which had yielded to a panic. He assembled the whole division, and, addressing those two demi-brigades, he upbraided them with their want of discipline and their flight. Then turning to the chief of the staff, he said: "Let it be inscribed on the colours that the thirty-ninth and eighty-fifth no longer form part of the army of Italy." These expressions caused in the soldiers of the two demi-brigades the most poignant sorrow; they surrounded Bonaparte, assured him they had fought one against three, and entreated to be sent into the vanguard, that they might show whether or not they were worthy of the army of Italy. Bonaparte indemnified them for his severity by a few gracious phrases, which transported them with joy, and he left them firmly resolved to avenge their tarnished honour by a desperate valour.

Only 8000 men, of the 12,000 he commanded before his recent mishap, survived to Vaubois. Bonaparte distributed them to the best advantage in the positions of La Corona and Rivoli, and, after satisfying himself that Vaubois could hold his ground there for a few days, and cover his left and rear, he returned to Verona to operate against Alvinzy. The highway leading from the Brenta to Verona, following the foot of the mountains, passes by Vicenza, Montebello, Villa-Nuova, and Caldiero. Alvinzy, surprised to see Bonaparte fall back on the morrow of a successful engagement, had followed him at a distance, surmising that the progress of Davidovich alone could have induced him to retrograde. He indulged the flattering hope that his plan of junction at Verona was about to be accomplished. He halted about three leagues from Verona, on the heights of Caldiero, which command the route. These heights afforded an admirable position for holding at bay an army issuing from Verona. Alvinzy established himself on them, planted batteries, and omitted nothing to render the position impregnable. Bonaparte reconnoitered the ground, and determined to attack him without delay; for the situation of Vaubois at Rivoli was very precarious, and allowed him but little time to act separately against Alvinzy. He marched against him in the afternoon of the 21st (11th November), repulsed his vanguard, and bivouacked with the divisions of Massena and Augereau at the base of Caldiero. At break of day, he discovered that Alvinzy, strongly intrenched, was prepared to give battle. The position was assailable on one side, that which rested on the mountains, and which had not been fortified by Alvinzy with sufficient precaution. Bonaparte directed Massena on that point, and charged Augereau to attack the rest of the line. A hot engagement ensued; but the rain fell in torrents, which gave a decided advantage to the Austrians, whose artillery had been previously placed in good positions, whereas that of the French, obliged to move in roads become impracticable, could not be brought on the suitable points, and was thus rendered wholly inoperative. Nevertheless, Massena succeeded in scaling the height neglected by Alvinzy. But suddenly the rain changed to a frigid sleet, which a coarse wind drove violently upon the faces of the soldiers. At this moment, Alvinzy marched his reserve on the position that Massena had carried, and recovered all his posts. Bonaparte vainly strove to repeat his efforts; the case was hopeless. The two armies passed the night in mutual presence. The rain poured incessantly, and reduced the French soldiers to the most dismal condition. The next morning, 23d Brumaire (13th November), Bonaparte re-entered Verona.

The situation of the army had become most critical. After having fruitlessly driven the enemy beyond the Brenta, and sacrificed without benefit a multitude of brave men; after having lost the Tyrol and 4000 men on the left; after having fought an unsuccessful battle at Caldiero, with the view of forcing Alvinzy from Verona, thereby still further diminishing its strength unavailably—all resource seemed at an end. The left, which scarcely counted 8000 men, was liable every moment to be repelled from La Corona and Rivoli, and in that case Bonaparte would be surrounded at Verona. The two divisions of Massena and Augereau, which formed the active army opposed to Alvinzy, were reduced, by the two battles, to 14,000 or 15,000 men. How could a force of 14,000 or 15,000 men cope with one of nearly 40,000? The artillery, by which the French had always contrived to counterbalance the superiority of their foes, was rendered immoveable by the state of the roads, so that no hope remained of contending with any chance of success. The army was stricken with dismay. Those hardy soldiers, tested by so many fatigues and perils, began to murmur. Like all intelligent troops, they were subject to emotions of discontent, because they were capable of reflection and judgment. "After having destroyed," they said, "two armies sent against us, we are expected also to destroy those which were opposed to the armies of the Rhine. Wurmser succeeds Beaulieu; Alvinzy succeeds Wurmser: the contest is renewed every day. We cannot perform the task of all. It is not our province to combat Alvinzy, any more than it was our part to fight Wurmser. If all had done their duty like us, the war would have been finished. Still," they added, "if succours were only given us proportioned to our dangers! But we are abandoned at the extremity of Italy; we are left alone to contend with two innumerable armies. And when, after having shed our blood in myriads of actions, we are at last driven over the Alps, we shall return without honour or glory, like fugitives who have failed in their duty." Such was the language of the soldiers in their bivouacks. Bonaparte, who partook their dissatisfaction and chagrin, wrote to the Directory, on the 24th Brumaire (14th November), in a desponding and upbraiding strain. "All our superior officers," he said, "all our chosen generals, are disabled; the army of Italy, reduced to a handful of men, is exhausted. The heroes of Millesimo, Lodi, Castiglione, and Bassano, have died in the service of their country or are in the hospitals. There remain to the regiments only their renown and their honest pride. Joubert, Lannes, Lamare, Victor, Murat, Charlot, Dupuis, Rampon, Pigeon, Ménard, Chabrand, are wounded. We are isolated in the depths of Italy: the brave men who survive see death inevitable, amidst such continual hazards and with forces so greatly inferior. Perhaps, the knell of the valiant Augereau, of the intrepid Massena, is about to sound —— Then! then, what will become of these heroic men? This idea renders me cautious; I dare no longer confront death, as it would be a cause of discouragement to those who are the objects of my solicitude. If I had received the eighty-third, composed of 3500 men known to the army, I would have answered for all! Perhaps, within a few days, 40,000 will be insufficient! To-day," added Bonaparte, "we give the troops repose; to-morrow, according to the movements of the enemy, we will act."

Whilst addressing these bitter complaints to the government, he affected, nevertheless, a perfect confidence in the eyes of his soldiers. He instructed the officers to enforce upon them that a vigorous effort must be made, and that such effort would be the last; that, Alvinzy vanquished, the resources of Austria would be utterly exhausted, Italy conquered, peace secured, and the glory of the army immortal. His presence, his words, reanimated drooping courage. The invalids, burning with fever, poured in numbers from the hospitals, on learning that the army was in danger, and hurried to resume their stations in its ranks. Deep and anxious emotions throbbed in all hearts. The Austrians had approached Verona in the course of the day, and exhibited the ladders they had prepared for mounting the walls. The Veronese manifested their joy at the expectation that, within a few hours, Alvinzy would be united to Davidovich in their city, and the French exterminated. Some amongst them, compromised by their attachment to the French cause, perambulated the streets in sadness, counting the diminutive force of their champions.

The army waited with breathless interest the orders of the general, expecting every moment he would command a movement. However, the day of the 24th elapsed, and, contrary to custom, the order of the day gave no announcement. But Bonaparte had not wasted time: after pondering on the scene of warfare, he had formed one of those resolutions wherewith despair inspires genius. Towards night, an order was issued for all the army to get under arms. The utmost stillness was enjoined. The troops were put in motion; but, instead of proceeding forward, they retrograded, repassed the Adige by the bridges of Verona, and issued from the city by the gate leading to Milan. They imagined the intention of defending Italy was finally relinquished: a mournful dejection oppressed the ranks. At some distance from Verona, however, they diverged to the left: instead of continuing to remove from the Adige, they began to skirt it and descend its course. They followed it for a space of four leagues. Eventually, after a march of several hours, they arrived at Ronco, where a bridge of boats had been constructed by the foresight of the general; they recrossed the stream, and, at break of day, once more found themselves beyond the Adige, which they feared to have abandoned for ever. The plan conceived by their general was extraordinary, and one well fitted to surprise both armies. The Adige, on leaving Verona, ceases for an interval to flow perpendicularly from the mountains to the sea, and bends towards the east: in this oblique course, it approaches the route from Verona to the Brenta, upon which Alvinzy was encamped. Bonaparte, when at Ronco, was consequently on the flank, and almost on the rear, of the Austrians. In this position he was stationed amid vast morasses. These marshes were traversed by two causeways, whereof the one, to the left, ascending the Adige by Porcil and Gombione, led again to Verona, whilst the other, to the right, passed over a small river called the Alpon, at the village of Arcole, and joined the road from Verona near Villa-Nuova, behind Caldiero.

Bonaparte, therefore, held at Ronco two causeways, both of which communicated with the high road occupied by the Austrians—the one between Caldiero and Verona, the other between Caldiero and Villa-Nuova. His project was based on the following considerations:—Amidst these morasses, the advantage of numbers became of no avail; the armies could deploy only on the causeways, and on causeways the intrepidity of the heads of columns decides every thing. By the causeway on the left, which joined the road between Caldiero and Verona, he could fall on the Austrians if they attempted to storm Verona. By that on the right, which passed the Alpon at the bridge of Arcole, and terminated near Villa-Nuova, he could debouch on the rear of Alvinzy, capture his magazines and baggage, and intercept his retreat. He was thus unassailable at Ronco, and extended his two arms around the enemy. He had barricaded the gates of Verona, and left Kilmaine in it with 1500 men, in order to withstand a first assault. This combination, so singularly bold and profound, struck the army with mingled admiration and astonishment; it instantly comprehended the latent purpose, and resumed all its buoyant aspirations.

Bonaparte planted Massena on the left dyke or causeway, with the view of ascending to Gombione and Porcil, and taking the enemy in flank if he marched on Verona. Augereau he directed on the right to debouch upon Villa-Nuova. The day had now fully broken. Massena placed himself in observation on the left dyke; Augereau, to traverse the right dyke, had to cross the Alpon by the bridge of Arcole. Some Croatian battalions, detached to reconnoitre the country, chanced to occupy that position at the moment. They lined the river, and pointed their cannon on the bridge. They saluted Augereau's vanguard with a vigorous fire, and compelled it to recoil. Augereau hurried to the spot, and again led his troops forward; but the fire from the bridge and the opposite bank once more checked them. He was obliged to yield before this obstacle, and halt in his march.

Meanwhile, Alvinzy, who had his attention centred on Verona, and who believed the French army still there, was surprised to hear a brisk firing amidst the marshes. He never supposed that General Bonaparte could have chosen such ground, and he concluded it came from some detached corps of light troops. But his cavalry soon arrived to inform him that the engagement was serious, and that the firing proceeded from all quarters. Without being fully enlightened on the matter, he dispatched two divisions: one, under Provera, followed the left dyke; the other, under Mitrouski, proceeded along the right dyke, and advanced on Arcole. Massena, perceiving the Austrians approach, allowed them to advance on the narrow causeway; and when he deemed them sufficiently entangled, he charged upon them at full speed, threw them back, hurled them into the marsh, and cut down and submerged a considerable number. On the other side, Mitrouski's division arrived at Arcole, debouched over the bridge, and wound along the dyke like Provera's. Augereau fell upon it, broke it, and cast part of it into the marsh. He pursued it, and attempted to pass the bridge in its wake; but the bridge was even better guarded than in the morning; a numerous artillery defended the approach, and all the rest of the Austrian line was drawn up on the bank of the Alpon, firing on the dyke and raking it crosswise. Augereau seized a flag, and bore it on the bridge. His soldiers followed him, but a terrible fire forced them back. Generals Lannes, Verne, Bon, and Verdier, were dangerously wounded. The column recoiled, and the troops crept along the side of the dyke to protect themselves from the Austrian balls.

Bonaparte saw from Ronco the whole Austrian army break up; for, now apprised of the danger, it hastened to quit Caldiero, to avoid being taken in the rear at Villa-Nuova. It was with deep mortification he perceived a decisive result escaping him. He had indeed sent Guyeux with a brigade to attempt the passage of the Alpon below Arcole, but several hours must be consumed in the execution of that enterprise; and yet it was of the last importance to clear the Alpon without a moment's delay, in order to arrive in time on the rear of Alvinzy, and obtain a complete triumph: the fate of Italy hung on the contingency. The conviction formed, he galloped off with all speed, arrived near the bridge, threw himself from his horse, approached the soldiers, who had squatted on the sides of the dyke, asked them if they were still the conquerors of Lodi, animated them by his words and gestures, and, snatching a banner, exclaimed to them, "Follow your general!" At this cry, many of the soldiers remounted on the causeway and followed him; unfortunately, the impulse could not be communicated to the whole column, the residue of which remained behind the dyke. Bonaparte advanced, bearing the flag aloft, amidst a storm of bullets and grape. All his generals surrounded him. Lannes, already wounded by two shots in the course of the day, was struck by a third. Young Muiron, the general's aid-de-camp, essayed to cover him with his body, and fell lifeless at his feet. However, the column was on the point of clearing the bridge, when a final discharge stopped and swept it back. The rear abandoned the head of the column. Thereupon the soldiers who stood near the general seized him in their arms, bore him away amidst the roar and smoke of the fire, and endeavoured to reseat him on horseback. An Austrian column, which charged upon them, threw them in disorder into the marsh. Bonaparte fell, and sunk to his middle in the bog. The soldiers instantly perceived his extreme peril: "Forward!" they shouted, "to save the general!" They flew, at the heels of Belliard and Vignolles, to extricate him. They drew him from the miry pit, planted him on horseback, and he returned to Ronco.

By this time, Guyeux had succeeded in passing below Arcole, and in carrying the village by the opposite bank. But it was too late. Alvinzy had removed his magazines and baggage; he had deployed in the plain, and was in a position to frustrate the designs of Bonaparte. All this display of heroism and genius was consequently fruitless. Bonaparte might have avoided the obstacle of Arcole by throwing his bridge over the Adige a little below Ronco, that is to say, at Alboredo, a point whereat the Alpon has united with the Adige. But in that case he must have debouched into the plain, which it behoved him to shun;* and he would not have been in a capacity to hasten by the left dyke, in case of need, to the relief of Verona. He was therefore justified in acting as he had; and, although the success was not complete, important results were gained. Alvinzy had quitted his formidable position of Caldiero; he had again descended into the plain; he no longer menaced Verona, and he had lost a great number of men in the marshes. The two dykes had become the only intermediate field of battle between the two armies, which ensured the advantage to prowess, and took it from superiority of force. In fine, the French soldiers, animated by the conflict, had recovered all their confidence.

* I here mention a criticism often addressed to Bonaparte respecting this celebrated battle, and the reply he has himself made in his Memoirs.

Bonaparte, who had to attend to manifold cares and hazards at once, now turned his attention to his left wing, stationed at Rivoli and La Corona. As it might be momentarily overpowered, he desired to have it in his power to fly to its aid. He therefore judged it requisite to fall back from Gombione and Arcole, repass the Adige at Ronco, and bivouac on this side the river, that he might be in a position to succour Vaubois, if, during the night, he should learn his defeat. Such was this first day of the 25th Brumaire (15th November).

The night passed over without any untoward intelligence. Vaubois was known to be still in possession of Rivoli. The exploit of Castiglione served to protect Bonaparte on that quarter. Davidovich, who commanded a corps in the affair at Castiglione, had received such an impression from that event, that he durst not advance before obtaining certain tidings of Alvinzy. Thus the spell of Bonaparte's genius hovered where he was himself absent. The morning of the 26th Brumaire (16th November) dawned; the hostile troops met on the two dykes. The French charged with the bayonet, drove in the Austrians, forced a great number into the marshes, and made numerous prisoners. They captured several standards and pieces of cannon. Bonaparte directed a fire across the Alpon, but adventured no decisive effort to pass it. As the night closed in, he again drew back his columns, removed them along the dykes, and rallied them on the other bank of the Adige, content to have harassed the enemy during the whole day, and awaiting more certain information from Vaubois. The second night elapsed as before; the news from Vaubois were cheerful. A third day might be devoted to a definitive struggle with Alvinzy. At length the sun rose for the third time upon this fearful field of carnage. It was the 27th Brumaire (17th November). Bonaparte calculated that the enemy, in killed, wounded, drowned, and prisoners, must have lost nearly a third of his army. He deemed him exhausted and discouraged, whilst he found his own soldiers full of enthusiasm. He therefore resolved to quit the dykes, and carry the field of battle into the plain beyond the Alpon. As on the preceding days, the French, debouching from Ronco, encountered the Austrians on the causeways. Massena still occupied the left dyke; on the right dyke was planted General Robert, who was instructed to charge whilst Augereau diverged to cross the Alpon, near its junction with the Adige. Massena experienced at first a strenuous resistance; but he placed his hat on the point of his sword, and thus marched at the head of the soldiers. As on the previous occasions, many of the enemy were slain, stifled, and taken. On the right dyke, General Robert advanced for a while with success; but he was killed, and his column eventually repulsed almost to the bridge of Ronco.

Bonaparte, spying the danger, placed the thirty-second in a plantation of willows which skirted the dyke. Whilst the antagonist column, victorious over Robert, was advancing, the thirty-second suddenly sprang from its ambuscade, took it in flank, and threw it into irremediable disorder. It comprised 3000 Croats; the greater part were killed or made captive. The dykes being thus swept, Bonaparte determined to clear the Alpon: Augereau had already passed it on the extreme right. Bonaparte recalled Massena from the left to the right dyke, directed him upon Arcole, which was evacuated, and thus moved his whole army into the plain, confronting that of Alvinzy. Before ordering the charge, he sought to infuse terror by means of a stratagem. A marsh, stocked with reeds, covered the left wing of the enemy he directed Colonel Hercule to take twenty-five of his guides,* defile through the reeds, and make a sudden onslaught with a loud clang of trumpets. The intrepid band of twenty-five straightway proceeded to execute the order. Bonaparte then gave the signal to Massena and Augereau. They charged impetuously on the Austrian line, which stubbornly resisted. But, at a critical moment, a great noise of trumpets was heard: the Austrians, believing themselves assailed by an entire division of cavalry, yielded ground. At the same instant, the garrison of Legnago, which Bonaparte had called out to demonstrate on their rear, appeared in the distance, and added to their disquietude. Thereupon they retired; and, after seventy-two hours of murderous conflict, discouraged and overwhelmed with fatigue, they ceded the victory to the heroism of a few thousand warriors, and to the genius of a great captain.

The two armies, exhausted by their efforts, passed the night in the plain. By daybreak on the morrow, Bonaparte recommenced the pursuit on Vicenza. Arrived at the point of the high road leading from Verona to the Brenta which touches Villa-Nuova, he devolved upon his cavalry alone the task of pursuing the enemy, and returned towards Verona by the route of Villa-Nuova and Caldiero, for the purpose of bearing succours to Vaubois. He learnt on the way that Vaubois had been constrained to abandon La Corona and Rivoli, and to fall back on Castel-Nuovo. He redoubled his speed, and arrived the same evening at Verona—passing over the field of battle which Alvinzy had occupied. He entered the city by the gate opposite that through which he had departed. When the Veronese saw that handful of men, who had issued as fugitives by the Milan gate, return as conquerors by the Venice gate, they were amazed beyond expression. Friends and foes were alike unable to restrain their admiration of the general and the soldiers who had so gloriously changed the fortune of the war. From that moment, fears and hopes were equally dismissed that the French were to be expelled from Italy. Bonaparte instantly sent forward Massena to Castel-Nuovo, and Augereau to Dolce, by the left bank of the Adige. Davidovich, assailed on all sides, was promptly driven back into the Tyrol, with the loss of sundry prisoners. Bonaparte contented himself with reoccupying the positions of La Corona and Rivoli, without attempting to ascend as far as Trent, and to regain possession of the Tyrol. The French army was greatly weakened by this last struggle. The Austrian army had lost 5000 prisoners and 8000 or 10,000 killed and wounded, but was still upwards of 40,000 strong, including the corps under Davidovich. It retreated into the Tyrol and on the Brenta, to repose after its fatigues; it was far from having suffered like the armies of Wurmser and Beaulieu. The French, from their exhaustion and deficiency, had been able merely to repulse without destroying it. All idea of pursuing it was necessarily relinquished, or, at all events, until the promised reinforcements should have arrived. Bonaparte contented himself with occupying the Adige from Dolce to the sea.

This fresh victory occasioned a rapturous joy both in Italy and in France. All men extolled that indomitable spirit which, with a force of 14,000 or 15,000 in array against 40,000, had never dreamt of retreating; that fertile and profound genius which had so promptly discovered, in the dykes of Ronco, a perfectly new field of battle, that annihilated the advantage of number, and opened up the flanks of the enemy. They celebrated more especially the heroism displayed at the bridge of Arcole; and the young general was every where depictured in the midst of the fire and the smoke, bearing a flag in his hand. The two councils, when declaring, according to usage, that the army of Italy had deserved well of their country, decreed, moreover, that the standards borne by Generals Bonaparte and Augereau on the bridge of Arcole, should be presented to them as trophies to be preserved in their families: an admirable and noble recompense, worthy of an heroic age, and infinitely more glorious than the diadem subsequently awarded by infatuation to transcendent genius!

* [If the reader has forgotten who Bonaparte's "guides" were, he will find an account of their institution at page 594 of this history.]

CHAPTER L.

CLARKE AT THE HEAD-QUARTERS OF THE ARMY OF ITALY.—RUPTURE OF THE NEGOTIATIONS WITH THE BRITISH CABINET.—EXPEDITION TO IRELAND.—ADMINISTRATIVE LABOURS OF THE DIRECTORY DURING THE WINTER OF THE YEAR V.—STATE OF THE FINANCES.—CAPITULATION OF KEHL.—LAST ATTEMPT OF AUSTRIA UPON ITALY.—VICTORIES OF RIVOLI AND LA FAVORITA.—FALL OF MANTUA.—CLOSE OF THE MEMORABLE CAMPAIGN OF 1796.

General Clarke, charged with pacific overtures to the Emperor of Austria, reached, on his way to Vienna, the head-quarters of the army of Italy. The essential object of his mission had lapsed, for the battle of Arcole rendered an armistice unnecessary. Bonaparte, whom General Clarke was instructed to consult, entirely disapproved of the projected armistice and of its conditions. The reasons he alleged were just and potential. An armistice could now produce but one advantage, namely, the preservation of the fortress of Kehl on the Rhine, which the Archduke Charles was besieging with inexorable pertinacity; and, for this very secondary object, Mantua was relinquished. Kehl merely afforded a tête-de-pont, which was not indispensable for invading Germany. The capture of Mantua, on the contrary, involved the definitive conquest of Italy, and would warrant the exaction, in restitution, of Mayence and the entire line of the Rhine. An armistice would evidently jeopardise this conquest; for Mantua, filled with invalids and reduced to stinted rations, could not defer its surrender more than a month. The provisions to be introduced, according to the stipulation, would tend to recruit the health and vigour of the garrison. It would be impossible to ascertain the exact quantity exigible under the convention: and Wurmser, by instituting a rigid economy, might husband supplies enabling him to prolong his resistance, in case hostilities were eventually resumed. The series of battles fought to cover the blockade of Mantua, would thus become altogether fruitless, and the contest must be recommenced with all the attendant sacrifices. Nor was this all. The Pope would, of course, be comprehended in the armistice by Austria, and thus would be lost the opportunity of chastising him, and extorting from him twenty or thirty millions, necessary for behoof of the army, and serviceable in the prosecution of a fresh campaign. In short, Bonaparte, diving into the future, recommended that, instead of suspending hostilities, they should be continued with vigour; but that the war should be centred on its true theatre, and a reinforcement of 30,000 men detached into Italy. He undertook on such terms to march on Vienna, and win in two months a peace, the frontier of the Rhine, and a republic in Italy. Undoubtedly, such a combination placed in his hands all the military and political operations of the war; but whether it were dictated by selfishness or otherwise, it was based on sound and comprehensive views, and the future demonstrated its wisdom.

Nevertheless, in obedience to the Directory, communications were forwarded to the Austrian generals on the Rhine and the Adige, proposing to them an armistice, and requesting a safe conduct for Clarke. The Archduke Charles replied to Moreau that he could not hearken to any proposal for an armistice, as his powers did not embrace such a subject, and that it must be referred to the Aulic Council. Alvinzy returned a similar answer, and dispatched a courier to Vienna. The Austrian ministry, secretly devoted to England, was little inclined to entertain the overtures of France. The cabinet of London had imparted to it the mission intrusted to Lord Malmesbury, and laboured to persuade it that the emperor would act more advantageously for himself by taking part in the negotiation opened at Paris, than by concluding a separate accommodation, since the English conquests in the two Indias were to be sacrificed in order to procure for him the restitution of the Low Countries. Besides the instigations of the English cabinet, the imperial counsellors had other reasons for rejecting the propositions of the Directory. They flattered themselves with the speedy reduction of the fortress of Kehl, when the French, checked along the course of the Rhine, would be unable to clear that bulwark, and additional detachments might be safely withdrawn for removal to the Adige. These detachments, joined to the new levies in most active progress throughout the Austrian possessions, would allow another attempt to be made on Italy; and perhaps that terrible army, which had annihilated so many Austrian battalions, would finally succumb under such reiterated assaults.

The inflexibility of the German character was in this instance perfectly exemplified; despite such disastrous reverses, the idea of recovering the fair region of Italy was yet clung to with steadfast tenacity. Hence, access to Vienna was denied to the French envoy. Moreover, repugnance was felt to the presence of an observer in the metropolis of the empire, and no desire existed for opening a direct negotiation. The armistice, indeed, would have been welcome on the Adige, but not on the Rhine. Clarke was informed, in reply, that if he betook himself to Vicenza, he would there find the Baron von Vincent, with whom he might confer as to him seemed meet. An interview between these parties was accordingly held at Vicenza. The Austrian nuncio intimated that the emperor could not receive an envoy from the republic, as that would imply a recognition; and, with respect to the armistice, he declared that it was admissible with a limitation to Italy. This restriction was preposterous; and it is difficult to conceive how the Austrian ministry could seriously submit such a proposition, for whilst it rescued Mantua, it abandoned Kehl to fate, and the French must have been shallow indeed to accept so bootless a reciprocity. At the same time, the cabinet of Vienna, mindful to prepare the way for a separate negotiation in case of exigency, allowed its nuncio to inform the French commissioner that if he had any proposals to make relative to peace, he might repair to Turin and communicate them to the Austrian ambassador resident at the Sardinian court. Thus, through the suggestions of England and the futile hopes of the imperial councillors, the noxious scheme of an armistice was frustrated. Clarke proceeded to Turin, in order to profit, should circumstances render it expedient, by the intermediary offered him at that court. He had, besides, another mission—to watch General Bonaparte. The genius of that young man had appeared so extraordinary, his character so absolute and energetic, that, without any precise ground, he was supposed ambitious. He had insisted upon conducting the war according to his own ideas, and had tendered his resignation when a plan was prescribed to him which he disapproved; he had acted with sovereign independence in Italy, dispensing to its princes peace or war, under the specious appellation of armistices; he had complained with haughty indignation that the negotiations with the Pope were not left exclusively to his management, and had demanded that the task of prosecuting them should be forthwith delegated to him; he treated with harshness the commissioners Garau and Salicetti, when they ventured to adopt measures which provoked his displeasure, and he had obliged them to quit his head-quarters; in fine, he had not scrupled to remit funds to other armies without any warrant on the part of the government, and without using the indispensable medium of the public treasury. All these facts indicated a man lustful to perform alone what he deemed himself alone capable of fitly accomplishing. It was as yet but the impatience of genius, scorning the thraldom of dictation; but in this impatience the germ of despotic will might be detected. When seen to arouse Upper Italy against its old lords, and to create or subvert states, he was alleged to contemplate his own elevation to the dukedom of Milan. A presentiment of his aspiring ambition was general, and he himself foreboded the imputation. He complained of being accused, and laboured to dispel obloquy, without the Directory having by word or act given occasion for such disclaimers.

Clarke, therefore, besides his mission to negotiate, was privily instructed to observe Bonaparte. The latter was apprised of the fact, and, acting with the sternness and address peculiar to him, he rendered it obvious he knew the object of his mission, and speedily subjugating him by his ascendancy and insinuating grace—as ineffable, it is represented, as his genius—he converted him into a warm adherent. Clarke possessed considerable acuteness, but he had too large a share of vanity to play the adroit and subtle spy. He remained in Italy, sojourning sometimes at Turin and sometimes at head-quarters, and eventually became a creature of Bonaparte rather than of the Directory.

At Paris, the English cabinet had exerted its ingenuity to protract the negotiation; but the French government, by prompt and explicit rejoinders, finally constrained Lord Malmesbury to explain himself. That plenipotentiary, as we have recorded, had originally laid down the principle of a general negotiation and of reciprocal compensations: on its part, the Directory had insisted upon the production of credentials from all the allies, and upon a more precise explanation of the compensatory principle. The English envoy had taken nineteen days to compose an answer; ultimately, he had replied that the credentials were solicited, but that before obtaining them, the French government must distinctly admit the principle of compensations. The Directory had then demanded that the objects of retrocession should be forthwith specified. At this point we left the negotiation. Lord Malmesbury again wrote to London, and, after a lapse of twelve days, delivered a communication on the 6th Frimaire (26th November), to the effect that his court had nothing to add to its previous statements, so long as the French government refrained from formally admitting the proposed principle. This amounted to a subterfuge; for, by demanding the specification of the objects intended for compensation, France evidently admitted the principle itself. To correspond with London, and consume twelve days for such an evasion, was assuredly trifling with the Directory. It answered, as was its wont, on the following day; and in a note of four lines, stated that its previous note necessarily implied the admission of the compensation principle, but that, to obviate doubts, it formally admitted that basis, and demanded the immediate designation of the objects to which it was to be made referable. The Directory begged to be informed, moreover, whether Lord Malmesbury must write to London as every question arose. Lord Malmesbury replied vaguely that he would be obliged to communicate with his cabinet whenever the question required fresh instructions. He wrote once more, and remained twenty days a passive sojourner in Paris. The time had now come when he must leave the indefinite generalities wherein he had shrouded his intentions, and introduce the delicate topic of the Low Countries. To explain his views on that point was to break off the negotiation, and it is clear the British cabinet sought to delay the rupture as long as possible. At length, on the 28th Frimaire (18th December), Lord Malmesbury had an interview with the minister Delacroix, and delivered to him a note wherein the pretensions of the British government were set forth. It required France to restore to the powers of the Continent all she had conquered: to Austria, Belgium and Luxumbourg; to the Empire, the German principalities on the left bank of the Rhine; to evacuate the whole of Italy, and replace it in the status quo ante bellum; to restore certain portions of territory to Holland, such as the Maritime Flanders, for example, so that it might be rendered independent; in fine, to make modifications in her existing constitution. The English cabinet undertook to restore the colonies of Holland only in case the Stadtholderate were re-established, and even then not all: it claimed to retain some as an indemnity for the war, the Cape of Good Hope being of the number. For all these sacrifices, it offered the restitution of two or three islands which the fortune of war had torn from France in the Antilles, Martinique, Saint Lucia, and Tobago, burdened, moreover, with the condition that the whole of Saint-Domingo should not remain under French dominion. Thus France, after an iniquitous war, in which all the justice had been on her side, in maintaining which she had disbursed enormous sums, and wherefrom she had emerged victorious, was not to have a single province, whilst the northern powers had partitioned a powerful kingdom, and England had made enormous acquisitions in India! France, which still occupied the line of the Rhine and was mistress of Italy, was to evacuate the Rhine and Italy on the simple summons of England! Such conditions were absurd and inadmissible; the mere submission of them was offensive, and they ought not to have been entertained. Delacroix, however, listened to them with a politeness which affected the British envoy, and even led him to hope the negotiation might be continued.

Delacroix, in the course of the conference, relied on an argument which was valueless, to wit, that the Low Countries were declared national territory by the constitution; to which the English minister objected a fact equally pithless in the controversy—that the treaty of Utrecht assigned them to Austria.* The constitution might be obligatory on the French nation, but it neither concerned nor bound foreign nations. The treaty of Utrecht was, like all treaties made in this world, an arrangement resulting from force, which force might sweep away. The only reason the French minister ought to have given was, that the union of Belgium with France was just, agreeable to all natural and political harmonies, and warranted by victory. After a lengthened discussion on various accessory points of the negotiation, the two ministers separated. Delacroix reported the result to the Directory, which, justly irritated, resolved to answer the English minister as he richly merited. The memorial of the British plenipotentiary was not signed, having been merely enclosed in a signed letter. The Directory demanded, during the same day, that it should be completed by the necessary forms, and that Lord Malmesbury should furnish his ultimatum within twenty-four hours. Lord Malmesbury, much embarrassed, replied that the memorial was sufficiently authenticated by its enclosure within a signed letter, and that with respect to an ultimatum, it was contrary to all usage to demand one so abruptly. On the following day, the 29th Frimaire (19th December), the Directory intimated to him that it would never listen to any proposition contrary to the laws and treaties which bound the republic. It added, furthermore, that Lord Malmesbury finding it necessary to consult his government every moment, and enacting a part purely passive in the negotiation, his presence at Paris was useless, and that consequently he was ordered to withdraw, he and all his suite, within forty-eight hours. The Directory stated in conclusion, that the negotiation might be carried on by the interchange of couriers, if the British government thought fit to adopt the basis fixed by the French republic.

* [M. Thiers has here adopted an ingenious mode of representing the case. Lord Malmesbury did not adduce the treaty of Utrecht as the chief reason for the restitution of the Low Countries, but to show the futility of Delacroix's plea about the French constitution. Delacroix told Malmesbury that the union of Belgium with France by the constitution was notorious to the whole world, and Malmesbury replied that when the French made that constitution, the treaty of Utrecht was equally notorious.]

Thus finished this negotiation, in which the Directory, so far from infringing established forms, as was alleged, gave a veritable example of frankness in its intercourse with hostile powers. There was no usage violated in its progress. The communications of governments are characterised, like all the relations between individuals, by the peculiar spirit of the age, of the situation, and of the men wielding the sovereign functions. A strong and victorious government holds a language very different from a feeble and vanquished government; and it befitted a republic supported by justice and victory, to speak with decision, promptitude, and publicity.

Pending these events, the grand project of Hoche on Ireland was executed. The English government had viewed the preparations with the utmost alarm, well aware the blow would fall on a vulnerable point, and possibly be productive of disastrous consequences. Notwithstanding the rumours artfully disseminated of an expedition to Portugal or to America, the British minister had sagaciously divined the object of the armaments fitting out at Brest. Pitt had called out the militia, put the coasts in a state of defence, and issued directions to remove every thing into the interior if the French should effect a disembarkation.

Ireland, the intended destination of the expedition, was in a state calculated to inspire the deepest solicitude. The advocates of parliamentary reform and the Catholics formed a body sufficiently numerous to hoist the standard of rebellion. They were ready to adopt a republican government under the guarantee of France, and had sent secret agents to Paris to concert with the Directory. Thus the opportunity seemed auspicious for an expedition into that island, being well-timed for occasioning England the most serious embarrassments, and for reducing her to accept a peace upon somewhat different conditions than she now presumed to offer. Hoche, who had consumed the two fairest years of his life in La Vendée, and who saw the great theatres of action occupied by Bonaparte, Moreau, and Jourdan, burned to open one for himself in Ireland. England was as noble an antagonist as Austria, and the honour to be reaped in combating and vanquishing her was not less brilliant. A new republic had been reared in Italy, as a centre to diffuse the rays of liberty through all that land. Hoche deemed it glorious and possible to establish one in Ireland, by the very side of aristocratic England. He had cultivated an intimate intelligence with Admiral Truguet, the minister of marine, a man of aspiring views. They had pondered together on the means of restoring the importance of the navy and of accomplishing great deeds; for at this time all men strained their faculties to the utmost, all meditated prodigies for the glory and happiness of France. The offensive and defensive alliance concluded with Spain at St Ildefonso, rendered ample resources available, and permitted hopes of mighty achievements. By uniting the Toulon fleet with the Spanish squadrons, and concentrating them in the British Channel with those which France possessed on the Atlantic, a most formidable force might be collected, and a decisive effort made to emancipate the seas; at all events, a firebrand might be thrown into Ireland, and the conquests of England in India seriously interrupted. Admiral Truguet, keenly alive to the importance of carrying instant succours to India, held that the Brest squadron, without awaiting the junction of the French and Spanish fleets in the Channel, should immediately put to sea, land the army of Hoche in Ireland, keep a few thousand men on board, crowd all sail for the Isle of France (the Mauritius), there receive the battalions of blacks presently organising, and transport these auxiliaries into India, to sustain Tippoo Saib in his contest. This vast project was liable to the objection of disembarking in Ireland only a portion of the army destined for the expedition, and of leaving it exposed to great hazards, pending the problematical junction of the squadron under Admiral Villeneuve, appointed to sail from Toulon, of the Spanish fleet which was scattered in the ports of Spain, and of the squadron under Richery expected from America. The enterprise thus planned by Truguet was not attempted. It was determined to await the arrival of Richery from America, and meanwhile, despite the low ebb of the state finances, extraordinary efforts were made to equip the squadron lying in Brest. In Frimaire (December) it was in a fit state for sea. It comprised fifteen line-of-battle ships, twenty frigates, six brigs, and fifty transports. It might carry twenty-two thousand men. Hoche finding it impossible to act in concert with Villaret-Joyeuse, that commander was superseded for Morard-de-Galles. The Bay of Bantry was assigned as the place of disembarkation. Sealed orders were lodged with each captain, prescribing the course he was to take and the anchorage to choose, in case of accident.

The expedition set sail on the 26th Frimaire (16th December). Hoche and Morard-de-Galles were stationed on board a frigate. The French squadron, under favour of a thick mist, escaped the English cruisers, and scudded into the open sea without being perceived. But during the night of the 26th–27th, a frightful storm dispersed it: one vessel foundered. Rear-admiral Bouvet, however, manœuvred to rally the squadron, and, after a lapse of two days, succeeded in mustering it, with the exception of a ship and three frigates. Unfortunately, the frigate bearing Hoche and Morard-de-Galles was of the number of the missing. The squadron bore away for Cape Clear, off which it manœuvred during several days, awaiting the two commanders. At length, on the 5th Nivôse (24th December), it entered the Bay of Bantry. A council of war decided upon a disembarkation, but it became impracticable from the boisterous weather. The squadron was again driven off the Irish coast. Rear-admiral Bouvet, alarmed by so many obstacles, afraid of falling short of provisions, and separated from his superior officers, thought it best to make for the coast of France. Hoche and Morard-de-Galles eventually arrived in the Bay of Bantry, and learned the departure of the French flotilla. They returned through incredible perils. Shattered by the sea and pursued by the English, they reached the shores of France only by a sort of miracle. The ship "Les Droits de l'Homme," Captain La Crosse, was parted from the squadron, and performed prodigies. Attacked by two English vessels, it destroyed one and escaped from the other; but sadly crippled, deprived of masts and sails, it succumbed to the violence of the sea. Part of the crew unhappily sunk, the remainder was rescued with much difficulty.

Such was the result of this expedition, which excited great consternation in England, and revealed her assailable point to foes. The Directory fostered the idea of resuming the enterprise at a subsequent period, and in the interim centered all its attention on the continent, to accelerate the moment when Austria might be induced to lay down her arms. The troops on board the fleet had suffered little; they were forthwith disembarked. The force necessary to maintain the police of the country was left on the coasts, whilst the greater part of the army, which had borne the title of the Army of the Ocean, was marched towards the Rhine. The two Vendées and Brittany were indeed completely subdued by the continual presence and labours of Hoche. An important command was intended for that general, to indemnify him for his former arduous and ungrateful task. The resignation of Jourdan, whom the unfortunate issue of the campaign had disgusted, and who had been provisionally succeeded by Beurnonville, afforded the opportunity of offering Hoche a recompense, long and richly merited by his talents and patriotism.

Winter, already far advanced (January 1797 had commenced), had not interrupted this memorable campaign. On the Rhine, the Archduke Charles prosecuted the sieges of Kehl and the tête-de-pont of Huningen: on the Adige, Alvinzy was preparing for a fresh and final effort against Bonaparte. The interior of the republic was sufficiently tranquil: the factions had all eyes fixed on the different theatres of warfare. The consideration and strength of the government vacillated according to the vicissitudes of the campaign. The recent victory of Arcole had shed a lustre around it, and retrieved the evil effect produced by the retreat of the armies of the Rhine. But still that amazing effort of desperate courage failed to dispel all apprehensions touching the retention of Italy. Rumours were current that Alvinzy was reinforcing his army, and the Pope preparing armaments. The malignants asserted that the army of Italy was exhausted; that its general, overwhelmed by the fatigues of an unprecedented campaign, and consumed by an extraordinary malady, was disabled from mounting his horse. Mantua still remained untaken, and a feeling of disquietude was engendered for the events January might bring forth.

The journals of the two parties, revelling in all the licentiousness of the press, continued to be distinguished for virulent diatribes. Those devoted to the counter-revolution were more than usually intent on stirring opinion and disposing it in favour of the cause they advocated, on account of the approach of spring, the season appointed for the new elections. Since the disastrous issue of their contest in La Vendée, it had become the last resource of the royalists to make use of liberty itself as the means of destroying it, and to subvert the republic by influencing the elections. On observing their unscrupulous violence, the Directory gave way to those emotions of indignation from which the most enlightened government cannot always guard itself. Although well inured to the excesses of liberty, the language held in certain journals struck it with alarm: the expediency of allowing free vent to every variety of publication was not then sufficiently understood; the knowledge that falsehood is never to be dreaded, however industriously disseminated, that it becomes innocuous through very violence, and that a government perishes by the force of truth alone, and, above all, by that of suppressed truth, was as yet enigmatical. The Directory, therefore, moved the two councils to enact laws respecting the abuses of the press. The demand gave rise to bitter vituperation; it was accused of a design to oppress liberty during the approaching elections. The laws it solicited were refused. Two regulations only were granted it: one relative to the repression of private calumny, the other to the hawkers of newspapers, who, perambulating the streets, were accustomed, instead of proclaiming them simply by their names, to recommend them by detached phrases, often extremely injurious. Thus a pamphlet was offered for sale through the streets, with such cries as the following: "Restore us our myriads and —— the camp, if you cannot promote the happiness of the people!" To avert this scandal, it was provided that newspapers and other writings should be henceforth cried only by their respective titles. The Directory proposed, moreover, the establishment of an official journal of the government. The Five Hundred sanctioned, the Ancients rejected the suggestion. The law of the 3d Brumaire, brought a second time under discussion in Vendémiaire, and made the pretext for the ridiculous attack on the camp of Grenelle, had been confirmed after a protracted debate. It was the topic upon which the two parties were distinctly arrayed in hostility. The provision excluding the relatives of emigrants from public functions, was that which the right side chiefly desired to expunge, and the republicans to retain. After a third attack, it was decided that this provision should be maintained. A single modification was made in the law. As it stood, it excepted from the general amnesty extended to revolutionary delinquencies such as had reference to the 13th Vendémiaire: that event was now sufficiently remote to pardon those who had taken part in it, and who in fact already enjoyed a virtual impunity; consequently, the amnesty was rendered applicable to the crimes of Vendémiaire as to all other deeds purely revolutionary.

Thus the Directory and the upholders of the directorial republic still preserved a majority in the two councils, notwithstanding the opposition of certain madly excited patriots, and of sundry intriguers sold to the counter-revolution.

The state of the finances had the usual effect of penury in private families; it troubled the domestic union of the Directory and the legislative body. The Directory complained that its measures were not always favourably received by the councils; it addressed to them an alarming message, which it rendered public, as if to throw on them the odium of the public misfortunes, should they decline to adopt its propositions. This message, dated the 25th Brumaire (15th December), was conceived in these terms:

"Every branch of the public service suffers under depression. The pay of the troops is in arrear; the defenders of the country are exposed to the horrors of nakedness; their courage is blighted by the discouraging influence of want; disgust, which is the necessary consequence, provokes desertion. The hospitals are deficient in furniture, fuel, and medicines. The charitable institutions, affected by the like destitution, afford no asylum to the indigent and infirm, of whom they were the sole resource. The creditors of the state, the contractors who daily contribute to supply the necessities of the armies, receive but a small proportion of the sums due to them: their distress scares men who might perform the same services with greater punctuality or on more moderate terms. The roads are broken up, the communications interrupted. The public functionaries remain without salaries: from one end of the republic to the other, we see judges and administrators reduced to the horrible alternative of existing with their families in utter wretchedness, or of dishonouring themselves by accepting the bribes of intriguers. A malignant spirit is every where rife; in several localities assassination is reduced to a system, and the police, devoid of activity and strength from the lack of pecuniary means, is unable to check such disorders."

The councils were irritated at the publication of this message, which seemed to charge on them the calamities of the country, and pointedly censured the indiscretion of the Directory. They applied themselves, however, to the immediate consideration of the suggestions it propounded. Specie was every where abundant, except in the coffers of the state. The taxes, exigible in specie or paper at the course of exchange, dropped in slowly and reluctantly. The national domains, previously sold, were partly paid for; the instalments, still outstanding, were not yet due. Meanwhile, temporary expedients were resorted to; the contractors were put off with ministerial orders or notes of liquidation, a species of postponed paper, which were taken only at a reduced value, and which tended to enhance considerably the rates of all contracts. Thus affairs were in the same situation as we have already so often described.

Great improvements were introduced into the financial system for the year 5. The budget was divided, as we have previously mentioned, into two parts—the ordinary expenditure of 450 millions, and the extraordinary expenditure of 550 millions. The land-tax, estimated at 250 millions, the assessed taxes at 50, the customs, stamp-duty, and fees of registration, at 150, were expected to provide the 450 millions of ordinary expenditure. The extraordinary was to be covered by the arrears of taxes and the produce of the national domains. All imposts were henceforth exigible in specie. There still remained in circulation a quantity of mandats and assignats, which were at once annulled and made receivable at the course of exchange, in satisfaction of arrears. In this manner the disorders resulting from the paper money were effectually cured. The forced loan was definitively closed; it had scarcely produced 400 millions of available funds. The contributions in arrear were ordered to be wholly discharged before the 15th Frimaire of the present year (5th December). Bailiffs were put in requisition to accelerate the collection. The schedules were directed to be immediately made out, in order that the fourth of the taxes of the year 5 might be collected without delay. The question remained to be solved how the value of the national domains was to be realised, now that there was no paper-money to bring it by anticipation into circulation. The last sixth due for the domains under contract of purchase was still to be received. It was determined that, with the view of forestalling this final payment, the purchasers should be required to give obligations payable in specie, falling due at the same period whereat the law obliged them to pay up their instalments, and involving, in case of protest, the forfeiture of the property purchased. This measure would provide the state with eighty and some millions in obligations, which the contractors declared their readiness to accept. They had no longer any confidence in the state, but they had it in individuals; and the eighty millions of this personal paper possessed a value which a paper issued and guaranteed by the republic would not have had. It was decreed, moreover, that the domains hereafter sold should be paid for as follows: a tenth down in specie, five-tenths down in ministerial notes or orders of liquidation issued to contractors, and the remaining four-tenths in four bonds or obligations, one payable annually.

Thus, public credit being exhausted, the government availed itself of private credit; being no longer able to emit paper-money hypothecated on the national property, it required from the purchasers of such property a species of paper which, bearing their signatures, possessed an individual value; and, furthermore, it afforded the contractors an opportunity of reimbursing themselves by acquiring national property on their own account.

These regulations warranted hopes of revived order and certain receipts. To meet the pressing wants of the war ministry, the sum of one hundred and twenty millions was forthwith adjudged to it for the months of Nivôse, Pluviose, Ventôse, and Germinal, the months devoted to preparations for a new campaign, of which sum thirty-three millions were to be taken from the ordinary, and eighty-seven from the extraordinary income. The registration tax, the post-office, the customs, patents, and the land-tax, were expected to furnish the thirty-three millions; the eighty-seven of extraordinaries were to be raised by the produce of the forests, the arrears of military contributions, and the obligations of the purchasers of national domains. These amounts were certain, and must be speedily gathered. All the public functionaries were paid in specie. It was resolved to pay the fundholders in the same manner; but the treasury being unable as yet to give them specie, delivered them drafts to bearer, receivable in payment of national domains, like the ministerial orders and notes of liquidation issued to the contractors.

Such were the administrative labours of the Directory during the winter of the year 5 (1796 to 1797), and the means it husbanded for prosecuting a fresh campaign. The actual campaign, meanwhile, was not yet terminated, and it seemed only too manifest that, notwithstanding ten months of furious warfare, notwithstanding the bleak season of frost and snow, additional battles would yet be fought. The Archduke Charles was obstinately bent on carrying the têtes-de-pont of Kehl and Huningen, as if, by possessing himself of them, he would for ever interdict the return of the French to the right side of the Rhine. The Directory, too, was materially interested in giving him occupation at those points, in order to prevent him diverging into Italy. He consumed nearly three months before the fort of Kehl. On both sides the troops distinguished themselves by an heroic courage, and the generals of division evinced talents of the highest practical order. Desaix, especially, immortalised himself by his intrepidity, his imperturbable coolness, and his admirable dispositions around that wretchedly intrenched fortress. The conduct of the two generals-in-chief was not so cordially approved as that of their lieutenants. Moreau was censured for not having profited by the strength of his army, and debouched on the right bank to fall on the besieging army. The archduke was blamed for wasting such prodigious efforts on a mere bridge-head. Moreau surrendered Kehl on the 28th Nivôse, year 5 (9th January 1797); it was but a slight loss. The prolonged resistance of the French demonstrated the solidity of the Rhinish barrier. The troops had suffered little: Moreau had employed the time in perfecting their organisation, and his army now presented a superb appearance. That of the Sambre-and-Meuse, recently placed under the orders of Beurnonville, had not been actively engaged during these last months, but it had been refreshed by repose, and reinforced by numerous detachments from La Vendée; it had, moreover, received an illustrious leader, Hoche, who was at length called to a scene of warfare worthy of his talents. Thus, although it did not yet possess Mayence and had been bereft of Kehl, the Directory might still deem itself powerful on the Rhine. The Austrians, on their side, were elated with the capture of Kehl, and concentrated all their might against the bridge-head of Huningen. But the emperor and his ministers had their attention almost exclusively absorbed by Italy. The exertions of the government to reinforce the army under Alvinzy, and to maintain a last vigorous struggle for preponderance in Italy, partook of the extraordinary. Troops were forwarded by post-relays. The entire garrison of Vienna had been moved to the Tyrol. The inhabitants of the capital, glowing with loyal zeal for the imperial family, had furnished 4000 volunteers, who were embodied under the title of the Vienna Volunteers. The empress presented them with banners embroidered by her own hands. A fresh levy had been made in Hungary, and several thousands of the best troops in the empire had been draughted from the Rhine. By means of these diligent operations, worthy of the highest eulogium, Alvinzy's army was reinforced by 20,000 men, and its full strength increased to upwards of 60,000. It was invigorated by rest, and subjected to reorganisation; and, although containing many recruits, it was composed in the greater part of veteran troops. The battalion of Vienna Volunteers was formed of young men, strangers, it is true, to war, but belonging to good families, animated with lofty sentiments, ardently devoted to the imperial house, and burning to display their personal prowess.

The Austrian ministers had come to a perfect understanding with the Pope, and engaged him to contemn the menaces of Bonaparte. They had sent him Colli and sundry officers to command his army, exhorting him to move it as near as possible to Bologna and Mantua. They had advised Wurmser of approaching aid, and ordered him not to surrender; but, if he were reduced to extremity, to sally from Mantua with all the disposable troops, and especially the officers, and proceed, through the legations of Bologna and Ferrara, into the papal states, to join the Roman army, which he would forthwith organise and march to the rear of Bonaparte. This scheme, doubtless very ably conceived, might have succeeded under a general so renowned for bravery as Wurmser. That veteran marshal, however, maintained himself in Mantua with the greatest fortitude, although his garrison was reduced to subsist on salted horse-flesh and poulenta.

Bonaparte, meanwhile, awaited the coming struggle, which was to decide definitively the fate of Italy, and prepared to meet it. As the malignants, who desired the humiliation of the French arms, reported at Paris, he was labouring under a cutaneous disorder, caught before Toulon by loading a cannon with his own hands, which had been injudiciously treated. This malady, little known, combined with the incredible fatigues of the campaign, had greatly weakened him. He could scarcely support himself on horseback; his cheeks were hollow and livid, and his emaciation produced an appearance of almost pitiful debility; his eyes alone, still lively and piercing, announced that the fire of his mind was not extinguished. His physical proportions formed, indeed, a singular contrast with his genius and fame, affording to soldiers, at once gay and enthusiastic, the theme of many a quaint remark. Notwithstanding the prostration of his strength, his highly impassioned temperament sustained him, and communicated to him an activity which left no subject unheeded. He had commenced what he called "war against the robbers." Intriguers of all descriptions had flocked into Italy, to worm their way into the administration of the armies, and to fatten on the spoils of that celebrated country. Whilst simplicity and indigence prevailed in the armies of the Rhine, luxury had crept into the army of Italy, rivalling in extent the glory it had achieved. The soldiers, comfortably clad, well fed, and viewed with complacency by the dark-eyed daughters of the soil, revelled in pleasures and abundance. The officers and generals participated in the common prosperity, and began to found fortunes. As to the contractors, they displayed a scandalous sumptuousness, and purchased with the produce of their exactions the favours of the most beautiful actresses in Italy. Bonaparte, in whom all passions worked, but who, at the moment, was engrossed by one alone, that of glory, lived in a simple and austere manner, and sought relaxation only in the society of his wife, whom he tenderly loved, and whom he had recently called to his head-quarters. Indignant at the disorders existing in the army administration, he instituted a severe scrutiny into the smallest details, examined in person the transactions of the different companies, ordered prosecutions against corrupt agents, and denounced the whole commissariat tribe in the bitterest terms. He upbraided this class especially with a lack of courage, and with abandoning the army on occasions of danger. He recommended the Directory to select men of approved energy; he urged the establishment of a syndicate, which, judging like a jury, should be empowered to punish, upon internal conviction, delinquencies which could never be substantially proved. He willingly pardoned indulgences in his soldiers and officers, which were not likely to act on them as the voluptuousness of Capua did of yore on Hannibal's troops; but he harboured an implacable hatred against those who enriched themselves at the expense of the army, without aiding it by their personal bravery or exertions.

He had manifested a similar spirit of observance and activity in his relations with the Italian powers. Still dissembling with Venice, whose armaments in the lagunes and the mountains of the Bergamasco were not unknown to him, he postponed the period for explanation until the reduction of Mantua. He caused his troops to take provisional occupation of the citadel of Bergamo, which had a Venetian garrison, alleging in justification that he did not deem it sufficiently guarded to resist a sudden attack of the Austrians. He thus protected himself from the chance of perfidy, and overawed the numerous enemies he had in Bergamo. In Lombardy and the Cispadan states, he continued to foster the spirit of liberty, curbing the Austrian and papal party, and moderating the democratic party, which, in all countries, stands in need of control. He maintained himself in friendship with the King of Sardinia and the Duke of Parma. He repaired in person to Bologna, in order to terminate a negotiation with the Duke of Tuscany, and to intimidate the Pope of Rome. The Duke of Tuscany was incommoded by the presence of the French at Leghorn; acrimonious disputes had arisen with the Leghorn merchants respecting the merchandise belonging to the subjects of powers hostile to France. These discussions had engendered infinite animosity; besides, the commodities, which were with such difficulty obtained, were afterwards badly sold, and by a company which had recently defrauded the army of five or six millions. Bonaparte, under these circumstances, esteemed it preferable to treat with the Grand Duke. It was agreed that he should evacuate Leghorn on receiving two millions—a course recommended by the farther advantage of rendering the garrison of that city disposable. He had formed the design of uniting the garrison of Leghorn with the two legions levied by the Cispadan republic, increased by three thousand of his other troops, and pushing this small army into Romagna and the March of Ancona. He wished to seize upon two additional provinces of the Roman state, grasp the private property of the Pope, arrest the taxes, levy by such means the contribution which had been withheld, select hostages from the party opposed to France, and thus establish a barrier between the states of the Church and Mantua. He would thereby render impracticable the plan of a junction between Wurmser and the papal army: he might succeed in terrifying the Pope, and at length oblige him to accede to the conditions proposed by the French republic. In his anger against the Holy See, he had even abjured the idea of pardoning it, and contemplated an entirely new division of Italy. Lombardy might be restored to Austria; a powerful republic might be constituted by adding to the dutchy of Modena and the legations of Bologna and Ferrara, Romagna, the March of Ancona, and the dutchy of Parma; and Rome might be given to the Duke of Parma, which would give great satisfaction to Spain, and compromise the most Catholic of all the powers. He had already begun to put his project in execution; he had advanced to Bologna with three thousand men, whence he menaced the Holy See, which had already formed the nucleus of an army. But the Pope, now assured of a fresh Austrian expedition, and hoping to communicate with Wurmser by the Lower Po, defied the threats of the French general, and even testified a desire to see him advance still farther into his provinces. "The holy father," according to the counsellors of the Vatican, "would quit Rome if it were necessary, and take refuge in the extremity of his dominions. The farther Bonaparte should proceed and remove from the Adige, the greater the danger he must incur, and the more favourable the chances for the sacred cause." Bonaparte, being gifted with a foresight quite equal to that of the Vatican, had no intention of marching on Rome; he merely purposed to intimidate, and his attention was constantly fixed on the Adige, where he expected every moment the resumption of hostilities. On the 19th Nivôse (8th January 1797), in fact, he learned that a collision had occurred on all his outposts: he instantly repassed the Po with 2000 men, and hastened with all speed to Verona.

His army had received since the battle of Arcole the reinforcements it ought to have received before that critical conflict. The sick had left the hospitals during the winter, and it now counted about 45,000 men under arms. Their distribution was the same as before: 10,000 men, or thereabouts, blockaded Mantua under Serrurier; 30,000 were in observation on the Adige. Augereau guarded Legnago; Massena, Verona; Joubert, who had succeeded Vaubois, Rivoli and La Corona. Rey, with a division of reserve, was at Desenzano, at the bottom of the Lake of Garda. The remaining four or five thousand men were either in the citadels of Bergamo and Milan, or in the Cispadan republic. The Austrians were advancing with sixty and some thousand men, and had twenty besides in Mantua, of whom twelve at least were under arms. Thus in the coming contest, as in the preceding, the proportion of the enemy was twofold. The Austrians had this time formed a new project. They had already essayed all the routes permitting an attack on the double line of the Mincio and the Adige. At the time of Castiglione, they had descended along both shores of the Lake of Garda, by the two valleys of the Chiesa and the Adige. Subsequently, they had debouched by the valley of the Adige and by that of the Brenta, attacking by Rivoli and Verona. Now they had modified their plan, in consequence of their arrangements with the Pope. Their principal attack was intended to be made on the Upper Adige, with 45,000 men under the command of Alvinzy. An accessory attack, independent of the first, was to be adventured with about 20,000 men, under the orders of Provera, by the Lower Adige, in the hope of communicating with Mantua, Romagna, and the Papal army.

Alvinzy was to lead the main attack: he was sufficiently strong to warrant the expectation of complete success, and his instructions enjoined him to push onwards without consideration for what might befall Provera. We have elsewhere described the three routes which issue from the mountains of the Tyrol. That winding behind the Lake of Garda had been neglected since the affair of Castiglione; the other two were again preferred in this instance. The first, meandering between the Adige and the Lake of Garda, passed through the mountains separating the lake from the river, and came upon the position of Rivoli; the other skirted the farther bank of the river, and opened into the plain of Verona, beyond the French line. Alvinzy decided in favour of the route between the river and the lake, which led him at once upon the French line. His efforts were consequently to be directed on Rivoli. That celebrated position requires a particular description. The chain of the Monte-Baldo divides the Lake of Garda from the Adige. The high road winds between the Adige and the foot of the mountains, for a space of several leagues. At Incanale the Adige sweeps up to the very base of the mountains, and debars farther progress along its bank. The road then diverges from the river, ascends by a sort of spiral staircase the flanks of the mountain, and conducts to an extensive plateau, which is that of Rivoli. It commands the Adige on one side, and on the other it is encompassed by the amphitheatre of the Monte-Baldo. An army, in position on this plateau, threatens the spiral way by which it is reached, and in the distance sweeps by its fire both banks of the Adige. The plateau is not easily to be carried in front, on account of the narrow tortuous ascent, which must be climbed to attain its level. Thus an enemy would not choose to attack it by that way alone. Before reaching Incanale, other paths lead over the Monte-Baldo, which, scaling those steep acclivities, likewise conduct to the plateau of Rivoli. They are not practicable either for cavalry or artillery, but they afford an easy access to troops on foot, and may be used for moving a considerable force of infantry to the flank and rear of the army defending the plateau. The plan of Alvinzy was to attack the position by all the avenues simultaneously.

On the 23d Nivôse (12th January) he attacked Joubert, who held all the advanced positions, and forced him back on Rivoli. The same day Provera pushed forward two vanguards, the one on Verona, the other on Legnago, through Caldiero and Bevilagua. Massena, being at Verona, sallied forth, repulsed the vanguard which had advanced to his vicinity, and took 900 prisoners. Bonaparte arrived immediately afterwards from Bologna. He recalled the whole division into Verona, to hold it in readiness to march. During the night he learned that Joubert had been attacked and forced at Rivoli, and that Augereau had perceived considerable forces before Legnago. He was not yet able to divine on what point the enemy was directing his principal mass. He kept Massena's division disposable for any movement, and ordered Rey's division, which was at Desenzano, and which had descried no enemy advancing behind the Lake of Garda, to proceed to Castel-Nuovo, as the most central point between the Upper and Lower Adige. On the following day, the 24th (13th January), couriers arrived in rapid succession. Bonaparte was apprised that Joubert, assailed by an overwhelming force, was on the point of being enveloped; and that by the obstinacy and fortune of his resistance alone he had been enabled still to retain the plateau of Rivoli. Augereau informed him from the Lower Adige, that a brisk firing was maintained along the opposite banks, without having led to any important event. Bonaparte had before him at Verona scarcely 2000 Austrians. He instantly comprehended the project of the enemy, and became convinced that his principal attack was to be directed on Rivoli. He deemed Augereau adequate to defend the Lower Adige: he reinforced him with a corps of cavalry detached from Massena's division. He directed Serrurier, who blockaded Mantua, to move his reserve to Villa-Franca, in order that it might be stationed intermediately as regarded all points. He left at Verona a regiment of infantry and one of cavalry; and, during the night of the 24th-25th (13th-14th January), he set out with the eighteenth, thirty-second, and seventy-fifth demi-brigades of Massena's division, and two squadrons of cavalry. He dispatched an order to Rey not to halt at Castel-Nuovo, but to advance with all speed on Rivoli. He outstripped his troops, and reached Rivoli in person at two in the morning. The weather, which had been rainy the preceding days, had become serene. The sky was cloudless, the landscape glittered in a brilliant moonlight, the air was sharp and piercing. At the moment of his arrival, Bonaparte beheld the whole horizon reddened by the glare of the enemy's fires. He presumed him to possess 45,000 men; Joubert had 10,000 at the utmost: the timely arrival of succours was therefore indispensable. The enemy was divided into several corps. The principal, composed of a massy column of grenadiers, all the cavalry, artillery, and baggage, followed, under Quasdanovich, the high road between the river and Monte-Baldo, intending to advance by the spiral ascent of Incanale. Three other corps, under the orders of Ocskay, Koblotz, and Liptai, composed of infantry solely, had scaled the crests of the mountains, prepared to descend the steps of the amphitheatre which the Monte-Baldo forms around the plateau of Rivoli, and thus reach the field of battle.

A fourth corps, under the command of Lusignan, winding along the verge of the plateau, was to plant itself on the rear of the French army, in order to cut it off from the road to Verona. Alvinzy had, moreover, detached a sixth corps, which, from its position, was altogether excluded from the projected operation. It had passed to the other side of the Adige, and tracked the route which, through Roveredo, Dolce, and Verona, followed its farther bank. This corps, commanded by Wukassovich, could, at the utmost, send a few bullets on the field of battle, across the intervening river.

Bonaparte instantly discerned that the plateau must be preserved at all hazards. He had in front the Austrian infantry descending the amphitheatre, without a single piece of cannon; on his right he had the grenadiers, artillery, and cavalry, moving along the route of the river, and preparing to debouch by the ascent of Incanale on his right flank. On his left, Lusignan was in progress to turn Rivoli. From the opposite bank of the Adige, the volleys of Wukassovich threatened annoyance. Planted on the plateau, he prevented the junction of the different arms, he would sweep down the infantry devoid of cannon, and drive back the cavalry and artillery entangled in a narrow and winding path. In such case, the efforts of Lusignan to turn him, and of Wukassovich to pick off his men, would be of little moment.

His plan being formed with his accustomed promptitude, he commenced operations before break of day. Joubert had been obliged to shrink in compass, so as to occupy only a space proportioned to his force; hence a dread lest the infantry descending the gradations of Monte-Baldo should effect a junction with the head of the column ascending by Incanale. Bonaparte, long before dawn, aroused Joubert's troops, which, after sustaining a combat of forty-eight hours' duration, were seeking repose in a hurried sleep. He assaulted the outposts of the Austrian infantry, drove them in, and expanded more widely over the plateau.

The action speedily raged with fury. The Austrian infantry, without ordnance, recoiled before the French, which was supported with its formidable artillery, and fell back in a semicircle towards the amphitheatre of Monte-Baldo. But a disastrous event occurred at the moment on the French left. Liptai's corps, which held the extremity of the hostile semicircle, charged on Joubert's left, composed of the eighty-ninth and twenty-fifth demi-brigades, which it surprised, broke, and forced to retreat in disorder. The fourteenth, standing immediately next to those two demi-brigades, wheeled round to cover the rest of the line, and resisted with admirable courage. The Austrians mustered all their strength against it, and nearly prevailed in overwhelming it. They strove especially to wrest from it the cannon, the horses of which had been killed. They had already reached the pieces, when an officer exclaimed—"Grenadiers of the fourteenth, will you let your pieces be captured?" Fifty men instantly rushed forward, with this brave officer at their head, repulsed the Austrians, yoked themselves to the pieces, and retrieved them.

Bonaparte, descrying the danger, left Berthier on the threatened point, and started at full gallop for Rivoli, in quest of succours. The first troops of Massena's division had just come up, after having marched all night. Bonaparte took the thirty-second, rendered famous by its exploits during the campaign, and moved it to the left, to rally the two demi-brigades which had yielded. The intrepid Massena advanced at its head, rallied behind him the discomfited troops, and overthrew all who ventured to withstand him. He chased back the Austrians, and planted himself by the side of the fourteenth, which had continued throughout to perform prodigies of valour. The battle was thus re-established on this quarter, and the army again occupied the semicircle of the plateau. But the momentary check on the left had compelled Joubert to fall back with the right; he yielded ground, and the Austrian infantry was a second time approaching the point Bonaparte had been so solicitous to make it abandon: it was on the point of gaining the avenue by which the spiral road of Incanale opened on the plateau. At the same moment, the column composed of artillery and cavalry, and preceded by several battalions of grenadiers, ascended the spiral way, and, with incredible efforts of bravery, repulsed the thirty-ninth. Wukassovich, from the other side of the Adige, poured a continuous volley of bullets to protect this species of escalade. The grenadiers had already scaled the summit of the defile, and the cavalry debouched in their wake on the plateau. Nor was this all: the column under Lusignan, whose fires had been perceived in the distance, and which had been seen turning the position of the French to the left, now placed itself on their rear, intercepted the route to Verona, and barred the way to Rey, who was advancing from Castel-Nuovo with the division of reserve. Lusignan's soldiers, finding themselves on the rear of the French army, clapped their hands and exulted at its inevitable destruction. Thus, on this plateau of Rivoli, hemmed in front by a semicircle of infantry, turned on the left by a strong column, stormed on the right by the bulk of the Austrian army, and raked by the bullets showered from the opposite bank of the Adige, Bonaparte stood isolated, with the divisions of Joubert and Massena, amidst a swarm of enemies. With 16,000 men, he was enveloped by at least 40,000.

In this fearful moment, his presence of mind was unshaken. He manifested all the fire and promptitude of his wonted intuition. Surveying the Austrians under Lusignan, he said, "Those men are ours;" and he allowed them to proceed without concerning himself as to their movement. The soldiers, understanding their general's thoughts, partook his confidence, and repeated amongst themselves, "They are ours!"

At the present time, the attention of Bonaparte was directed exclusively to his antagonists in front, and to their efforts. His left was covered by the heroism of the fourteenth and the thirty-second; his right was menaced at once by the infantry which had resumed the offensive and by the column escalading the plateau. He forthwith ordered decisive movements. A battery of light artillery and two squadrons, under two brave officers, Leclerc and Lasalle, were directed on the outlet of the pass. Joubert, who, with the extreme right, had that outlet at his back, faced about with a corps of light infantry. All charged together. The artillery first made play on those who had debouched; the cavalry and light infantry then rushed forward with impetuosity. Joubert fell, with his horse slain beneath him; he arose again, more terrible in his wrath, and flew on the enemy with a loaded musket. All who had debouched—grenadiers, cavalry, artillery—were precipitated pell-mell down the inclined way of Incanale. A frightful confusion reigned within its crooked course: some pieces of ordnance rolling into the defile augmented the terror and disorder. At every step the French cut down or made prisoners at discretion. After having delivered the plateau from the assailants who had scaled it, Bonaparte resumed his attack upon the infantry ranged in a semicircle before him: he drove upon it Joubert with the light infantry and Lasalle with two hundred hussars. At this renewed onslaught a panic seized the Austrian infantry, now deprived of all hope of effecting a junction, and it fled in disorder. Thereupon the whole French line moved forward from right to left, pushed the Austrians against the amphitheatre of Monte-Baldo, and hotly pursued them into the mountains. Bonaparte subsequently returned to the rear, and prepared to realise his prediction touching the corps of Lusignan. That division, on beholding the discomfiture of the Austrian army, quickly foresaw its impending fate. After having cannonaded it, Bonaparte ordered the eighteenth and seventy-fifth demi-brigades to charge it. Those gallant troops advanced chanting the chant du depart, and drove Lusignan on the road to Verona, by which Rey was coming up with the reserve. The Austrian corps made at first a show of resistance, then retreated, and finally fell upon the head of Rey's division. Terrified at this unexpected incident, it invoked the clemency of the victor, and laid down its arms to the number of four thousand men. Two thousand had been previously captured in the defile of the Adige.

It was now five o'clock, and the Austrian army might be deemed annihilated. Lusignan was taken; the infantry, which had approached by the mountains, was flying over rugged rocks; the principal column was engulfed on the strand of the river; the subsidiary corps of Wukassovich had beheld the disastrous issue of the combat with fruitless grief, separated by the Adige from the field of battle. This admirable victory beguiled but transiently the thoughts of Bonaparte: his eyes were instantly averted to the Lower Adige, which he had left menaced. He judged that Joubert, with his intrepid division, and Rey, with the division of reserve, would suffice to inflict the last blows upon the enemy, and to wrest from him some thousands of prisoners. He mustered Massena's division, which had fought the previous day at Verona, had subsequently marched all night, again fought the whole day of the 25th (14th), and now once more set out for a dreary nocturnal march in quest of fresh conflicts. Those brave soldiers, anticipating further victories with joyful countenances, seemed insensible to fatigue. They flew rather than marched to cover Mantua, from which fourteen leagues separated them.

Bonaparte learned on the way what had passed on the Lower Adige. Provera, masking his operations from Augereau, had thrown a bridge over the river at Anghuiari, a little below Legnago, and, leaving Hohenzollern beyond the Adige, had marched on Mantua with 9000 or 10,000 men. Augereau, apprised too late, had nevertheless followed in his wake, taken him in rear, and captured from him 2000 prisoners. But Provera was marching on Mantua with 7000 or 8000 men to join the garrison. Bonaparte learned these details at Castel-Nuovo. He was apprehensive lest the garrison might sally forth to act in concert with the corps advancing to its relief, and take the blockading force between two fires. He had marched all the night of the 25th-26th (14th-15th) with Massena's division, and he made it continue the movement during the day of the 26th, in order that it might arrive the same evening before Mantua. He likewise directed thither the reserves which he had left at the intermediate station of Villa-Franca, and hastened to the spot in person to make his dispositions.

On the same day, the 26th (15th January), Provera arrived before Mantua. He presented himself before the suburb of Saint-George, in which Miollis was stationed with 1500 men at the utmost. Provera summoned him to surrender. The valiant Miollis replied by a discharge of artillery. Provera, repulsed, moved to the side of the citadel, hoping Wurmser would make a sortie; but he found Serrurier confronting him. He halted at the palace of La Favorita, between Saint-George and the citadel, and lanched a boat across the lake with a message to Wurmser to debouch from the fortress on the following morning. Bonaparte arrived in the evening, and disposed Augereau on the rear of Provera, Victor and Massena on his flanks, so as to separate him from the citadel, by which Wurmser was to attempt his sally. He opposed Serrurier to Wurmser. The next day, 27th Nivôse (16th January), at break of day, the battle began. Wurmser debouched from the place, and attacked Serrurier with fury; the latter resisted with equal valour, and kept him in check along the lines of circumvallation. Victor, at the head of the fifty-seventh, which on that day received the appellation of the Terrible, charged on Provera and overthrew all he encountered. After an obstinate conflict, Wurmser was driven back into Mantua. Provera, hunted like a stag, surrounded by Victor, Massena, and Augereau, disquieted by a sortie of Miollis, laid down his arms with 6000 men. The young volunteers of Vienna formed part of them. After an honourable defence, they surrendered their arms, together with the banner embroidered by the hands of the empress.

Such was the crowning achievement of this memorable campaign, judged by military men one of the most brilliant and extraordinary recorded in history. Intelligence arrived that Joubert, pursuing Alvinzy, had again taken from his shattered forces 7000 prisoners. At the battle of Rivoli 6000 had been secured, making 13,000 in all. Augereau had made 2000 prisoners, Provera had capitulated with 6000 men, 1000 had been picked up before Verona, and a few hundred stragglers besides, which rendered the number of captives, taken in three days, 22,000 or 23,000. Massena's division had marched and fought without respite for four days, marching by night, fighting by day. Thus Bonaparte boasted, with just pride, that his soldiers had surpassed the vaunted celerity of Cæsar's legions. Why he at a later date attached to the name of Massena that of Rivoli will be readily understood. The action of the 25th (14th January) was styled the battle of Rivoli, that of the 27th (16th January), before Mantua, the battle of La Favorita.

Thus, again, in three days, Bonaparte had taken or slain half of the hostile army, and struck it as if with a thunderbolt. Austria had made her last effort, and now Italy lay at the mercy of France. Wurmser, immured in Mantua, was without a ray of hope; he had consumed all his horses, and disease conspired with famine to destroy his garrison. A longer resistance would have been useless, and repugnant to humanity. The old marshal had given proof of a noble courage and a rare fortitude; he might without dishonour prepare to capitulate. He dispatched one of his officers, by name Klenau, to parley with Serrurier. The latter referred the subject to his superior general, who repaired to the conference. Bonaparte, enveloped in his mantle, and without making himself known, listened to the discussion between Serrurier and Klenau. The Austrian envoy descanted largely on the resources remaining to his general, and asserted that he had still provisions for three months. Bonaparte, continuing his disguise, approached the table at which the interlocutors stood, grasped the paper whereon Wurmser's propositions were transcribed, and began to trace some lines on the margin, without uttering a word, to the great amazement of Klenau, who was at a loss to comprehend the action of the unknown. Then rising and uncovering, Bonaparte advanced to Klenau. "Here," he said, "these are the conditions I grant to your marshal. If he had provisions for merely fifteen days, and talked of surrendering, he would not deserve an honourable capitulation. Since he deputes you here, he is reduced to extremity. I respect his age, his bravery, his misfortunes. Convey to him the conditions I grant him: let him leave the place to-morrow, in a month, or in six, he will have conditions neither better nor worse. He can remain as long as it befits his honour."

By this language, by the tone of its delivery, Klenau recognised the illustrious captain, and he hastened to bear to Wurmser the conditions accorded him. The veteran marshal was filled with gratitude on learning the generous treatment vouchsafed him by his young antagonist. He allowed him permission to issue freely from the fortress with all his staff; he even granted him two hundred horsemen, five hundred men to be nominated by himself, and six pieces of cannon, in order that his evacuation might be less humiliating. The garrison was to be conducted to Trieste, there to be exchanged against French prisoners. Wurmser gladly accepted these terms; and to testify his gratitude towards the French general, he informed him of a plot to poison him planned in the states of the Church. The 14th Pluviose (2d February) was appointed as the day of his evacuation. On quitting Mantua he derived consolation from the idea of surrendering his sword to the conqueror himself; but he found only the brave Serrurier, before whom he was obliged to defile with all his staff. Bonaparte had already departed for Romagna, intent on chastising the Pope and humbling the Vatican. His vanity, lofty as his genius, moved him differently from vulgar minds; he preferred being absent rather than present on the scene of triumph.

With the capitulation of Mantua the campaign was terminated, and Italy definitively conquered.

When we ponder on the whole series of events, the imagination is struck by the multiplicity of engagements, the variety and fecundity of conceptions, and the immensity of the results. Entering Italy with thirty and some thousand men, Bonaparte first separated the Piedmontese from the Austrians at Montenotte and Millesimo, and accomplished the destruction of the first at Mondovi; then hastened after the latter, passed in face of them the Po at Placentia, and the Adda at Lodi, took possession of Lombardy, there halted for an interval, speedily resumed his march, found the Austrians reinforced on the Mincio, and completed their overthrow at the battle of Borghetto. Then he formed at a glance the plan of his future operations: it was upon the Adige he must establish himself to confront the Austrians; as to the princes on his rear, it would be sufficient to employ negotiations and menaces to keep them in check. A second army was sent against him under Wurmser: his only chance of defeating it was by concentrating his forces rapidly, and smiting alternately each of its isolated masses: with prompt resolution, he sacrificed the blockade of Mantua, crushed Wurmser at Lonato and Castiglione, and repulsed him into the Tyrol. Wurmser was reinforced, as had been Beaulieu: Bonaparte anticipated him in the Tyrol, ascended the Adige, cut down all before him at Roveredo, plunged back through the valley of the Brenta, intercepted Wurmser, who expected to be himself the interceptor, worsted him at Bassano, and shut him up in Mantua. This was the second Austrian army destroyed after having been reinforced.

Bonaparte, constantly negotiating and menacing from the banks of the Adige, awaited the approach of the third army. It was a formidable host: it arrived before he had received reinforcements; he was compelled to recede before it; he was reduced to despair, and on the point of succumbing, when he found, amidst an impassable marsh, two lines leading into the flanks of the enemy, and threw himself upon them with an incredible audacity. He was again triumphant at Arcole. But the enemy was arrested, not destroyed: he returned a last time, and more puissant than before. On one side, he descended from the mountains; on the other, he advanced by the Lower Adige. Bonaparte discerned the only point where the Austrian columns, winding in a mountainous country, could effect a junction, threw himself on the celebrated plateau of Rivoli, and, from that position, overwhelmed the principal army under Alvinzy; then, turning his flight towards the Lower Adige, he encompassed the column which had crossed it. His last operation was the most brilliant, for in that instance fortune waited upon genius. Thus, in ten months, besides the Piedmontese army, three formidable armies, thrice reinforced, had been utterly discomfited by an army, which, thirty and a few thousand strong at the commencement of the campaign, had since received but 20,000 to repair its losses. In other words, 55,000 Frenchmen had defeated upwards of 200,000 Austrians, of whom they had captured more than 80,000, and killed or wounded at least 20,000; they had fought twelve pitched battles, and upwards of sixty minor actions, and passed several rivers, defying alike the hostile elements of fire and water. When warfare is a purely mechanical routine, presenting a dry detail of one host assailing another immediately before it, the record is unworthy of history; but when one of those encounters is pourtrayed, wherein we perceive a mass of men moved by a single and transcendent intellect, which develops its powers amidst the roar of thunder, with the equanimity of a Newton or a Descartes in the stillness of the cabinet, then is the spectacle worthy the philosopher equally with the statesman and the soldier; and, if this identification of a multitude with a single individual, which imparts to force its utmost might, serves to protect and defend a noble cause, that of liberty, the exemplification becomes as moral as it is grand.

Bonaparte now hurried to fresh enterprises. He moved towards Rome, for the purpose of terminating the treacherous machinations of that court of priests, intending to return, no longer upon the Adige, but upon Vienna itself. He had, by his successes, centred the war on its veritable theatre, that of Italy, whence the hereditary dominions of the emperor might be easiest overrun. The government, enlightened by his achievements, forwarded him reinforcements, with which he might advance to Vienna, and dictate a glorious peace in the name of the French republic. The close of the campaign had stimulated all the hopes its commencement had engendered.

The victory of Rivoli filled the patriots with unmeasured joy. In all public places exulting reference was made to the twenty-two thousand prisoners captured during the late events, and the testimony of the authorities of Milan, who had passed them in review and certified their number, was triumphantly cited to silent the affected doubts of the malevolent. The surrender of Mantua still further augmented the general enthusiasm. From that moment, the conquest of Italy was believed definitive. The courier who brought the intelligence reached Paris in the evening. The garrison was forthwith assembled, and the tidings published amid the glare of torches, the flourish of trumpets, and the rapturous exclamations of all true Frenchmen. Days for ever renowned, evoking painful regret on retrospection! At what epoch was France as a nation greater or more glorious! The storms of the revolution appeared hushed; the murmurs of parties were heard only as the dying echoes of the tempest. Those remains of agitation were indeed regarded as the vital principle of a free state. The trade and finances of the country were happily emerging from a dismal crisis, and its soil, restored to industrious cultivators, promised more than wonted fecundity. A government composed of citizens, all equals, ruled the republic with moderation; the worthiest were called to succeed them. All voices were free. France, at the pinnacle of power, was mistress of all the territory stretching from the Rhine to the Pyrenees, and from the Ocean to the Alps. Holland and Spain were about to unite their fleets with hers, and to attack in concert the maritime despotism. She was resplendent with immortal glory. Redoubtable armies bore her three colours fluttering triumphantly in the face of the kings who had conspired to annihilate her. Twenty heroes, differing in character and in talents, similar only in age and courage, led her soldiers to victory. Hoche, Kléber, Desaix, Moreau, Joubert, Massena, Bonaparte, and many others, were rising to fame concurrently. Men canvassed their respective merits; but as yet no eye, however piercing it might be, detected in that galaxy of heroes the unfortunate or the criminal; no eye marked him who was to expire in the flower of his age, wasted by an unknown malady—him who was to perish under the Mussulman's poniard or beneath an enemy's fire—him who would oppress liberty—or him who would prove a traitor to his country: all appeared great, pure, fortunate, ripe for future destinies! This was but for a moment; yet there are isolated moments in the existence of nations as in that of individuals. Internal tranquillity was beginning rapidly to reproduce wealth; liberty and glory were already abundantly enjoyed. In the words of an ancient, "A country ought to be not only prosperous, but sufficiently glorious." This condition was fully realised. Frenchmen, we who have since seen our liberty stifled, our country invaded, our heroes shot or false to their fame, let us never forget those immortal days of liberty, of greatness, and of bright anticipation.

CHAPTER LI.

SITUATION OF THE GOVERNMENT IN THE WINTER OF THE YEAR 5 (1797).—CHARACTERS AND DISPUTES OF THE FIVE DIRECTORS.—CLUB OF CLICHY; INTRIGUES OF THE ROYALIST FACTION.—PLOT OF BROTTIER AND ACCOMPLICES DISCOVERED.—ELECTIONS OF THE YEAR 5.—GLANCE AT THE SITUATION OF FOREIGN POWERS AT THE OPENING OF THE CAMPAIGN OF 1797.

THE late victories of Rivoli and La Favorita, followed by the capture of Mantua, had restored to France all her superiority. The Directory, although still the object of ruthless obloquy, inspired the European powers with a profound dread. "The half of Europe," wrote Mallet-du-Pan,* "is on its knees before this divan, to purchase the honour of becoming its vassal." Fifteen months of firm and glorious sway had rooted the five directors in power, but had at the same time developed their passions and characters. Men cannot long act in conjunction without experiencing individual distastes or predilections, and without associating conformably to their inclinations. Carnot, Barras, Rewbell, Larévellière-Lépaux, and Le Tourneur, were already divided in accordance with this invariable result. Carnot was systematic, obstinate, and haughty. He was entirely devoid of those qualities which impart to the mind comprehensiveness and perspicuity, and to the disposition pliability. He possessed penetration, and could readily master any subject submitted to his investigation; but, once committed to an error, he never retracted. He was a man of strict probity, high courage, and ardent devotion to business, but he never forgave either an injury or a mortification to his self-love; yet he was undoubtedly intellectual and original, which is indeed not uncommon with men wrapped up in themselves. He had formerly quarrelled with the members of the committee of public welfare, for it was impossible that his pride could have ever harmonised with that of Robespierre or Saint-Just, or his lofty courage quailed before their despotism. At present the like mishap unavoidably befell him in the Directory. Independently of those frequent occasions of collision with his colleagues, arising from the common performance of a task so difficult as that of conducting a government, and which so naturally provokes diversity of opinions, he harboured old resentments, particularly against Barras. All his prepossessions as an austere, scrupulous, and laborious man, alienated him from that prodigal, debauched, and indolent colleague; but he above all detested him as the leader of the Thermidorians, the friends and avengers of Danton, and the persecutors of the old Mountain. Carnot, having been one of the chief promoters of Danton's execution, and having subsequently narrowly escaped being involved in the fate of the principal Mountaineers, could not forego his vindictive feelings against the Thermidorians: accordingly, he cherished a rooted hatred against Barras.

Barras had formerly served in India, and had there evinced the qualities of a brave soldier. He was well fitted, during civil broils, to enact a military part, and, as we have seen, that merit had elevated him to a seat in the Directory. Thus, on all difficult occasions, he was prone to boast of mounting on horseback and putting the enemies of the republic to the sword. In person he was tall and handsome; but his expression bore something sombre and sinister, which ill accorded with a character more passionate than malignant. Although reared in an elevated rank, his manners were far from possessing any peculiar elegance. They were, on the contrary, rough, bold, and vulgar. He was endowed with a soundness and penetration of mind which, with study and industry, might have become distinguished faculties; but lazy and ignorant, he knew just so much as may be learned in the course of a chequered career; still, in affairs he was daily called upon to discuss, he gave token of a judgment sufficiently acute to make his defective education a subject of regret. For the rest, dissolute and cynical, violent and false as the sons of the south, who possess the art of concealing duplicity under the mask of bluntness, a republican by feeling and by position, but a man devoid of faith, receiving at his house the most furious revolutionists of the faubourgs and all the emigrants who had returned to France, gratifying the first by his frivolous violence, the latter by his spirit of intrigue—he was in reality a warm patriot, and in secret held out hopes to all parties. He was the sole representative of the entire Dantonist party, lacking the genius of its pristine leader, which had not descended to his successors.

Rewbell, originally an advocate at Colmar, had acquired at the bar and in the different assemblies great experience in the management of affairs. With the rarest penetration and discernment, he combined extensive information, a prodigious memory, and an extraordinary assiduity in toil. These qualities rendered him an invaluable man at the head of a state. He discussed questions with admirable perspicuity, although somewhat prone to subtilise, a remnant of his forensic habits. To a rather prepossessing appearance he joined a perfect knowledge of society; but he was rude and repulsive from the vivacity and bitterness of his language. Notwithstanding the calumnies of libellers and counter-revolutionists, he was a man of strict probity. Unfortunately he was not altogether free from avarice; he was intent on employing his individual fortune in an advantageous manner, which caused him to hold frequent intercourse with men of business, and which furnished a fruitful theme for slander. He devoted himself peculiarly to the department of foreign relations, and was actuated by so keen an attachment to the interests of France, that he would have been willingly unjust towards other nations. An ardent, sincere, and firm republican, he belonged originally to the moderate party in the convention; and he viewed with equal repugnance both Carnot and Barras, the one as a Mountaineer, the other as a Dantonist. Thus Carnot, Barras, and Rewbell, all three sprung from different parties, cordially detested each other; the enmities contracted during a long and painful struggle still survived under the constitutional system; hearts refused to blend in unison, as rivers which join without mingling their waters. Nevertheless, albeit fostering this antipathy, these three men restrained their feelings, and laboured in concord at the common task.

The two remaining directors, Larévellière-Lépaux and Le Tourneur, harboured no resentments against any one. Le Tourneur, of an amiable disposition, but vain, although his vanity was simple and inoffensive, being content with the external symbols of power and the homage of sentinels—he, Le Tourneur, entertained a submissive respect for Carnot. He was prompt to give his opinion, but equally so to retract it when he was proved to be wrong, or if Carnot spoke adversely. His vote, on all occasions, belonged to Carnot.

Larévellière, the best and honestest of men, possessed, with much varied knowledge, a just and observing mind. He was attentive to business, and capable of giving prudent counsel on all subjects; on several important occasions his judicious advice was tendered with paramount advantage. But he was often misled by illusions, or fettered by the scruples of a virtuous heart. He occasionally desired what was impossible, and shrunk from sanctioning what was necessary; for it requires a great mind to determine what is due to circumstances without infringing principles. Speaking with facility, and gifted with unshaken firmness, he was of infinite utility when it became needful to vindicate expedient measures, and he was of essential service to the Directory by his personal consideration.

* Secret correspondence with the government of Venice.

His part, amidst colleagues so bitterly estranged from each other, was most salutary. Amongst the four directors, his preference was decided in favour of the most able and upright, namely, of Rewbell. He had, nevertheless, avoided forming any intimate connexion, which would have been agreeable to his feelings, but which would have tended to alienate him from his other colleagues. He was not without a partial predilection for Barras, and might have united with him had he found him less corrupt and false. He exercised over that personage a certain ascendancy, from the high consideration he enjoyed, as also from his penetration and his firmness. The dissolute are ever ready to deride virtue, but they are awed by it when they find it armed with the insight which probes, and the courage that scorns to fear them. Larévellière used his influence over Rewbell and Barras to keep them in harmony with each other and with Carnot. Owing to this happy mediator, and owing also to their general zeal for the interests of the republic, those directors acted befittingly together, and performed their allotted tasks, divided upon questions submitted for common deliberation according to their actual opinions rather than according to their private animosities.

With the exception of Barras, the Directors lived with their families, each occupying apartments in the Luxembourg. They displayed but a very moderate share of luxury. Larévellière, nevertheless, indulging in a relish for society, inspired with a love for the arts and sciences, and deeming it incumbent on him to expend his official income in a manner beneficial to the state, was accustomed to receive men of science and literature, entertaining them with a modest and cordial simplicity. He had unfortunately exposed himself to some ridicule, without having in the slightest degree merited it. He professed in all respects the philosophy of the eighteenth century, such as it was expressed in the Savoyard Vicar's profession of faith. He desired the suppression of the Catholic religion, and held that it would soon sink if governments had the prudence to employ against it simply indifference and neglect. He was opposed to superstitious ceremonies and material representations of the divinity; but he thought meetings essential to men, wherein they might discourse in common on morality, and on the great objects of creation. Those subjects, in fact, require to be treated in assemblies, because in them lofty emotions, noble and generous sentiments, are more easily excited and communicated. He had developed his ideas in a published work, wherein he contended that the ritual of the Catholic worship ought to be superseded for meetings somewhat similar to those of the Protestants, but still more simple and free from forms. This doctrine, embraced by sundry well-meaning individuals, was forthwith acted upon. A brother of the celebrated naturalist Haüy formed a society which he styled that of the Theophilanthropists, whose meetings were devoted to moral exhortations, philosophical lectures, and pious anthems. Others were instituted for the like purposes. They were held in rooms hired at the expense of the members, and under the surveillance of the police. Although Larévellière approved of them, and believed them well adapted for enticing from the Catholic churches many of those devout persons in whom the necessity of pouring forth their religious feelings in concert with others was all-powerful, he cautiously abstained from appearing in them, or even allowing his family to attend them, lest he might incur the odium of enacting the part of a sectarian leader, and revive the recollection of Robespierre's pontificate. But notwithstanding his reserve, malevolence seized the pretext to throw ridicule upon a magistrate universally respected, and whose life afforded no ground for calumny. At the same time, if Theophilanthropism formed the theme of certain spiritless sarcasms in the saloons of Barras or in the royalist journals, it attracted very little attention generally, and tended in no degree to lessen the esteem wherewith he was regarded.

The member of the Directory who really damaged the reputation of the government was Barras. His life was not simple and retired like that of his colleagues; he exhibited a luxury and prodigality for which his participation in ill-gotten gains could alone account. The finances of the state were managed with strict probity by the directorial majority and by the excellent minister Ramel; but they could not prevent Barras receiving, from the contractors and bankers he supported, considerable portions of the profits they reaped. He had, moreover, divers other modes of defraying his expenses. France was becoming the arbiter of so many states, both great and small, that several princes were moved to cultivate her favour, and to pay large sums for the promise of a vote in the executive cabinet. Instances of this shameful tampering will be hereafter adduced. The splendour that Barras maintained might not have been hurtful, for it behoves the rulers of an empire to draw men around them, that they may study, appreciate, and discreetly choose them; but he was encompassed, not only by practical men, but by intriguers of all sorts, by dissolute women, and by notorious knaves. A shameful contempt of decency prevailed in his saloons. Those clandestine connexions which, in well-regulated societies, are studiously shrouded in mystery, were publicly avowed. Gros-Bois, a seat in the vicinity of Paris, was made the scene of scandalous orgies, which supplied the enemies of the republic with powerful topics of invective against the government. Barras, in truth, never attempted to conceal his conduct, but, as is usual with confirmed debauchees, delighted to publish his excesses. He himself related before his colleagues, who often addressed to him severe reproaches, his precious feats at Gros-Bois and at the Luxembourg; he boasted how he had compelled a celebrated contractor of the time to relieve him from the burden of a mistress who began to pall upon him, and whose profusion he found it inconvenient to sustain; how he had revenged himself on a journalist, the Abbé Poncelin, for certain diatribes levelled against him; how, after drawing him to the Luxembourg, he had caused his domestics to flagellate the unfortunate author. Such conduct, characteristic only of a degenerate prince, practised in a republic, greatly injured the Directory, and would have completely arrayed the feeling of the country against it, had not the virtues of Carnot and Larévellière counterbalanced the infamy of Barras's proceedings.

The Directory, instituted immediately subsequent to the 13th Vendémiaire, formed in hatred of the counter-revolution, composed of regicides, and assailed with unrelenting fury by the royalists, could scarcely be other than zealously republican. But each of its members was more or less identified with the opinions which divided France. Larévellière and Rewbell were distinguished for that moderate but rigid republicanism, which equally abjured the frenzy of 1793, and the violent royalist reaction of 1795. To induce them by any appliances to aid the counter-revolutionary cause, was felt to be impossible. The unerring instinct of party taught that no compromise of principles was to be expected from them, by means either of direct seduction or of insidious flattery in the journals. Consequently, towards those two directors both factions indulged in venomous censure. The case was different with Barras and Carnot. Barras, although he mingled with all indiscriminately, was in reality an ardent revolutionist. The fauboargs held him in high estimation, always remembering that he had been the general in Vendémiaire, and the conspirators at the camp of Grenelle had been persuaded that he at least sympathised with them. Thus the patriots loaded him with praises, and the royalists with abuse. Certain secret agents of royalism, drawn within his circle by a common spirit of intrigue, might, with reference to his profligacy, entertain hopes; but if so, they were confined to themselves alone. The mass of the party held him in abhorrence, and inveighed against him with demoniacal rancour.

Carnot, an ex-Mountaineer, a member of the old committee of public welfare, and almost a victim of the reaction which followed the 9th Thermidor, must surely have been a decided republican, and was so in fact. At the first moment of his accession to the Directory, he had strenuously advocated the appointments distributed amongst the Mountaineer party; but by degrees, as the alarm provoked by the events of Vendémiaire subsided, his tendencies had undergone a change. Even in the committee of public welfare, he had never cherished any cordial affection for the revolutionary rabble, and had powerfully contributed to destroy the Hébertists. When he saw Barras, who affected to continue a king of the mob (roi de la canaille), collect around him the remains of the Jacobin party, he had become hostile towards that party; he had displayed infinite energy in the affair of the camp of Grenelle, and with the greater zest that Barras chanced to be somewhat implicated in that disturbance. Moreover, Carnot was haunted with retrospections. The reproach addressed to him, that he had signed the most sanguinary orders of the committee of public welfare, cruelly tormented him. The very natural explanations he had given were not sufficient in his eyes; he was anxious to prove, above all things, that he was not a monster—and to establish that fact to his own satisfaction. he would have made weighty sacrifices. Parties are gifted with wonderful powers of divination and discernment; they are fastidious and captious with regard to men only when in the ascendant; but when vanquished, they are willing to accept all recruits, and exhibit an especial anxiety to win over the directors of armies. The royalists had quickly detected the sentiments of Carnot touching Barras and the patriot party. They comprehended his craving to relieve himself from the sense and stigma of opprobrium; they were sensible of his military importance; and they took care to treat him differently from his colleagues, and to speak of him in the terms they knew the best adapted to affect him. Thus, whilst the whole of their journals teemed with the grossest abuse of Larévellière, Rewbell, and Barras, they had nothing but eulogy and incense for the ex-Mountaineer and regicide, Carnot. Besides, by gaining Carnot, they also won Letourneur; and thus, by a commonplace but potential artifice, like all cunning prostitutions to egotism, two voices in the Directory were to be secured in the counter-revolutionary interest. Carnot had the weakness to yield to this species of seduction; and, without foregoing or becoming absolutely recreant to his internal convictions, he formed, with his friend Le Tourneur, within the pale of the Directory, an opposition analogous to that presented by the new third in the two councils. On all questions submitted to the decision of the Directory, he declared for the opinion adopted by the opposition in the councils. On all occasions, when matters relative to peace or war were discussed, he voted for peace, after the example of the opposition, which professed a marvellous anxiety for its blessings. He had forcibly maintained that great sacrifices should be made to the emperor; and that peace should be concluded with Rome and Naples, without insisting on too rigorous conditions.

The moment such dissensions break forth, they grow in virulence with great rapidity. The party which expects to profit by them lauds beyond measure the men it hopes to gain, and redoubles the tirade of detraction against the others. The usual success had attended such tactics in the present instance. Barras and Rewbell, already hostile to Carnot, became still more so in consequence of the eulogiums so profusely poured upon him, and imputed to his influence the outrageous vituperation with which themselves were assailed. Larévellière in vain employed his good offices to allay their mutual resentment; the schism became, despite his benevolent efforts, every day the wider; and the public, well aware of the existing discord, divided the Directory into a majority and a minority, classing Larévellière, Rewbell, and Barras on one side, Carnot and Le Tourneur on the other.

The various ministers, also, were regarded with peculiar views. As it had been at all times usual to criticise the management of the finances, an incessant clamour persecuted the minister Ramel, albeit an excellent administrator, whom the deplorable state of the exchequer compelled to adopt expedients, at any other time undoubtedly blameable, but under existing circumstances altogether unavoidable. The taxes came slowly in, on account of the almost insurmountable difficulties impeding the collection. It had been found necessary to reduce the land-tax, and the indirect contributions produced much less than had been anticipated. It often happened that the national treasury was absolutely destitute of money; and, in such pressing cases, the funds destined for the extraordinary service were perforce misappropriated to meet the ordinary expenditure, or the receipts were anticipated, and all the strange and onerous contracts were entered into which situations of this nature render inevitable. Then outcries arose against abuses and against malversations, whereas every assistance, on the contrary, should have been afforded to the government. Ramel, who performed the duties of his ministry with equal integrity and talent, was the especial object of all attacks, and was treated as a public enemy by every journal. Almost equal acrimony was exhibited towards the minister of marine, Truguet, known as a frank republican, as the friend of Hoche, and as the patron of all the patriot officers; towards the minister of foreign affairs, Delacroix, a man whose qualities fitted him for the labours of administration, but who was undoubtedly a sorry diplomatist, being withal too formal and arrogant in his intercourse with the ministers of other powers; and, lastly, towards Merlin, who, in the department of justice, evinced all the fervour of a Mountaineer republican. The ministers of the interior, of war, and of police, Benezech, Petiet, and Cochon, were entirely severed from their aforenamed colleagues. Benezech had been assailed with such fury by the Jacobins, for having proposed a recurrence to free traffic in articles of food and an abandonment of the alimentary provision to Paris, that he had become agreeable to the counter-revolutionary party. An able administrator, but reared under the old system, which he still regretted, he partly deserved the favour of those who praised him. Petiet, minister at war, discharged his duties with great efficiency; but, as the creature of Carnot, he was associated in the same category with respect to party. Cochon was likewise recommended by his connexion with Carnot; the discovery he had made of Jacobin plots, and the zeal he had manifested in urging the prosecutions against their authors, procured him the applause of the opposite party, which extolled him with egregious affectation.

Notwithstanding these estrangements, the government was still sufficiently united to administer affairs with vigour, and to pursue with glory its operations against the hostile powers of Europe. The opposition was effectually curbed by the conventional majority retained in the legislative body. However, the elections were approaching, and the moment was at hand when a new third, elected under the bias predominant at the time, would replace another conventional third. The opposition was sanguine of then acquiring a majority, and of emerging from that state of subjection in which it had hitherto languished. Consequently, its language in the two councils grew insensibly bolder, a portent significant of its swelling hopes. The members who constituted the present minority were wont to assemble at Tivoli, to discuss their projects and concert their course of action. This meeting of deputies had become a club of the most violent character, known under the title of the Clichy Club. The newspapers aided the movement. A vast number of young men, who, under the obsolete order of things, must have been content, to indite vapid odes, declaimed in fifty or sixty prints against the excesses of the revolution, and against the convention to which they imputed those excesses. None quarrelled with the republic, they asserted, but with those who had drenched its birth in blood. Assemblies of the electors were convoked in advance, and earnest endeavours made to settle the eventual nominations. The identical language, spirit, and passions of Vendémiaire were all in all revived; the same sincerity and delusion existed in the mass, the same ambition actuated individuals, the same perfidy and deception marked the conspirators who furtively laboured in the cause of royalty.

This royalist faction, constantly discomfited, but ever sanguine and wily, was perpetually starting into renewed vitality. Wherever there is a claim supported by pecuniary supplies, intriguers will be found in abundance ready to promote it by any desperate scheme. Although Lemaitre had been condemned to death, La Vendée subjugated, and Pichegru deprived of his command over the army of the Rhine, the machinations of the counter-revolutionists had not ceased; on the contrary, they were continued with extreme activity. Meanwhile, sundry changes had occurred in the positions of individuals. The pretender, designated alternately the Count de Lille and Louis XVIII., had quitted Verona, as we are aware, and repaired to the army on the Rhine. He had tarried for an interval in the camp of the Prince of Condé, where an accident had endangered his life. Standing at a window, a musket-ball struck him, slightly grazing his body. The act, the author whereof remained undiscovered, was of course charged upon the Directory, which was, however, not so inordinately stupid as to suborn assassins to commit a crime that would redound solely to the advantage of the Count d'Artois. The pretender did not sojourn long with the Prince of Condé. His presence in the Austrian army was not agreeable to the cabinet of Vienna (which had always abstained from recognising him), being conscious how surely it would tend still more to embitter the quarrel with France, which was already sufficiently fraught with irritating topics. He received an order to depart, and, on his refusal to obey it, a detachment was sent to enforce compliance. He thereupon retired to Blankemburg, where he continued to be the centre of the royalist correspondence. Condé remained with his corps on the Rhine. The Count d'Artois, after his abortive designs on La Vendée, had withdrawn into Scotland, whence he still held communications with certain intriguers, who travelled to and fro between La Vendée and England.

Lemaitre being dead, his associates had taken his place, and succeeded him in the confidence of the pretender. They were, as we have previously intimated, the Abbé Brottier, of old a preceptor, Laville-Heurnois, a master of requests in times past, a certain Chevalier Despomelles, and a naval officer called Duverne de Presle. The constant system of these agents located at Paris had been to concentrate all action in intrigues conducted at the capital itself; whilst the Vendéans had aimed to effect the great object of the restoration by an armed insurrection, and the Prince of Condé through the treacherous intervention of Pichegru. La Vendée being tranquillised, Pichegru reduced to a private station, and a powerful reaction in obvious progress against the revolution, the Paris agents were the more confirmed in opinion that all their hopes were to be realised by a spontaneous movement throughout the country. First, to secure the elections, next, by the elections to command the councils, and lastly, by the councils to seize upon all offices and upon the Directory itself, seemed to them an assured process for re-establishing royalty, wielding such means only as were afforded by the republican constitution. But for this purpose it was absolutely essential to put an end to that discrepancy of ideas which had always marked and frustrated the counter-revolutionary plans. Puisaye, still secreted in Brittany, pondered as formerly on an insurrection of that province; M. de Frotté, in Normandy, was striving to convert that ancient dutchy into a modern La Vendée; but neither of these two chiefs would enter into communication with the agents at Paris. The Prince of Condé, baffled in his intrigue with Pichegru, still insisted on prosecuting it alone, without the interference of either the Austrians or the pretender, and it was with much reluctance he had imparted to them the secret. To mould these incoherent schemes into one harmonious co-operation, and, above all, to procure money, the Parisian agents dispatched one of their number into the western provinces, into England, Scotland, Germany, and Switzerland. Duverne de Presle was selected for the mission. Failing to deprive Puisaye of his command, he endeavoured, through the influence of the Count d'Artois, to attach him to the system of the Paris agency, and constrain him to concert his measures with it. From the English the most important point was gained—a grant of subsidies. Powers were obtained from the pretender, whereby the agency of Paris was confirmed in the exclusive privilege of originating and directing intrigues. The Prince of Condé was visited, though it would seem he was not rendered either more intelligent or more pliable. M. de Précy, also, who still continued the secret fomentor of troubles in Lyons and the south, was seen in his district. In short, a general plan was arranged, which on paper possessed the requisites of combination and unity; but, unhappily, none felt himself thereby debarred from acting as he might deem fit, with reference to his individual interests and pretensions.

It was agreed that the whole of France should be divided into two agencies, the one comprehending the east and south, the other the north and west. M. de Précy was at the head of the first, the Paris agents directed the latter. These two agencies were to act in concert in all their operations, and to correspond directly with the pretender, who would give them orders from time to time. Secret associations were devised, on the principle of those instituted by Babœuf. Isolated with respect to each other, and ignorant of the names of the chiefs, the discovery of one would not affect the general ramifications of the plot. These associations were to be formed in accordance with the opinions prevalent in France. As it was deemed apparent that the majority of the population, without entertaining any direct wish for the restoration of the Bourbons, desired order and tranquillity, and imputed to the Directory the continuation of the revolutionary system, a sort of masonic confederation was imagined, under the title of the Society of Philanthropists, the members of which should bind themselves to exercise their electoral rights, and in favour of men opposed to the Directory. The Philanthropists were to be kept in ignorance of the real object of the machinations, the only design avowed to them being that of strengthening the opposition. Another association, more secret, concentrated, and limited, called the Society of the Faithful, was to be composed of such energetic and devoted men, as the secret of the faction might be safely intrusted with. The Faithful were to be secretly armed, and kept in readiness for all sudden enterprises. They were intended to be enrolled in the national guard, which was not yet organised, because, under favour of that costume, they could more surely execute the orders given them. Their bounden duty, independently of abetting any plan of insurrection, was to watch over the elections, and if conflicts occurred, as had happened in Vendémiaire, to aid the party of the opposition. The Faithful would assist, moreover, in concealing emigrants and priests, fabricating false passports, and harassing revolutionists, and purchasers of national property. These associations were to be under the direction of military leaders, who would correspond with the two principal agencies and receive their injunctions. Such was the new plan of the faction, truly a chimerical one, which history would disdain to particularise, if it were not instructive as an evidence of the hallucinations wherewith parties beguile themselves in their adversity. Notwithstanding this boasted combination, the association of the south ripened merely into the production of a few nameless companies, acting without aim or direction, and obeying the impulses solely of vengeance, lust, and rapine. Puisaye, Frotté, and Rochecot, in Brittany and Normandy, laboured apart to kindle another Vendéan conflagration, and disavowed the mixed counter-revolution of the Parisian agents. Puisaye even issued a manifesto, declaring that Brittany would never second projects which did not contemplate, by means of open force, the restoration of an unimpaired and absolute sovereignty to the house of Bourbon.

The Prince of Condé continued on his part to correspond directly with Pichegru, whose strange and capricious conduct can be explained only by the embarrassment of his position. This general, the first known in history to have incurred a voluntary defeat, had himself solicited his recall. This circumstance may well appear surprising, since he thus deprived himself of all means of influence, and consequently rendered it impossible for him to accomplish his professed purposes. It becomes comprehensible, however, on an examination of Pichegru's situation. He could not remain in his command without carrying into execution the enterprise he had undertaken, on account whereof he had already received considerable sums. Before him stood three portentous examples, all different in their kind, those of Bouillé, Lafayette, and Dumouriez, which convinced him that to inveigle an army was a hopeless task. He accordingly resolved to divest himself of the power of attempting any thing, and thus is explained the sudden tender of his resignation, which the Directory, as yet altogether unconscious of his treason, only accepted with reluctance. The Prince of Condé and his agents were infinitely amazed at the conduct of Pichegru, and concluded that he had defrauded them of their money, and that at bottom he had never intended to serve them. But after being superseded, Pichegru returned to the banks of the Rhine, under pretence of selling his carriages, and subsequently proceeded into the Jura, which was his native district. He there renewed his intercourse with the agents of the prince, and represented his resignation to them as a most profound manœuvre. He would be considered, he set forth, as a victim of the Directory, and he was about to connect himself with all the royalists of the interior, and organise a prodigious party; his army, which had passed under the orders of Moreau, poignantly regretted him, and, at the first reverse it suffered, would not fail to claim its former general, and to mutiny unless he were placed at its head. That critical moment he designed to seize, throw aside all disguise, hasten to his army, assume the dictatorship, and proclaim royalty. This ridiculous scheme, had it even been propounded in good faith, must have been dependent on the discomfiture of Moreau, who, as it chanced, even during his famous retreat, had been uniformly victorious. The Prince of Condé, the Austrian generals, to whom he had been obliged to divulge the cherished mystery, and the English minister in Switzerland, Wickham, all began to opine that General Pichegru was an arrant deceiver. They exclaimed against longer continuing the correspondence; but on the entreaties of the intermediate agents, who never willingly confess to an abortive undertaking, the correspondence was continued, in the forlorn hope of deriving some advantage from it, even though trifling. It was carried on through Strasburg, by means of certain spies who crossed the Rhine and repaired to the quarters of the Austrian general Klinglin; and also through Basle, with the English minister Wickham. Pichegru remained in the Jura without accepting or refusing the embassy to Sweden which was offered him, but labouring diligently to get himself elected a deputy, feeding the agents of the prince with empty and most puerile expectations, and receiving from them seasonable supplies of money in return. He held out mighty consequences as inevitably to ensue from his nomination to the Council of Five Hundred; he boasted of an influence which he was far from possessing; he pretended to give the Directory perfidious counsel, and to trepan it into dangerous determinations; he attributed to himself the lengthened resistance of Kehl, which he asserted he had advised with the view of compromising the army. Very little faith was put in these his equivocal services. The Count de Bellegarde wrote—"We are in the situation of the gambler who wishes to regain his money, and who exposes himself to lose still more in attempting to recover what he has lost." The Austrian generals, however, kept up the intercourse, because, in defect of great results, they at least obtained valuable details touching the condition and the movements of the French army. The infamous agents employed in these communications forwarded to General Klinglin all the reports and plans they were enabled to procure. During the siege of Kehl, they had even indicated the points on which the enemy's fire might be directed with the greatest effect.

Such at this time was the degraded position of Pichegru. With a mind of mediocre compass, he was subtle and sagacious, and had sufficient forethought and experience to be aware that any project for effecting a counter-revolution was impracticable at the moment. His perpetual delays, his fables to amuse the credulity of the prince's agents, prove his conviction in this respect; and his conduct under critical circumstances will demonstrate it more infallibly. He did not the less receive, however, the reward of the schemes he never designed to execute, and had the art of procuring it to be pressed upon him without precisely demanding the wages of infamy.

At the same time, his conduct was in strict keeping with that of all the royalist agents. They were finished adepts in impudent prevarication, asserting themselves to wield an influence they never remotely enjoyed, and pretending to sway the most important men, frequently without having exchanged words with them. Brottier, Duverne de Presle, and Laville-Heurnois, boasted of holding numerous members of the two councils at their beck, and pledged themselves to have many more after the forthcoming elections. In this statement they deviated egregiously from the fact: they were in communication only with the deputy Lemerer and a certain Mersan, who had been expelled from the legislative body, by virtue of the law of the 3d Brumaire against the relatives of emigrants. Through Lemerer they professed to command all the deputies composing the assemblage of Clichy. From the speeches and votes of those deputies, they deemed it probable they would applaud the restoration of the monarchy; and hence they considered themselves authorised to make an immediate tender of their attachment, and even of their repentance, to the King of Blankenburg. The wretches both imposed on the prince and calumniated the members of the Clichy Club. There were in that society ambitious men, sworn foes to the conventionalists, because the latter monopolised the entire government—men exasperated at the revolution—and many of weak character, who were mere creatures in the hands of others; but very few indeed sufficiently bold to contemplate royalty, or of sufficient ability to aid materially in its re-establishment. It was upon such foundations, nevertheless, that the royalist agents built their plans and promises.

From England came all the funds to expedite the anticipated counter-revolution. The subsidies craved by Puisaye were remitted direct from London to Brittany. Wickham, the English minister in Switzerland, was directed to furnish supplies to the two agencies of Lyons and Paris, and to refresh with suitable retainers the zeal of Pichegru, who was, according to the correspondence, "cut out for great occasions."

The agents of the counter-revolution vaunted their dexterity in drawing money from England whilst entertaining a deliberate intention to deceive her. They had agreed with the pretender to accept her donations, without ever following any one of her views, or ever acceding to any one of her suggestions, which, they held, were always to be suspected. England was not their dupe, but entertained for them all the contempt they merited. Wickham, Pitt, and the other English ministers, placed no reliance whatsoever on the operations of such persons, or indulged hopes of a counter-revolution. They merely wanted disturbers, who would keep France in turmoil, spread disquietude and alarm by their machinations, and, without exposing the government to any real danger, inspire it with exaggerated apprehensions. They willingly devoted a million or two of francs per annum to this object. Thus the royalist agents signally erred when they thought to practise such deception on the English. With all their frank alacrity to commit a swindle, they were not successful, for England had an accurate conception of their capacity, and depressed her expectations to that standard.

Such were the projects and means of the royalist faction. Cochon, the minister of police, was partially cognisant of what was going forward; he was aware that correspondents of the court of Blankenburg resided in Paris; in fact, at no time in the course of the revolution, so thickly strewed with successive plots, had a conspiracy been hatched to maturity without previous detection. He sedulously tracked the course of these men, surrounded them with spies, and awaited some overt act on their part to seize them with advantage. They speedily furnished him with the opportunity he desired. Intent on realising their cherished plan of securing the authorities, they turned their attention in the first place to the military commanders of Paris. The principal forces in the capital consisted of the grenadiers of the legislative body and of the troops in the camp of Les Sablons. The grenadiers of the legislative body were a chosen corps of twelve hundred men, whom the constitution had assigned to the two councils as a guard of security and honour. Their commander, Adjutant-General Ramel, was known for his moderate sentiments, which formed a sufficient ground, in the opinion of the pretender's imbecile agents, for deeming him a royalist. The armed force encamped at Les Sablons amounted to nearly twelve thousand men, under the command of General Hatry, a brave officer, whom no hope existed of seducing. The agents consequently fixed their eyes on that colonel of the 21st dragoons, by name Malo, who had so briskly charged the Jacobins, when they made their ludicrous attempt on the camp of Grenelle. They reasoned concerning him as concerning Ramel: because he had repudiated the Jacobins, they concluded he would embrace the royalists. They sounded both these officers, and made them propositions, which were listened to, and the next moment denounced to the minister of police. That functionary enjoined Ramel and Malo to give further ear to the conspirators, in order to ascertain their whole plan. They were accordingly incited to enter into an elaborate development of their projects, means, and prospects, and an early interview was fixed, at which they were to produce the powers they held from Louis XVIII. This occasion was selected for their arrest. The interview was to take place at Colonel Malo's apartments in the Military School. Gendarmes and witnesses were concealed in a manner enabling them to hear every thing that passed, and to start forward at a given signal. On the 11th Pluviose (30th January), the appointed day, the unfortunate dupes duly repaired to Malo's, with their credentials from Louis XVIII., and again expatiated on their promising schemes. When they had sufficiently committed themselves, they were permitted to take leave, but the gendarmes on the watch forthwith secured their persons and conducted them to the office of the police-minister. Their residences were immediately visited, and all their papers seized in their presence. Letters were found which fully proved the conspiracy, and partially revealed the details. It was discovered, for example, that they had taken upon themselves to construct a government in anticipation. They had agreed, in the first instance, until the arrival of the king from Blankenburg, to allow part of the existing authorities to continue. They purposed to retain Benezech in the home department, Cochon in the police; but if the latter, as a regicide, was obnoxious to the royalists, they proposed to put in his place M. Siméon or M. Portalis. They intended likewise to confer the portfolio of finance on M. Barbé-Marbois, "who possesses," they stated, "talents and information, and passes for honest." They had certainly never consulted Benezech or Cochon, or Messieurs Portalis, Siméon, and Barbé-Marbois, to whom they were totally unknown; but they had disposed of those parties, as usual, without their knowledge, and merely on account of their presumed opinions.

The detection of this plot produced a deep sensation, rendering manifest, as it did, that incessant vigilance was needful to protect the republic from its old enemies. It excited unfeigned astonishment in the opposition, which approximated to royalism almost unconsciously, and which had been left in total ignorance of the secret. This surprise shows clearly how those imbeciles had prevaricated, when assuring the king at Blankenburg that they swayed numerous members of the two councils. The Directory forthwith determined to arraign them before a military commission. They protested against such a judicature, contending that they had not been taken with arms in their hands, or in prosecution of any attempt by open force. Several deputies, who in sentiment sympathised with their cause, supported them in the two councils; but the Directory nevertheless persisted in sending them before a military commission, as having attempted to inveigle soldiers.

Their defence was characterised by considerable ingenuity. They allowed their character of agents to Louis XVIII., but maintained that the only mission they held was to prepare opinion, and from it alone, not from force, to expect a return to monarchical ideas. They were condemned to death; but their punishment was commuted to imprisonment, in requital of disclosures furnished by Duverne de Presle. That individual made a long confession before the Directory, wherein he unfolded all the machinations of the royalists, and which was deposited in the secret registry. The Directory refrained from publishing the particulars of this revelation, in order that the conspirators might remain in ignorance of its thorough acquaintance with their plans. Duverne de Presle stated nothing concerning Pichegru, whose intrigues, conducted directly with the Prince of Condé, were unknown to the agents at Paris; but he declared vaguely, upon the strength of rumours, that attempts had been made to establish a correspondence in one of the principal armies.

This arrest of their principal agents might have annihilated the hopes of the royalists, if they had proceeded on a combined plan; but each acting for himself and in his own manner, the disaster of Brottier, Laville-Heurnois, and Duverne de Preslè, failed to prevent Puisaye and De Frotté from continuing to intrigue in Normandy and Brittany, M. de Précy at Lyons, and the Prince of Condé on the Rhine.

Babœuf and his accomplices were shortly afterwards brought to trial. All were acquitted, with the exception of Babœuf and Darthé, who suffered the penalty of death on the 6th Prairial (23d May).

The elections now became the momentous subject of speculation. From a spirit of opposition to the Directory, or from pure royalism, numbers exerted themselves to influence the choice of the electoral body. In the Jura, agitation was rife to carry the nomination of Pichegru, and at Lyons of M. Imbert-Colomès, one of Louis XVIII.'s agents in the South. At Versailles, the return of M. de Vauvilliers, a man seriously compromised in the recently discovered plot, was almost assured. Everywhere, in short, selections hostile to the Directory were threatened. At Paris, the electors of the Seine had assembled to preconcert their nominations. They proposed to submit the following questions to the candidates: Have you purchased national property? Have you been a journalist? Have you written, aided, or done anything in the course of the revolution? Any who should answer these questions in the affirmative, were to be at once rejected. The exaction of such tests proved the violence of the reaction against all the men who had taken part in the revolution. A hundred journals, besides, teemed with inflammatory diatribes, and worked the public mind into a veritable delirium. The only means of curbing the licentiousness of the press, possessed by the Directory, consisted of the law punishing with death writers promoting the restoration of royalty. The tribunals invariably refused to apply the provisions of so sanguinary a law. The government, for the third time, demanded from the two councils additional enactments on the subject, and its request was once more rejected. It likewise urged that an oath of hatred to royalty should be administered to the electors. A warm discussion ensued on the efficacy of the oath, and the proposition was modified by changing it into a declaration. Each elector was to declare that he was equally opposed to anarchy and royalty. The Directory, on its own part, abstaining from any of the discreditable means so frequently used in representative governments to influence elections, contented itself with selecting men known for their republican sentiments as commissioners to the assemblies, and with issuing circulars, through the minister Cochon, in which it recommended particular candidates to the electors. A loud but senseless outcry was raised against these circulars, which could operate simply as an exhortation, and not at all as an injunction; for the number and independence of the electors, especially in a state where almost all offices were elective, removed them far without the pale of any executive influence or intimidation.

Whilst the elections thus absorbed attention, some share of interest was excited by the vacancy in the directorial body itself. The first anxiety was, as to which of the five directors would be designated by lot, conformably to the constitution, to retire from the government. If the chance fell on Barras, Rewbell, or Larévellière-Lépaux, the opposition felt sure, by the aid of the new third, of nominating a director of congenial views. In such case it anticipated a majority in the executive cabinet; but it therein reckoned too sanguinely, for its absurdities must have shortly driven Carnot and Le Tourneur from its alliance.

The selection of a new director became the theme of animated discussions in the Clichy Club. Cochon and Barthélemy were both proposed. Cochon had somewhat forfeited the good opinion of the counter-revolutionists, since he had caused Brottier and his accomplices to be arrested, and especially since his emission of the circulars to the electors. The majority decided in preference of Barthélemy, French ambassador in Switzerland, who was believed to be secretly connected with the emigrants and the Prince of Condé.

Amidst this universal agitation, the most absurd reports were propagated. It was boldly asseverated that the Directory had resolved to arrest the newly-elected deputies, and to prevent their junction in the legislative councils; nay, that a serious intention was formed to procure their assassination. On the other hand, the friends of the Directory repeated, that articles of impeachment against it had been prepared in the Clichy Club, which were to be presented to the Five-Hundred the moment the new third was installed.

But whilst party spirit thus raged, in the agony of a conflict which was to decide the possession of power and the future direction of the republican government, a fresh campaign was preparing, which seemed destined to be the last. The belligerents were matched as in the preceding campaign. France, united with Spain and Holland, had to contend against England and Austria. The sentiments of the court of Spain were not, and could scarcely be, favourable to the republican French; but its policy, dictated by the Prince of Peace, was unequivocally directed in accordance with their views. It regarded their alliance as the surest protection against their principles, judging with reason they would refrain from attempts to revolutionise it, so long as they found in it a powerful naval auxiliary. It had, moreover, an ancient feud with England, and flattered itself that the junction of all the continental navies would ensure it a grateful vengeance. The Prince of Peace, feeling that his own sway depended on the maintenance of this policy, and that its abandonment would involve his downfall, employed all his influence over the queen to rivet it on Spain, despite the sentiments of the royal family; in which he succeeded according to his desires. It resulted from this state of things, that the French were individually ill-treated in Spain, whilst their government obtained an unlimited acquiescence in its demands. Unfortunately, the French legation evinced neither the consideration due to a friendly power, nor the firmness necessary to protect French citizens. Through her alliance with France, Spain had lost the important colony of Trinidad. She trusted, however, that if France were relieved from Austria this year, and enabled to direct all her strength against England, that power would be speedily made to atone for its successes. The queen was more particularly intent on procuring an aggrandisement in Italy for the benefit of her son-in-law, the Duke of Parma. The question of an enterprise against Portugal, likewise, was again canvassed, and, under favour of the present political convulsion, the court of Madrid was not without hopes of reuniting the whole peninsula under one crown.

As to Holland, her situation was sufficiently deplorable. The country was distracted by all the passions a change of constitution so powerfully tends to arouse. Moderate men, who desired a government in which the ancient federative system might be reconciled with the concentration necessary to impart vigour to the Batavian republic, had to combat three parties equally dangerous. First, the Orangeists, comprehending all the creatures of the Stadtholder, individuals enjoying official incomes, and the populace; se the Federalists, including all the wealthy and ful families anxious to preserve the old state with the exception of the Stadtholderate, which mortified their pride; lastly, the decided democrats, a turbulent, bold, and implacable party, composed of enthusiasts and adventurers. These three parties waged an interminable strife, and prevented the establishment of the constitution. Besides these internal dissensions, Holland always stood in dread of an invasion by Prussia, which was only kept in check by the successes of France. She found her commerce harassed in the North by England and Russia, and she was losing all her colonies by the treachery of most of her governors. The Cape of Good Hope, Trincomalee, and the Moluccas, were already in the power of the English. The French troops, encamped in Holland to protect it against Prussia, observed a laudable and severe discipline; but the military administrations and commanders were deficient both in forbearance and in honesty. The country was consequently oppressed with merciless exactions. It might be hence concluded that Holland had acted unwisely in linking herself to France, but this would be a superficial inference. Holland, placed between two colossal and hostile states, must necessarily fall under the influence of the conqueror. Under the Stadtholder, she was the vassal of England, and sacrificed to her interests, and shackled, moreover, with domestic slavery. In allying herself to France, she incurred the hazards incidental to the nature of that power, territorial rather than maritime, and endangered her colonies; but she might one day, favoured by the happy junction of the three continental navies, recover what she had lost; and she might hope for an equitable constitution under the ægis of French protection. The fate of nations is thus ruled: if they be strong, they effect their own revolutions, but they undergo all the miseries inseparable from social convulsions, and shed torrents of native blood; if they be weak, they see their neighbours arrive to revolutionise them at the point of the bayonet, and suffer all the inconveniences arising from the presence of a foreign army. True, they are saved from internecine struggles, but condemned to maintain the soldiers who are distributed over their confines to preserve order. Such was the destiny of Holland, and her position with reference to the French. Under these auspices she had not proved of much utility to the French government. Delays and difficulties impeded the reorganisation of her navy and army; the Batavian bonds, in which the war-indemnity of one hundred millions had been paid, had been negotiated for a poor trifle, and the advantages of the alliance had become almost null for France; hence had accrued asperity between the two countries. The Directory reproached the Dutch government with not performing its engagements, and the Dutch government upbraided the Directory with rendering it incapable of fulfilling them. Notwithstanding this gloom upon their relations, the two powers were animated with a like purpose. A fleet and an army for embarkation were preparing in Holland to co-operate in the enterprises contemplated by the Directory.

With Prussia, a large portion of Germany, Denmark, Sweden, and Switzerland, France still continued on terms of strict neutrality. Differences had arisen between France and America. The United States had manifested a spirit equally unjust and ungrateful with regard to France. Washington in his old age had allowed himself to be trepanned into the party of John Adams and the English, who wished to restore aristocratic and monarchical institutions in America. The injurious acts of certain privateers, and the conduct of the agents of the committee of public welfare, served as the pretexts against France—pretexts singularly baseless, for the wrongs of the English towards the American marine were much more glaring, and the demeanour of the French agents had been resented at the time, and ought to have been excused. The supporters of the English party contended that France meant to procure the cession of Louisiana and the Floridas from Spain; that by means of these provinces and of Canada, she would surround the United States, disseminate therein her democratic principles, successively detach all the States from the Union, thus dissolve the American confederation, and form one vast democracy from the Gulf of Mexico to the Five Lakes. There was no truth in this, but such allegations served to inflame animosity, and stir up enemies to France. A treaty of commerce had recently been concluded between America and England, which contained stipulations transferring to the latter power exclusive advantages hitherto reserved to France alone, and well earned by the services she had rendered the American cause. Under these circumstances, a rupture with the United States found advocates in the French government. Monroe, who chanced to be the American minister at Paris, gave the most sagacious counsel to the Directory on this subject. "War with France," he represented, "will force the American government to throw itself into the arms of England, and wholly subject it to the influence of the latter; aristocracy will become predominant in the United States, and liberty be endangered. On the contrary, by patiently enduring the wrongs of the present president, you will leave him without excuse, disabuse the American people, and ensure a different choice at the next election. All the grievances of which France may have to complain will then be redressed." This prudent and prophetic exhortation prevailed with the majority of the Directory. Rewbell, Barras, and Larévellière successfully enforced the views thus inculcated, despite the protest of Carnot, who, although usually predisposed for peace, maintained the policy of appropriating Louisiana, and converting it into a republic.

Such were the relations of France with the powers which ranked either as its allies or simply as its friends. England and Austria had in the preceding year negotiated a treaty of triple alliance with Russia; but the great and crafty Catherine had since ceased to exist. Her successor, Paul, a prince of diseased intellect, and rational only for evanescent intervals, as has often happened in his family, had evinced great regard for the French emigrants, but little eagerness to execute the conditions of the treaty of triple alliance. It would seem that the colossal magnitude of the French revolution had made a deep impression on his mind, and he is even stated to have comprehended the danger of rendering it more formidable by contending against it; indeed, his language to a Frenchman well known for his talents and accomplishments leads strongly to the inference. Without disavowing the treaty, he had adduced the state of his armies and exchequer in exculpation of inaction, and recommended England and Austria to attempt the ways of negotiation. England had endeavoured to prevail on the King of Prussia to join the coalition, but had not succeeded in her aim. That monarch was sensible he had no interest in advancing to the succour of his redoubtable enemy the emperor. France held out to him the promise of an indemnity in Germany for the Stadtholder, who had married his sister; he had therefore nothing to desire individually. His great object was to prevent Austria, defeated and despoiled by France, from obtaining indemnities for her losses in Germany; he even desired to oppose her receiving such indemnities in Italy: thus he had announced that he would never consent to the cession of Bavaria to Austria in exchange for the Low Countries; and at the same time he offered his alliance to the republic of Venice, undertaking to guarantee its integrity in case France and Austria should venture to accommodate their differences at its expense. His manifest purpose, therefore, was to debar the emperor from receiving equivalents for the losses he had suffered in his struggle against France.

Russia still standing aloof from the contest, and Prussia persisting in her neutrality, England and Austria remained alone in the lists. The situation of England had become one of discouragement. She no longer dreaded, at least for the moment, an expedition against Ireland, but her bank was more seriously threatened than ever; she founded but feeble hopes on Austria, whom she saw gasping for breath; and she viewed with alarm the probability of France, after dictating peace to the continent, overwhelming her with its undivided force. Austria, notwithstanding the reduction of Kehl and Huningen, felt that she had wasted her energies in so obstinately persevering against two mere bridge-heads, and that she ought to have moved the bulk of her forces into Italy. The disasters of Rivoli and La Favorita, and the surrender of Mantua, had placed her in imminent peril. She was obliged to uncover the Rhine, and to reduce her strength on that frontier far beneath that of the French, in order to withdraw troops, together with her Archduke Charles, to the Italian theatre of war. But during the interval occupied by these troops in traversing the distance between the Upper Rhine and the Piave and Isonzo, she was exposed without defence to the assaults of an adversary who seized the advantages of time with admirable promptitude.

The apprehensions of Austria were only too well justified. France was preparing to assail her in her most vital parts, and the campaign we are about to record will show with what vigour and success.

CHAPTER LII.

STATE OF THE FRENCH ARMIES AT THE OPENING OF THE CAMPAIGN OF 1797.—MARCH OF BONAPARTE AGAINST THE ROMAN STATES.—TREATY OF TOLENTINO WITH THE POPE.—FRESH CAMPAIGN AGAINST THE AUSTRIANS.—PASSAGE OF THE TAGLIAMENTO, AND BATTLE OF TARWIS.—PASSAGE OF THE JULIAN ALPS, AND MARCH ON VIENNA.—PRELIMINARIES OF PEACE SIGNED WITH AUSTRIA AT LEOBEN.—PASSAGE OF THE RHINE.—PERFIDY OF THE VENETIANS.—MASSACRE OF VERONA.—FALL OF THE REPUBLIC OF VENICE.

THE army of the Sambre and Meuse, reinforced by a considerable portion of the army of the Ocean, had been augmented to eighty thousand men. Hoche, who had been appointed its commander, had tarried but a short while in Paris after his return from the Irish expedition, and repaired with all haste to his head quarters. He had employed the winter in organising his troops, and forming magazines of necessary supplies. Drawing ample resources from Holland and the provinces between the Meuse and the Rhine, which were regarded as conquered countries, he had relieved his soldiers from the wants which afflicted the army of the Rhine. Imagining another distribution of the different arms, he had moulded the whole into a more perfect form of combination, and trained it into the exactest discipline. He panted to lead his eighty thousand men into the field, and recognised no obstacle to prevent him advancing into the very heart of Germany. Eager to illustrate his political views, he cherished a desire to imitate the example of the conqueror of Italy, and to create in his turn a new republic. The provinces between the Meuse and Rhine, which had not been, like Belgium, declared constitutional territory, were provisionally under military rule. If, on the conclusion of peace with the empire, they were refused to France, from repugnance to grant her the barrier of the Rhine, consent might at least be wrung to their constitution as a republic—the friend and ally of the French. Such a republic, under the name of the Cisrhenane republic, might be indissolubly attached to France, and become as useful to her as one of her own provinces. Hoche took advantage of the moment to give it a provisional organisation, and to prepare it for republican institutions. He had formed at Bonn a commission charged with the twofold duty of organising it, and of levying the supplies requisite for his troops.

The army of the Upper Rhine, under the command of Moreau, was far from being in so satisfactory a condition. So far as the bravery and discipline of the soldiers were concerned, nothing was to be desired; but it lacked the necessaries of life; and the want of money preventing even the purchase of a bridge-equipage, its appearance in the field was fatally retarded. Moreau earnestly entreated for the grant of a few hundred thousand francs, but the exchequer was utterly unable to gratify even so moderate a demand. In his distress he had applied to General Bonaparte for a remittance; but the latter could not comply with his wishes until he had brought his enterprise against the papal dominions to a fortunate issue. Owing to this penury, the operations on the Rhine were necessarily delayed.

Prompt and signal blows, meanwhile, were about to be struck in Italy. Bonaparte, when preparing to destroy the last Austrian army at Rivoli, had announced that he would afterwards make an excursion of a few days in the states of the Pope, for the purpose of subduing his holiness to the yoke of the republic, and of gathering the funds he required for the exigencies of his army; and he had added that, if a reinforcement of 30,000 men were sent him, he would clear the Julian Alps, and march boldly on Vienna. This project, justly deemed chimerical the preceding year, had now become feasible. Policy on the part of the Directory could alone oppose any obstacle; it might naturally have felt averse to entrust all the operations of the war in the hands of a young man so absolute in his determinations. However, the confiding Larévellière strongly insisted that he should be furnished with the means of executing a plan so glorious, and one which would, moreover, terminate the war so speedily. It was decided that 30,000 men should be forwarded to him from the Rhine. Bernadotte's division was draughted from the army of the Sambre and Meuse, and Delmas' division from that of the Upper-Rhine, to be transported across the Alps in the depth of winter. Moreau used every effort to put Delmas' division into a suitable state to represent with credit the army of the Rhine in Italy; he selected his best troops, and emptied his magazines to equip them. It was impossible that any could have evinced a more honourable and disinterested feeling. These two divisions, forming twenty and some odd thousand men, passed the Alps in January, at a time when their march was suspected by none. A storm arrested them as they were on the point of clearing the Alpine ridge. The guides recommended a halt until it subsided; but the charge was sounded, and the tempest defied, with drums beating and banners streaming in the gale. They had already descended into the plains of Piedmont, ere their departure from the banks of the Rhine was known.

Bonaparte had scarcely signed the capitulation of Mantua, than he set out, without waiting to witness the humiliation of Marshal Wurmser, and proceeded straightway to Bologna, with the view of taking immediate measures against the Pope. The Directory would have been well pleased if he had finally destroyed the temporal power of the Holy See, but it refrained from imposing this course upon him as an obligation, and left him free to act according to circumstances and his own dictates. Bonaparte had no intention of embarking in such an enterprise. Whilst preparations were in progress throughout Upper-Italy for a march beyond the Julian Alps, he purposed wresting one or two additional provinces from the Pope, and subjecting him to a contribution sufficient to defray the charges of the impending campaign. To attempt more, would be to compromise the general plan against Austria. It especially behoved him to regulate his conduct in such a manner as to avoid a religious war, and to overawe the court of Naples, which had signed a peace, but considered itself in no degree bound by its treaty. That power was anxious to interfere in the dispute, as well with the hope of grasping part of the papal spoils, as for the purpose of averting the establishment of a republic at Rome, and the extension of the revolution to its own portals. Bonaparte assembled at Bologna Victor's division, and the Italian troops newly levied in Lombardy and the Cispadan republic, and marched at their head, to execute in person an enterprise which, to be conducted successfully, required a more than usual display of his tact and promptitude.

The Pope was in mortal disquietude. The emperor had promised him his alliance only on very hard conditions, to wit, at the price of Ferrara and Commachio; but even this alliance had become of no avail since the discomfiture of the Austrian army under Alvinzy. The Holy See had therefore compromised itself to little purpose. The correspondence of Cardinal Busca, secretary of state, and a sworn enemy of France, had been intercepted. The plans laid to destroy the French army by attacking it from the rear were all unfolded, so that not even an excuse remained for deprecating the vengeance of a conqueror whose pacific propositions had been for a whole year spurned and rejected. When the French resident Cacault communicated the manifesto of the general, and requested permission to retire, the papal court hesitated to retain him from a remnant of pride, but it was thrown into direful consternation. Soon, however, it took counsel of despair. The Austrian general Colli, who had arrived at Rome with sundry officers, was placed at the head of the papal troops; fanatical exhortations were delivered throughout the Roman provinces; paradise was promised to all who should take up arms for the Holy See, and every effort made to stir up a Vendée around Bonaparte. Urgent prayers were addressed to the court of Naples, designed to kindle alike the fervour of ambition and the zeal of fanaticism.

Bonaparte advanced with rapidity to quench the conflagration ere it had time to spread. On the 16th Pluviose (4th February), he marched on the Senio, where the papal army was intrenched. It was composed of seven or eight thousand regular troops, and a great number of peasants hastily armed and led by monks. The appearance of this host was signally grotesque. An officer bearing a flag of truce appeared to declare that, if the French army persisted in advancing, it would be fired upon. Notwithstanding this menace, it proceeded towards the bridge over the Senio, which was strongly defended. Lannes ascended the course of the river with a few hundred men, passed it at a ford, and drew up in battle array on the rear of the Roman forces. Thereupon General Lahoz, with the Lombard troops, marched on the bridge, and speedily succeeded in carrying it. The new Italian troops bravely withstood the fire, which for an interval was brisk and sustained. Four or five hundred prisoners were taken, and several peasants put to the sword. The papal army retreated in disorder. It was pursued to Faenza; the gates of the town were forced, and an entrance effected amidst the howls of a furious population and the peals of the tocsin. The soldiers demanded leave to pillage; Bonaparte refused it. He assembled the prisoners captured in the affair on the banks of the Senio, and addressed them in Italian. Those unfortunate men imagined they were drawn out to be slaughtered. Bonaparte rebuked their fears, and intimated to them, amidst their joyful astonishment, that he gave them liberty, on condition they returned to enlighten their countrymen respecting the intentions of the French, who had come to destroy neither religion nor the popedom, but desired simply to remove the evil counsellors with whom the Pope was environed. He subsequently caused food to be distributed amongst them, and then dismissed them. From Faenza Bonaparte pushed rapidly on to Forli, Cesena, Rimini, Pesaro, and Sinigaglia. Colli, with whom not more than three thousand regular troops remained, intrenched himself in advance of Ancona, in a strong position. Bonaparte surrounded him, and took the greater part of his men prisoners. He gave them likewise liberty on the same conditions. Colli retired with his officers to Rome. It now only remained to march on that capital. Bonaparte proceeded straightway to Loretto, whence the treasures were found to have been removed, on which account scarcely a million was collected. The antique wooden Virgin was transported to Paris as an object of curiosity. At Loretto he quitted the coast, and marched by Macerata on the Appenines, intending to cross them and debouch on Rome if it should become necessary. He arrived at Tolentino on the 25th Pluviose (13th February), and there halted, to await the effect produced by his rapid march, and the liberation of the prisoners. He had summoned the general of the Camaldulenses, a friar in whom Pius VI. reposed great confidence, and charged him to bear a mission of peace to Rome. Bonaparte was extremely desirous that the Pope should submit, and accept the conditions he designed to impose upon him. He had no wish to lose time in effecting a revolution at Rome, which would detain him longer than it suited him to tarry, possibly provoke the court of Naples to take up arms, and, by overthrowing the established government, ruin for the moment the Roman finances, and prevent the extraction from the country of the twenty or thirty millions whereof he stood in such pressing need. He held that the Holy See, shorn of its finest provinces for behoof of the Cispadan republic, and exposed to contact with that newly-established democracy, would be speedily invaded by the revolutionary contagion, and swept away by its potent agency. His views were eminently sagacious, and the future demonstrated their forethought. He thus awaited at Tolentino the combined effects of clemency and terror.

The liberated prisoners had, in fact, spread through all parts of the Roman dominions, and especially at Rome, the most favourable reports concerning the French army, and greatly allayed the existing rancour against it. The general of the Camaldulenses reached the Vatican as the Pope was preparing to step into his carriage and quit Rome. The pontiff, encouraged by what this messenger related to him, relinquished all intention of abandoning his capital, dismissed the secretary of state Busca, and dispatched Cardinal Mattei, the prelate Galeppi, the Marquis Massimi, and his nephew the Duke di Braschi, to Tolentino, to treat with the French general. They were vested with full powers to conclude a treaty, provided the republican exacted no sacrifice bearing on faith. The negotiation consequently became an affair of little difficulty, for, on articles of faith, the French general betokened a most accommodating spirit. The treaty was arranged in a few days, and signed at Tolentino on the 1st Ventôse (19th February). Its principal conditions were as follows. The Pope revoked every treaty of alliance against France, recognised the republic, and declared himself at peace and in good intelligence with it. He ceded to it all his rights on the Comtat Venaissin, and surrendered definitively to the Cispadan republic the legations of Bologna and Ferrara, and the rich province of Romagna in addition. The city and important citadel of Ancona were to remain in the possession of France until a general peace. The two provinces of the Duchy of Urbino and of Macerata, which the French army had overrun, were restored to the Pope in consideration of fifteen millions. A similar sum was to be paid in conformity with the provisions of the armistice concluded at Bologna, not yet executed. These thirty millions were payable, two-thirds in money, and one third in diamonds and other precious stones. The Pope was to furnish besides 800 cavalry horses, 800 draught horses, buffaloes, and other products of the ecclesiastical territory. He bound himself to disavow the murder of Basseville, and to pay 300,000 francs, in compensation, as well to his heirs as to those who had suffered from the consequences of that event. All the objects of art and manuscripts ceded to France by the armistice of Bologna were to be immediately conveyed to Paris.

Such was the treaty of Tolentino, which secured to the Cispadan republic, besides the legations of Bologna and Ferrara, the fine province of Romagna, and obtained for the French army a subsidy of thirty millions, being more than sufficient for the campaign in perspective. Fifteen days had sufficed to bring the expedition to a fortunate issue. Whilst negotiating this treaty, Bonaparte had contrived to keep the court of Naples in wholesome awe, and to free himself from such embarrassments as it could offer. Before quitting Tolentino, he performed a remarkable act, which already bespoke his latent tendencies. Italy, and particularly the states of the Church, swarmed with expatriated French priests. These unfortunate men, seeking refuge in the convents, were not always received in those establishments with the most charitable welcome. The decrees of the Directory warned them from the countries occupied by the French armies, and the Italian monks were not grieved to be delivered from them by the approach of the French troops. The wretched exiles were reduced to despair. Long banished from their native land, and exposed to the scorn and obloquy of strangers, they shed tears on beholding the French soldiers; they even recognised some of them, whose pastors they had been in the rural parishes of France. Bonaparte was easily moved; he furthermore took pleasure in showing himself free from every kind of prejudice, revolutionary or religious; hence, he enjoined, by an ordinance, all the convents in the papal dominions to receive the French priests, maintain them, and afford them a pecuniary allowance. He thus ameliorated their condition, instead of driving them before him as fugitives. He notified to the Directory the motives which had induced him to commit this infraction of its decrees. "By continually expelling these unfortunates from their retreats," he wrote, "you oblige them to return home. It is better that they remain in Italy than migrate to France; they will be useful to us there. They are less fanatical than the Italian priests, and they will enlighten the people whom every means are taken to excite against us. Besides," he added, "they weep on seeing us; how withhold pity for their misfortunes?" The Directory approved his conduct. This action and his explanatory letter, transpiring through the public prints, produced a very great sensation.

Bonaparte immediately returned to the Adige, to execute the boldest march whereof history makes mention. After having once passed the Alps to enter Italy, he now prepared to cross them a second time, to throw himself beyond the Drave and the Muehr, into the valley of the Danube, and to advance on Vienna. No French army had ever appeared in sight of that capital. In the accomplishment of so mighty an undertaking he had to defy appalling dangers. He left Italy in his rear,—Italy, absorbed in terror and admiration, it is true, but still impressed with the belief that the French could not hold it long.

The last campaign of Rivoli and the reduction of Mantua had apparently dissipated all such doubts; but a march into Germany was fitted to revive them in their full extent. The governments of Genoa, Tuscany, Naples, Rome, Turin, and Venice, irritated at the spectacle of the revolution planted on their confines, in the Cispadan and Lombardy, would probably rise in hostilities on tidings of the first reverse. In the uncertainty of the result, the Italian patriots remained quietly observant, to avoid compromising themselves. The army of Bonaparte was much inferior in strength to what it ought to have been, considering the vast hazards his plan involved. The divisions of Delmas and Bernadotte, recently arrived from the Rhine, did not comprise above twenty thousand men; the old army of Italy contained upwards of forty, which, with the Lombard troops, might make about seventy thousand in all. But it would be necessary to leave twenty thousand at least in Italy, fifteen or eighteen in guard of the Tyrol, and thus thirty or thereabouts would be left to march on Vienna,—an incredible temerity! To obviate this difficulty in some degree, Bonaparte attempted to conclude an offensive and defensive alliance with the king of Sardinia, which, indeed, he had long ago desired. This alliance promised to bring him ten thousand men, brave and disciplined troops. The king, who had heretofore deemed the guarantee of his possessions too small a reward for the services he might render, was now happy to embrace the offer, seeing that revolutionary ideas were spreading with so impetuous a wave. He signed the treaty, which was transmitted to Paris. But this treaty ran counter to the views of the French government. The Directory, approving the policy of Bonaparte in Italy, which consisted in awaiting the subversion of governments, neither provoking nor discouraging change, so as to avoid both the trouble and responsibility of revolutions,—the Directory was wishful neither to molest nor to guarantee any prince. The ratification of the treaty was therefore very doubtful, and at any rate it could not arrive in less than fifteen or twenty days. The Sardinian contingent was then to be mustered and put in motion, and by that time Bonaparte would be already beyond the Alps.

Bonaparte was even more solicitous to conclude a similar treaty of alliance with Venice. The government of that republic was making considerable armaments, of which the design was sufficiently obvious. The lagoons were filled with Sclavonian regiments. The podestat of Bergamo, Ottolini, a fit instrument of state-inquisitors, had distributed money and arms amongst the mountaineers of the Bergamasco, and held them ready for a favourable occasion. This Venitian government, however, equally emasculated and perfidious, refrained from compromising itself, and persisted in its pretended neutrality. It had refused the alliance of Austria and Prussia, but it was in arms; and should the French, on entering Austria, sustain reverses, it was prepared to take a decided part, by massacring them in their retreat. Bonaparte, whose astuteness rivalled even that of Venitian aristocracy, was sensible of this danger, and pressed for its alliance rather to secure himself from its evil purposes than to obtain its aid. On passing the Adige, he called to his presence the proveditore Pezaro, the same he had so cruelly terrified the preceding year at Peschiera; he now submitted to him the most frank and amicable overtures. The whole terra-firma, he represented to him, was imbued with revolutionary ideas; a single word from the French would suffice to arouse all the provinces in rebellion against Venice; but, if Venice united herself in alliance with the French, they would refrain from encouraging revolt, strive to calm discontent, guarantee the republic against the ambition of Austria, and, without demanding the sacrifice of its constitution, be content to recommend, for its own welfare and stability, certain indispensable modifications.—The prudent course thus advised was enforced with all the earnestness of sincerity. It is not true that at the very moment Bonaparte lavished these exhortations, the Directory and himself already contemplated the surrender of Venice to Austria. The Directory entertained no fixed ideas on the subject; or if, pending the issue of events, it revolved any particular plans, they were based on the principle of enfranchising Italy rather than of yielding a portion to Austria. As to Bonaparte, he was sincerely desirous of securing an ally; and if Venice had hearkened to him, if she had cordially embraced his offers, and submitted to modify her constitution, she would have preserved her territory and her ancient laws. Pezaro replied in evasive terms. Bonaparte, perceiving he had nothing to hope, determined to adopt requisite precautions, and to supply all deficiencies by his accustomed resource,—rapidity and vivacity of action.

He had under his command upwards of sixty thousand men, unsurpassed in military qualities by any troops hitherto arrayed for combat. Ten thousand he purposed to leave in Italy, which, united with the Lombard and Cispadan battalions, would form a body of fifteen or eighteen thousand men, sufficient to overawe the Venetians. Fifty and a few thousand remained for offensive operations, which he marked out for disposition according to the nature of the ground and the position of the enemy. Three routes led, across the Rhætian, Norican and Julian Alps, to Vienna: the first towards the left, traversing the Tyrol by the defile of Brenner; the second in the centre, passing Carinthia by the pass of Tarwis; the third on the right, crossing the Tagliamento and the Isonzo, and leading into Carniola. The Archduke Charles had the bulk of his forces on the Isonzo, guarding Carniola and covering Trieste. Two corps, the one at Feltre and Belluno, the other in the Tyrol, occupied the two other roads. Through the neglect of Austria in too tardily moving reinforcements into Italy, six divisions detached from the Rhine had not yet arrived. This omission might have been partly repaired, if the Archduke Charles, planting his head-quarters in the Tyrol, had resolved to operate on the French left. He would have received the six divisions from the Rhine fifteen days earlier; and in that case, Bonaparte, instead of defiling on the right through Carinthia or Carniola, would have been compelled to engage and defeat him before hazarding a march beyond the Alps. But he would have encountered the Archduke with his best troops and found the task by no means easy. The Archduke, however, had strict orders to cover Trieste, the only port belonging to the Austrian empire. He accordingly established himself at the entrance of Carniola, and merely posted accessory corps on the roads through Carinthia and the Tyrol. Two of the divisions draughted from the Rhine were appointed to reinforce General Kerpen in the Tyrol; the other four were to pass behind the Alps, through Carinthia and Carniola, and join the head-quarters in Friuli. The month of March had only commenced. The Alps were covered with ice and snow. How improbable that Bonaparte would seriously think of scaling their fearful crests at such a moment!

Bonaparte conceived that by falling impetuously on the Archduke, before the arrival of the principal forces from the Rhine, he would carry the passes of the Alps with comparative facility, clear them in his wake, successively defeat, as he had always done, the isolated Austrian corps, and, if he were supported by a movement of the armies of the Rhine, advance even to Vienna.

In consequence he reinforced Joubert, who, since the battle of Rivoli, had deservedly obtained his unlimited confidence, with the divisions of Baraguey d'Hilliers and Delmas, and placed him at the head of eighteen thousand men. He instructed him to ascend into the Tyrol, furiously assail Generals Laudohn and Kerpen, drive them beyond the Brenner, on the other side of the Alps, afterwards diverge towards the right through the Pusterthal, and eventually join the grand army in Carinthia. Laudohn and Kerpen might doubtless return into the Tyrol, after Joubert had rejoined the principal army; but they would require time to recover from their defeat, to procure reinforcements and regain the Tyrol, and in the interim Bonaparte would be at the gates of Vienna. In order to conciliate the Tyrolese, he recommended Joubert to caress the priests, to speak well of the Emperor and ill only of his ministers, to seize nothing but the imperial coffers, and to make no changes in the administration of the country. He charged the intrepid Massena, with his fine division, ten thousand strong, to march on the corps stationed in the centre towards Feltre and Belluno, hasten to the gorges of Ponteba which precede the great pass of Tarwis, take possession of the gorges and the pass, and thus secure the entrance into Carinthia. In person he proposed to march with three divisions, twenty-five thousand men strong, on the Piave and the Tagliamento, drive the Archduke before him into Carniola, then diverge towards the road through Carinthia, join Massena at the pass of Tarwis, clear the Alps by that defile, descend into the valley of the Drave and the Muehr, pick up Joubert, and march on Vienna. He relied greatly on the impetuosity and boldness of his attacks, and on the awe usually inspired by the unexpected and terrible blows he was wont to strike.

Before commencing his movements, he conferred on General Kilmaine the command of Upper Italy. Victor's division, distributed in the states of the Pope, awaiting the payment of the thirty millions, was to return within a few days on the Adige, and there form with the Lombards the corps of observation. Meanwhile an extraordinary ferment reigned in the Venitian provinces. The peasants and mountaineers devoted to their priests and to the existing oligarchy on the one hand, and the inhabitants of the towns agitated by the revolutionary spirit on the other, were ready to engage in civil strife. Bonaparte enjoined General Kilmaine to observe the strictest neutrality between the two parties, and set out to execute his vast projects. According to usuage, he published an energetic proclamation, fitted to stimulate still higher the enthusiasm of his soldiers, if that had been possible. On the 20th Ventôse, Year V. (10th March 1797), amidst an intense cold, and with several feet of snow lying on the mountains, he put his whole line in motion. Massena began his operation against the corps in the centre, drove it on Feltre, Belluno, and Cadore, captured a thousand prisoners, in the number of whom was General Lusignan, diverged on Spilimbergo, and plunged into the gorges of Ponteba, which precede the pass of Tarwis. Bonaparte advanced on the Piave with three divisions: the division of Serrurier, which had distinguished itself before Mantua, the division of Augereau, actually commanded by General Guyeux in the absence of Augereau, who had been sent to Paris with the Austrian flags, and the division under Bernadotte recently arrived from the Rhine. This latter offered a strong contrast, by its simplicity and austere deportment, to the old army of Italy, enriched in the teeming plains it had conquered, and composed of the daring, fiery, and intemperate denizens of the south. The soldiers of Italy, proud of their victories, ridiculed those of the Rhine, and called them the contingent, in allusion to the contingents of the circles, which, in the armies of the emperor, usually performed their duty sluggishly and indifferently. The soldiers of the Rhine, veterans in arms, were impatient to prove their prowess before their rivals in glory. Already several duels had been fought on account of these jibes, and the emulous eagerness to wrestle gloriously with the enemy was wrought to the highest pitch.

On the 23d (13th March), the three divisions passed the Piave without accident, save only that they nearly lost a man, who was on the point of being washed away by the current, when a canteen-woman swam to his rescue and brought him happily to shore. Bonaparte presented this heroine with a golden necklace. The enemy's outposts fell straightway back and sought shelter behind the Tagliamento. All the Archduke's troops, distributed in Friuli, were there assembled to dispute the passage. The two youthful adversaries were now at length to confront each other. One, by saving Germany through a luminous conception, had acquired a high reputation the preceding year. He was bold, resolute, and unfettered by the antiquated routine of German tactics, but dubious always of success and in trepidation for his glory. The other had astounded Europe by the fecundity and audacity of his combinations; and nothing in the world daunted him. Modest previous to Lodi, he now deemed no capacity equal to his own, nor any soldier equal to the French soldier. On the morning of the 26th Ventôse (16th March), Bonaparte moved his three divisions on the banks of the Tagliamento through Valvasone. This river, whose bed is often uncertain, falls from the Alps over rocky channels, and divides into a multitude of arms, all fordable. The Austrian army was drawn up on the opposite side, protecting with its fire the shores of the river, and keeping its superb cavalry deployed on its wings, in order to draw from it every advantage on plains so eminently favourable for evolutions.

Bonaparte left the division of Serrurier in reserve at Valvasone, and moved forward the two divisions under Guyeux and Bernadotte, the first to the left, fronting the village of Gradisca, where the enemy was posted, and the latter to the right, in face of Godriopo. The cannonade commenced, and a few cavalry skirmishes occurred on the flanks. Finding the enemy too well prepared, Bonaparte made a feint of giving his troops repose, directed an intermission of the fire, and ordered the soup to be made ready. The device succeeded; the enemy concluded that the divisions having marched all night would now be brought to a halt and recruited with an interval of rest. But at noon, Bonaparte suddenly issued orders for the resumption of arms. The division under Guyeux deployed to the left, that under Bernadotte to the right. Battalions of grenadiers were formed. At the head of each division was placed the light infantry, prepared to disperse as sharpshooters, and then the grenadiers who were appointed to charge, together with the dragoons who were to support them. The two divisions were drawn up in the rear of these two vanguards. Each demi-brigade had its first battalion deployed in line, and the two others formed in close column on the wings of the first. The cavalry was stationed to hover on the wings. The army advanced in this order towards the banks of the river, marching to combat with the precision and coolness of troops on parade.

General Dammartin on the left, and General Lespinasse on the right, pushed forward their artillery. The light infantry dispersed and covered the banks of the Tagliamento with a swarm of sharpshooters. Bonaparte thereupon gave the signal. The grenadiers of the two divisions entered the stream, supported by squadrons of cavalry, and moved steadily through its waters towards the opposite shore. "Soldiers of the Rhine," exclaimed Bernadotte, "the army of Italy has its eyes on you!" The troops hurried forward with equal intrepidity on both quarters. They rushed upon the hostile army and repulsed it on all sides. The Archduke, however, had posted a mass of infantry at Gradisca on the French left, and held his cavalry on their right, with the view of outflanking and charging them on the plain. General Guyeux attacked Gradisca with impetuosity at the head of his division, and carried it. Bonaparte disposed his reserve of cavalry on his threatened wing, and directed it, under the orders of General Dugua and Adjutant-general Kellermann, to attack the Austrian cavalry. It executed the charge with skill and promptitude, captured the general of the enemy's cavalry, and put it to flight. Along the whole line the Tagliamento was cleared and the Austrians in retreat. The French had taken four or five hundred prisoners; the open nature of the ground prevented them from securing more.

Such was the action of the 26th Ventôse (16th March), called the battle of the Tagliamento. During its progress, Massena, on the centre road, attacked Osopo, seized the gorges of Ponteba, and drove the remains of Lusignan and Ocskay's divisions on Tarwis.

The Archduke Charles perceived that if he resolved to guard the route of Carniola and cover Trieste, he must lose the route of Carinthia, which was the most direct and the shortest, and that which Bonaparte desired to follow in his march on Vienna. The chaussée of Carniola communicates with that of Carinthia and the pass of Tarwis by a cross road which winds along the valley of the Isonzo. The Archduke detached the division under Bayalitsch by this communication towards the pass of Tarwis to anticipate Massena if possible. He himself retired with the remainder of his forces on Friuli, with the design of disputing the passage of the Lower-Isonzo.

Bonaparte pursued him and reduced Palma-Nuova, a Venitian fortress, which the Archduke had occupied, and which contained large magazines. He afterwards marched on Gradisca,* a town situated in front of the Isonzo. He arrived there on the 29th Ventôse (19th March). Bernadotte advanced with his division to the walls of the place, which was weakly fortified, but defended by three thousand men. Meanwhile, Bonaparte sent Serrurier's division below Gradisca, with orders to pass the Isonzo and intercept the retreat of the garrison. Bernadotte, without awaiting the result of this manœuvre, summoned the town to surrender. The Austrian officer in command refused to capitulate. The soldiers of the Rhine demanded leave to assault, burning with ardour to enter the place before their comrades of Italy. They rushed furiously on the intrenchments, but a storm of balls and grape stretched upwards of five hundred on the ground. Serrurier's movement, however, fortunately put an end to the combat. The three thousand Austrians in Gradisca laid down their arms, and delivered up their flags and cannon.

In the meantime Massena had at length reached the pass of Tarwis, and, after a hot engagement, succeeded in securing that avenue of the Alps. Thus Bayalitsch, crossing the country by the Isonzo to anticipate him at this important post, was foiled in his purpose, and doomed to find the approach barred. The Archduke, foreseeing the possibility of this misfortune, left the residue of his army on the route to Friuli and Carniola, with orders to rejoin him behind the Alps at Clagenfurt, and hastened in person to Villach, where numerous detachments were arriving from the Rhine, in order to direct a counter attack on Tarwis, dislodge Massena, and re-open the route to the division under Bayalitsch. Bonaparte, on his side, left Bernadotte's division to continue the pursuit of the corps retiring into Carniola, and with the divisions of Guyeux and Serrurier set off in the wake of Bayalitsch to envelop him from the rear in the valley of the Isonzo.

Prince Charles, having rallied behind the mountains the shattered corps of Lusignan and Ocskay, which had been chased from the pass of Tarwis, strengthened them with six thousand grenadiers, the best and bravest of the emperor's forces, and attacked the defile, in which Massena had merely left a detachment. He succeeded in recovering it, and there established himself with the troops of Lusignan and Ocskay and the 6,000 grenadiers. Massena collected the whole of his division to redeem its loss. Both commanders were well aware of the great importance of the position. By securing Tarwis the French became masters of the Alps, and completely encompassed Bayalitsch and his division. Massena led on his brave infantry with headlong impetuosity, exposing himself, as usual, to the front of danger. The Archduke was not less prodigal of his person than the republican general, and repeatedly confronted the fire of the French riflemen. The pass of Tarwis is the most elevated of the Noric Alps, soaring high above and commanding the plains of Germany. The battle was fought above the clouds, in the midst of snow, and on fields of ice. Whole troops of cavalry were overturned and disabled on this dismal scene of conflict. At length, after contesting the ground to his last battalion, the Archduke relinquished Tarwis to his persevering adversary, and was constrained to sacrifice the division of Bayalitsch. Massena, again master of the pass, turned back to meet that unfortunate division, and attacked it in front, whilst pressed from the rear by the divisions of Guyeux and Serrurier, united under the orders of Bonaparte. It had no alternative but to submit at discretion. Many of the soldiers composing it, natives of Carniola and Croatia, saved themselves across the mountains, having thrown down their arms; but five thousand remained in the power of the French, with all the baggage, administrations and magazines of the Austrian army, which had been directed on this route. Thus had Bonaparte reached the summit of the Alps in fifteen days, and, on the side where he himself commanded, fully accomplished the object he had aspired to realize.

* This town will be distinguished from the one of the same name on the Tagliamento.

In the Tyrol also, Joubert justified the confidence reposed in him by a series of brilliant actions. The two Austrian generals, Laudohn and Kerpen, occupied the two banks of the Adige. Joubert had attacked and defeated them at Saint-Michel, killing 2,000 of their men, and taking 3,000 prisoners. Pursuing them without intermission on Neumarkt and Tramin, and cutting off other 2,000 men, he had driven Laudohn to the left of the Adige, into the valley of Meran, and Kerpen to the right, to the foot of the Brenner. Kerpen, reinforced at Clausen by one of the divisions marching from the Rhine, had attempted to make a stand, and been again defeated. At Mittelwald he had been further reinforced by a second division from the Rhine, had been once more worsted and finally repulsed beyond the Brenner. Having thus swept the Tyrol, Joubert had wheeled to the right, and was now marching through the Pusterthal in order to rejoin his commander-in-chief. It was only the 12th Germinal (1st April), and Bonaparte had already penetrated to the summit of the Alps, taken nearly twenty thousand prisoners, secured the proximate junction of Joubert and Massena with his principal corps, and prepared the way for advancing on Vienna with fifty thousand men. His discomfited antagonist was striving to rally the broken wrecks of his army, and to unite them with the troops arriving from the Rhine. Such were the results of this rapid and audacious movement on the part of the French general.

But whilst Bonaparte was pursuing this swift career of victory, all that he had foreboded on his rear came to pass. The Venitian provinces, stirred by revolutionary ideas, had broken into revolt. They had thus furnished the government of Venice with a pretext for assembling considerable forces, and for putting itself into a condition to overwhelm the French army in case of reverse. The provinces on the right side of the Mincio were the most imbued with the revolutionary spirit from their contiguity to Lombardy. In the towns of Bergamo, Brescia, Salo, and Crema, resided a number of great families, to whom the yoke of the nobility of the Golden-Book was most odious, and who, supported by the bulk of the citizens, formed a powerful party of malcontents. By following the counsels of Bonaparte, opening the pages of the Golden-Book, and making certain modifications in the ancient constitution, the Venitian government would have disarmed the hostility of the formidable party which had arisen in all the provinces of the Terra-Firma; but the accustomed blindness of aristocracies had prevented the adoption of any conciliatory course, and rendered a revolution inevitable. The part taken by the French in this revolution is easily explained, despite the malicious fabrications suggested by hatred and repeated by folly. The army of Italy was composed of southern, that is to say, ardent revolutionists. It was impossible but that in their intercourse with the subjects of Venice they should communicate the sentiments that animated them, and excite dissatisfaction against the most detestable of oligarchies; this was unavoidable and beyond the power of either the French government or generals to avert. The views of the Directory and of Bonaparte were perfectly clear. The Directory desired the natural dissolution of the Italian governments, but was determined to take no active part in hastening their overthrow; and, moreover, it had delegated to Bonaparte the entire conduct of all political as well as military operations in Italy. With respect to Bonaparte himself, he had too much need of concord, tranquillity, and friends in his rear to have any inclination to revolutionize Venice. A compromise between the two parties consorted best with his position. This compromise and the French alliance being refused, he intended on his return to exact by coercion what he had been unable to obtain by persuasion; but, for the present, it was his object to abstain from any attempt at interference, and his opinions in that behalf were explicitly stated to the Directory. Furthermore, he had given General Kilmaine positive injunctions to take no part in political affairs, and to maintain public tranquillity as far as in him lay.

The towns of Bergamo and Brescia, of all those on the Terra-Firma the most unruly and agitated, had long been in communication with Milan; in fact, secret revolutionary committees were formed in various quarters to hold correspondence with the Milanese patriots, and solicit their aid in throwing off the yoke of Venice. The victories of the French removed all doubt as to the definitive expulsion of the Austrians; the patrons of aristocracy therefore were vanquished, and although the French affected neutrality, it was certain they would not employ their arms in subduing populations to a thraldom they had repudiated; hence it was to be inferred that they who rebelled would not only obtain but enjoy unmolested the advantages of freedom. Such was the manner in which the Italians argued. The citizens of Bergamo, the nearest in connection with Milan, applied to the Milanese authorities, inquiring how far they might rely on their assistance and on the support of the Lombard legion commanded by Lahoz. The podestat of Bergamo, Ottolini, the same who, as the faithful agent of the State-Inquisitors, distributed money and arms among the peasants and mountaineers, retained spies in the councils of the Milanese patriots; consequently he was informed of the schemes in contemplation, and furnished with the names of the principal Bergamascans implicated therein. He hastened to dispatch a courier to Venice with the intelligence thus obtained, and in his letters urged the immediate arrest of those he had ascertained to be involved in the insurrectionary project. The inhabitants of Bergamo, apprized of this proceeding of the podestat, sent in pursuit of his messenger, who was overtaken and stopped, and the names of those compromised were forthwith published. This circumstance produced the long-dreaded explosion. On the 11th March, at the very time Bonaparte was advancing on the Piave, the commotion began in Bergamo. The podestat issued threatening proclamations which were disregarded. The French commander, whom Bonaparte had placed in the citadel to watch the movements of the mountaineers of the Bergamasco, saw cause for increased vigilance, and reinforced all his posts. On both sides his aid was invoked; but he replied that he could not interfere in disputes between Venitian subjects and their government, and, moreover, intimated that he had doubled his posts merely as a precaution for the security of the fortress confided to his guardianship. In executing his orders and remaining neutral, he sufficiently promoted the designs of the Bergamascans. They assembled the following day, 12th March, instituted a provisional municipality, declared the city of Bergamo free, and expelled the podestat Ottolini, who withdrew with the Venitian troops. They likewise sent a deputation to Milan to crave the co-operation of the Lombards. The rapid extension of the insurrection to Brescia and the neighbouring towns was of unavoidable occurrence. The Bergamascans had no sooner hoisted the standard of liberty than they dispatched deputies to Brescia, whose presence and exhortations sufficed to arouse the inhabitants of that city. Battaglia, the Venitian who had given such sage advice to the senate in its deliberations, was in authority at Brescia. Believing resistance fruitless, he retired from the town, and the revolution was effected without difficulty on the 13th March. Thence skirting the foot of the mountains, the revolt continued to spread. It reached Salo, where the revolution was accomplished, as elsewhere, by the arrival of Bergamascans and Brescians, by the retirement of the Venitian authorities, and in presence of the French garrison, which remained neutral, but whose aspects, although silent, seemed propitious to the insurgents and filled them with hopes. This outbreak of the patriot party in the towns was naturally calculated to provoke a counter-movement by the opposite party dwelling on the mountains and in the fields. The mountaineers and peasants, long ago armed by the zeal of Ottolini, received the signal of action from the Capuchins and monks who preached a crusade from hamlet to hamlet; preparations were made for attacking and sacking the insurgent towns, and, if opportunities offered, for massacring the French. Henceforth the French generals could no longer continue inactive, however much disposed to remain neutral. They were too well acquainted with the designs of the mountaineers and peasants to suffer their assumption of arms; and without desiring to afford support to any party, they found themselves obliged to interfere and to repress those who harboured and even proclaimed hostile intentions against them. Kilmaine forwarded immediate orders to Lahoz, commander of the Lombard legion, to march towards the mountains and oppose the armament in progress. He neither would nor might have offered any obstacle to the operations of the regular Venitian troops, but it was impossible for him to allow a general rising, the consequences whereof were incalculable should any disaster happen the army in Austria. He dispatched couriers to Bonaparte without loss of time, and sent to hasten the march of Victor's division, which was on its return from the states of his Holiness the Pope.

The government of Venice, as usually happens with besotted rulers, who refuse to avert danger by timely concessions of what is indispensable, was struck with dismay by these events, as if they had been unforetold. It instantly put in motion the troops it had mustered long before, and directed them on the towns to the right of the Mincio. At the same time, convinced that the influence chiefly to be invoked lay with the French, it addressed to the minister of France, Lallemant, the inquiry whether, in this extreme peril, the republic of Venice might rely on the friendship of the Directory. The reply of the minister Lallemant was simple, and such as his position dictated. He declared that he had no instructions from his government anticipatory of such a case, in which he merely stated the truth; but, he added, that if the Venitian government would introduce into its constitution such modifications as were demanded by the exigencies of the times, he was of the opinion that France would cheerfully support it in the present emergency. No other answer could have been given by Lallemant; for if France had offered its alliance to Venice as against foreign powers, it had never done so as against its own subjects; nor could it have entered into any such domestic guarantee, unless on condition that a prudent and rational policy were adopted by the government. The great council of Venice met in solemn deliberation on the reply of Lallemant. Several centuries had passed since a proposition for a change in the constitution had been publicly made, and now out of above two hundred voices it obtained favour only with five. Fifty senators declared for the adoption of energetic measures; but one hundred and eighty decided for a slow and progressive reform, to be deferred until calmer times, or, in other words, for evasion. It was resolved to send forthwith two deputies to Bonaparte, with the view of sounding his intentions and soliciting his aid. For this mission were nominated J. B. Cornaro, one of the sages of the Terra-Firma, and Pesaro, the famous procurator, whom we have already seen in conference with the general.

The couriers dispatched by Kilmaine and the Venitian deputies reached the quarters of Bonaparte at the moment his bold manœuvres had secured him the line of the Alps, and laid open to invasion the hereditary states of Austria. He was at Gorizia engaged in settling the capitulation of Trieste. He learnt with sincere affliction the events that had occurred on his rear, as may be readily imagined when the daring and perilous nature of his march on Vienna is considered. Moreover, his dispatches to the Directory prove the vexation he experienced; and they who have alleged that he did not express his real feelings in those dispatches have evinced but little reflection, since he never hesitated to avow in such communications his craftiest designs against the Italian governments. It was difficult for him to determine what part he should take under the circumstances. Policy and generosity equally forbid him to repress by force the party which upheld French principles, which caressed and welcomed French soldiers, and to confirm the sway of that which was ready, in case of disaster, to destroy those same principles and soldiers. Meanwhile, he resolved to profit by the actual contingency in order to obtain from the Venitian envoys the concessions and succours which had been hitherto denied to him. He received the two deputies with politeness, and granted them an audience on the 5th Germinal (25th March). "That I should take arms," he said to them, "against my friends, against those who hail our presence and would willingly fight for us, in behalf of my enemies, in favour of those who detest and would willingly massacre us, is quite impossible. So base a policy is equally repugnant to my heart and my interests. I will never lend my aid in opposition to principles for which France has made its revolution, and to which I partly owe the success of my arms. But I once more offer you my friendship and advice. Ally yourselves frankly with France, approximate to her principles, and make indispensable modifications in your constitution; in that case I answer for all, and without employing a violence which is impossible on my part, I will obtain through my influence over the Italian people, and by the assurance of a more reasonable system of government, a return to peace and order. This result is as desirable for you as for me."

This language, spoken with sincerity, and the wisdom whereof needs no demonstration, did not suit the Venitian envoys, especially Pesaro. Their views were otherwise directed; they were desirous that Bonaparte should restore the fortresses he had occupied by way of precaution, as Bergamo, Brescia, and Verona, and allow the arming of the fanatical party against the patriotic, thus permitting another Vendée to arise in his rear. Such ideas were not calculated to promote an understanding. Bonaparte, whose temper was hasty, treated the envoys with great harshness, and, recalling to them the various proceedings of the Venitian government towards the French army, warned them he was well aware of their secret dispositions and projects, but that he was prepared, and an army remained in Lombardy to keep watch upon their conduct. The conference thus became acrimonious. From these questions the parties passed to those respecting supplies. Hitherto Venice had furnished provisions to the French army, and she had justified Bonaparte in exacting them by the support she gave the Austrian army. Now that he had moved into the hereditary states, the Venitians propo-ed that Bonaparte should cease to live at their expense. This, however, was not at all his intention, since in order that he might propitiate the inhabitants of the Austrian countries, it was his purpose to avoid subjecting them to any demands. Meanwhile the purveyors, secretly commissioned by the Venitian government to supply the army, had ceased their operations, whereby it had become necessary to make requisitions in the Venitian territories. "This is a vicious method," Bonaparte remarked; "it harasses the cultivator and gives rise to monstrous peculations; give me a million monthly whilst this campaign lasts, which cannot be long; the French republic will afterwards account with you, and it will owe you more for this million than for all the evils you will endure from requisitions. Besides, you have cherished all my enemies, you have given them an asylum, and you owe me reciprocity." The two envoys replied by stating that the exchequer was exhausted. "If it be exhausted," rejoined Bonaparte, "take from the treasures of the Duke of Modena, which you have received to the prejudice of my allies the Modenese; get money from the effects of the English, Russians, Austrians, of all my enemies, which you hold in charge." They parted with abundant dissatisfaction on both sides. Another interview took place the following day. Bonaparte renewed with calmness his propositions; but Pesaro offered nothing to satisfy him, and simply promised to inform the senate of all his demands. Thereupon Bonaparte, whose irritation began to swell beyond control, seized Pesaro by the arm and said to him: "I see through you, I probe you; I know what you are preparing for me; but, beware! if, whilst I am engaged in a distant enterprise, you massacre my sick, attack my depôts or threaten my retreat, you provoke your own ruin. What I might have overlooked whilst in Italy, will become an inexpiable crime when I am entangled in Austria. If you take arms, you decide either my destruction or yours. Reflect, therefore, and expose not rashly the sickly lion of Saint Mark against the fortune of an army whose depôts and hospitals alone could supply force enough to storm your lagoons and exterminate you." This energetic language struck terror, without carrying conviction, into the minds of the Venitian envoys, who immediately transmitted the result of their conference. Bonaparte, on his part, forthwith wrote to Kilmaine, enjoining him to redouble his vigilance, to punish any French commanders who overstepped the limits of neutrality, and to disarm all the mountaineers and peasants.

Events were so far advanced that it was impossible to stop their course. The insurrection of Bergamo occurred on the 23d Ventôse (13th March); that of Brescia on the 27th (17th March); that of Salo on the 4th Germinal (24th March). On the 8th Germinal (28th March), the town of Crema effected its meditated revolution, and the French troops became perforce implicated in it. A detachment which preceded the division of Victor, on its return to Lombardy, appeared before the gates of Crema. It was at a moment of fermentation. The sight of the French troops naturally tended to inflame the hopes and courage of the patriots. The Venitian podestat, who was in great consternation, at first refused admission to the French; eventually he allowed forty to enter, who seized the gates of the town and opened them to the advancing columns. The inhabitants took advantage of the opportunity, arose in insurrection, and expelled the podestat. The French had thus acted merely to secure a passage; the patriots profited thereby to revolt. When such dispositions exist, anything serves as a cause of explosion, and circumstances altogether involuntary lead to results which induce a suspicion of confederacy perfectly groundless. Such was the situation of the French, who, beyond all doubt, were individually favourable to the revolution, but officially preserved neutrality.

The mountaineers and peasants, stimulated by the agents of the Venitian government, and by the exhortations of the Capuchins, overran the open country. The Sclavonian regiments, landed from the lagoons on terra firma, advanced towards the insurgent towns. Kilmaine had issued his orders, and put in motion the Lombard legion to disarm the peasants. Several conflicts had already taken place; villages had been burnt, and peasants seized and disarmed. But these, on their part, began to sack the towns and to slaughter the French, whom they designated under the name of Jacobins. Even earlier they had put to death all such as they found scattered in the most horrible manner. First of all, they effected a counter-revolution at Salo: whereupon a body of the inhabitants of Bergamo and Brescia, supported by a detachment of Poles from the Lombard legion, marched upon Salo to drive out the mountaineers. Certain individuals, sent forward to open a parley, were drawn into the town and slain; the detachment was surrounded and repulsed; two hundred Poles were taken prisoners and conducted to Venice. At Salo, Verona, and in all the Venitian cities, the known partisans of the French were siezed and conveyed beneath "the Leads,"* and the inquisitors of state, encouraged by this miserable success, appeared disposed to proceed to cruel extremities. Some have alleged, indeed, that it was prohibited to dredge the canal Orfano, which was appropriated, as is known, to the detestable usage of drowning prisoners of state. Still, whilst preparing to put in force a relentless rigour, the Venitian government strove to deceive Bonaparte by acts of seeming acquiescence, and it granted the million per month which had been asked. The assassination of Frenchmen, however, wheresoever they were encountered, did not the less continue. The situation of affairs was becoming extremely critical, and Kilmaine dispatched fresh couriers to Bonaparte. He, on hearing of the actions fought by the mountaineers, of the event at Salo, where two hundred Poles had been made prisoners, of the incarceration of all the partisans of France, and of the assassinations committed on Frenchmen, was seized with wrath. He instantly addressed an imperious letter to the senate, wherein he recapitulated all his causes of complaint, and demanded the disarming of the mountaineers, and the liberation as well of the Polish prisoners as of the Venitian subjects confined beneath "the Leads." He commissioned Junot to carry this letter and read it to the senate, and at the same time ordered the minister Lallemant to immediately quit Venice with a declaration of war, if all the points demanded were not conceded.

* [I Piombi, the celebrated prisons underneath the roof of the old ducal palace in Venice.]

Meanwhile, he descended with gigantic strides from the heights of the Noric Alps into the valley of the Muehr. His principal reliance, in undertaking a movement of such temerity, was on the prompt cooperation in the campaign of the armies of the Rhine, and their speedy arrival on the banks of the Danube. But he received a letter from the Directory which deprived him of all hopes in this respect. The penury of the exchequer was such that it could not furnish General Moreau with the few hundred thousand francs requisite to procure a bridge-equipage to pass the Rhine. The army under Hoche, which occupied two bridges and was quite ready, clamoured to march, but the government dared not hazard it beyond the Rhine, whilst Moreau remained behind it. In his dispatch, Carnot even magnified the delays which must retard the advance of the two armies into Germany, and left Bonaparte no hope of being supported. The intimation greatly disconcerted him; ardent in imagination, he passed at once from extreme confidence to the uttermost distrust. He suspected either that the Directory wished to ruin the army of Italy and its general, or that the other generals refused to second him. He replied with bitter reflections on the conduct of the armies of the Rhine. He stated, "that a line of water was no impediment, as he had himself sufficiently proved; that when a general desired to cross a river, he could always do so; that by determining never to risk his glory, a man sometimes lost it; that he had cleared the Alps with three feet of snow and ice, and that if he had calculated like his colleagues he would not have ventured to attempt it; that if the soldiers of the Rhine left the army of Italy exposed alone in Germany, they could have no blood in their veins; that, for the rest, this brave army, if it were abandoned, would recoil, and to Europe he appealed as the judge between it and the other armies of the republic." Like all proud and irascible men, Bonaparte loved to complain, and to exaggerate the subject of his complaints. Although he thus wrote, he entertained no intention of retreating or even of pausing, but the contrary design of striking Austria with terror by a rapid march, and dictating to her a peace. Many considerations tended to flatter this purpose. Vienna was already in consternation; the court was inclined to treat; Prince Charles strongly advised it; the ministry alone, devoted to England, still resisted. The conditions prescribed to Clarke, previous to the victories of Arcole and Rivoli, were so moderate that Austria might be easily brought to accept them, or perhaps even worse. Re-united with Joubert and Massena, Bonaparte would have forty five or fifty thousand men under his command, and with so powerful a mass he need not dread a general battle, whatever might be the force of the enemy. For all these reasons, he resolved to make an overture to the Archduke Charles, and if he made no reply, to fall upon him with impetuosity, and to strike a blow so prompt and signal that all further opposition to his offers would vanish. And how glorious for him, if, alone, without aid or support, penetrating into the heart of Austria by so extraordinary a route, he should impose peace upon the haughty and puissant emperor!

On the 11th Germinal (31st March), Bonaparte was at Klagenfurth, the capital of Carinthia. Joubert, on his left, was accomplishing his movement, and about to rejoin him. Bernadotte, whom he had detached to sweep the road of Carniola, had possessed himself of Trieste, the rich mines of Idria, and the Austrian magazines, and was advancing by Laybach upon Klagenfurth. On this day, the 11th Germinal, he addressed to Prince Charles a memorable letter.

"General-in-chief," he wrote, "brave soldiers make war and desire peace. Has not this war continued six years? Have we not slain enough of men and caused sufficient evils to suffering humanity? From all quarters her appealing voice is heard. Europe, which took up arms against the French republic, has laid them down. Your nation alone remains, and yet blood is about to flow more profusely than ever. This sixth campaign opens under dismal auguries. Whatever may be its issue, we shall kill on both sides several thousands of men, and after all we must finish by coming to an understanding, since every thing has a term, even the passions of hatred and animosity.

"The Executive-Directory of the French republic has already made known to his Majesty the Emperor its desire to terminate a war which desolates both nations. The intervention of the court of London frustrated the design. Is there then no hope of an amicable settlement; and is it fixed that, for the interests and passions of a nation removed from the calamities of war, we are to continue to massacre each other? You, sir, who by your birth stand so near the throne, and are superior to all the petty passions which often animate ministers and governments, are you ambitious to merit the title of benefactor of all humanity and true saviour of Germany? Think not, commander-in-chief, that I mean by these words that it is not possible to save it by force of arms; but even supposing the chances of war become favourable to you, Germany will not be the less laid waste. As to myself, commander-in-chief, if the overture I have the honour to make you, may save the life of a single man, I shall feel more proud of the civic crown I will esteem myself to have merited, than of the mournful glory which can result from military successes."

The Archduke Charles could not entertain this overture, inasmuch as the determination of the Aulic Council was not yet taken. At Vienna, precautions were being adopted to meet the worst extremity; the moveables of the crown and all important documents were embarked on the Danube, the young archdukes and archduchesses were sent into Hungary, and the court itself was prepared, in case of dire necessity, to evacuate the capital. The Archduke accordingly replied to General Bonaparte, that he was equally desirous of peace with himself, but that he had no power to treat, and that he must address himself directly to Vienna. Bonaparte advanced rapidly through the mountains of Carinthia, and on the morning of the 12th Germinal (1st April), drove the enemy's rear-guard on Saint-Veit and Freisach, and dispersed it. In the afternoon of the same day, he encountered the Archduke, who had taken up a position in front of the narrow gorges of Neumarkt with the remains of his Friulian army, and with four divisions drawn from the Rhine, those of Kaim, Mercantin, and the Prince of Orange, and the reserve of grenadiers. A furious combat ensued in these gorges, of which Massena had again all the honour. The soldiers of the Rhine defied the veterans of the army of Italy, and it became a rivalry between them who should advance quickest and farthest. After a desperate engagement, in which the Archduke lost three thousand men on the field of battle and twelve hundred prisoners, all was forced at the point of the bayonet, and the gorges carried. On the following day, Bonaparte marched without halting from Neumarkt on Hunsmarkt. It was between these two points that the cross road uniting the great highways of the Tyrol and Carinthia came to a head. By this route Kerpen was approaching, followed by Joubert. The Archduke, with the view of gaining time to secure the junction of Kerpen, proposed a suspension of arms, in order, as he alleged, to take into consideration the letter of the 11th (31st March). Bonaparte returned for answer that they could both fight and negotiate, and continued his march. The next day, 14th Germinal (3d April), he again engaged the enemy in a fierce conflict at Hunsmarkt, where he took 1,500 prisoners, entered Knittelfeld, and met with no further obstacle as far as Leoben. His van-guard reached that town on the 18th Germinal (7th April). Meanwhile, Kerpen had made a considerable circuit rejoin the Archduke, and Joubert had approximat to the principal French army.

On the very day that Bonaparte entered Le Lieutenant-general Bellegarde, chief of Prince Charles' staff, and Major-general Meerveldt, arrived at head-quarters as envoys of the Emperor, whom the rapid advance of the French had intimidated, and who desired a suspension of arms. They solicited one for ten days. Bonaparte was sensible that suspension of arms for ten days would give the Archduke time to receive his last reinforcements from the Rhine, to collect together all the scattered portions of his army, and to recover from the effects of his precipitate retreat. But to himself, a truce was extremely needful; and on his side he would thereby gain the advantage of securing a junction with Bernadotte and Joubert; moreover, he trusted in the sincerity of the desire to treat for peace, and he granted a suspension of arms for five days, in order to allow plenipotentiaries time to arrive and sign preliminaries. A convention to this effect was signed on the 18th (7th April), covenanted to continue in force only till the 23d (12th April). He fixed his head-quarters at Leoben, and pushed Massena's van-guard forward to the peak of the Simmering, the last height of the Noric chain, distant only twenty-five leagues from Vienna, and whence the towers of that metropolis were discernible to the eye. He employed the five days in re-positioning and gathering his columns. He issued a proclamation to the inhabitants calculated to calm their fears as to his intentions, and not in words only but in deeds he manifested the sincerity of his protestations. Nothing was taken by the army without being equivalently reimbursed.

Bonaparte awaited the expiration of the five days, ready to strike a fresh blow to complete the terror of the imperial court, if it were not yet sufficiently alarmed. But at Vienna all things wore a favourable aspect for the termination of this long and terrible struggle, which had lasted six years, and caused the effusion of torrents of blood. The English party in the ministry was totally discredited, and Baron Thugut tottered on the verge of disgrace. The inhabitants of Vienna clamoured loudly for peace. The Archduke Charles himself, the hero of Austria, advised it, and declared that the empire could not be saved by arms. The Emperor inclined to the same opinion. At length the determination was taken, and the Count de Meerveldt and the Marquis de Gallo, Neapolitan ambassador at Vienna, were forthwith dispatched to Leoben. The latter was selected through the influence of the Empress, who was a daughter of the Queen of Naples, and who interfered greatly in affairs. Their instructions were to sign preliminaries which should serve as the bases in negotiating thereafter a definitive peace. They arrived on the 24th Germinal (13th April), in the morning, at the moment that Bonaparte, the truce having expired, was about to attack the advanced posts. They intimated that they held full powers to settle the bases of peace. A garden in the vicinity of Leoben was made neutral ground, and the conferences were opened amidst the bivouacs of the French army. The young general, suddenly transformed into a negotiator, had never undergone a diplomatic apprenticeship; but for a year past, he had had manifold important affairs to transact, such as in the world could be scarcely rivalled; moreover he possessed a fame which rendered him the most imposing personage of his epoch, whilst the language he was wont to hold was as calculated to dazzle and overawe as his glory. Thus he constituted a brilliant representative of the French republic. He held no commission to negotiate; Clarke alone was invested with full powers in this respect, and Clarke, whom he had summoned, had not yet arrived at head-quarters. But he might consider preliminaries of peace in the light of an armistice, which was within the province of generals to grant; besides, he was certain that Clarke would sanction whatever he might determine, and he hesitated not to enter upon the negotiation. The regulation of the etiquette to be observed was a chief point with the Emperor and his envoys. According to ancient custom the Emperor had the honour of precedence above the monarchs of France; he was always first named in the protocol of treaties, and his ambassadors also took precedence of the French ambassadors. He was the only sovereign to whom this distinction was conceded by France. The imperial envoys offered to immediately recognise the French republic if the old etiquette were preserved. "The French republic," Bonaparte haughtily replied, "has no need of recognition; it is in Europe as the sun above the horizon; so much the worse for the blind who can neither see nor profit by it." He rejected the article of recognition. As to the point of etiquette, he declared "that such questions were very indifferent to the republic; that it might be hereafter settled with the Directory, which would probably not be averse to sacrifice matters of that sort for substantial advantages; but that, for the moment, they would treat on the footing of equality, and France and the Emperor take alternatively the post of precedency."

Topics of graver interest were then entered upon. The first and most important article was the cession of the Belgian provinces to France. It was not conceivable that Austria could contemplate a refusal. Accordingly, it was at once agreed that the Emperor should relinquish to France all his Belgian provinces, and moreover that he should acquiesce, as a member of the Germanic empire, in the extension of the French boundary to the banks of the Rhine. The difficulty was to find indemnities of equivalent value for the Emperor, which he insisted upon having either in Germany or Italy. There were two modes of procuring them for him in Germany: the assignment of Bavaria, or the secularization of sundry ecclesiastical states of the empire. The first idea had already more than once occupied European diplomacy. The second was due to the wit of Rewbell, who had imagined the scheme as at once the most expedient and the most conformable to the spirit of the revolution. The time in fact was past for bishops to be allowed the possession of temporal sovereignties, and it was an ingenious thought to make the ecclesiastical power pay the penalty of French aggrandizement. But the assent of Prussia to the augmentation of Austrian power in Germany could scarcely be anticipated; and furthermore, if Bavaria were appropriated, an indemnity must be found for the prince who held it. Besides, the states of Germany being already under the immediate influence of the Emperor, he gained comparatively little by the acquisition, and thus it happened that he greatly preferred an aggrandizement in Italy, which would give a veritable increase to his dominion and power. Hence Italy became the region where indemnities for the Emperor were to be found.

Bonaparte dissolving the Council of Five Hundred 8th. November 1799.

If the French had consented to restore Lombardy unconditionally to the Emperor, and undertaken to preserve the republic of Venice in its actual state, and to keep back the approach of democracy to the Alpine frontiers, he would have immediately accepted peace, and have recognised the Cispadan republic, composed of the Duchy of Modena, the two legations, and Romagna. But to replace Lombardy beneath the yoke of Austria, Lombardy which had evinced such attachment towards the French, which had made so many efforts and sacrifices for them, and the principal inhabitants of which had so strongly compromised themselves, would have been an act of equal baseness and imbecility, since their position enabled them, in a certain degree, to dictate terms. To guarantee the independence of Lombardy, therefore, was a settled point, and thus it became necessary to seek in Italy for indemnities to recompense the Emperor for the twofold loss of Belgium and Lombardy. There was a very simple arrangement, which had more than once occurred to the minds of European diplomatists and already formed a subject of hope to Austria and of fear to Venice, which was to compensate Austria with the Venitian territories. The Illyrian provinces, Istria and all Upper Italy, from the Isonzo to the Oglio, formed rich possessions amply sufficient to console Austria for her cessions. The conduct of the Venitian oligarchy towards France, its repeated refusals to form an alliance with her, its secret armaments, the obvious purpose of which was to attack the French in the event of a reverse of fortune, the recent rising of the mountaineers and peasants, the assassinations committed on Frenchmen, had filled Bonaparte with indignation. And if the Emperor, for whom Venice had secretly armed, was content to accept her spoils, Bonaparte, against whom her preparations had been made, could have little scruple to concede them. Besides, equivalents might be offered to Venice. There were Lombardy, the duchy of Modena, the legations of Bologna and Ferrara, and Romagna, rich and extensive provinces, whereof a portion formed the Cispadan republic, with some of which Venice might be indemnified. This arrangement appeared the most expedient, and now, for the first time, was adopted the principle of compensating Austria with the Venitian possessions on terra-firma, in consideration of the republic being indemnified with other Italian provinces.

This mode of settlement was referred to Vienna, whence the negotiators were scarcely twenty-five leagues distant. It was there approved of, and the preliminaries of peace were forthwith arranged and reduced into articles, which were to serve as the bases of a definitive peace. The Emperor relinquished to France all his territories in the Low Countries, and consented, as a member of the empire, that the republic should acquire the boundary of the Rhine. He likewise renounced all rights to Lombardy. In return for these sacrifices, he received the Venitian dominions on terra-firma, Dalmatia, Istria, and Upper Italy to the Oglio. Venice remained independent, retained the Ionian Islands, and was to obtain a recompense out of the provinces which were at the disposal of France. The Emperor recognised the republics which were intended to be established in Italy. The French army was to withdraw from the Austrian states, and canton on their frontier, that is to say, to evacuate Carinthia and Carniola, and plant itself on the Isonzo and at the entrances of the Tyrol. All the arrangements relative to the provinces and government of Venice were to be made in concert with Austria. Two congresses were to be opened, one at Berne for the individual peace with the Emperor, and the other in a town of Germany for the general peace with the Empire. The treaty with the Emperor was to be concluded in three months, under pain of the preliminaries being void. Austria had in addition a powerful reason for hastening the conclusion of the definitive treaty, namely, to enter as early as possible into possession of the Venitian provinces, in order that the French might not have time to propagate revolutionary ideas.

The design of Bonaparte was to dismember the Cispadan republic, comprising the duchy of Modena, the two legations, and Romagna, and to incorporate the duchy of Modena with Lombardy, forming of them a single republic, the capital of which should be Milan and the name Cisalpine, on account of its position with respect to the Alps. The two legations and Romagna he proposed to give to Venice, intending at the same time to humble the aristocracy and modify its constitution. Thus two republics would be established in Italy, close allies of France, indebted to him for their existence, and disposed to co-operate in all his plans. The frontier of the Cisalpine republic would be the river Oglio, which might easily be lined with intrenchments. It would not possess Mantua, which, together with the Mantuan, was to be restored to the Emperor; but Pizzighitone, on the Adda, might be rendered a fortress of impregnable strength, and the walls of Bergamo and Crema might be raised. The republic of Venice with its islands, with the Dogado and Polesina, which endeavours would be made to preserve for it, with the two legations and Romagna, which were to be given to it, with the principality of Massa-Carrara, and the gulf of Spezia, which might be added to it in the Mediterranean, would constitute a great maritime power touching the sea on both sides of the peninsula.

It may be asked why Bonaparte did not profit by his position to drive the Austrians altogether out of Italy, and more especially why he indemnified them at the expense of a neutral power, after a process similar in appearance to the infamous partition of Poland. But, as to the first point, was it possible wholly to enfranchise Italy? Must not Europe have been entirely prostrated to wring its consent to the deposition of the Pope, the King of Sardinia, the Grand Duke of Tuscany, the King of Naples, and the Prince of Parma? And was the French republic capable of the efforts which such a consummation implies? Was it not, in truth, a great achievement in this one campaign to extend the principles of liberty by the establishment of two republics, whence they must necessarily spread to the utmost limits of the Peninsula? With regard to the second point, the partition of the Venitian territories bore no resemblance to the celebrated atrocity which has so long formed the reproach of Europe. Poland was divided by the very powers which had fomented her disorders, and which were solemnly bound to afford her their assistance. Venice had repudiated the offers of friendship which the French had often made her in all sincerity, and was, moreover, prepared to betray and attack them in the moment of peril. If she had to complain of any party it was of the Austrians, for whose advantage her treachery toward the French was designed. Poland, besides, was a country whose limits were clearly defined on the map of Europe; whose independence was, so to speak, ordained by nature and essential to European tranquillity; whose constitution, although vicious, was generous; whose citizens, so shamefully betrayed, manifested a noble courage and commanded the sympathies of all civilized communities. Venice, on the contrary, had no natural territory but her lagoons, for her power had never consisted in her possessions on terra-firma; she was not obliterated because certain of her provinces were exchanged for others; her constitution was the most iniquitous in Europe; her government was abhorred by her own subjects; her perfidy and cowardice destroyed all claim either to sympathy or existence. In no feature, therefore, could the dismemberment of the Venitian states be assimilated with the partition of Poland, unless it were in the conduct of Austria.

It is, moreover, to be considered that, in order to avoid the necessity of giving such indemnities to the Austrians, they must have been excluded from Italy, which could have been effected only by dictating a peace in Vienna itself. For this the co-operation of the armies of the Rhine was indispensably requisite, and Bonaparte had been informed that they could not enter upon the campaign in less than a month. In this situation his only alternative was to retrograde and await their appearance in the field, a course exposing him to serious inconveniences, for the Archduke would have thereby gained time to collect a formidable army against him, and the Hungarians to rise en masse and assail his flanks. And, besides, the very fact of retrograding involved an admission of the heedless temerity of his advance. By accepting the preliminaries he had the honour of singly extorting peace; he reaped the reward of his perilous enterprise, and obtained conditions which, in the situation of Europe, were singularly brilliant, and above all far more advantageous than those which Clarke had been instructed to demand, since they contained stipulations for the frontier of the Rhine and the Alps, and for the establishment of a republic in Italy. Accordingly, partly moved by military and political and partly by personal considerations, he determined to sign the preliminaries. Clarke had not yet reached head-quarters. With his accustomed hardihood, and the assurance which his glory, his services, and the general desire of peace gave him, Bonaparte exceeded his powers and affixed his signature to the preliminaries, as if the question had been one of a simple armistice. The signature was attached at Leoben on the 29th Germinal, Year V. (18th April 1797).

If he had known at the moment what was passing on the Rhine, he would have been less hasty in signing the preliminaries of Leoben; but the only information he possessed was to the effect that the inaction of the armies must be long-continued. He appointed Massena to carry the convention to Paris. This was the only distinguished officer who had not been deputed to present captured banners and enjoy the honours of a triumph. Bonaparte deemed the present a fitting occasion to employ him in so glorious a mission, and one worthy of the signal services he had rendered. He likewise dispatched couriers to the armies of the Rhine and the Sambre-and-Meuse, who passed through Germany, in order that they might arrive with the greater speed, and stop hostilities if they had already commenced.

Hostilities had in fact commenced about the very time of the signature of the preliminaries. Hoche, who had long burned with impatience to enter upon action, continually urged the Directory for permission to take the field. Moreau had repaired to Paris in order to solicit in person the necessary funds for the purchase of a bridge-equipage. At length the order to begin operations was transmitted. Hoche, at the head of his fine army, debouched by Neuwied, whilst Championnet, with the right wing, debouched by Düsseldorf, and marched on Uckerath and Altenkirchen. Hoche attacked the Austrians at Heddersdorf, where they had reared formidable intrenchments, killed a multitude of their soldiers, and took five thousand prisoners. After this brilliant exploit, he advanced with rapidity on Frankfort, constantly repulsing Kray, and striving to cut off his retreat. He was on the point of surrounding him by a masterly manœuvre, and possibly of reducing him to surrender, when Bonaparte's courier, announcing the signature of the preliminaries, arrived. This intelligence arrested Hoche in the midst of his victorious progress, and caused him infinite chagrin, for he once more found himself obstructed in his career. If the couriers had been but sent through Paris, he would have had time utterly to annihilate Kray, which had added a glorious feat of arms to his laurels, and exercised a vast influence on the course of the negotiations. Whilst Hoche was moving so rapidly on the Nidda, Desaiz, who had received from Moreau anthority to pass the Rhine, executed one of the boldest actions recorded in history. He chose a point considerably below Strasburg at which to cross the river. After being stranded with his troops on a sand-bank, he eventually reached the opposite shore; there he remained for twenty-four hours, exposed to the hazard of being driven into the Rhine, and obliged to contend against the whole Austrian army to maintain himself in thickets and swamps whilst a bridge was constructing over the river. At length the passage was effected. The French repelled the Austrians into the Black Mountains, and captured part of their magazines. Here again the army was stopped in the midst of its successes by the courier from Leoben, and it also had cause to regret that the erroneous information transmitted to Bonaparte had induced him to sign the convention so hastily.

The couriers subsequently arrived at Paris, where the intelligence they conveyed diffused inexpressible joy amongst all who ardently longed for peace, but gave indifferent satisfaction to the Directory, who, deeming the military position of the republic extremely formidable, was discontented that it had not been turned to a still more advantageous account. As philosophers, Larévellière and Rewbell desired the total emancipation of Italy, and Barras, as a violent revolutionist, the more complete humiliation of potentates. But Carnot, who had affected moderation for some time past, and very generally supported the views of the opposition, advocated peace, and maintained that in order to render it durable the Emperor ought not to be too much humbled Several warm discussions took place in the Directory upon the preliminaries; ultimately, however, from a dread of irritating opinion and of appearing to desire an endless war, it was decided that the conditions settled at Leoben should be approved.

Whilst these things were passing on the Rhine and in France, important events occurred in Italy. We have seen that Bonaparte, being apprized of the troubles which disturbed the Venitian territories, of the rising of the mountaineers against the towns, of the repulse of the Brescians before Salo, of the capture of 200 Poles, of the assassination of numberless Frenchmen, and of the imprisonment of all French partisans, had written a vehement letter to the Venitian senate from Leoben. He had instructed his aide-de-camp Junot to read it in person to the senate, and to demand the immediate liberation of all the prisoners, together with the prosecution and punishment of assassins; and, if ample satisfaction were not given, he had directed him forthwith to leave Venice after publishing a declaration of war. Junot was introduced to the senate on the 26th Germinal (15th April). He read aloud the threatening letter of his general, and conducted himself with all the rudeness of a soldier flushed with the insolence of victory. He was answered that the warlike preparations complained of had been made with no other view than to maintain subordination within the dominions of the republic, and that if assassinations had been committed, the evil was unintentional, and it should be remedied. Junot refused to be satisfied with vain protestations, and threatened to publish the declaration of war unless the senate liberated the prisoners of state and the Poles, and gave directions to disarm the mountaineers and to prosecute the perpetrators of the assassinations. With difficulty the senate induced him to moderate his tone, and it was finally arranged with him and the French minister Lallemant, that the senate should write to General Bonaparte, and send to him two deputies to treat of the satisfactions he demanded. The two deputies chosen were Francis Donati and Leonard Justiniani.

Meanwhile, the agitation was far from subsiding in the Venitian dependencies The peasants and mountaineers were still in hostility with the urban population. The emissaries of the aristocratical and monkish party circulated the most deceitful reports as to the fate of the French army in Austria. They proclaimed that it had been enveloped and destroyed, and appealed to two facts in corroboration of their false assertions. Bonaparte having recalled to the main army the two corps under Joubert and Bernadotte, which he had dispatched, the one through the Tyrol and the other through Carniola, had thereby uncovered his flanks. Joubert had defeated and repulsed Kerpen beyond the Alps, but had left Laudohn in a part of the Tyrol, whence he had shortly emerged, arousing the faithful population of that mountainous country, and descending the Adige in the direction of Verona. General Servier, stationed with twelve hundred men to guard the Tyrol, slowly retreated before him on Verona, in order to obtain the aid and support of the French forces left in Upper Italy. At the same time, a corps of equal force, posted in Carniola, recoiled before the Croats, who had risen in arms like the Tyrolese, and fell back on Palma-Nuova. These were but trivial events, and the French minister, Lallemant, endeavoured to impress upon the senate their trifling importance with the view of saving it from fresh imprudences; but all his arguments were unavailing; and at the very time that Bonaparte had compelled the Emperor to send plenipotentiaries to his head-quarters, it was confidently rumoured in the Venitian territories that he was beaten, enveloped, and about to perish in his mad enterprise. The party hostile to France and the revolution, at the head of which stood the majority of the members of the Venitian government, although the government itself studied to appear unconnected therewith, manifested extreme exultation. At Verona, more especially, a prodigious ferment prevailed. This city, the most considerable in the Venitian dependencies, was the next exposed to the revolutionary contagion, since it stood immediately after Salo on the line of insurgent towns. The Venitians determined to save it from the infection and expel the French from its precincts. Every thing encouraged their resolution, as well the general dispositions of the inhabitants as the concourse of mountaineers and the approach of Laudohn. Certain Italian and Sclavonian troops in the service of Venice were already stationed there; more were added, and shortly all the communications with the circumjacent towns were intercepted. General Balland, who commanded the French garrison at Verona, found himself separated from the other commanders posted in the vicinity. Upwards of twenty thousand mountaineers overspread the country around. The French detachments were attacked on the roads, Capuchins preached to the populace in the streets, and a false manifesto of the podestat of Verona was circulated, exhorting to the slaughter of the French. This manifesto was forged, a fact sufficiently avouched by the signature of Battaglia, which had been daringly attached to it; but it did not the less contribute to inflame the passions. Lastly, a communication, addressed by the heads of the party in Verona, announced to General Laudohn that the time had arrived for him to advance, and that the town would be delivered into his hands. All this passed during the days of the 26th and 27th Germinal (15th and 16th April). No intelligence of Leoben had yet been received, and the moment, in fact, appeared most happy for an explosion.

General Balland was on his guard. He had issued orders to his troops to retire into the forts on the first signal. He protested to the Venitian authorities against the measures pursued with regard to the French, and especially against the preparations he saw in progress. But he obtained no real satisfaction; simply evasive assurances. He wrote to Mantua and Milan to request succours, and he held himself in readiness to take refuge in the forts. On the 28th Germinal (17th April), which happened to be Easter Monday, an extraordinary ferment manifested itself in Verona; bands of peasants entered the town vociferating "Death to the Jacobins!" Balland immediately withdrew his troops into the forts, merely leaving detachments at the gates, and intimated that upon the first act of violence he would bombard the town. Nevertheless, towards the middle of the day, repeated whistlings were heard in the streets, and eventually tumultuous assaults were made on the French, armed bands fell on the detachments left on guard at the gates, and all were massacred who had not time to reach the forts. Ferocious assassins pursued the unarmed Frenchmen, whom their functions retained in Verona, slew them, and threw their bodies into the Adige. They did not even respect the hospitals, and a part of the sick was slaughtered to satisfy their thirst of blood. Those who could save themselves by flight, but had not time to reach the forts, escaped into the government hospital, where the Venitian authorities gave them refuge in order that the massacre might not seem their work. Already upwards of four hundred unfortunate men had been sacrificed; the French garrison boiled with rage on beholding their countrymen murdered and their dead bodies floating in the stream of the Adige. General Balland at once gave orders to fire, and a cannonade opened upon the town. He might easily have laid it in ashes. But if the mountaineers who crowded it were indifferent to such a catastrophe, the inhabitants and magistrates were alarmed, and resolved to parley for the purpose of saving their town from destruction. They accordingly sent an envoy to General Balland to negotiate with him and avert the disaster. General Balland consented to listen to terms with a view of rescuing the fugitives in the palace of the government, upon whom all the mischief done to the town was threatened to be avenged. Among these were women and children belonging to the employés of the administrations, and the sick escaped from the hospitals, whom it was of consequence to extricate from danger. Balland demanded they should be forthwith delivered to him, and that the mountaineers and Sclavonian regiments should be sent away, the populace disarmed, and hostages given in the persons of the Venitian magistrates, as pledges of the submission of the town. The envoy begged that an officer should be sent to treat at the palace of the government. The brave Colonel Beaupoil had the courage to undertake this mission. He pushed through the crowd of infuriated populace, who howled to tear him in pieces, and with difficulty reached the seat of the authorities. The whole night was passed in fruitless discussions with the proveditore and podestat, but nothing satisfactory could be arranged. They refused to disarm or to give hostages, and they required guarantees against the vengeance which General Bonaparte would not fail to take upon the rebellious city. But during these negotiations, the agreement to abstain from hostilities whilst the conference was held was not maintained by the furious hordes that had broken into Verona; the forts were fired on, and the French troops provoked into sallies. The following morning, 29th Germinal (18th April), Colonel Beaupoil returned to the forts, amidst the greatest dangers, without having contained any concession. Shortly the French learned that the Venetian magistrates, being unable to control the enraged multitude, had disappeared. The firing against the forts was renewed. Thereupon General Balland once more applied the torch to his pieces, and opened a general discharge against the town. Flames burst forth in several quarters. Some of the principal inhabitants assembled at the palace of the government to take the direction of the town in the absence of the authorities. Fresh negotiations were commenced. A mutual pledge was given to cease the firing. But this convention was not better observed by the insurgents, who continued to fire on the forts. The barbarous peasants who overran the country fell upon the garrison of the fort of La Chiusa upon the Adige, and put every man to death. They executed the same ruthless vengeance upon all the French scattered in the villages around Verona.

But the hour of vengeance was at hand. Couriers had been dispatched on all sides to carry the intelligence to General Kilmaine. Troops approached from all quarters. Kilmaine had issued immediate orders to General Chabran to march with 1,200 men, to Lahoz, commander of the Lombard legion, to push forward with 800 more, and to Generals Victor and Baraguay-d'Hilliers to advance with their divisions. Whilst these movements were being executed, General Laudohn had received intelligence of the signing of the preliminaries, and halted on the Adige After a sanguinary conflict which General Chabran had to sustain against the Venitian troops, Verona was encompassed on all sides, and then the madmen who had massacred the French sunk from the height of fury to the deepest dejection and dismay. Meanwhile from the 1st to the 5th Floreal (20th to the 24th April), the negotiations and the firing were both continued without cessation. The Venitian magistrates had re-appeared, and again insisted upon guarantees against the vengeance which menaced them; twenty-four hours were given them to form their determination, but before that time they again vanished A provisional municipality replaced them, which, seeing the French masters of the town, and prepared to reduce it to ashes, surrendered at discretion. General Kilmaine did his utmost to prevent pillage; but with all his efforts he could not save the Mont-de-Piété, which was partly plundered. He put to death some of the acknowledged leaders of the insurrection, taken with arms in their hands, imposed a contribution of 1,100,000 francs (£50,000) on the town for the payment of the army, and sent out his cavalry on the different roads to disarm the peasants, and destroy those who had the hardihood to resist. He then took measures for the re-establishment of order, and drew up a report for the commander-in-chief, awaiting his decision with regard to the further treatment of the rebellious city. Such were the massacres known under the name of the Veronian Easter.

Whilst these events were passing at Verona, an act still more atrocious, if possible, was perpetrated at Venice itself. There was an ordinance prohibiting armed vessels of belligerent powers from entering the harbour of Lido. A lugger under the command of Captain Laugier, forming part of the French flotilla in the Adriatic, being chased by some Austrian frigates, had taken refuge under the batteries of the Lido, and fired a salute of nine guns. Notwithstanding the weather and the enemy's vessels in pursuit he was ordered by signal to bear away. He was about to obéy, when, without allowing him time to make a tack-off into the open sea, the forts opened on the unfortunate vessel and raked her without mercy. Captain Laugier, inspired with a generous devotion, ordered his crew below, and paced the deck in person with a speaking-trumpet to his mouth, proclaiming his intention to retire. But he was shot dead on the deck with two men of his company. At the same moment several Venitian boats, manned by Sclavonians, rowed off to the lugger, boarded her, and put all the crew to death, with the exception of two or three miserable survivors who were conducted to Venice. This deplorable event took place on the 4th Floreal (23 April).

It was at this time that, following the massacre at Verona, the capture of that city and the signing of the preliminaries were made known at Venice. No longer able to rely on the destruction of General Bonaparte, who, so far from being surrounded and defeated, was, on the contrary, completely victorious, and had dictated peace to Austria, the government felt itself thoroughly compromised. It was now to confront the all-powerful commander whose alliance it had spurned and whose soldiers it had but just cruelly butchered. It was seized with well-founded terror. That it had officially ordered either the massacre at Verona or the cruel outrage in the port of Lido was not to be supposed, and they would know but little of the working of governments controlled by factions who should allege it. Governments in this situation have no need to issue orders for the execution of what they desire; they have but to leave the faction, whose views they approve, to act. They yield it their means, and do through it what they dare not perform openly themselves. The insurgents at Verona possessed cannons, and had been aided by regular Venitian regiments; the podestat of Bergamo, Ottolini, had long before received in abundance the supplies necessary to arm the peasants; wherefore, after having furnished the means, the government had simply to sit still and wink at their employment, and such precisely had been its conduct. Still, in this critical position, it committed a fatal indiscretion,—which was to decree a reward to the commander of the Lido, for having, as it premised, caused the Venitian laws to be respected. Thus it destroyed all hope of propitiating Bonaparte by any valid excuses. It forwarded fresh instructions to the two deputies Donati and Justiniani, who at first had been simply commissioned to answer the demands made by Junot on the 26th Germinal (15 April). At that time the events at Verona and the Lido were not known; but now the deputies had a very different task to accomplish, and occurrences of a more austere order to explain.

These, however, proceeded forward on their mission, and as they advanced amidst the rejoicings occasioned by the news of peace, they speedily comprehended that they alone had reason to be sad at this momentous juncture. They learnt on the way that, to punish their refusal of his alliance, their prosecutions of his partisans and some isolated murders committed on Frenchmen, Bonaparte had ceded a portion of their provinces to Austria. Alas! what would it be when he came to know the grievous charges which had been since supplied!

Bonaparte had already retrograded from Leoben, and, in accordance with the terms of the preliminaries, moved back his army on the Alps and the Isonzo. The envoys found him at Gratz, and were presented to him on the 6th Floreal (25th April). He was as yet aware only of the massacres at Verona, which had commenced on the 28th Germinal (17th April), and not of the occurrence before the Lido, which had taken place on the 4th Floreal (23d April). They had provided themselves with a letter from the general's brother with the hope of procuring a more gracious reception. They approached with trembling awe "this man so truly extraordinary," as they themselves describe him, "from his vivacity of imagination, his promptness of understanding, and his invincible strength of character." He received them with urbanity, and, restraining his wrath, permitted them to explain at great length; but at last breaking silence, he abruptly interrogated them: "Are my prisoners discharged? Are the assassins punished? Are the peasants disarmed? I want no vain words;—my soldiers have been massacred, signal vengeance must be taken!" The two envoys pleaded the circumstances which had compelled their government to provide against an outbreak, the excesses inseparable from such events, the difficulty of seizing the real assassins. "A government," hotly retorted Bonaparte, "so well served by spies as yours ought to know the real instigators of these murders. However, I am well aware it is not more despicable than despised, and that it is no longer able to disarm those whom it armed; but I will disarm them for it. I have made peace, and have 80,000 men; I will demolish your Leads, I will prove a second Attila to Venice. I will have no Inquisition, no Golden Book; they are institutions of barbarous ages. Your government is antiquated, it must be swept away. When I was at Goritz, I offered M. Pezaro my alliance and rational counsel. He repudiated me. You waited for my return to cut off my retreat; well, here I am! I will treat no longer, I shall now give law. If you have nothing further to say, I tell you at once you may retire."

These words, uttered with passionate vehemence, struck dismay into the hearts of the Venitian envoys. They solicited a second interview, but could obtain no other declarations from the general, who persisted in the intentions he had expressed, his evident determination being to act arbitrarily towards Venice, and destroy by force an aristocracy he had failed to induce by persuasion to reform itself. But they shortly had fresh grounds of apprehension when they learnt in detail the massacres at Verona, and especially the detestable act of cruelty in the port of Lido. Not daring to present themselves before Bonaparte, they ventured to write him a letter of the most submissive character, offering him all the explanations he might desire. "I cannot receive you all-reeking with French blood," he replied to them; "I will hear you when you have delivered to me the three inquisitors of state, the commander of the Lido, and the principal officer of police at Venice." Nevertheless, as a later courier had arrived with dispatches for them relative to the Lido affair, he consented to see them, but he refused to listen to any proposition until the individuals he had specified were delivered into his hands. Then the two Venitians, seeking to use an appliance which the republic had often in times past found of good effect, essayed to tempt him with a satisfaction of a different species. "No, no," exclaimed the indignant general, "if you were to cover this whole region with gold, all your treasures, with those of Peru to boot, would not avail to redeem the blood of one of my soldiers."

Bonaparte dismissed them. It was the 13th Floreal (2d May), and he forthwith issued a manifesto of war against Venice. The French constitution permitted neither the Directory nor commanders of armies to declare war, but it authorized them to repel hostilities. Accordingly, Bonaparte, founding his proceedings on this provision and on the affairs of Verona and the Lido, declared hostilities commenced, summoned the minister Lallemant to leave Venice, directed the lion of Saint Mark to be struck down in all the provinces of the terra-firma, the towns to be municipalized, the overthrow of the Venitian government to be everywhere proclaimed, and, pending the march of his troops from Austria, ordered General Kilmaine to move the divisions under Baraguay-d'Hilliers and Victor to the margin of the lagoons. His determinations, equally prompt with his anger, were instantly put in execution. In the twinkling of an eye the ancient lion of Saint Mark disappeared from the banks of the Isonzo to those of the Mincio, and was everywhere replaced by the tree of liberty. Troops advanced from all quarters, and the French cannon reverberated on those shores which for so long a period had not been startled by a hostile gun.

The ancient city of Venice, standing amidst its lagoons, might still present almost insuperable difficulties even to the general who had just humbled Austria. All its lagoons were defended. It had thirty-seven galleys, one hundred and sixty-eight gun-boats, carrying seven hundred and fifty pieces of ordnance, and eight thousand five hundred sailors and gunners. It was garrisoned by three thousand five hundred Italians and eleven thousand Sclavonians, was provisioned for eight months, with fresh water for two, and possessed the means of renewing its stores. The French were not masters of the sea; they had no gun-boats to traverse the lagoons; they must advance cautiously, sounding their way every step, along those canals altogether unknown to them, and under the fire of innumerable batteries. However bold and impetuous the conquerors of Italy had proved themselves, these were obstacles which might stop them and compel a siege of several months. And how many events might a delay of months bring forth! Defeated Austria might reject the preliminaries, arise again in its strength, and risk the hazards of a fresh encounter.

But if the military situation of Venice presented resources, its internal condition scarcely allowed an energetic application of them. Like all decayed bodies, its aristocracy was divided; it had neither the same interests nor the same passions. The high aristocracy placed aloof, dispensing offices, honours, and riches, was less ignorant, prejudiced, and impassioned than the inferior nobility; and moreover was actuated by the lust of power. The bulk of the nobles, excluded from employments, living in dependence, ignorant and furious, were imbued with genuine aristocratic prejudices. United with the priests they swayed the populace, which adhered to them, as usually happens in communities where no middle class exists in sufficient strength to direct its impulses. This populace, composed of sailors and artisans, rough, superstitious, and half-savage, was ready for any outbreak of fanaticism and ferocity. The middle class, composed of merchants, shopkeepers, lawyers, doctors, &c., desired, as in other places, the establishment of civil liberty, and rejoiced at the approach of the French, but dared not evince any such feeling, in presence of a populace which might be roused to the most barbarous excesses, until a revolution was actually effected. Moreover, to all these elements of discord was added a circumstance not less fruitful of danger perhaps. The Venitian government was served by Sclavonians. This barbarous soldiery, foreign to the Venitian people, and often in hostility with them, only wanted an occasion to commence a general pillage without reference to the interests of any party.

Such was the internal condition of Venice. Feeble and decrepit, its body-politic seemed on the point of crumbling in pieces of its mere motion. The grandees in possession of the government were terrified to enter the lists with a warrior like Bonaparte. Notwithstanding Venice was in a position to resist an attack, they regarded with deep apprehension the horrors of a siege, the broils which were sure to ensue between two exasperated parties, the outrages of the Sclavonian soldiery, the dangers to which Venice with its maritime and commercial establishments would be exposed; and above all, they dreaded to have their estates, situated on the Terra-firma and liable to confiscation, seized and sequestrated by Bonaparte. They trembled even for the pensions whereon the inferior nobility depended, and which might be lost if, pushing the contest to extremity, the chance of a revolution was incurred. They thought that by means of negotiation they might save the ancient institutions of Venice through modifications; retain the chief power, which always falls to the lot of those accustomed to wield it; preserve their own possessions and the pensions of the lower nobility.

and rescue the city from the horrors of a sack and pillage. Accordingly these men, who lacked both the energy of their ancestors and the passions of the mass of nobles, resolved to treat. The principal members of government met at the palace of the Doge. The assembly comprised the six councillors of the Doge, the three presidents of the Criminal Gallery, the six grand sages, the five sages of the Terra-firma, the five sages of the Orders, the eleven sages deputed from the Council, the three heads of the Council of Ten, and the three Avogadors. The object of this extraordinary assembly, convoked in contravention of all usage, was to provide for the safety of Venice. Terror was predominant in the conclave. The Doge, an old man enfeebled by age, his eyes filled with tears, presided. He spoke, saying there was no security that they should even that night sleep tranquilly in their beds. Every one was eager to proffer his counsel. One member proposed to make use of the banker Haller for the purpose of gaining Bonaparte. The idea was found idle and ridiculous. In truth, their ambassador Quirini had already instructions to do everything he could at Paris in that way, and even to buy votes in the Directory, if it were possible. Others declared for a vigorous defence. This proposal was treated as rash, and worthy only of young and foolish heads. At length the suggestion was adopted of propounding before the Great Council a modification in the Constitution, with the view of appeasing Bonaparte by the concession. The Great Council, usually composed of all the nobility, and representing the Venitian nation, was accordingly convoked. Six hundred and nineteen members, that is to say, somewhat more than one-half, were present. The proposition was submitted amidst a mournful silence. The subject had been already canvassed upon a communication from the minister Lallemant to the senate, and it had been then determined to postpone the modifications to a future day. But at present any recurrence to dilatory measures was felt to be hopeless. The proposition of the Doge was adopted by five hundred and ninety-eight voices. It bore that two commissioners deputed by the senate should be authorized to negotiate with Bonaparte, and to treat even on points within the province of the Great Council, that is to say, on constitutional questions, subject to subsequent ratification.

The two commissioners departed forthwith, and discovered Bonaparte on the margin of the lagoons, at the bridge of Marghera. He was in the act of disposing his troops, and already an exchange of shots had commenced between the French artillery and the Venitian gun-boats. The commissioners drew near and delivered to him the vote of the Great Council. He seemed struck for a moment at its terms; but, resuming his abrupt and rapid manner, he exclaimed: "And the three inquisitors of state and the commandant of the Lido, are they arrested? I must have their heads. No treaty until that French blood is avenged. Your lagoons do not alarm me; I find them just as I expected. In a fortnight I will be in Venice. Your nobles will escape death only by betaking themselves, like the French emigrants, to wander in misery over the face of the earth." The deputies strove ardently to obtain a delay of a few days to arrange the terms of satisfaction he demanded. He refused to grant them more than twenty-four hours. He agreed, however, to give a suspension of arms for six days, to allow the Commissioners time to rejoin him at Mantua, with the acceptance by the Great Council of all the prescribed conditions.

Bonaparte, satisfied to strike the Venitians with terror, was by no means anxious to engage in actual hostilities, for he duly appreciated the difficulty of forcing the lagoons, and foresaw an intervention on the part of Austria. By an article in the preliminaries, it was provided that everything relative to Venice should be regulated in concert by France and Austria. Hence, if he entered the city by force of arms, complaints would be made at Vienna of a violation of the preliminaries. On all accounts, therefore, it suited him better to induce them to submit. So, content with the fright he had given them, he took his departure for Mantua and Milan, not doubting they would soon follow with a full and entire submission.

The assembly of all the members of government, previously constituted at the palace of the Doge, again met to receive the report of the commissioners. No option was left under the circumstances; it was necessary to concede all the demands of the general, for the internal danger was becoming hourly more imminent. It was rumoured that the citizens were conspiring and laying plans to slaughter the nobles, and that the Sclavonians were prepared to profit by the occasion to plunder the city. A resolution was passed to submit a fresh proposition to the Great Council, in substance yielding to all the requisitions of General Bonaparte. On the 15th Floreal (4th May) accordingly the Great Council was again convoked. By a majority of 704 votes to 10, it determined that the commissioners should be authorized to treat unreservedly as to conditions with General Bonaparte, and a prosecution immediately instituted against the three inquisitors of state and the commandant of the Lido.

Invested with these new powers, the commissioners followed Bonaparte to Milan, to lay the boasted constitution of Venice at his feet. But six days were not sufficient, and the truce must necessarily expire before they could reach and satisfy Bonaparte. During the interval, the alarm grew to a fearful pitch in Venice. At one moment so terrible was the consternation, that the commandant of the lagoons was authorized to capitulate with the French generals left in command by Bonaparte. He was merely enjoined to stipulate for the independence of the republic, the security of religion, of persons, and of the foreign ambassadors, for public and private property, the mint, the bank, the arsenal, and the archives. A prolongation of the truce, however, was obtained from the French generals, to afford the Venitian envoys time to negotiate with the commander-in-chief.

The arrest of the three inquisitors of state had disorganized the police of Venice. The most influential personages of the middle class associated together, and openly asserted their intention to hasten the fall of the aristocracy by active means. They applied to the French chargé-d'affaires, Villetard, who had remained at Venice after the departure of Lallemant, and who was an ardent patriot. They relied with confidence on him for support in their projects. At the same time, the Sclavonians manifested symptoms of insubordination, and gave rise to fears of frightful excesses. They had already had some broils with the Venitian populace, and the citizens seemed to foment these disturbances, as they tended to promote dissention in the forces of the aristocracy. On the 20th Floreal (9th May), the terror reached its height. Two influential members of the revolutionary party, named Spada and Zorzi, entered into communication with certain of the individuals composing the extraordinary assembly formed at the Doge's palace. They suggested the prudence of applying to the French chargé-d'affaires, and consulting with him on the means of preserving Venice from the calamities which threatened it. Donati and Battaglia, two patricians whom we have before known as actors on this scene, did in fact address themselves to Villetard on the above-named day, inquiring of him what measures were best calculated, in the existing peril, to save Venice. He replied that he was not authorized to treat by the commander-in-chief, but that if his private opinion were desired, he would advise the following measures: the dismissal and embarkation of the Sclavonians; the formation of a burgher guard; the introduction of 4,000 French troops into Venice, and the occupati n by them of all the fortified posts; the abolition of the ancient government; the substitution in its place of a municipality of thirty-six members chosen from all classes, and taking the present Doge as mayor; and the liberation of all prisoners confined on account of opinion. Villetard added, that on these conditions there was no doubt General Bonaparte would pardon the three inquisitors of state and the commandant of the Lido.

These recommendations were carried to the council assembled at the Doge's palace. They were of serious import, since they involved a total revolution of things in Venice. But the heads of the government were in mortal dread of a revolution effected amid blood and pillage by the execution of the designs of the revolutionary party, through the barbarous violence of the mob, and the unbridled lust of the Sclavonians. Two of their number were differently affected, and vehemently opposed surrender. Pesaro maintained they ought to retire into Switzerland rather than themselves consummate the ruin of the ancient Venitian government. Opposition, however, was disregarded, and a resolution passed to lay these propositions before the Great Council. Its convocation was fixed for the 23d Floreal (12th May). Meanwhile the Sclavonians were paid all their arrears and shipped on board of transports to be reconveyed to Dalmatia. But a contrary wind detained them in the harbour, and their presence in the waters of Venice continued to excite uneasiness and apprehension.

On the 23d Floreal (12th May) the Great Council assembled with unusual solemnity, to vote the annihilation of this ancient oligarchy. An immense crowd was congregated. On one side were seen the citizens, overjoyed at finally beholding the power of their masters abolished; on the other, the populace, stimulated by the nobles, eager to assault and sacrifice those whom it regarded as the promoters of this revolution. The Doge rose, and, with tears starting from his eyes, proposed the abdication of its sovereignty to the Council. While yet in deliberation a report of firing was heard. The nobles started in alarm, believing they were about to be massacred. "To the vote! To the vote!" they cried from all sides. Five hundred and twelve suffrages were given for the demolition of the ancient government. According to the statutes six hundred were requisite. Twelve voted in the negative and six were neuter. The Great Council then surrendered the government to the whole Venitian people. It ordained the establishment of a provisional government, composed of deputies from all the Venitian states, and of a municipality; it consolidated the public debt and the pensions granted to the poor nobles, and decreed the introduction of the French troops into Venice. Scarcely had these resolutions passed, than a flag was hoisted at a window of the palace. At this sight the citizens applauded and were full of joy; but the populace, enraged and furious, seizing an image of St. Mark, rushed through the streets of Venice, and attacked the houses of those accused of having forced the nobility to take this step. The dwellings of Spada and Zorzi were sacked and plundered. Universal confusion reigned, and a frightful carnage and convulsion seemed inevitable. Meanwhile a number of inhabitants interested in the public tranquillity gathered together, placed at their head an old Maltese general, called Salembeni, who had been long persecuted by the State-inquisition, and fell upon the rioters. After a conflict on the Rialto they dispersed them, and restored peace and order.

The Sclavonians were finally embarked and sent off, after committing abominable excesses in the villages of Lido and Malamocco. The new municipality was instituted, and on the 27th Floreal (16th May), the flotilla was dispatched to bring a division of 4,000 French, who quietly established themselves in Venice.

Whilst these events were passing at Venice, Bonaparte had signed at Milan, and on the same day, a treaty with the Venitian plenipotentiaries in every respect conformable to the course things had taken. He therein stipulated for the abdication of the aristocracy, the establishment of a provisional government, the admission of a French division under the guise of protection, and the punishment of the three inquisitors of state and the commandant of the Lido. Secret articles moreover specified certain exchanges of territory, a contribution of three millions in money and of other three millions in naval stores, and the surrender to France of three men-of-war and two frigates. This treaty was to have been ratified by the Venitian government; but this was no longer possible, since the abdication had already taken place, and was besides of no moment, as all the chief articles of the treaty were executed. The provisional municipality, nevertheless, thought fit formally to ratify it.

Thus had Bonaparte accomplished his ends without compromising himself with Austria, or incurring the vexatious embarrassments of a siege. He had overthrown the absurd oligarchy which had betrayed him, and placed Venice in the same situation as Lombardy, Modena, Bologna, and Ferrara. He might now, without any difficulty, make all such arrangements of territory as appeared expedient to him. Whilst ceding to the Emperor all the terra-firma extending from the Isonzo to the Oglio, he possessed the means of indemnifying Venice by giving it Bologna, Ferrara, and Romagna, which at present formed part of the Cispadan Republic. Incorporating these provinces with revolutionized Venice, could not certainly be regarded as again placing them under the yoke of subjection. Then there remained the duchy of Modena and Lombardy, out of which might be carved a second republic, the ally and sister of the first. But a still better and more comprehensive plan was feasible; namely, supposing all local rivalries subdued, to amalgamate all the provinces emancipated by the French arms, and to merge Lombardy, Modena, Bologna, Ferrara, Romagna, Polesina, Venice, and the Isles of Greece, into one mighty republic, capable of commanding both the continent and the seas of Italy.

The secret articles, relative to the payment of three millions in naval stores and to the surrender of three men-of-war and two frigates, afforded an opportunity of laying hands on the whole Venitian navy. Bonaparte, whose vast mind and foresight embraced all objects at a view, was determined that the same mischance should not befall the French with regard to Venice which had happened with regard to Holland, that is to say, that the naval officers and commanders of islands, dissatisfied with the revolution, should deliver to the English the vessels and places under their command. He regarded with especial interest the important islands of Corfu, Zante, Cephalonia, Santa-Maura, and Cerigo, all belonging to Venice, in the Grecian Archipelago. He accordingly made immediate preparations for occupying them. He dispatched letters to Toulon, directing that a certain number of sailors should be sent to him by land, promising at the same time to pay and equip them on their arrival at Venice. He demanded from the Directory orders for Admiral Brueys to sail instantly with six ships, in order to rally under his flag the whole Venitian navy, and be enabled to secure possession of the islands in question. He transmitted two millions to Toulon, that the admiralty officer might not be delayed in the execution of his commands by the want of funds. In this instance he again transgressed the rules of the treasury to insure promptitude. Nevertheless, fearing that Brueys would arrive too late, he joined the small flotilla he had in the Adriatic to the vessels found at Venice, put mixed crews of French and Venitians on board of them, embarked two thousand troops, and dispatched them to seize the islands. He thus took measures to obtain possession of the most important posts in the Levant and Adriatic; and thereby yet more to improve a position, which, becoming daily more imposing, must necessarily greatly influence the definitive negotiations with Austria.

Since the signing of the preliminaries at Leoben had decided the fate of Italy and the predominance of the French, the revolutionary spirit grew wider and bolder day by day. It was now certain that the greater part of Upper Italy would be formed into a democratic republic. This tended to agitate the minds and excite the hopes of the people of Piedmont, Parma, Tuscany, and the Papal states. The French general, however, took no steps to stimulate disaffection, but stood ready, as it seemed, to extend his countenance to all who should seek his protection. At Genoa, great animosity prevailed against the aristocracy, a less preposterous and emasculated body than that of Venice, but even more obstinate if that were possible. As we have related, France had treated with her to secure the rear of the army of Italy, confining her demands to two millions by way of indemnity, two millions by way of loan, and the recall of the families exiled for their attachment to France. But now that Bonaparte had imposed peace on Austria, no measures were observed by the patriot party. It assembled at the house of a person called Morandi, and established a club of the most violent character. A petition was there drawn up, and afterwards presented to the Doge, demanding modifications in the constitution, which he referred to a commission for consideration. In the interval, the ferment increased. The citizens of Genoa, with sundry young and ardent spirits, took concert together and prepared for an appeal to arms. On their side the nobles, aided by the priests, inflamed the populace, and supplied arms to the charcoal-burners and porters. The French minister, a mild and moderate man, restrained rather than excited the patriot party. But on the 22d May, when the events at Venice were made known, the Morandists, as they were called, assembled in arms and attempted to seize the principal posts in the city. A furious conflict ensued; the patriots, who were opposed to the entire populace, were defeated and subjected to the cruelest violence. The victorious mob committed all sorts of excesses, not even sparing the families of the French resident in Genoa, many of whom were grossly abused. The French minister himself was respected only because the Doge took the precaution to send him a guard. As soon as Bonaparte was apprized of these proceedings, he perceived he could no longer refrain from interfering. He dispatched his aide-de-camp Lavellette to claim the release of all imprisoned Frenchmen and compensations in their behalf, and especially to insist upon the arrest of the three inquisitors of state accused of having put arms into the hands of the populace. The patriot party, reanimated by this powerful support, again took the offensive, gained the upper hand, and compelled the Genoese oligarchy, like that of Venice, to abdicate. A provisional government was installed, and a deputation sent to Bonaparte to confer with him touching the constitution suitable for the republic of Genoa.

Thus, after having in two months subdued the Pope, passed the Julian Alps, dictated peace to Austria, recrossed the Alps and chastised Venice, Bonaparte was at Milan, exercising a supreme authority over the whole of Italy, awaiting without pressing the march of the revolution, deliberating upon the constitution of the emancipated provinces, creating a navy in the Adriatic, and rendering his position continually more potential with regard to Austria. The preliminaries of Leoben had been approved at Paris and Vienna; the ratifications were exchanged between Bonaparte and De Gallo, and the immediate opening of the conferences for a definitive peace expected with impatience. And Bonaparte thus at Milan, a simple general of the Republic, wielded greater influence than all the potentates of Europe. Couriers incessantly arriving and departing, proclaimed that there the destinies of nations were to be decided. The enthusiastic Italians clustered whole hours around the palace Serbelloni to catch a glimpse of the great general as he issued forth. His wife, Madame Bonaparte, was constantly attended by the young and beautiful of her sex, who formed around her a brilliant court. Here, in truth, commenced that extraordinary existence which for so long a while amazed, dazzled, and awed the world.

CHAPTER LIII.

BONAPARTE'S POSITION WITH REGARD TO THE DIRECTORY.—EMBARRASSING SITUATION OF ENGLAND AFTER THE PRELIMINARIES OF PEACE WITH AUSTRIA.—RENEWED PROPOSALS FOR PEACE AND CONFERENCES AT LILLE.—ELECTIONS OF THE YEAR V.—CONTEST BETWEEN THE COUNCILS AND DIRECTORY.—STATEMENT OF THE FINANCES OF THE YEAR V.—RETURN OF THE PRIESTS AND EMIGRANTS.—INTRIGUES OF THE ROYALIST PARTY.—POSITION AND STRENGTH OF PARTIES.—DISPOSITION OF THE ARMIES.

THE conduct of Bonaparte with regard to Venice was sufficiently bold, but nevertheless within the strict letter of the laws. He had grounded the manifesto issued by him at Palma-Nuova on the necessity of repelling hostilities actually commenced; and before the war had been fairly declared or begun he had concluded a treaty, which rendered it unnecessary for the Directory to submit the declaration of war to the two Councils. Thus the republic of Venice had been attacked, abolished, and effaced from the map of Europe without the general having almost consulted the Directory, or the Directory the Councils. It simply remained to notify the treaty and the result. So with regard to Genoa, which had been similarly revolutionized without any appearance of concurrence on the part of the Directory; all which events, being attributed to General Bonaparte even more than the facts really warranted, gave an extraordinary idea of his power in Italy, and of the authority he arrogated. The Directory in truth felt that Bonaparte had resolved sundry important questions after a too peremptory fashion, but it could scarcely object to him that he had materially exceeded his powers. Moreover, it was unable to deny the general utility and fitness of his operations, whilst it dared not venture to censure a commander so signally victorious and in such high esteem with his countrymen.

The Venitian ambassador at Paris, Quirini, had meanwhile used all possible endeavours to gain voices in the Directory, in behalf of his country. He employed on this service a skilful intriguer, a Dalmatian, who had succeeded in forming an intimate communication with Barras and securing the favour of that director. It would seem that a sum of 600,000 francs (£24,000), was given to him in bills as the consideration of defending Venice in the Directory.

But Bonaparte, being apprized of the transaction, denounced it; and as Venice was not saved, payment of the bills was refused. These facts being known to the Directory, provoked explanations, and even the commencement of a process; but they were ultimately stifled. The conduct of Bonaparte in Italy was approved, and the preliminaries of Leoben were universally hailed with joyful acclamations. It is true the enemies of the revolution and the Directory, who had so lustily invoked peace as a means of harassing the government, were at heart bitterly disappointed with the auspicious conclusion of the war. But all true republicans were exceedingly rejoiced. These would have doubtless preferred the total emancipation of Italy; but they exulted in the fact of the recognition of the republic by the emperor, which seemed to gain a new consecration thereby. The great mass of the population viewed with delight the termination of hostilities, anticipating a reduction in the public burdens. The sitting in which the Councils received the notification of the preliminaries presented an exciting scene of enthusiasm. Decrees were passed that the armies of Italy, the Rhine, and the Sambre-and-Meuse had deserved well of their country and of humanity, by conquering peace with victory. All parties lavished on General Bonaparte expressions of the warmest admiration, and it was even proposed to confer on him the surname of Italicus, as the Romans had of old given Scipio that of Africanus.

With Austria, the continent was subdued. There now remained only England to combat; and, cut off from all foreign aid, that country was veritably exposed to great dangers. Hoche, stopped at Frankfort in his course of triumphs, was impatient to open a new career. Ireland was always present to his mind, and he still clung to the project he had formed the preceding year. He had nearly 80,000 men between the Rhine and the Nidda; he had left about 40,000 in the district of Brest, and the squadron in that port was all ready for sea. A Spanish fleet collected at Cadiz only awaited an accident of wind, which should compel Admiral Jervis to sheer off, in order to leave the roadstead and sail into the channel, to join the French fleet. The Dutch had likewise at length succeeded in equipping a squadron, and reorganizing a part of their army. Thus Hoche had prodigious means at disposal to invade Ireland. He proposed to detach 20,000 men from the army of the Sambre-and-Meuse, and march them towards Brest, to be there embarked for this service. He had already selected his best troops for the undertaking upon which all his thoughts were fixed. He repaired in person to Holland, preserving a profound incognito, and giving out that he had gone to pass a few days with his family. He there superintended the preparations with his own eyes; 17,000 excellent soldiers of the Dutch army were put on board a fleet, and held in readiness to join the expedition prepared at Brest upon the signal being given. If to these forces were added the Spanish contingent, England was, as we see, truly menaced with appalling dangers.

Pitt was in the greatest terror. The defection of Austria, the preparations at the Texel and at Brest, the squadron collected at Cadiz, which a puff of wind might relieve from blockade—all these were circumstances calculated to excite alarm. Moreover, France and Spain were at work with Portugal to drive her into a peace, and thus there was reason to fear the loss even of that ancient ally. These gloomy considerations had tended very sensibly to affect public credit, and to produce a crisis which had been long foreseen and often foretold. The English government had been in the constant habit of applying to the bank for pecuniary aid, and had obtained from it enormous advances, by forcing upon it both the purchase of stock and the discount of exchequer bills. These advances it had been enabled to make only by profuse issues of notes. But when alarm began to spread, and the fact of the prodigious loans made to government by the bank became generally known, an universal run for gold took place. In consequence, so early as the month of March, at the moment Bonaparte was advancing on Vienna, the bank found itself compelled to demand power to suspend its cash payments. This power was granted to it, and it was relieved from the weight of an obligation it had no longer the means of fulfilling; but even this relief did not suffice to save its credit and its existence. An immediate publication of its assets and liabilities was found necessary. The assets were estimated at £17,597,280 sterling, and the liabilities at £13,770,390 sterling. This showed a surplus of assets of £3,826,800. But it was not stated how much of these assets consisted of government securities. All the bank possessed, in bullion or in commercial bills of exchange, was safe enough; but the stocks and exchequer bills, which constituted the larger portion of its assets, had lost credit with the political mischances of the government. Bank notes forthwith fell upwards of fifteen per cent. in value. The private bankers in their turn claimed the like privilege of paying in notes, on the threat of being obliged to stop payment. It was only fair they should be allowed the same favour as the bank of England, and, in fact, strict justice ordained it; for the bank, by refusing to perform its engagements in specie, had rendered it quite impossible for them to redeem theirs in such medium. But this was tantamount to a forced currency of paper. To avert this inconvenience, the principal merchants of London met together and gave a remarkable proof of public spirit and intelligence. Perceiving that a refusal to accept bank-notes in payments would lead to an inevitable catastrophe, in which the fortunes of all would be equally exposed to danger, they resolved to avoid it as far as lay in their power, and agreed by common consent to receive notes in payment. From that time England entered on the career of paper-money. It is true that this paper-money, instead of being forced, was voluntary; but it possessed merely the attributes of a paper-currency, and depended entirely on the political management of the cabinet. To render it more convenient for the purposes of money, it was emitted in smaller sums. The bank, whose lowest notes were for five pounds, was authorized to issue them for one and two pounds. They were thus made available for the payment of the wages of labour.

Although the good sense of the commercial community thus prevented this financial crisis proving so disastrous as it might have been, yet the situation of affairs was not the less perilous; and that it might not become absolutely fatal, seemed to depend wholly on bringing France to terms, and on stopping the Spanish, Dutch, and French fleets from sailing to light up a flame in Ireland. The Royal family was still as much opposed as ever to the revolution and to peace; but Pitt, who had no other view but the interest of Great Britain, deemed a respite at this moment indispensable. Whether peace should be definitive or not, an interval of repose must be obtained. Entirely agreed with Lord Grenville upon this point, he determined the cabinet to open a sincere negotiation, which might procure two or three years' relief to the over-stretched capacities of England. There could be no longer any pretence for disputing about the Netherlands, as they were now ceded by Austria herself; the only questions that remained for settlement had reference to the colonies, and these there was good reason to hope means might be found to adjust. And not only did the actual condition of affairs indicate a disposition to treat with sincerity, but the choice of a negotiator demonstrated it more fully. Lord Malmesbury was again appointed upon this occasion, and at his age he would not have been twice in succession employed upon an idle mission. Celebrated for his long diplomatic career, and for his dexterity as a negotiator, Lord Malmesbury sighed for retirement from public affairs, but aspired to signalize his retreat by a happy and brilliant negotiation. None could be more desirable than a pacification with France after so terrible a conflict; and if he had not been assured that his cabinet desired peace, he would not have consented to act, for a vain parade would become ridiculous by repetition. He had received, in fact, secret instructions which left him no room to doubt. The English ministry lost no time in demanding passports for its envoy, and by mutual consent the place of conference was fixed at Lille, instead of Paris. The Directory preferred receiving the English ambassador in a provincial town, because it there cared less for his intrigues. The English minister, on his part, was not over-anxious to be in immediate contact with a government whose forms were somewhat rude, and was well content to treat through the medium of its accredited agents. Lille, therefore, was the place chosen, and each party nominated a solemn legation. Hoche, nevertheless, continued to urge his preparations with vigour, in order to give greater weight to the French plenipotentiaries.

Thus France, victorious on all sides, was in negotiation with the two great European powers, and verging on a general peace. Events so glorious and auspicious ought to have occasioned, it was natural to suppose, no feeling but one of general congratulation; but the elections of the year V. had given the opposition a dangerous accession of strength. We have seen how the opponents of the Directory bestirred themselves as the elections approached. The Royalist faction had greatly influenced the result. It had lost three of its principal agents by the arrest of Brottier, Laville-Heurnois, and Duverne de Presle; but this was of little moment, for so great was the confusion in its ranks that even the loss of its leaders could scarcely increase it. There still existed two associations, the one composed of devoted partisans fitted to take arms, the other of less decided adherents to be relied on only as voters at the elections. The Lyons agency had remained entire. Pichegru, plotting apart, still corresponded with the English minister Wickham, and with the Prince of Condé. Influenced by these intrigues of various kinds, and especially by the spirit of reaction, the elections resulted in the manner that had been foreseen. Almost the whole of the second third, like the first, was formed of men who were opposed to the Directory, either from attachment to royalty, or from hatred to the system of terror. The advocates of royalty, it is true, were not very numerous; but they would avail themselves, according to custom, of the passions of others. Pichegru was nominated a deputy in the Jura. At Colmar, the electors chose one Chemblé, employed in the correspondence with Wickham; at Lyons, Imbert-Colomès, one of the members of the royalist agency in the south, and Camille-Jourdan, a young man of good intentions, but actuated by a lively imagination and a ridiculous wrath against the Directory; at Marseilles, General Willot, who had been detached from the army of the Ocean to take the command of the department of the Bouches-du-Rhone, and who, far from curbing the factions, had allowed himself to be gained, perhaps unconsciously, by the royalist party; at Versailles, a person named Vauvilliers, implicated in Brottier's conspiracy, and designed by the agency for the post of administrator of provisions; at Brest, Admiral Villaret-Joyeuse, who had quarrelled with Hoche, and in consequence with the government, on the occasion of the expedition to Ireland. Several other nominations were made equally significant with these. On the other hand, all were not so threatening to the Directory and the Republic. General Jourdan, amongst others, who had relinquished the command of the army of the Sambre-and-Meuse after the misfortunes of the preceding campaign, was elected a deputy by his department. He was worthy to represent the army in the legislative body, and to redeem the dishonour about to be reflected on it by the treachery of Pichegru. By a strange singularity Barrère was returned from the department of the Upper-Pyrenees.

The new deputies hastened with all speed to Paris. Whilst awaiting the 1st Prairial, the day of their installation, they were enticed to attend the meetings at Clichy, which daily increased in violence. The Councils themselves no longer preserved their former moderation. As they saw the moment draw nigh when they would be so strongly reinforced, the members of the first third began to throw aside that reserve they had maintained during the last fifteen months. Hitherto they had followed in the wake of the Constitutionalists, or in other words, of those deputies who professed to be neither friends nor enemies of the Directory, but affected to adhere to the constitution alone, and to oppose the government only when it departed therefrom. This spirit had yet more especially prevailed in the council of the Ancients. But as the day of the junction approached, the opposition in the Five-Hundred assumed a tone of a more menacing character. It was echoed from mouth to mouth that the Ancients had led the Five-Hundred too long, and that it was time for the latter to emerge from tutelage. Thus, both in the club at Clichy and in the legislative body, the party in expectation of a majority set no bounds to its exultation and audacity.

The self-complacent Constitutionalists, labouring under the delusion that had affected all the parties which, since the commencement of the revolution, had been drawn into the ranks of opposition, believed that they were the destined masters of the movement, and that the new arrivals would prove to them a powerful reinforcement. Carnot was at their head. He, driven continually more in the false direction he had taken, had never ceased to support the opinion of the legislative majority in the Directory. Particularly in the discussion on the preliminaries of Leoben, he had displayed an animosity he had hitherto restrained within the limits of decency, and advocated, with a zeal inconsistent with his whole life, the concessions made to Austria. Blinded by egotism, he regarded the constitutional party, both in the Ancients and in the Five-Hundred, as completely under his guidance, and saw in the newly-elected deputies only so many partisans the more. In his heat to gather the elements of a party which he expected to lead, he sought to ingratiate himself with the most marked of the new deputies. He even made advances to Pichegru, who viewed all the members of the Directory with an evil eye, and paid him a visit. But Pichegru, returning but indifferently his advances, received him with distant coolness, amounting almost to disdain. Nevertheless Carnot was in close intimacy with numerous deputies of the first and second third. His apartments at the Luxembourg became the rendezvous of the new opposition, and his colleagues had occasion to remark their avowed enemies his daily visitors.

The great point was the choice of a new director. Chance was to designate the retiring member. If the lot fell on Larevellière-Lépeaux, Rewbell, or Barras, the policy of the government was changed; for the director nominated by the new majority could not fail to side with Carnot and Letourneur.

A rumour got abroad that the five directors had agreed amongst themselves which should go out; that Letourneur had consented to resign, and that the ballot would be merely nominal. It was impossible for a supposition to be more absurd. All directors, Larévellière alone excepted, were duly enamoured of place. Besides, Carnot and Letourneur, expecting to become masters of the government if fortune should rid them of one of their colleagues, could not voluntarily relinquish their position. The report originated in a peculiar way. The five directors had covenanted together that he whom fate decided to abdicate should receive an indemnity of 10,000 francs from each of his colleagues, making a sum of 40,000 francs in the whole, which would serve to break the too sudden transition of a poor director from splendour to penury. This arrangement gave rise to an impression that the other directors had consented to give up part of their emoluments to Letourneur, if he would of his own accord surrender office. There was no pretence nevertheless for the surmise. One false rumour, however, begets another. A further statement gained credit, that this resignation was to take place before the first of Prairial, in order that the appointment of a new director might be carried before the accession of the second third to the councils; a plan altogether impossible with the presence of Carnot.

The Clichy club, however, was in great alarm, and took measures to prevent the arrangement thus spoken of. It resolved to have a motion submitted to the Five-Hundred to the effect that the directors should be compelled to draw the lots publicly. Such a motion was unconstitutional, for the constitution prescribed no particular mode of drawing, but reckoned for its due regularity upon the vigilance of each of the parties directly interested; nevertheless it passed the councils. Larévellière-Lépeaux, unambitious but tenacious withal, represented to his colleagues that this measure was an interference with their functions, and induced them to deny its legality. Accordingly a message from the Directory intimated its refusal to obey the vote of the Councils, seeing that it was clearly unconstitutional. The Councils rejoined by a declaration that the Directory was not competent to judge a decision of the legislative body. The Directory was inclined to persevere, and to maintain that the constitution was placed by a fundamental article under the safeguard of each of the governing powers, and that the executive power was bound not to execute an unconstitutional measure; but Carnot and Letourneur forsook the diet of their colleagues. Barras, who with all his violence lacked firmness, prevailed on Rewbell and Larévellière to yield, and thus all dispute about the mode of drawing was ended.

The turbulent clubbists of Clichy devised fresh motions for discussion in the Councils before the first Prairial. The most important in their eyes was one for the repeal of the famous law of the 3d Brumaire, which excluded the relatives of emigrants from public employments, and barred the door of the legislative body to several of both the first and second third. The motion was brought forward accordingly in the Five-Hundred some days previous to the first Prairial, and after a stormy debate successfully carried. This unexpected victory, even before the junction of the second third, proved the sway already exercised by the Opposition over the legislature, although still composed of two-thirds Conventionalists. The party, however, which styled itself Constitutional was more in the ascendant with the Ancients. It was offended at the violence of deputies who had hitherto professed to follow its impulse, and refused to rescind the law of the 3d Brumaire.

At length the first Prairial arrived, and the two hundred and fifty newly elected deputies repaired to the legislative body, and quietly displaced two hundred and fifty Conventionalists. Out of the seven hundred and fifty members of the two Councils, there thus remained only two hundred and fifty belonging to the great assembly which had achieved and defended the revolution. When Pichegru appeared in the Five-Hundred, the greater part of the members, ignorant as yet that they harboured a traitor amongst them, but seeing in him only a general of illustrious merit disgraced by the government, rose through a movement of curiosity. Out of 444 votes he obtained 387 for the presidency. The moderate and constitutional party desired to place General Jourdan in the bureau, so as to prepare the way for him to succeed Pichegru in the chair; but the new majority, elated with its strength and already regardless of discretion, rejected Jourdan. The members of the bureau elected were Siméon, Vaublanc, Henri La Rivière, and Parisot. The exclusion of Jourdan was impolitic, and could not fail to excite the deep resentment of the armies. When the assembly was constituted, its first act was to annul the election of the Upper-Pyrenees which had returned Barrère to the legislative body. Thereafter the result of the Directorial ballot was communicated to it. By a strange chance, the lot had actually fallen on Letourneur, which confirmed the opinion previously entertained of concert on the part of the directors.* The nomination of his successor became forthwith the leading topic. The choice to be made was now of less importance since it could not change the Directorial majority, but still an efficient ally was to be provided for Carnot; and furthermore, as the real sentiments of Larévellière-Lépaux were not distinctly known, and as he was notoriously a moderate man and one of the proscribed in 1793, hopes were indulged that he might, in certain cases, take part with Carnot and reverse the majority. The Constitutionalists, who desired to modify the policy of the government without destroying it, were in favour of a candidate attached to the actual system, but opposed to the Directory and prepared to support Carnot. They accordingly proposed Cochon, the minister of police, and the friend of Carnot. Beurnonville was likewise mentioned by them. But in the Clichy club, Cochon was not regarded with favour, although he had obtained great credit with it at first on account of his energy against the Jacobites. He was now in bad odour, however, owing to the arrest of Brottier, Duverne de Presle, and Laville-Heurnois, and more particularly to his circulars to the electors. Hence, Cochon was repudiated, as likewise Beurnonville. Barthélemy, French ambassador in Switzerland, and negotiator of the treaties of peace with Prussia and Spain, was proposed. It was certainly not with any view of honouring him as a pacific diplomatist, but as the presumed accomplice of the pretender and the emigrants. Nevertheless, the royalists who hoped, and the republicans who dreaded, to find in him a traitor, were equally deceived. Barthélemy was but a weak and mediocre personage, faithful to the reigning power, and devoid even of the boldness necessary to betray it. To facilitate his election, which encountered obstacles, it was rumoured that he would not accept the office, and that his nomination would be simply an act of homage to the man who had commenced the reconciliation of France with Europe. This manœuvre was not without success. In the Council of Five-Hundred he had 309 votes, and Cochon 230. On the list of candidates presented to the Ancients, there likewise appeared the names of Massena, supported by 187 suffrages, of Kleber by 173, and of Augereau by 139. Many of the deputies were desirous of raising to the seat of government one of the most distinguished of the generals of division in the armies of France.

* We read in a multitude of works that Letourneur went out by a voluntary arrangement. The director Larevelliere Lepeaux, in his valuable but unpublished memoirs, assures us to the contrary. To those who knew that virtuous citizen, so incapable of falsehood, his assertion will be a sufficient proof. But we cannot have a shadow of doubt after reading Carnot's narrative, written subsequent to the 18th Fructidor. In that account replete with gall, and which is to be regretted for the fame of Carnot, he affirms that such an arrangement was a pure fiction. He assuredly had no interest in justifying his colleagues, against whom in fact he was deeply incensed.

Barthélemy was selected by the Ancients; and, disregarding the subterfuge employed to gain him votes, he replied with prompt alacrity that he accepted the office of Director. His substitution in place of Letourneur effected no change of importance. He was equally incapable with Letourneur of exercising influence over his colleagues, and he was bound by position to vote and act in the same manner as his predecessor had done from attachment to Carnot.

The members of the Clichy club, the Clichyans, as they were called, prepared to take the field in earnest after the first Prairial, and announced the most violent intentions. Few amongst them were in the confidence of the royalist agents. Lemerer, Mersan, Imbert-Colomès, Pichegru, and perhaps Willot, alone were in the secret. Pichegru, from having been originally in communication with Condé and Wickham, had recently been put in direct relation with the pretender. He received lavish encomiums, magnificent promises, and additional remittances, which he again accepted without being more certain than before of the use to which he could apply them. He, on his part, promised mighty things, but said that before taking any decisive step he must have time to observe the new course of events. Cold and taciturn, he affected with his accomplices, and with all the world, the mysteriousness of a wondrous profundity and the reserve of an important personage. As common in such cases, the less he said the more deep his combinations, the more ample his means were supposed. The great majority of the Clichyans were entirely ignorant of his secret mission. The government itself was in the same condition, for Duverne de Presle had no knowledge of it, and therefore could not communicate it.

Amongst the Clichyans, some were inspired by ambition, others by an instinctive love of monarchy, but the greater number by dread of the revival of the system of terror, which they held in fearful remembrance. Drawn together by different motives, they were impelled, as too often happens with large assemblages, by the most ardent among them. From the very earliest moment the wildest projects were formed. The first was to declare the Councils permanent. Next they would demand the removal of the troops stationed in Paris; assume the police of the capital under a free interpretation of the clause in the constitution which assigned to the legislative body the police of its place of sessions, reading for the word "place" the word "city;" put the Directors under impeachment, nominate others, and annul in a mass the laws called revolutionary, that is to say, annul, by virtue thereof, the whole revolution itself. Then Paris in their power, the heads of the government deposed, the entire authority in their hands to dispose of at pleasure, they might hazard any extremity, even to the proclamation of royalty. But these schemes, urged by the more furious of the party, were too desperate for immediate adoption. Certain prudent men, perceiving that they were equivalent to a direct attack by force upon the Directory, opposed them, and succeeded in enforcing more moderate counsels. It was therefore determined that for the present they should make use of their majority to change all the committees, to remodel certain laws, and to thwart the policy of the government. Legislative tactics, accordingly, were preferred for the moment to an assault by arms.

This plan being settled, no time was lost in putting it into execution. The election of Barrère was first of all annulled, and five members of the first third, who had been excluded the year before by virtue of the law of the 3d Brumaire, were installed. The refusal of the Ancients to repeal this law was no obstacle. The deputies rejected from the legislative body were reinstated as unconstitutionally excluded. Their names were Ferrand-Vaillant, Gault, Polissart, Job Aymé de la Drôme, and Mersan, one of the royalist agents. A new mode of abrogating the law of the 3d Brumaire was devised. A proposition for its repeal having been made a few days previously, and negatived by the Ancients, the motion could not be entertained again for a year. Another form was adopted therefore, and the Five-Hundred passed a resolution that the law of the 3d Brumaire was void so far as related to exclusion from public employments. In this consisted nearly the whole law. The Ancients nevertheless concurred in the resolution under this form. By force thereof, the members of the new third, who were debarred from taking their seats as relations of emigrants, or as amnestied for revolutionary offences, were enabled to enter the legislative body. To it M. Imbert Colomès of Lyons owed the opportunity of making his election available. It in like manner profited Salicetti, who had been implicated in the events of Prairial and amnestied with several members of the convention. Nominated in Corsica, his election was held valid. Through an affectation of impartiality, the leaders of the Five-Hundred caused a law of the 21st Floreal, banishing from Paris all conventionalists not invested with public duties, to be likewise repealed. The real motive was to prepare the way for a total abrogation of all the revolutionary laws. The verification of the elections was the next measure that engaged attention, and, as was natural to expect, all doubtful returns affecting a republican were cancelled, and all those affecting an enemy of the revolution were sustained. The whole of the committees were changed, and, pretending that everything ought to take date from the period of the new infusion into the legislative body, the majority called for the financial accounts up to the first Prairial. Special committees were moreover appointed to consider the laws relative to emigrants, priests, religion, public instruction, colonies, &c. The intention to remodel the whole system of government was made sufficiently manifest.

In the laws banishing the emigrants for ever, two exceptions had been made; the one in favour of the artisans and husbandmen whom Saint-Just and Lebas had expelled from the Upper Rhine during their mission in 1793; the other in favour of the individuals concerned in the events of the 31st of May, and obliged to fly in consequence. The exiles of Toulon, who had delivered that fortress and taken refuge on board the English squadron, were alone excepted from the benefit of the second exemption. Under favour of these provisions, a multitude of emigrants had already returned. Some gave themselves out as labourers or agriculturists belonging to the Upper Rhine, and others as proscripts of the 31st of May. The Clichyans obtained an extension of the term granted to the fugitives of the Upper Rhine, prolonging it for six months. They procured a decree, besides, that the Toulon exiles might come in under the exception made in behalf of the proscripts of the 31st of May. Although this grace was well-deserved by many of the Southerns who had fled to Toulon, and from Toulon to the British ships, only to save themselves from the vengeance vowed against the Federalists, it nevertheless recalled and seemed to pardon the most culpable action of the counter-revolutionists, and was calculated to incense the patriots. The discussion upon the colonies and the conduct of the agents of the Directory at Saint-Domingo led to a violent outbreak. The commission charged with this inquiry, and composed of Tarbé, Villaret-Joyeuse, Vaublanc, and Bourdon de l'Oise, presented a report wherein the Convention was treated with the utmost bitterness. The Conventionalist Marec was accused in it of not having resisted tyranny with the energy of virtue. At these words, which realized the design often indicated of aspersing the members of the Convention, all of them who yet sat in the Five-Hundred rushed to the tribune and demanded a report more becoming the dignity of the legislative body. A scene of furious contention ensued. The Conventionalists, however, supported by the moderate deputies, succeeded in having the report sent back to the commission. Carnot influenced the committee by means of Bourdon de l'Oise, and the terms of the projected decree were modified. It had been originally intended to take from the Directory the power to send agents into the colonies; this power was now left, limiting the number of the agents to three, and the duration of their mission to eighteen months. Santhonax was recalled. The Constitutionalists, seeing that in this instance they had been able, by uniting with the Conventionalists, to control the fury of the Clichyans, flattered themselves they could at any time assume the direction of the Councils. But this delusion was speedily dispelled in the following diets.

Among the number of important subjects the newly-elected deputies proposed to regulate, were religion and the laws respecting priests. The commission charged with this grave matter nominated as its reporter young Camille Jordan, whose mind had been inflamed amid the horrors of the siege of Lyons, and whose sensibility, although sincere, was not without pretensions. In his report he entered upon a long and inflated dissertation touching religious liberty. "It was not sufficient," he said, "to allow every one the exercise of his own religion, but, in order that real liberty might prevail, nothing should be imposed offensive to conscience. Thus, for example, the oath required from priests, although attacking no article of creed, having been misinterpreted by them, and regarded as contrary to the doctrines of the Catholic church, ought not to be exacted. It amounted to a tyranny, the result of which was to create a large body of proscripts, and very dangerous proscripts, because they exercised considerable influence over multitudes, and, sheltered from the researches of authority by the pious and eager zeal of the people, laboured in the dark to stimulate revolt. With regard to the ceremonies of religion, it was not enough to permit them in closed temples; certain necessary observances should be openly allowed, under a strict prohibition of any external pomp calculated to excite trouble. Thus bells were necessary to assemble Catholics at a certain hour; they were an essential part of religion; to prohibit them was to outrage liberty. Besides, the people were accustomed to such sounds, loved them, and had never lost their inclination for them; indeed, in the country, the law against bells had never been observed. To allow their use, therefore, was simply to satisfy an innocent desire, and to put an end to the scandal of a disregarded law. The same held good with regard to cemeteries. Whilst interdicting public rites to all persuasions, it was nevertheless proper to allow each of them to possess enclosed grounds consecrated to burials, in which enclosures the signs peculiar to their faith might be placed." In accordance with these principles, Camille Jordan proposed the abolition of the oath, and of the repressive laws consequent upon it, and permission to use bells and have cemeteries, within the walls of which religious symbols might be placed according to pleasure upon the tombs.

The principles of this report, although enforced with indiscreet emphasis, were indisputably just. Nothing is more true than that the only way to extirpate old superstitions is to leave them in poverty and contempt. Governments, by suffering all creeds and subsidising none, take the best means to hasten their decay. The Convention had already restored to the Catholics buildings to serve as churches; the Directory would have done well to give them bells and crosses in their grave-yards, and to abolish the use of the oath and the laws enacted against the priests who refused to take it. But were the proper steps pursued, was the moment wisely selected for urging such claims? If, instead of treating the subject as one of the counts of the grand indictment against the Directory, a moment more seasonable had been waited for and time given for passions to cool, and for the government to acquire stability, the concessions desired would have been readily obtained. But from the very fact of the counter-revolutionists insisting on them as conditions, the patriots opposed them; for it is the nature of man to contest what an enemy wishes. In imagining the sound of bells, they seemed to hear the tocsin of counter-revolution. Every party demands to have its own passions understood and satisfied, even whilst refusing to recognise or regard those of the opposite faction. The patriots had their passions compounded of errors, fears, and hatreds, which still required to be estimated and considered. This report, accordingly, produced an extraordinary sensation, for it touched animosities hot and sensitive. It was the boldest and most dangerous act of the Clichyans, although at bottom the least reprehensible. The patriots spoke absurdly when they described the proposition as one to reward the violation of laws by repealing them. It involved, in truth, the abrogation of laws incapable of being executed.

To all these vexatious attacks on the Directory, the Clichyans added annoyances on the subject of the finances. This, indeed, was the great point on which they expected to distress and overthrow the government. We have already mentioned, in giving a sketch of the financial resources of the year V. (1797), the estimated income and expenditure of that year: 450 millions of ordinary expenses were to be defrayed by 250 millions of the property contribution, 50 millions of the personal contribution, and 150 millions the produce of stamps, registrations, patents, posts, and duties: 550 millions of extraordinary expenses were to be provided for by the last fourth of the price of the national property disposed of in the preceding year, amounting to 100 millions and secured by bills on the part of the purchasers, by the produce of the woods and rents of the national estates, the arrears of contributions, the Batavian payments, the sale of national moveables, different accessary products, and lastly, the eternal resource of the domains remaining unsold. But all these means were insufficient, and for the most part far below their presumed value. The receipts and disbursements of the year being arranged only provisionally, the collection of three-fifths of the property and personal contributions had been ordained to be levied on the provisional lists. But these lists being, as we have said, defectively prepared by the local administrations on account of the continual variations in the fiscal laws, and over-scrawled with annotations, gave rise to perpetual difficulties. The indisposition of the payers likewise increased these difficulties, and the collection consequently was made but slowly. And, independently of this delay in the receipt, the amount was much below what had been reckoned. It became evident that the property-tax would not produce more than 200 instead of 250 millions. The different items of stamps, registers, patents, duties, and posts, would not exceed 100 instead of 150 millions. Such the deficiency in the ordinary income set apart to meet the ordinary expenditure. It was not less in the extraordinary branch. The bills of the national purchasers for the amount of the last fourth had been negotiated at a heavy loss. To avoid the like result upon the Batavian rescriptions, they had been pledged for a sum greatly inferior to their expressed value. The lands sold slowly, and thus on all sides expectation was defeated and the distress extreme. The army of Italy had contrived to support itself upon the contributions it levied; but the armies of the Rhine, of the Sambre-and-Meuse, of the Interior, and the forces of the Marine, had suffered terrible privations. Upon several occasions the troops had almost been driven to revolt and mutiny. All the national establishments and hospitals were in frightful destitution, and public functionaries pined without hope of salary.

In this extremity it had been found necessary to resort to expedients of all kinds. Thus, as we have related above, recourse was had to delays in the fulfilment of certain obligations. The fundholders were paid only one-fourth in cash, and the other three-fourths in notes redeemable in national property, called "notes of the three-fourths." The charge of the consolidated debt, annuities, and pensions, amounted to 248 millions; accordingly there were only 62 millions to pay, and the ordinary expenditure was thus reduced by 186 millions. But, notwithstanding this reduction, the expenditure did not the less exceed the receipts. Although a distinction had been established between the ordinary and extraordinary expenditures, it was not observed in the payments of the treasury. Extraordinary expences were defrayed from resources appropriated to ordinary charges; that is to say, in default of money to pay the troops, or the contractors who supplied them, funds intended for public functionaries, judges, and administrators of all descriptions, were applied for the purpose. Not only were these two kinds of funds confounded, but receipts were anticipated by assignations on such and such receivers, payable with the first monies that came into their hands. Contractors were paid by drafts on the treasury, of which the minister settled the order of payment according to the urgency of circumstances: a practice which sometimes gave occasion to abuses, but was nevertheless useful as a resource in providing for pressing emergencies, besides being often of great service to individual purveyors, who were thereby enabled and encouraged to complete their undertakings. Finally, in default of every other resource, debentures on the national property were issued, a sort of paper which was negotiable on certain terms. This was the mode employed, since the destruction of the paper-money, of anticipating sales. From this state of the finances it resulted that contractors of the worst description, namely, adventurers and speculators, alone surrounded the government, and imposed on it the most onerous contracts. It was only at a very low value they accepted the paper given to them, and they raised the price of articles in proportion to the delays and risks of payment. Recourse was often had to very singular contrivances to meet particular exigencies. For instance, the minister of Marine had purchased flour for the navy on condition that the contractor, on delivering the flour at Brest, should furnish a part in money, for the purpose of paying the wages of the seamen, who were on the point of mutinying. Compensation for this advance of specie was of course found in the increased price charged for the flour. Such losses were unavoidable, and resulted from the situation of the country. To charge them upon the government was unjust. But unfortunately the scandalous conduct of one of the directors, who had a secret share in the extraordinary profits of the contractors, and who took no pains to conceal either his prodigality or the rise of his fortunes, supplied a pretext for every calumny. It was assuredly not the infamous gains of an individual which plunged the state in distress, but advantage was taken of them to accuse the Directory of ruining financial credit.

Thus, to a violent and unscrupulous opposition, ample scope was afforded for declamations and sinister projects. Nor did it fail to avail itself of the opportunity after a very dangerous fashion. It had formed the finance-commission of men in its own ranks, and decidedly inimical to the government. The first proceeding of this commission was to present to the Five-Hundred, through its reporter Gilbert-Desmolières, an incorrect account of the income and expenditure. It exaggerated the one and largely abridged the other. Compelled to acknowledge the insufficiency of the ordinary resources, such as the property-tax, registration, stamps, patents, posts, customs, it nevertheless objected to all the taxes proposed to make up the deficiency. Since the outbreak of the revolution it had been hitherto found impossible to re-establish indirect taxation. A duty on salt and tobacco being suggested, the commission pretended it would alarm the people; a lottery, it repudiated as immoral; tolls on highways, it found open to serious difficulties. All this was more or less true, but means were somehow or other to be found. The sole resource the commission devised consisted in an intention, as it announced, of discussing the imposition of a notarial duty. As to the deficiency in the extraordinary receipts, far from attempting to provide therefor, it sought to aggravate the extent by prohibiting the Directory from resorting to those expedients by means whereof it had alone contrived to carry on affairs. The case stood thus.

The constitution had divided the Treasury from the Directory, and made a separate establishment of it, which was directed by independent commissioners nominated by the Councils, and having no other duty but to receive the revenue and discharge the expenditure. In this manner the Directory had not the management of the funds of the State; it delivered orders on the Treasury, which the latter paid in concurrence with credits opened by the Councils. Nothing could be more detrimental to the public service than this arrangement, for the management of the state-funds is a matter of polity which ought to rest with the executive, like the direction of military operations, and with regard to which deliberative bodies can no more interfere than with the plan of a campaign. Indeed, it is not unusual that a minister, by a prompt and dexterous adaptation, succeeds in creating temporary resources upon a pressing emergency. The two Councils, accordingly, had, during the preceding year, empowered the Treasury to perform such transactions as might be enjoined by the Directory. The new commission, however, determined to put a stop to the expedients whereby the Directory subsisted, by taking from it all power over the Treasury. In the first place, it decided that the government ought no longer to have the power of ordering the negotiation of securities. When occasions arose for realizing paper on hand, the commissioners of the Treasury were to negotiate it themselves on their own responsibility. In the next place, it proposed to deprive the Directory of the power to settle the order in which drafts for payment should be retired. It, moreover, proposed to forbid all anticipations on the funds receivable in the departmental exchequers. It even urged that all assignations already issued on funds uncollected should be carried to the Treasury, verified, and paid in their turn; a measure which would interrupt and put an end to all the operations then in progress. It insisted, besides, on the necessity of rendering obligatory the distinction established between the two kinds of expenses and receipts, and of enacting that the ordinary expenditure should be strictly borne by the ordinary income, and the extraordinary expenditure by the extraordinary income; a fatal design at a moment when every pressing want as it arose must of necessity be met by the first funds available. To all these propositions it appended yet another, still more dangerous than any of the preceding. We have stated that, owing to the slow sale of the national domains, anticipations were formed thereon by issuing debentures which were receivable in payment for lands. The contractors were content to take these debentures, which they afterwards negotiated with intending purchasers. This paper, it is true, came into competition with the notes of the three-fourths delivered to the fund-holders, and diminished their value by its rivalry. Under pretence of protecting the unfortunate fund-holders against the avidity of the contractors, the commission proposed to annul the privilege of paying for national domains with debentures issued to contractors.

All these recommendations were adopted by the Five-Hundred, the majority of whom, driven blindly forward, no longer preserved any measures. They were fraught with danger, and threatened to paralyse every service in the State. The Directory, in fact, being henceforth unable to negotiate at its pleasure the securities it held, or to fix the order of payments according to the exigency of cases, or to anticipate in emergencies the uncollected funds, or to apply the ordinary to the purposes of the extraordinary departments, or to emit a voluntary paper redeemable in national property, was at once deprived of all the means whereby it had hitherto succeeded in carrying on the government, and which had enabled it, under the impossibility of satisfying all wants, to provide at least for the most craving. The propositions adopted, well calculated as they might be to establish order in a period of tranquillity, were utterly destructive in a situation like the present. The Constitutionalists in the Five-Hundred made strenuous but fruitless efforts to prevent their passing. They failed, and no hope remained but in the Council of the Ancients.

The Constitutionalists, moderate enemies of the Directory, beheld with the utmost concern the spirit that actuated the Council of Five-Hundred. They had indulged the hope that the accession of a new third would be advantageous rather than prejudicial to them, that its effect would be simply to shift the majority, and that they would become masters of the legislative body. Carnot, their leader, had given way to these delusive expectations; but he and all of them found themselves carried far beyond their original views, and were taught on this occasion, as on all others, that behind every opposition lurked the counter-revolution with its evil designs. They possessed, however, much greater influence in the Council of Ancients than in that of the Five-Hundred, and they exerted all their strength to procure the rejection of the finance-resolutions. Carnot had, among the Ancients, a devoted friend in the person of the deputy Lacuée, and had likewise relations with Dumas, formerly a member of the Legislative Assembly. He could also count on the co-operation of Portalis, Tronçon-Ducoudray, Lebrun, and Barbé-Marbois, all moderate opponents of the Directory, and inimical to the violent proceedings of the Clichyan party. Through the combined efforts of these deputies, and the general disposition of the Council of Ancients, the first resolutions of Gilbert-Desmolières, which debarred the Directory from commanding the negotiations of the treasury, from fixing the order of payments, and from confounding the ordinary with the extraordinary, were negatived. This result gave great satisfaction to the Constitutionalists, and in general to all moderate men who dreaded above all things a new explosion. Carnot evinced uncommon delight. He again felt confident of his power to control the Clichyans by means of the Council of Ancients, and that the direction of affairs would finally rest with him and his friends.

After all, it proved but a trifling palliative. The Clichy club resounded with the most furious denunciations against the Ancients, and with fresh topics of accusation against the Directory. Gilbert-Desmolières renewed his first propositions, rejected by the Ancients, in the hope that, by presenting them under another form, they would be induced to adopt them upon a second deliberation. Meanwhile, resolutions of every kind adverse to the government rapidly multiplied in the Five-Hundred. Deputies were declared ineligible to accept offices for a year before their retirement from the legislative body. Imbert-Colomès, who corresponded with the court of Blankenburg, carried a motion that the Directory be deprived of the power it held by law of inspecting foreign letters. Aubry, the same who, after the 9th Thermidor, effected a reaction in the army, and who, in 1795, dismissed Bonaparte, proposed to take from the Directory the right of cashiering officers, which deprived it of one of its most essential constitutional prerogatives. He likewise proposed to add a company of artillery and a squadron of dragoons to the 1,200 grenadiers composing the guard of the legislative body, and to give the command of the whole to the inspectors of the hall of the legislative body,—a proposal in itself absurd, but which indicated a spirit of preparation for war. Marked censure was passed against the transmission of a million to the commander of the navy at Toulon, a remittance made direct by Bonaparte, without using the medium of the treasury, in order to expedite the departure of the squadron which he so much needed in the Adriatic. This million had been seized by the treasury and carried to Paris. Similar remittances sent in the same manner from the army of Italy to the armies of the Alps, the Rhine, and the Sambre-and-Meuse, were likewise condemned. A long report was presented respecting the relations with the United States; and whatever reason the Directory might have in the differences that had arisen with America, its conduct was bitterly assailed. In fine, the rage for attacking and condemning all the operations of the government betrayed the Clichyans into a last step, which involved a fatal imprudence on their part.

The events of Venice had caused a profound sensation throughout Europe. Since the manifesto of Palma-Nuova, that republic had been annihilated and the government of Genoa revolutionized, without any intimation on the subject from the Directory to the two Councils. This silence was owing, as we have seen, to the rapidity of the occurrences, a rapidity so great that Venice had fallen before the question of war could be brought under deliberation in the legislative body. The subsequent treaty had not yet been submitted to discussion, but was intended to be so in a few days. At the same time, it was less the silence of the Directory that gave offence than the destruction of aristocratic governments and the progress of the revolution in Italy. Under this feeling Dumolard, a verbose orator, who for nearly two years had kept up an incessant assault upon the Directory in the Five-Hundred, determined to introduce a motion relative to the events at Venice and Genoa. The movement was a bold one, for it was impossible to attack the Directory without attacking General Bonaparte. In this he must defy general opinion, and all that mighty influence surrounding Bonaparte since he had imposed peace on Austria, and, in the double capacity of warrior and diplomatist, seemed at Milan to regulate the destinies of Europe. Such of the Clichyans as still retained any measure of reason used their endeavours to dissuade Dumolard from carrying out his intention; but he persisted, and in the sitting of the 5th Messidor (23d June), made a motion of order on the affairs of Venice. He said, "Fame, whose bounds we cannot circumscribe, has everywhere spread the report of our victories over the Venitians and of the astonishing revolution that has crowned them. Our troops are in their capital; their navy is delivered up to us; the most ancient state of Europe is annihilated; it reappears in the twinkling of an eye under democratic forms; finally, our soldiers brave the waves of the Adriatic, and are transported to Corfu to consummate the new revolution. Admit these events for certain, and it follows that the Directory has made in disguised terms war, peace, and, in some respects, a treaty of alliance with Venice, and all without your concurrence. Are we no longer then that people who has proclaimed as a principle, and maintained by force of arms, that it is not allowable for foreign powers, under any pretext, to interfere with the form of the government of another state? Abused by the Venitians, was it upon their political institutions that we had a right to declare war? Victors and conquerors, did it behove us to take an active part in their revolution so sudden in appearance? I will not now ask what fate is reserved for Venice, and more especially for its provinces of the Terra-firma. I will not consider whether their seizure, meditated, perhaps, before the acts which served for its motives, is not destined to figure in history as a worthy appendage to the partition of Poland. I will postpone these reflexions, and I ask, with the constitutional act in my hand, how the Directory can justify the absolute ignorance in which it seeks to leave the legislative body with regard to this multitude of extraordinary events." After having spoken of the affairs of Venice, Dumolard turned to those of Genoa, which presented, he said, the same character, and gave reason to presume the interference of the French army and its leaders. He spoke also of Switzerland, with which, he alleged, France was in contention about a right of navigation, and he demanded whether it was intended to democratise all the states in alliance with France. Whilst frequently extolling the heroes of Italy, he never once mentioned the general-in-chief, whose name at that time none lost an opportunity of pronouncing with extravagant eulogies. He concluded by proposing a message to the Directory, to demand from it explanations touching the events at Venice and Genoa, and the relations of France with Switzerland.

This motion caused general astonishment, and served forcibly to demonstrate the boldness of the Clichyans. It was destined to cost them dear; but whilst its bitter consequences were yet undeveloped, they exhibited the utmost arrogance, proclaimed openly their lofty expectations, and manifested their perfect assurance of speedily becoming masters of the government. On all sides, in truth, was evinced the same confidence and imprudence as at the epoch of Vendemiaire. The emigrants returned in crowds. A multitude of forged passports and certificates of residence were sent from Paris to all parts of Europe, and a regular commerce was established in them at Hamburg. The emigrants passed the frontiers by Holland, Alsace, Switzerland, and Piedmont. Urged alike by the love of country inherent in all Frenchmen, and by the sufferings and distastes experienced in foreign countries, having nothing, moreover, to hope from war since the negotiations opened with Austria, and having even cause to apprehend the disbanding of the corps under Condé, they poured in to attempt, in the chances of peace and by means of internal intrigues, that counter-revolution they had failed to accomplish by the aid of united Europe. And even without much hope of a counter-revolution, they longed to revisit their native country and to recover if possible a part of their possessions. These they in fact enjoyed many facilities for regaining, owing to the interest they inspired in almost every quarter. The jobbing practised with regard to the various securities admitted in payment for national domains and the ease of procuring them at a low price, the feeling of the local administrations for old proscribed families, the complaisance of bidders who withdrew when old proprietors sought to purchase their estates under supposititious names, all enabled the emigrants to redeem their patrimonies for insignificant sums of money. Above all, the priests re-entered France in swarms. They were welcomed by the whole religious community, who lodged and fed them, erected chapels for them in their houses, and even supplied them with money obtained by gathering contributions. The ancient ecclesiastical hierarchy was secretly re-established. None of the new distributions in the civil constitution of the clergy were recognised. The former dioceses were still preserved and administered by bishops and archbishops who corresponded with Rome. Through them and their ministry all the ceremonies of the Catholic church were performed; they confessed, baptized, and married those who remained faithful to the old religion. The Chouans also, or such of them as their occupations permitted, flocked to Paris and joined the emigrants, who were assembled there, it was stated, to the number of five thousand and upwards. Seeing the conduct of the Five-Hundred and the critical condition of the Directory, they deemed a few days would suffice to produce the catastrophe so long desired. They imparted these hopes to their friends abroad. Around the prince of Condé, whose corps had retired into Poland, around the pretender who was at Blankenburg, around the Count d'Artois who was in Scotland, all was joy and exultation. With the same infatuation they had shown at Coblentz, when they boasted of returning to Paris in a fortnight in the train of the King of Prussia, their followers again formed schemes of return, canvassed them in different shapes, and discoursed facetiously concerning them as of events on the eve of accomplishment. Their partisans filled the towns bordering on the frontiers of France, impatiently awaiting the moment of recall to their country. To all these indications must be added the unbridled language of the royalist journals, whose violence augmented with the revived boldness and hopes of their party.

The Directory was well-advised by its police of these various circumstances. The conduct of the emigrants and the proceedings of the Five-Hundred agreed with the declaration of Duverne de Presle as demonstrating the existence of a veritable plot. Duverne de Presle had denounced, without naming them, one hundred and eighty deputies as accomplices. He had specifically mentioned Lemerer and Mersan only, stating that the others were all members of the Clichy club. In this he was mistaken, as we have seen. The greater part of the Clichyans, (five or six might form the exception,) acted under the influence of opinion and not in conspiracy. But the Directory, deceived by appearances and the statement of Duverne de Presle, believed them formally implicated in the plot, and viewed them solely in the light of conspirators. Meanwhile a discovery made by Bonaparte in Italy gave it an insight into an important secret and tended to increase its fears. The Count d'Entraigues, an agent of the pretender, his intermediary with the intriguers in France, and the repository of all the secrets of the emigration, had taken refuge at Venice. When the French entered that city, he was seized and delivered up to Bonaparte. The general might have sent him into France to be shot as an emigrant and a conspirator; but he allowed himself to be moved by his position, and preferred to make use of him and his indiscretions rather than consign him to death. He assigned him the city of Milan for a prison, granted him pecuniary aid, and induced him to disclose all the secrets of the pretender. The whole history of Pichegru's treachery was known to him, which had hitherto remained concealed from the government, Rewbell alone entertaining certain suspicions which had been treated with scorn by his colleagues. D'Entraigues related to Bonaparte all he knew, and put him in possession of the entire schemes of the emigration. Besides these verbal revelations, other curious information was obtained by the seizure of papers found at Venice in d'Entraigues' portfolio. Amongst other documents was one of great importance, containing the minutes of a long conversation held by d'Entraigues with the Count de Montgaillard, in which the latter gave an account of the first negotiation with Pichegru, which proved abortive through the obstinacy of the Prince of Condé. D'Entraigues had written down this conversation which was found among his papers. Berthier, Clarke, and Bonaparte, immediately affixed their signatures to attest its authenticity, and transmitted it to Paris.*

The Directory kept this discovery secret, as well as the declaration of Duverne de Presle, awaiting the opportunity of using them with advantage. But it no longer entertained any doubt as to the part played by Pichegru in the Five-Hundred: it had found the clew to his unexpected defeats, his extraordinary conduct, his refusal to go to Stockholm, his hostile proceedings, and, finally, his influence over the Clichyans. It henceforth regarded him as the leader of one hundred and eighty deputies, his accomplices, busily plotting a counter-revolution.

The five directors were divided, since the new part taken by Carnot, in which he was followed by Barthélemy. Barras, Rewbell, and Larévellière-Lépeaux alone remained steadfast to the existing system of government. Yet these three directors were not cordially united amongst themselves, for Rewbell, who was a moderate conventionalist, detested Barras as a partisan of Danton, and, moreover, held his habits and character in utter disrepute. Larévellière was attached to Rewbell by certain intimate relations, but held little communication with Barras. The chief bond of union consisted in the habitual uniformity of their votes. All three were exasperated against the faction of Clichy and determinedly opposed to it. Barras, although he received the emigrants at his residence from the mere facility of his manners, constantly avowed his readiness to mount on horseback sword in hand, and, at the head of the faubourgs, put to death all the counter-revolutionists in the Five-Hundred. Rewbell expressed himself in very different terms; he deemed all lost; and though resolved to do his duty, he believed that his colleagues and himself would soon have no other resource but flight. Larévellière-Lépeaux, on the other hand, endowed with equal courage and honesty of purpose, held the necessity of making head against the storm, and of attempting everything for the salvation of the republic. With a heart free from animosities, he served as a connecting tie between Rewbell and Barras, and undertook the part of mediator between them. He first addressed himself to Rewbell, for whose integrity and talents he entertained a profound esteem, and, explaining to him his views, besought him to assist in saving the revolution. Rewbell warmly responded to his overtures and promised him the fullest co-operation. They then consulted about securing Barras, whose energetic language was not sufficient to calm the doubts of his colleagues. Assuming in him neither rectitude nor principles, and seeing him surrounded by all parties, they believed him equally capable of selling himself to the emigration as of putting himself at the head of the faubourgs and perpetrating a horrible massacre. They dreaded the one as much as the other. They desired to save the republic by an act of energy, but not to sully it by fresh murders. Incensed at the conduct of Barras, they regarded him perhaps with unnecessary distrust. Larévellière, however, took upon himself to sound him. Barras, delighted at the idea of a coalition with his colleagues, and of securing himself their support, flattered, moreover, by the credit of their alliance, gave in his glad adhesion to their projects, and manifested every disposition to second their views. Henceforth they were assured of forming a compact majority, and of wholly neutralizing, by their united votes, the influence of Carnot and Barthélemy. Still the important point remained to decide what means they should adopt to defeat the conspiracy, which, as they supposed, had such wide ramifications in the two Councils. To employ judicial measures, to denounce Pichegru and his accomplices, demand their impeachment from the Five-Hundred, and afterwards procure their condemnation, was altogether impossible. In the first place, they had only the names of Pichegru, Lemerer, and Mersan. True, they might judge who the others were from their connections, their intrigues, and their violent motions in the Clichy club and in the Five-Hundred, but they were nowhere expressly nominated. The conviction of Pichegru and two or three deputies would not destroy the conspiracy. Besides, they had not even the means of convicting Pichegru, Lemerer, and Mersan; for the existing proofs against them, though carrying a moral persuasion of their guilt, would not suffice to warrant a legal condemnation by the judges. The declarations of Duverne de Presle and of d'Entraigues were in themselves deficient without the corroboration of oral testimony. But still the greatest difficulty lay not therein: for had they possessed against Pichegru and his accomplices all the evidence they lacked, an act of accusation was requisite from the Council of Five-Hundred, and were the proofs clear as day the majority would disregard them; since the culprits would be in fact at the bar of their own fellows in conspiracy. These reasons were so evident, that, notwithstanding their respect for legality, Larévellière and Rewbell were compelled to renounce the idea of a regular trial, and to resolve on a coup d'état; a sad and deplorable resource, but one which, in their situation and in their state of alarm, was alone feasible. Determined upon extreme measures, they were still averse to such as might lead to the effusion of blood, and strove to repress the revolutionary tastes of Barras. Without having agreed upon the mode and moment of action, they concurred in the proposal to arrest Pichegru and his one hundred and eighty supposed accomplices, denounce them before the expurgated legislative body, and demand from it an extraordinary law decreeing their banishment without trial. In their supreme distrust they cast unjust suspicions on Carnot; forgetting his past life, his rigid principles, his unbending pride, they almost believed him a traitor. They feared that he, in concert with Barthélemy, was in the plot with Pichegru. His endeavours to marshal the opposition around him and to render himself its leader, were, in their apprehensive eyes, so many proofs of criminal confederacy. They were not fully convinced however; but resolutely bent on a bold stroke, they were determined not to act by halves; and if it proved necessary, they were prepared to crush the guilty, even though they sat as their colleagues and in the sanctuary of the Directory itself.

* M. de Montgaillard, in his work replete with calumnies and errors, has maintained that this document contained genuine facts, but that it was forged and had been fabricated by Bonaparte, Berthier, and Clarke. The contrary is beyond all doubt, though we may conceive the desire of M. de Montgaillard to justify his brother as to the part in the conversation attributed to him in the paper. But it is difficult to imagine under any circumstances that three persons of such station durst venture to commit a forgery. Acts like these are as rare in our days as poisonings. Clarke was dismissed after Fructidor, and belonged to Carnot's party. It is not probable he would lend himself to fabricate papers calculated to strengthen the government of Fructidor. Moreover, the document was insufficient for the purpose for which it was intended, whereas if it had been a forgery it would have been made complete. Everything therefore proves the falsehood of M. de Montgaillard.

The plan arranged was to make every preparation for the execution of their project, and meanwhile to to keep a watchful eye on their enemies, so as to seize the urgent moment for attacking them. With the intention of attempting so hazardous a blow, it behoved them to look around for support. The patriot party, from which they could alone derive it, was now as heretofore divided into two classes. The one consisting of men who, exasperated at the catastrophe of the 9th Thermidor, had brooded in discontent for three years past, and who were at a loss to comprehend the perverted march of the revolution, holding the faith they did, that the establishment of a legal system was but a concession to the counter-revolutionists, and that vengeance and proscriptions were the true watchwords of government. Still, although the Directory had smitten this party in the person of Babœuf, its members were ready, with their pristine alacrity, to lend it their effective succour. But to employ them in active service was full of danger, and the utmost that could be ventured was, on the day of peril, to draw them out in array, as on the 13th Vendemiare, and trust to their heroism in defying death. They had already given good proof of what they were capable in time of danger by the side of Bonaparte and on the steps of the church of St. Roch. Besides these ardent patriots, who were almost all compromised by their display of zeal or their actual participation in the revolution, there were the moderate patriots who belonged to a superior class, and who, approving more or less the policy of the Directory, and anxious above all things to have the republic based on the authority of laws, perceived the imminent peril to which it was exposed by the progress of reaction. These answered precisely the views of Rewbell and Larévellière, who might draw from them every assistance, if not of force at least of opinion, the most serviceable to the Directory. They were accustomed to frequent the saloons of Barras who entertained for his colleagues, and also those of Madame de Stäel, who had not quitted Paris, and who, by the graces of her mind, gathered around her all that was most brilliant in France. Benjamin Constant shone in those assemblies with the greatest lustre, both from the force of intellect and from the writings he had published in favour of the Directory. There also was to be seen M. de Talleyrand, who, erased from the list of emigrants during the latter days of the convention, had returned to Paris with the hope of obtaining employment in the higher diplomatic service. These distinguished men, composing the society of the government, had resolved to form a club to counterbalance the influence of that of Clichy, and for the discussion of political questions in a contrary spirit. It was called the "Constitutional Circle." It soon comprised all the men whom we have just mentioned, and the members of the Councils who voted with the government, that is to say, nearly the whole last conventional third. The members of the legislative body who called themselves constitutionalists might have likewise joined the new "Circle," for their principles were the same; but their amour-propre had become piqued in the course of the debates in the councils with regard to the Directory, and they persisted in standing aloof, between the Constitutional Circle and the Clichy club, under the leadership of the directors Carnot and Barthélemy, and of the deputies Tronçon-Ducoudray, Portalis, Lacuée, Dumas, Doulcet-Pontécoulant, Siméon, and Thibaudeau. Benjamin Constant frequently spoke in the Constitutional Circle, as did likewise M. de Talleyrand. The example was imitated; and circles of the same character, composed, it is true, of less elevated members and of less guarded patriots, were formed in all quarters. The Constitutional Circle had been opened on the first of Messidor Year V, one month after the first of Prairial. In a short time similar societies were established throughout all France; the hottest patriots resorted to them, and, by a very natural reaction, the jacobin party seemed on the point of again starting into life.

But after all they supplied a force almost exhausted and of little avail. Clubs had fallen into disrepute in France, and were in truth deprived by the constitution of the means to become formidable. Fortunately the Directory had another resource in the support of the armies, into which republican principles seemed to have taken refuge since the agonies of the revolution had wrought so great and general a revulsion in the interior. Every army is attached to the government which organizes, maintains, and rewards it; but more than that, the republican soldiers of that era saw in the Directory, not only the heads of the government, but the leaders of a cause for which they had been levied en masse in 1793, and for which they had fought and conquered during the last six years. And nowhere was the attachment to the revolution more firm than in the army of Italy. It was composed of those revolutionists of the South, who betrayed equal impetuosity in their opinions and in their valour. Generals, officers, and soldiers, had become loaded with honours, enriched with spoil, inflamed by pleasures. Their victories too had inspired them with an inordinate pride. Informed of all that was passing in France by the journals with which they were supplied, they vowed to repass the Alps and put to the sword the aristocrats of Paris. The repose they had enjoyed since the signing of the preliminaries contributed to increase their effervescence, as was natural in a state of idleness. Massena, Joubert, and Augereau, above all, gave them an example of the most ardent republicanism. The troops that had come from the Rhine, without being less republican, were nevertheless colder and less impassioned, and had contracted under Moreau a more decided spirit of sobriety and discipline. Bernadotte commanded them. He affected the man of cultivated breeding, and sought to distinguish himself from his colleagues by the superior polish of his manners. In his division the appellation of Monsieur had been revived, whilst in the old army of Italy the title of citizen was alone permitted. The old soldiers of Italy, insolent, licentious, and quarrelsome, as sons of the South and men spoiled by success, had heretofore provoked a rivalry in valour with the soldiers of the Rhine; now they commenced a rivalry of a different sort, not one of opinion, but of habits and usages. They scorned the distinction of Monsieur, and on this ground frequently measured swords with their comrades of the Rhine. Augereau's division especially, which, like its leader, was noted for hot revolutionary tendencies, was the most unruly. It required an energetic proclamation from its commander to keep it in order and to put an end to duels. The title of citizen was however declared to be the only one authorized in the army.

General Bonaparte regarded the spirit that animated the army with satisfaction and fostered its growth. His first achievements had been directed against the royalist faction, both before Toulon and on the 13th Vendemiare. He had broken with it therefore in the outset of his career. Since then it had laboured to depreciate his triumphs, chiefly because their glory spread a lustre over the revolution. Its latest attacks especially roused his anger. He could not restrain his indignation on reading the motion of Dumolard, and on learning that the Treasury had intercepted the million transmitted by him to Toulon. But in addition to these particular reasons for hating the royalist faction, he had one more general and profound: this was in his own glory and the greatness of his destiny. What could a king make him? High as he might exalt him, this king would be always above him. Under a republic, on the contrary, no head would overtop his own. Though he might not yet dream of the magnificent fate in store for him, he could at least discern a boldness and vastness of enterprise in a republic tallying closely with the characteristics of his own genius; whilst, with a king, France must have been reduced to an obscure and limited existence. Whatever therefore he did with this republic, whether he served or oppressed it, Bonaparte could be great only with it and through it, and must perforce cherish it as the instrument of his fortune. That Pichegru could be allured by a castle, a title, and a few millions, is conceivable enough; to the soaring imagination of the conqueror of Italy a different perspective was needed. The stupendous idea of a new world, revolutionized by his prowess, was required to fill the mind of Bonaparte.

He accordingly wrote to the Directory that he was ready, himself and his army, to fly to its aid and annihilate the counter-revolutionists. He ventured even to give advice, and strenuously exhorted the Directory to sacrifice certain traitors and break certain presses.

In the army of the Rhine feelings were more tranquil. Although a few malcontent officers had been placed in it by Pichegru, the bulk of the army was republican, but calm, disciplined, poor, and less intoxicated with success than that of Italy. An army is usually moulded after the fashion of its general. His spirit steals into the officers, and from them is communicated to the soldiers. Thus did the army of the Rhine take its tone from Moreau. That general had been an object of flattery with the royalists, who professed to extol his prudent retreat above the marvellous exploits in Italy, and accordingly felt less hatred against them than Bonaparte. In temperament, moreover, he was indifferent, cold, and moderate, and his taste for politics partook the character of his mind. Consequently he held back and sought to avoid declaring himself. Still he was a republican, and not a traitor as has been stated. He held at this very moment proofs of Pichegru's treachery, and might have rendered the government a vast service. We have already related that he had seized a carriage belonging to General Klinglin, containing a great number of papers. These papers comprised Pichegru's entire correspondence in cipher with Wickham, the Prince of Condé, &c. He could therefore have furnished full proof of the treason, and have rendered a judicial process more practicable. But Pichegru had been his commander-in-chief and his friend. He was unwilling to betray him, and contented himself with the task of deciphering the correspondence, without communicating it to the Directory. Let us not omit that it contained evidence of Moreau's own fidelity to the republic. After having thrown up his command, Pichegru could only preserve his importance by one pretence, which was, that he ruled Moreau, and that, whilst confiding to him the conduct of the army, he himself prepared to direct the intrigues of the interior. But, in fact, Pichegru constantly repeated that it was of no use applying to Moreau, for he would listen to no overture.* Hence, we conclude that Moreau was faithful, though cool. His army, at the same time, was one of the finest and bravest ever possessed by the republic.

With the army of the Sambre-and-Meuse the state of feeling was very different. This, as we have elsewhere stated, was the army of Fleurus, of the Ourthe and of the Roehr, an army brave and republican like its former general. Its ardour was still further increased when Hoche, appointed to its command, came to infuse into it all the fire of his soul. That young officer, promoted in one campaign from a sergeant in the guards to be general-in-chief, loved the republic as a mother and a benefactress. In the dungeons of the committee of public welfare his sentiments had not cooled; in La Vendée they had been fanned by contending against the royalists. In Vendemiaire he was ready to fly to the succour of the convention, and he had already put 20,000 men in motion, when the vigour of Bonaparte, on the day of the 13th, rendered his farther advance unnecessary. Having in his political capacity had occasion to mingle with affairs, which Moreau never had, regarding Bonaparte with no jealousy, but with impatience to rival him in the career of glory, he was in heart wholly devoted to the republic, and prepared to serve it in any manner, on the field of battle or amid civil broils. We have already had the opportunity of remarking, that to consummate prudence he joined an uncommon warmth and impetuosity of character. Ever prompt to take part in events, he at once offered his arm and his life to the Directory. Thus physical force was not wanting to the government; but the essential point was to employ it with judgment and especially at the fitting moment.

Of all the generals Hoche was the one whom it best suited the Directory to employ. If the character and high renown of Bonaparte were calculated to inspire distrust, it was otherwise with Hoche. His victories at Weissemburg in 1793, his admirable pacification of La Vendée, and his recent victory of Neuwied, had covered him with glory, but glory of a mixed character, in which esteem for the statesman was mingled with admiration of the warrior;—in a word, a glory that gave no apprehensions for liberty. Therefore, if a general were to be called to interfere in the troubles of the state, he was a more appropriate agent to invoke than the colossus who overrode Italy. In all respects he was the soldier dearest to the republicans, and upon whom their hopes rested without any admixture of fear. Moreover, his army was nearest to Paris. Twenty thousand of his troops might be detached and reach the capital in a few marches, to aid by their presence the vigorous blow contemplated by the Directory.

Upon Hoche accordingly the three directors Barras, Rewbell, and Larévellière, turned their thoughts. But Barras, more active and prone to intrigue than his colleagues, and who desired in this new crisis to usurp the honour of the execution, wrote without their privity to Hoche, with whom he was in correspondence, and requested his intervention in the forthcoming events. Hoche declared his readiness without hesitation. A very opportune occasion offered for directing troops on Paris. He was at this moment engaged in preparing with his wonted energy his new expedition against Ireland, and had visited Holland to expedite the preparations making at the Texel. He had determined to detach 20,000 men from the army of the Sambre-and-Meuse for embarkation at Brest. On their route through the interior it was easy to halt them abreast of Paris, and place them at the disposition of the Directory. He offered yet more. Money was necessary, both for the column on march, and for a coup-de-main; he secured it in a very adroit manner. We have seen that the provinces between the Meuse and the Rhine were in an uncertain position until a peace was concluded with the Empire. They had not been, like Belgium, divided into departments and united to France; they were administered with much prudence, but martially, by Hoche, who proposed to republicanize them, and, in case their actual incorporation with France could not be obtained, to constitute them a separate republic attached to France as its creator and protector. He had established a commission at Bonn, with powers to administer the country and to receive the contributions levied on both sides the Rhine. Two millions and some hundred thousand francs were in the hands of this commission at the present time. Hoche forbid it to transfer this sum to the paymaster of the army, since it would thereby have fallen under the authority of the Treasury, and been perverted perhaps to other purposes than those of the army. Instead, he caused the pay of the column intended for detachment to be discharged, and nearly two millions kept in reserve, either for the use of the Directory or for promoting the expedition to Ireland. Political zeal alone impelled him to commit this infraction of the laws, for he, who more than any other general had possessed opportunities of enriching himself, was extremely poor. In making all these dispositions, Hoche deemed he was executing the orders, not only of Barras, but likewise of Rewbell and Larévellière-Lépeaux.

* If M. de Montgaillard had read Klinglin's correspondence, he would not have asserted, on the faith of an expression of Louis XVIII., that Moreau betrayed France from 1797.

Two months had elapsed since the 1st Prairial, that is to say, since the opening of the new session; it was now the end of Messidor (mid-July). A constant succession of measures, digested at the Clichy club and propounded in the Five-Hundred, had been kept up the whole time. Another was now brought forward to which the royalist faction attached great importance. The organization of the national guards was not yet decreed; the principle only was laid down in the constitution. The Clichyans were anxious to have the control of a force opposed to the armies, and to again place arms in the hands of the young men who had risen in Vendemiaire against the convention. They had accordingly appointed a committee in the Five-Hundred to frame a project of organization, with Pichegru as its chairman and reporter. In addition, the finance-committee had again taken up the propositions rejected by the Ancients, and sought to renew them in another manner, so as to procure their adoption in a different shape.. These proceedings of the Five-Hundred, threatening as they were, less alarmed however the three allied directors than the conspiracy, at the head of which they knew a general of celebrity, and which they believed to have the widest ramifications in the two Councils. Urged by these considerations to prompt action, they first proposed to make certain changes in the ministry which they thought necessary, both to render the administration of the state more harmonious, and to make manifest in a firm and decided manner the policy of the government.

Cochon, the minister of police, though somewhat in disgrace with the royalists since the prosecution of the pretender's agents and the circulars regarding the elections, was nevertheless wholly devoted to Carnot. With the designs in view it was impossible for the Directory to permit the police to remain in his hands. Petiet, the minister at war, was in great esteem with the royalists, and a mere creature of Carnot's. Him likewise it would be necessary to dismiss, in order to prevent an enemy remaining the medium of communication between the armies and the directorial majority. Benezech, the minister of the interior, an able person in his department, and submissive to his superiors, gave no particular cause of umbrage to any party; but his known inclinations, and the forbearance of the royalist journals with regard to him, rendered him an object of distrust. It was determined to change him also, were it merely for the sake of having a man more surely to be relied upon. Perfect confidence was felt in Truguet, the minister of marine, and Charles Delacroix, minister for foreign affairs; but reasons derived from regard for the public service induced the directors to wish their displacement. Truguet was attacked with great virulence by the royalist faction, which he, in some measure, deserved by his haughty and violent character. He was a man of sterling honesty and of considerable talents, but wanted the courtesy and attention to individuals necessary in the head of a large department. Besides he might be employed to better purpose in a diplomatic capacity; he himself was desirous of succeeding General Perignon in Spain, with the view of moving that power to cooperate in his great designs on the Indies. With respect to Delacroix, he has since proved his ability to execute the duties of an important office; but he possessed neither the dignity nor information befitting the representative of the republic in relation with foreign powers. But, in truth, the directors were actuated by a strong desire to see another personage in the management of his department: to wit, M. de Talleyrand. The enthusiastic spirit of Madame de Stäel had been fired with admiration of the cold, caustic, profound wit of Talleyrand. She had brought him in communication with Benjamin Constant, who in his turn was made the medium of his introduction to Barras. M. de Talleyrand soon contrived to ingratiate himself with Barras, a thing to him of easy accomplishment with a subtler genius than that of the debauched director. After being thus recommended by Madame de Stäel to Benjamin Constant, and by Benjamin Constant to Barras, he was presented by the latter to Larévellière, and equally succeeded in gaining the ear of the honest man as he had done that of the unprincipled. He appeared to them all a person much to be pitied, for, odious to the emigration as a partisan of the revolution, and suspected by the patriots on account of his aristocratic lineage, he seemed at once the victim of his opinions and of his birth. Thus it became settled that he should be made minister of foreign affairs. The vanity of the directors was flattered by attaching so great a personage to their government, and they had, moreover, the assurance of confiding that department to a man at once well-informed, skilful, and personally connected with the whole of European diplomacy.

Ramel, at the head of the finances, and Merlin de Douai, at that of Justice, were the only remaining ministers. They were both obnoxious to the royalists, more than all the others together, but they fulfilled the duties of their departments with equal zeal and ability. The three directors had therefore no wish to part with them. Thus, out of the seven ministers, policy dictated the dismissal of Cochon, Petiet, and Benezech on account of their opinions, and of Truguet and Delacroix from regard to the interests of the public service; whilst the retention of Merlin and Ramel was commended by both considerations.

In every state with representative institutions, whether monarchical or republican, the appointment of ministers indicates emphatically the leading spirit and policy of the government. The nomination of ministers, therefore, is the great object of party contention, and is sought to be decided as much from regard to the carrying out of opinions as from mere lust of power. But if, amongst opposing parties, there be one desirous of more than a simple modification in the principles of the government, aspiring in fact to an overthrow of the existing system, fearful of reconciliations tending to strengthen and consolidate, and having objects of embroilment in view rather than a change of ministry, it takes no part therein or interferes with the sinister intention of thwarting and preventing it. Pichegru, accordingly, and the Clichyans in the secret of his schemes, attached no importance to any alteration in the departments of the administration. Nevertheless, they made advances to Carnot, and held interviews with him; but more for the purpose of sounding him and discovering his hidden views than of promoting a result which was wholly insignificant in their eyes. Carnot had declared himself in the frankest terms both in conferences and in writing, when replying to the members deputed to wait upon him. He had stated that "he would sooner perish than suffer the constitution to be infringed, or the powers it had instituted to be disgraced"—(the literal expressions in one of his letters). He had thus reduced those who sought to tamper with him to the necessity of discussing merely constitutional projects, such as a change of ministry might involve. As to the constitutionalists, and those of the Clichyans who were less implicated in the faction, they sincerely desired to effect a ministerial revolution, and to rest contented with the attainment of that object. These naturally ranged themselves under the standard of Carnot. The members of the Ancients and of the Five-Hundred, whom we have already specified, Portalis, Tronçon-Ducoudray, Lacuée, Dumas, Thibaudeau, Doulcet-Pontécoulant, Siméon, Emery, and others, consulted with Carnot and Barthélemy, and discussed the changes to be made in the ministry. The two ministers, whose displacement they most eagerly demanded, were Merlin, minister of Justice, and Ramel, minister of the Finances. Having particularly attacked the financial system, they were more embittered against the minister of that department than any other. They likewise urged the dismissal of Truguet and Charles Delacroix. Cochon, Petiet, and Benezech, they were of course in favour of retaining. Carnot and his ally Barthélemy were not difficult to persuade. The feeble Barthélemy, in truth, had no opinion of his own; but Carnot saw all his friends in the ministers retained, and all his enemies in those rejected. The plan, however, easy enough to form in the coteries of the Constitutionalists, was not so simple of arrangement with the three other directors, who, having resolved upon an adverse policy, proposed to discharge those precisely whom the Constitutionalists desired to keep in office.

Carnot, who was unconscious of the union formed by his three colleagues, Rewbell, Larévellière, and Barras, and little aware that Larévellière formed the connecting link between the two others, indulged the hope that he would be the easiest to gain over. He, therefore, recommended the Constitutionalists to address themselves to him, with the view of inducing him to concur in their projects. They accordingly repaired to Larévellière, and explained to him their purpose, but found beneath his moderation an invincible firmness. Unaccustomed, like all the men of that time, to the tactics of representative governments, Larévellière had no idea that the appointment of ministers could form a subject of negotiation.—"Perform your part," he said to them, "that is to say, make laws; leave us ours, which consists in nominating the public functionaries. We are bound to direct our choice according to our consciences, and the opinion we entertain of the merit of individuals, but without reference to the exigence of parties."—He did not then know, and all were equally ignorant, that a ministry should be formed by an amalgamation of influences, taken from the existing parties in the state, and that the nomination of such or such a minister, being a guarantee of the policy to be pursued, may feasibly become an object of negotiation. He had, however, other reasons for repudiating a compromise. He was confident that he and his friend Rewbell had always acted with the purest motives, and that the directorial majority, whatever might be the personal views of the directors, had never decided otherwise than for the public welfare; that in the management of the finances, without being able to prevent minor peculations, it had at least administered them honestly, and with the smallest amount of evil possible under the circumstances; that in political matters it had never been actuated by personal ambition, or had done any thing to extend its prerogatives; finally, that in the direction of the war it had ever kept steadily in view a speedy, but at the same time an honourable and glorious peace. He could not, therefore, either understand or submit to the reproaches made against the Directory. His own clear conscience rendered them incomprehensible. He regarded the Clichyans in the light of perfidious conspirators, and the Constitutionalists as men suffering under the smart of injured self-love. He was ignorant, with all his contemporaries, that the temper of parties is to be taken as an element in politics, and that all pretensions must be considered and treated, even those founded on wounded vanity. Furthermore, the proposals of the Constitutionalists had little of an enticing character in them. The three allied directors were intent on framing a homogeneous administration in order to crush the royalist faction; the Constitutionalists, on the contrary, demanded a ministry wholly opposed to such a one as the directors deemed necessary in the crisis, and they had to offer in return only their votes, which were far from numerous, and which, sooth to say, they refused to pledge on any given question. Their alliance, consequently, presented no advantages sufficient to induce the Directory to hearken to them, and forego its own projects. Hence, from their communications with Larévellière they derived but indifferent satisfaction. They beset him through the medium of the geologist Faujas de Saint-Fonds, with whom he was on intimate terms from the conformity of their tastes and studies; but all in vain. He at length stopped further solicitation by the abrupt rejoinder:—"On the day you attack us, you will find us prepared. We will put you to death, but only politically. You thirst for our blood, but yours shall not be shed. You will be simply reduced to the impossibility of doing mischief."

This obduracy on the part of Larévellière rendered his accession hopeless. Carnot, therefore, advised the Constitutionalists to make application to Barras, doubting nevertheless their success, for he knew the extent of his rancour against them. Admiral Villaret-Joyeuse, one of the hottest members of the opposition, but whom his taste for pleasures frequently led into the society of Barras, was selected to open their proposals. The easy-natured Barras, who was prone to give promises without heeding their import, though his opinions were at bottom sufficiently decided, was in appearance less intractable than Larévellière. Of the four ministers whose dismissal the Constitutionalists demanded, Merlin, Ramel, Truguet, and Delacroix, he readily concurred in their scheme as to two, Truguet and Delacroix. This was according to his compact with Rewbell and Larévellière, and, in undertaking to get rid of them, he did not transgress his previous engagements. But, whether with his usual facility he promised more than he intended to fulfil, or he wished to deceive Carnot and prompt him to move a change of ministers, or his language, generally ambiguous, was too favourably interpreted, the Constitutionalists returned to Carnot with the assurance that Barras had consented to every thing, and would vote with him as to each of the ministers. They were urgent with him that the change should be made at once. But Carnot and Barthélemy, still distrustful of Barras, hesitated to take the initiative. They then pressed Barras to assume the task, and he answered that, from the extreme virulence of the journals at that particular moment, it would be inferred that the Directory was yielding to their clamour. To obviate this objection silence was enjoined on the opposition press; but, meanwhile, Rewbell and Larévellière, strangers to these intrigues, themselves took the decisive step. On the 28th Messidor, Rewbell declared, in the sitting of the Directory, that the time for procrastination was past, that the fluctuations of the government must be brought to a close, and a change of ministers effected. He moved that a scrutiny be forthwith commenced. It was so agreed, and that the scrutiny should be secret. Truguet and Delacroix, whom every one doomed to exclusion, were cashiered unanimously. Ramel and Merlin, whom the Constitutionalists alone desired to supplant, had simply the two votes of Carnot and Barthélemy against them, and were upheld by the three votes of the other directors. Cochon, Pétiet, and Benezech, were deposed by the same majority that had supported Ramel and Merlin. Thus the project devised by the three directors was so far accomplished. But Carnot, finding himself outwitted, urged that the appointment of successors should be at least deferred, alleging that he was not prepared to make a choice. He was harshly answered that a director ought always to be prepared, and that he should not have joined in dismissing a public functionary without being in a condition to nominate his successor. His opposition was accordingly overruled and a vote taken on the moment. The five new ministers were named by the majority. Ramel had been retained in the Finance department, and Merlin in that of Justice; M. de Tallyrand was now nominated minister of foreign affairs; Pléville le Peley, a bold and veteran sailor, and excellent administrator, minister of the Navy; François de Neufchateau, a man of some eminence in the walks of literature, but of slender practical ability, minister of the Interior; Lemoir-Laroche, a discreet and enlightened individual, who contributed sound political articles to the Moniteur, minister of police; and lastly, the young and brilliant commander whose support it had been resolved to secure, Hoche, minister of war. The latter was not of the age required by the constitution, namely thirty. This was known, but Larévellière had proposed to his two colleagues, Rewbell and Barras, to appoint him, even were it necessary to supplant him within forty-eight hours, both in order the more firmly to attach him to their cause, and to propitiate the armies by so flattering a testimony to a military idol.

Thus all parties co-operated in promoting this change of ministers, which as a stroke of policy proved decisive in its consequences. It is common enough, however, to see parties so conspire to provoke a certain result, which they fondly conceive must prove advantageous to themselves. They all concur in hastening the conjuncture, but the strongest decides the event in its own favour.

Carnot, with the irritable pride that characterized him, could scarcely fail to be deeply mortified, or to believe that Barras had tricked him. The members of the legislative body, who had interposed in the negotiation, hurried to his apartments, gathered all the details of the diet that had been held of the Directory, broke into furious denunciations of Barras, proclaimed him a deceitful knave, and gave vent to the most outrageous indignation. A fresh circumstance added fuel to the excitement, and inflamed it to the highest pitch. At the instance of Barras, Hoche had put his troops in motion, with the intention of directing them eventually on Brest, but of halting them for a few days in the vicinity of the capital. He had selected the legion of Franks, commanded by Humbert, Lemoigne's division of infantry, the division of chasseurs commanded by Richepanse, and a regiment of artillery; in all from fourteen to fifteen thousand men. Richepanse's division of chasseurs had already arrived at La Ferté-Alais, eleven leagues from Paris. This involved a serious indiscretion, for the constitutional radius was twelve leagues, and, pending the moment for action, it was needless to transgress the legal limit. The imprudence was owing to the mistake of a commissary of war, who had infringed the law without knowing it. To this unfortunate occurrence were added others. The troops seeing the direction they were made to take, and aware of what was passing in the interior, had no doubt they were intended to march against the Councils. The officers and soldiers openly boasted on the route that they were going to reduce the aristocrats of Paris to reason. Hoche had contented himself with notifying to the minister at war a general movement of troops on Brest for the expedition to Ireland.

All these circumstances indicated to the different parties that some decisive event was approaching. The opposition and the enemies of the government redoubled their activity to parry the blow that threatened them, whilst the Directory, on its part, neglected no means to forward the execution of its projects and to make sure of victory; with what measure of success on either side we shall forthwith proceed to unfold.

CHAPTER LIV.

PREPARATIONS OF THE OPPOSITION AND CLICHYANS AGAINST THE DIRECTORY.—HOSTILITY OF THE COUNCILS.—PROJECT OF LAW AS TO THE NATIONAL GUARD AND AGAINST POLITICAL SOCIETIES.—FETE TO THE ARMY OF ITALY.—NEGOTIATIONS FOR PEACE WITH THE EMPEROR AND ENGLAND.—COMPLAINT OF THE COUNCILS REGARDING THE MARCH OF TROOPS.—DIVISIONS IN THE PARTY OF THE OPPOSITION.—DEFINITIVE PLAN OF THE DIRECTORY AGAINST THE MAJORITY OF THE COUNCILS.—COUP-D'ETAT OF THE 18TH FRUCTIDOR.—INVASION OF THE TWO COUNCILS BY AN ARMED FORCE.—BANISHMENT OF 53 DEPUTIES, TWO DIRECTORS AND OTHER CITIZENS.—CONSEQUENCES OF THIS REVOLUTION.

INTELLIGENCE of the arrival of Richepanse's chasseurs, with an account of the circumstances attending their march, reached the minister Pétiet on the 28th Messidor, the very day on which the change of ministry took place. Pétiet immediately communicated the information to Carnot; and the deputies who flocked around him and the discarded ministers, to indulge their resentment against the directorial majority, and express their sympathy with its victims, were further dismayed by learning at the same moment the advance of the troops. Carnot stated to them that the Directory had not, to his knowledge, issued any orders to that effect; but that the three other directors might perhaps have passed a private resolution, which in such case must be inserted in the secret register; that he would go and ascertain the fact; and that, in the meantime, the event itself should not be made public, until he was in a condition to prove the existence of orders. But the excitement was too great for any prudent exhortation to be of the least avail.

The dismissal of the ministers and the march of the troops, combined with the nomination of Hoche in the place of Pétiet, served to remove all doubts from their minds as to the intentions of the Directory. They proclaimed that the Directory evidently intended to outrage the inviolability of the Councils, perpetrate a new thirty-first of May, and proscribe the deputies faithful to the constitution. They assembled in numbers at the house of Tronçon Ducoudray, who was one of the most influential members of the Ancients. The Clichyans, as is the usage with extreme parties, had beheld with pleasure the moderates, that is to say, the Constitutionalists, deceived in their expectations and foiled in their project of composing a ministry of their own choice. They considered them as duped by Barras, and rejoiced greatly that they had fallen so easily into the snare. But the danger appeared to them rather more serious when they found troops advancing. Their two generals, Pichegru and Willot, being apprized of the special muster at Tronçon-Ducoudray's to confer upon the state of affairs, repaired thither, although the meeting was composed of men differing essentially in principles. Pichegru had not yet any real power at command; his only means lay in the passions of parties, and wherever these broke forth most violently there it behoved him to be, either curiously to watch or prominently to act, as circumstances might prompt. Amongst the personages assembled there were Portalis, Tronçon-Ducoudray, Lacu e, Dumas, Siméon, Doulcet-Pontécoulant, Thibaudeau, and Villaret-Joyeuse, with Willot and Pichegru. Great irritation marked the deportments of those present, as was natural. The actual designs of the Directory formed the preliminary theme of discussion. Expressions of Rewbell, Larévellière, and Barras, were quoted, which implied a settled purpose on their part, and from the change of ministry and the march of the troops, it was concluded that this purpose could be none other than an attack on the legislative body. Thereupon the most violent resolutions were proposed, such as the suspension of the Directory, its impeachment, and even its outlawry. But to put these measures in execution an armed force was requisite, and Thibaudeau, who did not partake the prevailing ferment, calmly inquired where it was to be found. He was answered that they had the twelve hundred grenadiers of the legislative body, a part of the 21st regiment of chasseurs, commanded by Malo, and the national guard of Paris; that pending the reorganization of that guard, they might send detachments of grenadiers into the various quarters of the capital and rally around them the citizens who had taken up arms in Vendemiaire. A long debate ensued without leading to any definite conclusion, as usually happens when means are unsubstantial and inadequate to the purpose. Pichegru, cool and composed as ordinary, let fall some observations on the insufficiency and the peril of the steps proposed, the quiet tone of which contrasted strangely with the agitation raging around him. At length the meeting separated, some dispersing to Carnot's, others to the residences of the supplanted ministers. Carnot condemned all the plans proposed against the Directory. A second meeting was held at Tronçon-Ducoudray's, but Pichegru and Willot did not attend it. Much wild and vehement elocution was wasted as before, but, shrinking from recourse to violent measures, temperate counsels prevailed with the majority, and it was finally determined to keep within strict constitutional limits. A motion was accordingly adopted to demand forthwith the law touching the responsibility of ministers and the prompt organization of the national guard.

In the Clichy club as elsewhere great excitement reigned; incessant was the declamation, but equally tame the end, for if hotter passions animated the members, their means of aggression were not more powerful. The removal of Cochon from the ministry of police was with them a chief object of regret, and they revived one of the favourite schemes of the faction, which consisted in depriving the Directory of all control over the police of Paris and vesting it in the legislative body, by a forced construction of the meaning of an article in the constitution. They proposed at the same time to intrust the direction of this police to Cochon; but the whole design was of too bold a character for them to venture on its immediate adoption. They were content in the end with positive resolutions to raise a cavil about the age of Barras, who, it was said, was not forty years old on his nomination to the Directory, and to insist on the instant organization of the national guard.

On the 30th Messidor (18th July), accordingly, the council of the Five-Hundred was a scene of prodigious clamour. The deputy Delahaye denounced the march of the troops, and moved that the report on the national guard be presented forthwith. Others inveighed against the conduct of the Directory, depicted in exaggerated alarm the frightful state of Paris, from the arrival of a multitude of well-known revolutionists and the new formation of clubs, and demanded that a discussion be opened on political societies. Ultimately it was decided that the report on the national guard should be made on the day after the morrow, and immediately afterwards a debate commenced on political societies. By the day prescribed, the 2d Thermidor (20th July), additional particulars had arrived respecting the march of the troops and their number, and it was known that there were already four regiments of cavalry quartered at La Ferté-Alais.

Pichegru presented the report on the organization of the national guard. His plan was conceived in a truly artful spirit. All Frenchmen enjoying the qualification of citizens were to be enrolled on the lists of the national guard; but all were not to compose the actual force of that guard. The national guards intended for duty were to be chosen by the rest, in other words, elected by the mass. In this manner the national guard would be formed like the Councils by electoral assemblies, and the result of the recent elections sufficiently indicated what sort of guard would be obtained by this process. It was to be composed of a battalion for each canton, and in each battalion there was to be a company of grenadiers and chasseurs, thereby re-establishing those chosen companies in which the most decided politicians mustered, and of which parties usually availed themselves for the execution of their schemes. No sooner was the report presented than a motion was made that it be forthwith adopted. The fiery Henri Larivière rose and asserted that everything announced another thirty-first of May. "Let us have it! Let us have it then!" exclaimed certain voices from the left, interrupting him. "Yes," he resumed, "but I console myself by reflecting that we are at the second of Thermidor, and that we approach the 9th, a day fatal to tyrants." He moved that the project be voted on the instant, and a message sent to the Ancients requesting them to protract their sitting, in order that they might likewise pass it without adjourning. This proposal was strenuously resisted. Thibaudeau, the leader of the Constitutional party, remarked with reason that, whatever dispatch might be used, the national guard could not be organized within a month; that such precipitation in passing an important law would therefore be fruitless as a means of saving the legislative body from any dangers that threatened it, and that the national representation should repose on its rights and its dignity, and not seek its force in means actually powerless. He therefore urged the expediency of allowing time for reflection. Eventually an adjournment of twenty-four hours was carried for a further consideration of the measure, the principle of the reorganization being however at once affirmed. At this moment a message from the Directory arrived, giving explanations as to the march of the troops. This message set forth that the troops, intended for a distant destination, were obliged to pass near Paris; that through the inadvertence of a war-commissary they had overstepped the constitutional limit; that the error of this commissary was the sole cause of this infraction of the laws; and that, to make amends, the troops had received orders to retrograde without delay. The Council was far from being content with this explanation. It provoked, indeed, fresh declamations of extreme violence, and a committee was named to examine the message and make a report on the state of Paris and the advance of the troops.

On the following day Pichegru's measure was discussed and four of its clauses voted. The Council next proceeded to take up the question of clubs, which were reviving in all quarters and seemed to threaten a resurrection of the Jacobin party. It was proposed they should be absolutely prohibited, since the laws which restrained them were continually evaded. A decree was in fact passed that no political assembly should be permitted for the future. Thus the society of Clichy committed a species of suicide, consenting to its own annihilation on condition of destroying the Constitutional Circle and the other inferior clubs forming all around. The leaders of the Clichy faction, in truth, had no need of that tumultuous gathering to concert together, and they could afford to sacrifice it without losing any great resource. Willot subsequently opened the attack on Barras, as not being of the age required by the constitution at the time he was appointed a director. But the army registers being searched, proved that it was an idle fiction. Meanwhile fresh troops had arrived at Rheims, and the feeling of alarm grew more intense. The Directory having repeated its previous explanations, they were again declared insufficient, and the committee already named was instructed to prosecute its inquiries and present a report with all dispatch.

In the interim Hoche had arrived at Paris, it being necessary he should visit the capital, whether he intended at once proceeding to Brest, or was to be detained for the execution of a coup-d'etat. He presented himself without any misgivings before the Directory, assured that in putting his divisions in motion he had obeyed the directorial majority. But Carnot, who was president of the Directory at the time, sought to intimidate him, demanding under what order he had acted, and menacing him with an impeachment for having transgressed the constitutional limits. Unfortunately, Rewbell and Larévellière, not having been informed of the orders sent to Hoche, could not interfere to assist him. Barras, who had issued the orders in question, did not venture to speak, and thus was Hoche left exposed to the searching examination of Carnot. He made answer that he could not go to Brest without troops; upon which Carnot retorted that there were yet 43,000 soldiers in Brittany, forming a sufficient number of men for the expedition. At length, Larévellière, perceiving the embarrassment of Hoche, came to his rescue, and, expressing to him in the name of the directorial majority the esteem and confidence his services had merited, assured him there was no ground of impeachment against him; and thereafter broke up the sitting. Hoche hastened to Larévellière to thank him for his seasonable interposition, and then learnt that Barras had not apprised either him or Rewbell of the intended movement of troops, having given the orders without their knowledge. He naturally felt indignant with Barras, who, after having compromised him, had shrunk with the meanest cowardice from defending him. It was clear that Barras in thus acting apart, without the privity of his two colleagues, had hoped to retain the sole disposal of the executory force to be employed. Hoche, highly incensed, treated him with haughty disdain, but expressed the greatest regard for Rewbell and Larévellière. The time was not yet come, nor had any preparations been made, for the execution of the project contemplated by the three directors, and Barras, in thus prematurely summoning Hoche, had uselessly compromised both him and them. The young general accordingly returned forthwith to his head-quarters, which were at Wetzlar, and ordered into cantonments the troops he had marched around the environs of Rheims and Sedan, where they were still within reach of a forced march on Paris. Although effectually disgusted with the conduct of Barras towards him, he was ready again to enact the same part on a signal from Rewbell and Larévellière. He had beyond doubt grievously committed himself, and a serious determination was evinced to bring him under accusation; but at his head-quarters he awaited with composure whatever steps the majority of the Five-Hundred, in the bitterness of its wrath against him, might hazard to his prejudice. Meanwhile his age not permitting him to accept the ministry of war, Schérer was nominated to it in his stead.

The unfortunate notoriety that had attended this matter, however, put it out of the power of the Directory to employ Hoche further in the execution of its designs. Moreover, it was a consideration that the importance with which such participation would invest him might excite the jealousy of the other generals. It was not improbable that Bonaparte would take umbrage at others than himself being applied to. It was therefore deemed more advisable not to make use of any of the generals-in-chief, but to employ one of the most distinguished generals of division. The notion was entertained of asking Bonaparte for one of those generals become so famous under his orders; a step which would combine the advantage of gratifying him personally without giving ground of offence to any of the other commanders-in-chief. But whilst this project of appealing to him was still in deliberation, he himself interfered in a manner somewhat startling for the counter-revolutionists, and at least embarrassing for the Directory. He chose the anniversary of the fourteenth of July, answering to the 26th Messidor, to give a festival to his army, and to publish addresses on the state of affairs at home. He caused to be erected at Milan a pyramid bearing numerous trophies, and the names of all the soldiers and officers killed during the campaign of Italy. Around this pyramid the festival was celebrated with great magnificence. Bonaparte was present in person, and addressed his soldiers in an exciting proclamation.

"Soldiers!" he said, "this day is the anniversary of the 14th July. You see before you the names of your companions in arms, killed on the field of honour for the liberty of our country. They have given you an example. You are bound wholly and indissolubly to the republic, to the happiness of thirty millions of Frenchmen, to the glory of that name which has received new lustre from your victories.

"Soldiers! I am aware you are deeply affected with the misfortunes which threaten our country. But the country cannot encounter real dangers. The same men who have made it triumph over allied Europe are still here. Mountains separate you from France; you would clear them with the swiftness of the eagle, if it were necessary, to maintain the constitution, defend liberty, and protect republicans.

"Soldiers! the government watches over the guardianship of the laws intrusted to it. The royalists, the moment they shall show themselves, will have lived.* Be without inquietude, therefore, and let us swear by the manes of the heroes slain by our side for liberty, let us swear upon our standards, implacable war to the enemies of the republic and of the constitution of the year III!"

A banquet wound up the entertainments, at which the most energetic toasts were given by the generals and officers. The generalissimo himself proposed the first toast to the brave Stengel, Laharpe, and Dubois, killed on the field of honour. "May their shades," he exclaimed, "watch around us and guard us from the toils of our enemies!" Other toasts were afterwards drank to the Constitution of the year three, to the Directory, to the Council of Ancients, to the memory of the French assassinated in Verona, to the re-emigration of the emigrants, to the union of French republicans, to the destruction of the Clichy club. The charge was sounded as an accompaniment to this latter toast.

* [Bonaparte, who was fond of classical allusions in his proclamations, here uses the Latin expression to signify death, the Romans entertaining a superstitious repugnance to mention dissolution otherwise than as life past.]

Similar fêtes took place in all the cities where divisions of the army were stationed, and were celebrated with the like manifestations. Thereafter, in each division of the army addresses were framed still more significant than the proclamation of the general-in-chief. He had observed in his language a certain dignity of style; but the old jacobin jargon of 1793 was revived in the addresses of the divisions of the army. Above the others, those under Massena, Joubert, and Augereau, distinguished themselves for violence of expression. Augereau's in fact exceeded all bounds. "Oh conspirators!" it said, "tremble! from the Adige and the Rhine to the Seine, there is but a step. Tremble! your iniquities are told, and their reward is on the point of our bayonets!"

These addresses were signed by thousands of names and sent to the commander-in-chief. He collected and forwarded them to the Directory, together with his own proclamation, in order that they might be printed and published in the newspapers. This proceeding on his part sufficiently indicated his readiness to march against the opposition faction in the Councils, and lend his aid in the execution of a coup-d'etat. However, as he knew the Directory was divided, and perceived that matters were growing serious and complicated, desirous at the same time of having correct information from the scene itself, he selected one of his aide-de-camps, M. de Lavalette, who enjoyed his unlimited confidence, and possessed the penetration necessary to estimate persons and events, whom he dispatched to Paris with orders to observe and gather everything worthy of communication. He likewise commissioned him to offer funds to the Directory, in case it needed them to carry into operation any purposed act of aggression.

When the Directory received these addresses it was greatly embarrassed. They were in some sort illegal, for the armies were forbidden to deliberate on political affairs. To accept and publish them was to authorize the armies to interfere in the government of the state, and deliver the republic into the hands of the military power. But was it possible to avoid this dangerous alternative? By applying to Hoche and requesting troops from him, by demanding the aid of a general from Bonaparte, had not the government itself provoked this intervention? Obliged to have recourse to force and to violate legality, could it rely upon other support than that of the armies? To receive these addresses was simply an inevitable consequence of what it had done, of what it had been obliged to do. Such was the melancholy fate of the republic, that to escape its enemies it was compelled to throw itself into the power of the armies. It was the dread of a counter-revolution in 1793 that had driven the republic into the excesses of which we have read the mournful detail; it was the same dread of a counter-revolution that now impelled it to seek protection from soldiers. In short, it was always to avert the like danger that at one time it had recourse to passions, at another to bayonets.

Still the Directory would have willingly concealed these addresses, and withheld them from publication on account of the evil example they afforded; but it would thereby have grievously offended the general, and driven him perhaps to side with the enemies of the republic. It was therefore constrained to print and circulate them. They struck terror into the Clichyan party, and made it sensible how gross had been its imprudence in attacking, by the motion of Dumolard, the conduct of General Bonaparte at Venice. They gave rise to fresh complaints in the Councils. Such an intervention on the part of an army was vehemently denounced, the right of soldiers to express political opinions was denied, and further corroborative testimony of the sinister designs of the Directory was therefrom deduced.

Bonaparte caused additional embarrassment to the government by the general of division he sent upon its application. It happened that Augereau was the occasion of considerable trouble in the army through the violence of his opinions, which were chiefly adapted for the atmosphere of the Faubourg Saint-Antoine. He was ever on the alert to quarrel with any one not equally violent as himself, so that Bonaparte stood in apprehension of some fierce altercation arising amongst his officers. To get rid of him he pitched upon Augereau to detach to the Directory, thinking he would be well fitted for the service required of him, and much better at Paris than at head-quarters, in a season of inactivity, where he might become dangerous. Augereau was well content with the mission, for he liked the agitation of clubs as well as the field of battle itself, and he was by no means insensible to the influence of ambition. He set out for Paris, therefore, with the greatest alacrity, and arrived about the middle of Thermidor. Bonaparte wrote to his aide-de-camp Lavalette that he had dispatched Augereau because he could keep him no longer in Italy; and recommended him to be on his guard with him, and to continue his observations, holding himself as much as possible aloof. He likewise exhorted him to cultivate friendly relations with Carnot; for although openly declaring in favour of the Directory against the counter-revolutionary faction, he had no intention of mixing himself up with the personal quarrels of the directors:

The Directory viewed the arrival of Augereau with any thing but satisfaction. He was agreeable enough to Barras, who found pleasure in drawing around him Jacobins and patriots from the faubourgs, and who was continually boasting of mounting on horseback and brandishing his sword; but he gave umbrage to Rewbell and Larévellière, who had desired to have a prudent and moderate officer, and one who might, in case of need, make common cause with them against the schemes of Barras. As for Augereau himself, none could be more elated with the position he occupied. He was an honest man, an excellent soldier, and possessed of a generous heart, but prone to speak vauntingly, and gifted with but little strength of head. He visited much in Paris, partaking of entertainments in his honour, and enjoying all the celebrity of his brilliant achievements in arms, but attributing to himself many of the operations of the army of Italy, willingly leaving it to be inferred that he had inspired the general-in-chief with the finest of his conceptions, and repeating on every occasion that he would soon bring all aristocrats to reason. Greatly annoyed at this conduct, Larévellière and Rewbell determined to remonstrate with him, and, by appealing to his vanity, to reclaim him to a more sober demeanour. Larévellière accordingly spoke earnestly but affectionately with him, and succeeded in calming him, partly by a little skilful flattery, and partly by the respect he knew how to exact. He pointed out to him that there was no occasion to sully his reputation by a massacre of citizens, but that he was called upon to merit the title of saviour of the republic by energetic but discreet action, whereby the factious might be disarmed without the shedding of blood. Larévellière thus tranquillized Augereau, and brought him to a more tractable and reasonable mood. He was forthwith appointed to the command of the seventeenth military division, which comprehended Paris. This fresh step left no doubt of the intentions of the Directory: they were in fact definitively settled. Hoche's troops were quartered within a few marches, and could be called at a moment's notice. The directors only waited for the funds which Bonaparte had promised, and which they hesitated to extract from the Treasury, in order to avoid compromising the minister Ramel, who was closely watched by the finance-committee of the Five-Hundred. These funds were partly intended to gain the grenadiers of the legislative body, then amounting to 1,200 men, and who, without being very formidable, might, if they resisted, provoke a combat, which it was determined above all things to shun. Barras, as the most skilled in intrigues, took upon himself this task, the accomplishment of which, in the meanwhile, was the cause of delaying the coup-d'etat.

These internal troubles had a most disastrous influence on the important negotiations in progress between the French republic and the powers of Europe. The desperate faction, which had sworn implacable war against the liberty and the tranquillity of France, was now to crown the catalogue of wrongs by jeopardizing the consummation of the peace so long and ardently desired. Lord Malmesbury had arrived at Lille, and the Austrian ministers had opened conferences at Montebello with Bonaparte and Clarke, who were the two plenipotentiaries appointed to represent France. The preliminaries of Leoben, signed on the 29th Germinal (18th April), had stipulated that two congresses should be held, the one general at Berne for peace with the emperor and his allies, the other special at Rastadt for peace with the empire; that the treaty of peace with the emperor should be concluded within three months, under penalty of nullifying the preliminaries; and that nothing should be done meanwhile in the Venitian states except in concert with Austria, but that the Venitian provinces should not be occupied by the emperor until after the conclusion of peace. The transactions at Venice seemed in some degree to derogate from these conditions, and Austria had, on her part, lost no time in yet more flagrantly violating them by seizing and occupying the Venitian provinces of Istria and Dalmatia. Bonaparte, however, closed his eyes on this infraction of the preliminaries, to escape recriminations with regard to what he had done at Venice, and what he meditated doing in the islands of the Levant. The exchange of the ratifications took place at Montebello, near Milan, on the 5th Prairial (24th May). The Marquis de Gallo, Neapolitan minister at Vienna, appeared as the emperor's envoy. After the exchange of the ratifications, Bonaparte conversed with M. de Gallo, and sought to induce him to forego the intention of holding a congress at Berne, and to treat separately in Italy without calling in the other powers. The reasons he had to urge for this course, as regarded the interest of Austria herself, were very persuasive. It was impossible to imagine that Russia and England, if summoned to this congress, would ever consent that Austria should indemnify herself at the expense of Venice, whose possessions they both coveted. The advantage of Austria, coupled with that of a speedy settlement, would therefore, it was plain, be best consulted by a separate and immediate conference to be held in Italy. M. de Gallo, a shrewd and intelligent man, was by no means insensible to the force of this argument. To decide him and bring over the Austrian cabinet, Bonaparte conceded a point of etiquette upon which the court of Vienna laid great stress. It had been an object of serious apprehension with the emperor lest the republic might reject the ancient ceremonial in use with the Kings of France and insist upon an alternate precedency in the protocol of treaties. He, the emperor, was intent on being always first named, and on his ambassadors retaining the privilege of preceding the ambassadors of France. Bonaparte, who had procured authority from the Directory to yield to any such miserable pretensions, granted what M. de Gallo so urgently solicited. His gratification thereat was so abundant that he forthwith adopted the principle of a separate negotiation at Montebello, and wrote to Vienna to obtain powers in accordance. But old Thugut, fretted, stubborn, wholly attached to the English alliance, and continually offering his resignation since the court, influenced by the Archduke Charles, seemed to incline in the opposite direction, entertained very different views. He regarded the prospect of peace with aversion; the internal troubles of France still served to animate hopes which he fondly cherished, notwithstanding they had proved so often delusive. Although the trust reposed in the vain promises of the emigrants had cost Austria the sacrifice of countless treasure, led her into sundry false movements, and entailed upon her the shame of an unsuccessful war, still the new conspiracy of Pichegru inspired Thugut with the idea of procrastinating the conclusion of peace. He resolved accordingly to oppose studied delays in the way of the negotiation; with which view he disavowed the Marquis de Gallo, and dispatched a fresh envoy to Montebello in the person of Major-general the Count de Meewelt. This individual arrived on the 1st Messidor (19th June), and proceeded to demand the execution of the preliminaries, that is to say, the convention of a congress at Berne. Bonaparte, indignant at this change of system, gave him a very warm retort. He repeated all he had previously advanced as to the impossibility of obtaining the adhesion of England and Russia to the arrangements laid down as the bases of a treaty at Leoben; and added, that a general congress would cause great additional delay, that two months had already elapsed since the preliminaries of Leoben, whilst, according to those preliminaries, the peace was to be concluded in three months, and that its conclusion within such interval would be hopeless if all the powers were invited to assist. These allegations left the Austrian plenipotentiary without the power of a reply. The Court of Vienna appeared to yield, and conferences were fixed to be opened at Udine, in the Venitian provinces, in order that the place of negotiation might be nearer Vienna. They were appointed to commence on the 13th Messidor (1st July). Bonaparte, whom cares of great importance retained at Milan, amidst the new republics in process of forming, and who moreover desired to keep a watch, not too remote, on events at Paris, would not be drawn fruitlessly to Udine, there to be duped by Thugut. He sent Clarke alone, declaring that he would not appear in person until he was convinced, by the nature of the powers given to the negotiators and by their conduct in the negotiation, of the good faith of the Austrian court. He was not deceived in his misgivings, as the event showed. The cabinet of Vienna, more deluded than ever by the wretched agents of the royalist faction, flattered itself it was about to be relieved, by a counter-revolution, from the necessity of treating with the Directory, and accordingly delivered through its agent certain notes, assuredly of a strange character in the existing state of the negotiation. These notes, bearing date the 18th July (30th Messidor), set forth that the court of Vienna was disposed to adhere rigorously to the preliminaries, and consequently to treat for a general peace at Berne; that the period of three months, fixed by the preliminaries for the conclusion of peace, could be understood to commence only with the convocation of the congress, for otherwise it would have been insufficient to be stipulated; and that in consequence, the court of Vienna, resolute to abide by the tenor of the preliminaries, demanded a general congress of all the powers. These notes likewise contained bitter complaints as to the events at Venice and Genoa, maintaining that those transactions involved a grave infraction of the preliminaries of Leoben, for which France was bound to give adequate satisfaction.

On receiving these notes, Bonaparte was highly exasperated. His first impulse was to collect all the divisions of the army, resume the offensive, and again advance on Vienna to exact conditions somewhat more onerous than those of Leoben. But the domestic state of France and the conferences at Lille restrained him, and he concluded it would be better, under such grave circumstances, to throw on the Directory, who stood in the centre of all affairs, the task of determining the line of conduct to be followed. He contented himself therefore with directing Clarke to present a vigorous rejoinder. His note in reply bore in substance that the time was past for demanding a congress, the incompatibility of which had been acknowledged by the Austrian plenipotentiaries, and which the court of Vienna had itself abandoned by fixing conferences at Udine; that at present no motive existed for such a congress, since the allies of Austria had separated from her and manifested the intention of treating individually, which was proved by the conferences at Lille; that the period of three months could only be interpreted to commence from the day of signing the preliminaries, for otherwise, by deferring the opening of the congress, everlasting delays might be interposed, which France had expressly designed to prevent by stipulating a positive term; and, finally, that the preliminaries had not been violated by the conduct pursued with regard to Venice and Genoa, since those states were at liberty to change the form of their governments without giving offence to any other power, and that, at any rate, by occupying Istria and Dalmatia, contrary to the express articles of the convention, Austria had much more wantonly violated those preliminaries. After thus lodging a reply at once firm and appropriate, Bonaparte referred the whole matter to the Directory and awaited its orders, exhorting it merely to decide with all possible speed, since it was of moment not to defer hostilities until the setting-in of the bad season, if so extreme a step should be eventually deemed imperative.

At Lille, the negotiations were conducted with more sincerity and good-faith, which ought to appear singular, since it was with Pitt the French plenipotentiaries had to treat. But Pitt was really alarmed at the situation of England; no longer able to rely on Austria, and having lost all confidence in the tales of the royalist agents, he desired to conclude a treaty with France ere peace with the emperor had rendered her more powerful and exorbitant. If, therefore, in the preceding year he had practised a mere feint, in order to satisfy public opinion and prevent an arrangement with regard to the Low Countries, this year he was sincerely anxious to treat, mentally resolving, no doubt, that the peace should prove but a hollow truce of two or three years' duration. This genuine Englishman, in truth, could not consent to leave the Low Countries in the definitive possession of France.

At the present moment, as we have said, every thing tended to demonstrate his sincerity, both the choice of Lord Malmesbury, and the nature of the secret instructions given to him as ambassador. According to the custom of English diplomacy, arrangements were made for two simultaneous negotiations, the one official and apparent, the other secret and real. Mr. Ellis had been appointed with Lord Malmesbury to conduct under his sanction the secret negotiation, and to correspond directly with Pitt. This practice in English diplomacy is unavoidable under a representative government. In the official negotiation only so much is stated as may be repeated in parliament, whilst for the secret negotiation is reserved all it may be judged impolitic to make public. Moreover, in cases where the ministry itself is divided on the question of peace, the secret conferences are communicated only to such of the ministers as approve and direct the negotiation.

The English embassy arrived at Lille with a numerous suite, and in great pomp, on the 16th Messidor (4th July). The envoys nominated to represent France were Letourneur, the late director, Pléville Le Peley, who remained at Lille only a few days on account of his appointment to the ministry of marine, and Hugues Maret, afterwards Duke of Bassano. Of these three personages the latter was the only one fitted to act a useful part in the negotiation. Still young, and from early years initiated in diplomatic life, he united with great abilities manners which had become rare in France since the revolution. He owed his introduction to public affairs to M. de Talleyrand; and it had been matter of recent concert between them that the one should have the foreign ministry and the other the mission to Lille. M. Maret had been twice sent to London in the early times of the revolution, when he had met with a favourable reception from Pitt, and acquired considerable knowledge of England and its cabinet. He was therefore well adapted to represent France in the negotiations at Lille. His two colleagues in the mission and himself arrived at that town about the same time as the English embassy. It is not in public conferences that diplomatic arrangements are usually in reality settled. The English negotiators, being men of dexterity and tact, were desirous of mingling familiarly with the French envoys, and had too much sense to evince any cold estrangement. On the contrary, however, Letourneur and Pléville Le Peley, who were honest men enough but unaccustomed to diplomacy, retained a good deal of the revolutionary savagery; they considered the two Englishmen as dangerous persons, perpetually on the alert to intrigue and deceive, and against whom it behoved them to be on their especial guard. They refused to see them save officially, fearing to compromise themselves by any other species of communication. It was not the likely method to arrive at an understanding.

Lord Malmesbury exhibited his powers, wherein the conditions of the peace were left in blank, and demanded to know the terms proposed by France. The three French negotiators produced their conditions, which were, it may be well imagined, pitched on a high maximum. They insisted that the king of Great Britain should renounce the title of king of France, which he continued to assume through one of those ridiculous usages perpetuated in England; that he should re-deliver all the vessels taken at Toulon, and restore to France, Spain, and Holland, all the colonies he had captured from them. In exchange for these sacrifices, France, Spain, and Holland offered peace, and peace only, for they had taken nothing from England. It is true that the position of France was sufficiently imposing to justify the demand of great concessions; but to ask every thing for herself and her allies, and give nothing in return, was to bar the possibility of an agreement. Lord Malmesbury, anxious to attain some substantial result, and perceiving the official negotiation would lead to nothing, sought to provoke a more intimate intercourse. Maret, better accustomed than his colleagues to diplomatic usages, willingly acceded; but it required great finesse to induce Letourneur and Pléville Le Peley to attend parties, even at the theatre. The young men attached to the two embassies were the first to associate more closely together, and gradually the communications became more friendly. France had so completely broken with the past since the revolution, that it was with infinite difficulty she could resume her ancient relations with foreign powers. No attempt of the nature had been made in the preceding year, because the negotiation was not sincere, and both parties were estranged by mutual distrust and a desire to elude contact; but on this occasion it was essential to introduce amicable and effective communications. Lord Malmesbury accordingly sounded M. Maret with the view of engaging him to enter on a private negotiation. Before consenting, M. Maret wrote to Paris to obtain authority from the French ministry. It was granted without difficulty, and he forthwith opened special conferences with the English plenipotentiary.

All pretence of contesting the possession of the Low Countries, or of discussing the new position assumed by France towards Holland, was abandoned; but England wished to retain some of the principal colonies she had conquered, as an indemnification both for the expenses of the war and for the concessions made to France. She consented to restore all the French colonies, and even agreed to renounce all pretension to Saint-Domingo, and assist France in re-establishing her dominion in that island; but she insisted upon having compensation at the cost of Spain and Holland. Thus she refused to restore to Spain the island of Trinidad, which she had seized, and which was a very important colony from its position at the entrance of the Caribbean sea. She desired besides, of the possessions wrested from the Dutch, to keep the Cape of Good Hope, which commands the navigation of two Oceans, and Trincomalee, the principal port in the island of Ceylon. Moreover, she proposed to exchange the town of Negapatnam on the coast of Coromandel for the town and fort of Cochin on the coast of Malabar, an invaluable acquisition for her. As to the renunciation of the title of King of France, the English negotiator resisted from considerations affecting the royal family, which was indisposed to peace, and whose pride it was necessary to soothe. With regard to the vessels carried off from Toulon, and which had been since equipped and armed after the English method, they deemed it ignominious to surrender them, and offered in lieu an indemnity of twelve millions. Lord Malmesbury assured M. Maret as a reason for making these demands, that he durst not return to London if he gave up all, and preserved for the British nation none of the conquests won at the expense of its blood and treasure. To prove more distinctly his sincerity, he showed all the secret instructions furnished to Mr. Ellis, and which bore convincing evidence of Pitt's desire to obtain peace. The conditions he proposed unquestionably deserved to be dispassionately canvassed.

A circumstance that occurred at this moment suddenly gave considerable advantage to the French negotiator. Besides the union of the Spanish, Dutch, and French fleets at Brest, which depended on the first gale which might blow Admiral Jervis from off Cadiz, England had now to apprehend another danger of a different kind. Portugal, menaced by France and Spain, had abandoned her ancient ally and concluded a treaty with France. The chief condition of this treaty prohibited her from permitting in her ports more than six armed vessels at a time belonging to the belligerent powers. England thus lost her advantageous station in the Tagus. This unexpected blow placed the English ambassadors more at the mercy of M. Maret. The definitive conditions were at length brought into form between them. Trinidad could not be recovered; and as to the Cape of Good Hope, which was the most important, it was eventually agreed to be restored to Holland, but on one express condition,—namely, that France should never avail herself of her ascendency over Holland to obtain the cession of it. This was what England most dreaded. She was less anxious to get it herself than to keep France from its possession; and the restitution was agreed to, on condition that France never should hold it. As to Trincomalee, which involved the dominion of Ceylon, it was to be retained by the English, although with an appearance of alternate lordship only. A Dutch garrison was to alternate with an English garrison, but it was understood this should be a mere formality, and that the port should remain for all effective purposes in the possession of England. With regard to the exchange of Cochin for Negapatnam, the English still adhered to the project, without making it however a condition sine quâ non. The twelve millions were accepted for the ships transported from Toulon. As to the title of King of France, it was arranged that without formally renouncing it, the British monarch should cease to assume it.

Such were the points to which the respective pretensions of the negotiators were modified. Letourneur, who had been left alone with M. Maret since the departure of Pléville le Peley, appointed to the ministry of marine, remained in complete ignorance of the secret negotiation. M. Maret made him amends for his actual insignificance by yielding to him all the external honours and routine of the mission, to which the good and simple man attached great importance. M. Maret communicated all the details of the negotiation immediately to the Directory and awaited its final orders. Never had France and England been so near the verge of an accommodation. It had been made evident that the conferences at Lille were wholly unconnected with those at Udine, and that England was acting on her own behalf without any design of concert with Austria.

The discussion upon these negotiations was calculated to embroil the members of the Directory more perhaps than any other subject. The royalist faction clamoured furiously for peace without desiring it; the Constitutionalists were sincere in demanding it, even at the cost of certain sacrifices; the republicans wished for it likewise, but without sacrifices, holding as the chief object of their regard the glory of the republic. These last would have willingly bought the total enfranchisement of Italy, and the restitution of all the colonies conquered from France and her allies, at the price of another campaign. The opinions of the five directors were influenced by their several positions. Carnot and Barthélemy argued that the conditions of Austria and England should be accepted, whilst the three other directors upheld a contrary decision. The dispute caused a complete rupture between the two parties in the Directory. Barras bitterly reproached Carnot with the preliminaries of Leoben, the ratification of which the latter had strongly urged, and used with regard to him some very unmeasured terms. Carnot, in reply, and with reference to this accusation, said, that it was not politic to oppress Austria: meaning, that to insure a durable peace the conditions thereof ought to be moderate. But his colleagues took great umbrage at the expression, and Rewbell taunted him with the query whether he deemed himself a minister of Austria, or a magistrate of the French republic. On receiving the last dispatches of Bonaparte, the three directors were prompted to declare the truce at an end and order the resumption of hostilities; but the state of the republic, the apprehension of affording fresh topics of arraignment to the enemies of the government, and of supplying them with a pretext for maintaining that the Directory never intended to conclude peace, induced them to temporize yet a little longer. They wrote to Bonaparte that the exigence of affairs demanded they should carry patience to the utmost pitch, and wait until the bad faith of Austria were proved in a manner still more palpable, when the recurrence of hostilities could be attributed to her alone.

The negotiation at Lille supplied a question not less embarrassing for solution. To France itself the course was sufficiently simple, since every thing was restored to it; but with regard to Spain, which was to be deprived of Trinidad, and to Holland, which was to lose Trincomalee, the matter was not so easy of adjustment. Carnot, whom his new position constrained to declare always in favour of peace, voted for the adoption of the conditions proposed, however unfavourable to the allies. As France had good reason to be dissatisfied with Holland and the parties which divided it, he recommended she should be abandoned to herself, and no further concern taken in her fate,—a counsel equally ungenerous with that to sacrifice her colonies. Rewbell took a warm part on the opposite side of the question. Vehement for the interests of France, even to the length of injustice, he maintained that, far from forsaking Holland, they should establish a perfect supremacy over her, and even reduce her to a province of the republic; and he especially opposed with all his might the ratification of the article whereby France renounced the future possession of the Cape of Good Hope. He argued, on the contrary, that this colony and several others ought to revert to France in reward for her services. Thus, as we see, he defended the cause of the allies for the sake of France, rather than for their own. Larévellière, whom a purer spirit of equity moved to advocate their interests, repudiated the proposed conditions for reasons wholly different. He viewed it as disgraceful to sacrifice Spain, who had been dragged into a war to which she was, so to speak, a stranger, and who was to be obliged, as the price of her alliance, to surrender an important colony. He considered it equally scandalous to abandon Holland, whom France had plunged into the vortex of a revolution, with whose fate she had charged herself, and whom she was asked at once to deprive of rich possessions and deliver up to a frightful anarchy. If France withdrew her protection, he urged, it was certain Holland must become the scene of discord and confusion, and for all the blood that might flow she would be responsible. There was much generosity in these considerations; but it is not equally clear they were well-weighed. The allies of France had suffered losses; the question to be pondered was, whether they would not suffer greater by the continuation of the war. The event has proved it to be so; but at that time the successes of France on the Continent inspired hopes that, once freed from Austria, she would obtain equally great on the seas. The abandonment of her allies appeared infamous; and ultimately a middle course was adopted. It was resolved to apply to Spain and Holland in order to ascertain their views. They were to be invited to declare whether they desired peace, at the price of the sacrifices demanded by England; and in case they preferred the continuation of the war, they were to be called upon, moreover, to state what forces they proposed to contribute for the defence of the common cause. The Directory wrote to Lille, at the same time, that a reply to the proposals of England could not be given until it had had an opportunity of consulting its allies.

These discussions inflamed the quarrel amongst the directors to the deadliest animosity. The moment of the crisis was drawing nigh, and the passions of the two parties grew daily more excited. Meanwhile, each of them pursued its determined course. The Finance-Committee in the Five-Hundred had remodelled its resolutions, to induce their adoption by the Ancients with some modifications. The regulations relative to the Treasury had been slightly changed. The Directory was still to have no part in the negotiation of securities, and without confirming or annulling the distinction between the ordinary and the extraordinary expenditures, it was provided that the charges arising from the pay of the armies should always have the preference. Future anticipations were prohibited, but those already made were not revoked. Finally, the new provisions touching the sale of the national property were preserved, but with an important modification: namely, that ministerial orders and contractors' notes might be taken in payment of domains, on the same footing as scrip of the three-quarters. These measures, thus modified, were adopted; they were less subversive of financial resources, but were still very dangerous. All the penal laws against priests were likewise repealed; the oath was converted into a simple declaration, on the part of the priests, of obedience to the laws of the republic. Nothing was as yet decided as to the ceremonies of religion, or the bells in churches. The succession to the estates of emigrants was taken from the state and vested in relatives. Families that had been obliged to compound with the republic for the portions of emigrant sons or kinsmen, were to receive an indemnity out of the patrimonial property. The sale of manses was suspended. Lastly, the most important of all the projects, the institution of the national guard, had been passed in a few days on the bases previously detailed. The composition of this guard was to be regulated by way of election. It was upon this measure that Pichegru and his adherents chiefly relied for the execution of their designs. Accordingly, they had added an article whereby the work of organization was to commence ten days after the publication of the law. They thus secured the speedy enrolment of the Parisian guard, and in its ranks of all the insurgents of Vendemiaire.

On its part, the Directory, convinced of the imminence of the peril, and always supposing a conspiracy prepared for immediate outbreak, had assumed a very threatening attitude. Augereau was not the only officer of name at Paris. The armies being in a state of inaction, several other generals had repaired to the capital. In the number were Cherin, the chief of Hoche's staff, and the generals Lemoine and Humbert, who commanded the divisions that had marched on Paris; Kléber and Lefebvre, who were on furlough; and, lastly, Bernadotte, whom Bonaparte had dispatched to present the remainder of the captured standards to the Directory. Besides these superior officers, others of all grades, unattached since the reduction of the reserves, and aspiring to be employed, abounded in all parts of Paris breathing direful anathemas against the Councils. Numbers of revolutionists likewise had flocked from the provinces, as was usual with them when they expected a commotion. These symptoms of an approaching catastrophe were strengthened by the conduct held with regard to the troops detached by Hoche. These were still kept in cantonments in the environs of Rheims. Men argued justly that if they had been solely destined for the expedition to Ireland, they would have continued their march on Brest, and not tarried in the vicinity of Paris; nor would Hoche have returned to his head-quarters; nor, in fine, would so many cavalry have been collected for a maritime service. A committee had been appointed, we remember, to make an inquiry, and report upon all these facts. To this committee the Directory had thought fit to give but very vague explanations. The troops had been put in motion, it said, towards a distant point by the order of General Hoche, who derived his authority from the Directory, and they had transgressed the constitutional radius only through the inadvertence of a commissary of war. But the Councils replied, at the instigation of Pichegru, that troops could not be transported from one army to another on the simple order of a general-in-chief; that the general must hold orders from a higher authority; that he could receive them from the Directory only through the medium of the minister at war; that the minister at war, Pétiet, had not countersigned any such orders; that, in consequence, General Hoche had acted without the proper formal warrant; and lastly, that if the troops had been appointed for a distant service they ought to prosecute their march, and not cluster around Paris. These observations were grounded in reason, and the Directory had good cause for not attempting to answer them. Thereafter, the Councils decreed, in pursuance of these conclusions, that a circle should be traced around Paris describing a circumference of twelve leagues, to be marked on all the roads by columns, and that any officers in command of troops who should overstep this radius were to be deemed guilty of high-treason

Additional circumstances concurred to increase the alarm. Besides the troops already quartered in the departments of the North, around Sedan and Rheims, and within a few leagues of Paris, Hoche had detached others in the same direction. This fresh movement of troops, the language held by the soldiers, the agitation reigning in Paris, the quarrels of the unattached officers with the young men wearing the costume of the gilded youth, all supplied Willot with fruitful topics for a second philippic. Mounting the tribune, he declaimed against the march of troops, the spirit manifested in their ranks, the rage instilled in them against the Councils, and, as applicable to this subject, against the addresses of the army of Italy, and the publicity given to them by the Directory. He moved, in consequence, that the inspectors of the hall be charged to take fresh informations, and present a further report. The deputies, called inspectors of the hall, were intrusted with the police of the Councils, and consequently with the duty of watching over their safety. The motion of Willot was adopted, and, at the instance of the commission of inspectors, on the 17th Thermidor (4th August), several embarrassing questions were addressed to the Directory. These reverted to the nature of the orders under which General Hoche had acted. It was asked whether the purport of these orders could be at length satisfactorily explained, and, moreover, whether measures had been taken to enforce the constitutional article which prohibited the troops from deliberating.

The Directory determined to answer the questions proposed to it by an energetic message, without affording the explanations it found inconvenient to give. Larévellière drew up this message which Carnot and Barthélemy refused to sign. It was presented on the 23d Thermidor (10th August). It contained nothing new as to the movements of the troops. The commanders of divisions who had marched on Paris, it stated, had received orders from General Hoche, and General Hoche orders from the Directory. The medium through which they had been transmitted was not specified. With regard to the addresses, the Directory set forth:—that the meaning of the word deliberate was too vague to determine whether the armies had committed a fault in presenting them; that it acknowledged the danger of permitting armies to express an opinion, and that it would prevent further publications of the same nature; but that, at the same time, before condemning the step the soldiers of the republic had ventured upon, it was necessary to recur to the causes which had provoked it; that these causes lay in the general anxiety which, during the last few months, had been aroused in the public mind; in the insufficiency of the national revenues, which placed all branches of the administration in a most deplorable situation, and often deprived of their pay, men who for years had shed their blood and wasted their strength in the service of the republic; in the persecutions and murders inflicted on the purchasers of national property, on public functionaries, and on the defenders of the country; in the impunity of crime and the partiality of certain tribunals; in the insolence of emigrants and refractory priests, who, openly recalled and favoured, abounded in all quarters, fanned the flame of discord, and taught contempt for the laws; in the multitude of journals that inundated the armies and the interior, preaching up royalty and the overthrow of the republic; in the interest, always ill-dissembled, and often directly avowed, felt for the glory of Austria and England; in the attempts made to depreciate the just renown of French warriors; in the calumnies propagated against two illustrious generals, who had, the one in the West, the other in Italy, enhanced the fame of their exploits by political conduct of the highest order; finally, in the sinister projects professed by men more or less influential on the destinies of the state. The Directory added that, notwithstanding, it entertained a firm resolution and well-grounded hope of saving France from the new convulsions with which it was menaced.—Thus, far from explaining its conduct or palliating it, the Directory, on the contrary, recriminated, and openly manifested the design of prosecuting the contest and the belief of emerging victoriously from it.—Its communication was taken for a veritable manifesto, and caused a great sensation. The Five-Hundred instantly nominated a committee to consider the message and reply to it.

The Constitutionalists began to be seriously alarmed at the situation of affairs. On one side, they saw the Directory prepared to support itself by the aid of the armies; on the other, the Clichyans intent on enrolling the insurgents of Vendémiaire, under pretence of organizing the national guard. Such as were sincere republicans might prefer the success of the Directory in the coming strife, but they were all averse to a conflict, and now had leisure to repent the evil consequences of their opposition, which had thus resulted in frightening the Directory and encouraging the royalists. They did not avow their error, but lamented grievously the desolate aspect of things, imputing it as usual to their opponents. Those of the Clichyans who were not in the secret of the counter-revolution, who were in fact not friendly to one, but were actuated solely by a blind detestation of the revolutionary excesses, also took the alarm, and seemed to fear that by their contradiction they had awakened all the revolutionary tendencies of the Directory. Their ardour henceforth grew sensibly cooler. But the Clichyans, out-and-out royalists, were urgent for action, and dreaded above all things to be forestalled. These beset Pichegru and warmly pressed him to take the offensive. He, with his accustomed phlegm, hinted at the great results in store, but thought fit as yet to temporize. In truth he had no actual means in his possession; for a few emigrants and Chouans in Paris constituted a force altogether insufficient; and until he had the national guard at his command he could not make any serious attempt. Cool and sagacious, he formed a due estimate of his position, and replied to all instances that it was necessary to wait. He was told that the Directory meditated an immediate blow; he answered that the Directory durst not venture it. For the rest, disbelieving the courage of the Directory, finding his own appliances inadequate, enjoying the consideration of an important personage, and disbursing large sums of money, it was natural he should be in no hurry to hazard the aggressive.

In this posture of affairs, enlightened minds panted earnestly for some means of averting a struggle. A reconciliation appeared the most advisable, which might have the effect of uniting the Constitutionalists and moderate Clichyans with the Directory, restoring to it the majority it had lost, and enabling it to dispense with any violent measures for insuring safety. Madame de Stäel was in a position to desire and attempt such a coalition. She was the centre of that intellectual and brilliant society, which, albeit deeming the government and its heads somewhat vulgar, still loved the republic and clung steadfastly to it. Madame de Stäel admired that form of government, as supplying the best incitement to human energy; and having already placed one of her friends in an elevated post, she hoped to exalt others in their turn, and be to them another Egeria. She discerned the dangers to which this order of things that had become dear to her was exposed; receiving at her house men of all parties, she heard their various sentiments, and learnt to apprehend the imminence of some fatal collision. Of generous impulses and active mind, unable to remain blind to the course of events, it was natural she should attempt to use her influence to unite men whom no insurmountable differences separated. She assembled republicans, Constitutionalists, and Clichyans, in her saloons, and sought to soften the asperity of discussions by interposing, with the tact of an amiable and gifted woman, to soothe the irritability and captious sensitiveness of rival partisans. But she was not more successful than is common with endeavours to effect reconciliations between parties, and the men most widely opposed began to absent themselves from her house. She sought especially to gain the members of the two committees appointed to answer the last message of the Directory. Some of them were Constitutionalists, such as Thibaudeau, Emery, Siméon, Tronçon-Ducoudray, and Portalis; through them the framing of the two reports might be influenced, which was of the greatest moment, since those documents would be in fact the reply of the Councils to the manifesto of the Directory. Madame de Stäel gave herself no relaxation in the task she had assumed, but laboured diligently both by herself and her friends. The Constitutionalists desired a coalition, for they were sensible of the danger that impended; but this coalition required sacrifices on their part it was difficult to wring from them. If the Directory had ever been really in the wrong or had pursued culpable measures, they might have stipulated the revocation of certain proceedings, and negotiated a treaty founded on the basis of reciprocal sacrifices; but, setting aside the private ill-conduct of Barras, the majority of the Directory had exhibited all the zeal and attachment to the constitution it was possible to exact. No arbitrary act or usurpation of power could be laid to its charge. The administration of the finances, so much decried, was the forced result of circumstances. The change of ministers, the movement of troops, the addresses of the armies, and the nomination of Augereau, were the only facts that could be alleged indicating formidable intentions. But these were precautions imposed upon it by the danger itself, and this danger must be entirely removed, by restoring the majority to the Directory, before it could be justly called upon to abandon such precautions. The Constitutionalists, on the contrary, had supported the newly-elected deputies in all their attacks, however unjust or imprudent, and therefore had alone to retract. Hence, nothing could be demanded from the Directory and much from the Constitutionalists, which rendered the exchange of sacrifices impossible, and the egotism of party-spirit intractable to conciliation.

It was in vain Madame de Stäel and her friends represented that the intention of the Directory was fixed to venture all upon the hazard, and that they, the Constitutionalists, would become the victims of their own obstinacy, and involve the republic in their ruin. They repudiated the notion of any recantation and refused every sort of concession, suggesting sullenly that the Directory ought to make the first advances. Rewbell and Larévellière were thereupon applied to. The latter, frankly entertaining the project of a discussion, entered upon the subject at large, enumerated in detail the various acts of the Directory, and asked, as to each of them, which was blameable. His interlocutors found themselves without an answer. With reference to the dismissal of Augereau, or the revocation of any of the measures adopted under the existing emergency, the directors were immoveable in their refusal, and demonstrated by their calm firmness the inflexibility of the determination they had taken.

Madame de Stäel, and they who seconded her in her laudable but hopeless enterprise, then directed their principal efforts towards the members of the two committees, striving to deter them from proposing legislative measures of too violent a nature, and especially, in replying to the grievances assigned in the message of the Directory, from launching into dangerous and irritating recriminations. All these endeavours were fruitless, for there are but few examples of parties listening to counsels emanating from neutral sources. In both committees there were Clichyans who advocated the most hostile measures. In the first place, they proposed to invest the criminal jury of Paris specially with cognisance of acts affecting the security of the legislative body, and to ordain the retirement of all troops beyond the limit of the constitutional circle; and, secondly, they demanded that this constitutional circle should form no part of any military division. This last proposition had for its object to deprive Augereau of the command of Paris, and thus effect by a decree what they could not accomplish by remonstrance or negotiation. Resolutions founded on these suggestions were adopted by the two committees. But Thibaudeau and Tronçon-Ducoudray, who were charged to frame the respective reports, the one to the Five-Hundred, the other to the Ancients, refused, with equal prudence and firmness, to embody the last proposition. It was accordingly abandoned, and the two first alone retained. Tronçon-Ducoudray presented his report on the 3d, and Thibaudeau on the 4th Fructidor (20th and 21st August). In these documents they replied indirectly to the reproaches of the Directory. Tronçon-Ducoudray, indeed, addressing the Ancients, exhorted them to interpose their wisdom and dignity between the vivacity of the young legislators in the Five-Hundred, and the susceptibility of the heads of the executive power. Thibaudeau, on his part, undertook to justify the Councils, and to prove that they had never intended either to attack the government or calumniate the armies. He referred particularly to the motion of Dumolard regarding Venice, and maintained that no design had existed to criminate the heroes of Italy; but, he urged, the establishments of their creation could be durable only by having the sanction of the two Councils. In the end the trivial measures recommended were passed by both Councils, and these two reports, so anxiously expected, produced scarcely any effect. They sufficiently indicated the impotency to which the Constitutionalists had reduced themselves, by their ambiguous position between the royalist faction and the Directory, unwilling to conspire with the one or to make concessions to the other.

The Clichyans bitterly complained of the insignificant character of these reports, and gratified their rancour by declaiming against the weakness of the Constitutionalists. The more ardent longed for battle, and especially for the means of waging it, and demanded to know what the Directory was doing towards the organization of the national guard. This was precisely what the Directory declined to promote, having resolved to abstain from any participation therein.

Carnot was in a position still more singular than the constitutional party. He had promptly broken with the Clichyans on finding the course they were bent on pursuing, he was of no use to the Constitutionalists, and had taken no part in their endeavours to effect a coalition, for he was of too irritable a temperament to seek a reconciliation with his colleagues. He stood alone, without support, in a vacuum, as it were, having no longer an object or purpose, since the egotistical views he had once indulged were totally dissipated, and the majority he had hoped to command was impossible of attainment. Still, through a perverse obstinacy in supporting the designs of the opposition in the Directory, he introduced a formal motion for the organization of the national guard. His presidency of the Directory was about to close, and he availed himself of the time still remaining to bring that subject under discussion. Larévellière rose upon this occasion with tranquil firmness, and having never had any personal quarrel with Carnot, appealed to him, for the last time, to reclaim him, if it were possible, to the cause of his colleagues. Addressing him with confidence and mildness, he propounded to him certain questions.—"Have you ever heard us," he asked, "make a proposition tending to lower the jurisdiction of the Councils, to exalt our own, or to infringe the constitution of the republic?" "No," replied Carnot, with hesitation. "Have you ever heard us," resumed Larévellière, "propose a measure, whether in matters of finance, of war, or of diplomacy, which was not conformable to the public interest? With regard to what is personal to yourself, have you ever heard us either depreciate your merit or deny your services? Since you have separated from us, can you accuse us of failing in respect for your person? Has your opinion been less heeded, when it has appeared to us advantageous, and offered in sincerity? As for myself," added Larévellière, "although you have joined a faction which has persecuted both me and my family, have I ever shown you the least animosity?"—"No, no," Carnot answered to all these questions. "Well, then!" retorted Larévellière, "how come you to detach yourself from us to join a faction which perverts you, which seeks to make use of you only to destroy the republic, which will ruin you too after using you as its tool, and which will disgrace as well as ruin you?" Larévellière employed other urgent but friendly expressions, to convince Carnot of the error and danger of his conduct. Rewbell and Barras even did violence to their hatred. Rewbell, from a sense of duty, Barras, from mere facility of disposition, spoke to him almost as friends. But amicable demonstrations often have the effect of irritating certain proud minds: Carnot remained cold and distant, and, after the interpellations of his colleagues, he drily repeated his motion to discuss the organization of the national guard. The three directors thereupon broke up the diet, and retired with the conviction, too natural upon such occasions, that their colleague was betraying them, and acting in concert with the enemies of the government.

It was thence determined that the blow should be struck against him and Barthélemy, as well as against the principal members of the Councils. The plan definitively arranged, was according to the following programme. The three directors still believed that the Clichyan deputies were implicated in a secret conspiracy. They had obtained against them, or against Pichegru, no additional evidence which might admit recourse to a judicial process. It was necessary, therefore, to adopt the medium of a coup-d'etat. They had in the two Councils a resolute minority, which would be joined by all the waverers, whom a partial vigour exasperates and alienates, but whom a decisive energy overawes and reclaims. They resolved, accordingly, to shut up the halls in which the Five-Hundred and the Ancients assembled, to fix elsewhere the place of session, to summon thither all the deputies upon whom they could rely, to present a list comprising the names of the two directors and of one hundred and eighty deputies struck from the most suspected, and to propose their banishment without any judicial investigation, but by extraordinary legislative power. They desired not the death of any individual, but the forced removal of all dangerous characters. Many have thought that this coup-d'etat had become useless, because the Councils, intimidated by the evident determination of the Directory, betokened a disposition to relent. But this impression is groundless. All who are acquainted with the spirit of parties, and their sanguine impulses, must be aware that the Clichyans, upon seeing the Directory refrain from active aggression, would speedily have resumed their courage. If they had restrained themselves even until a new election, they would have redoubled their ardour with the accession of the third-third, and then become irresistible in their wrath. Nor would then the Directory have had the conventional minority in the Councils to support it, or to lend an appearance of legality to any extraordinary measures it might be driven to attempt. Moreover, without even taking into consideration the inevitable result of a new election, the Directory, if it remained inert, would be compelled to put the laws, passed by its adversaries, in execution, and to reorganize the national guard, that is to say, to give the counter-revolutionists the army of Vendémiaire, which must have led to a terrible conflict between the national guards and the troops of the line. In fact, so long as Pichegru and his accomplices had no other offensive means than motions in the Five-Hundred and an indefinite body of emigrants or Chouans in Paris, their schemes were not very formidable; but, supported by the national guard, they might take the field and commence a civil war of uncertain duration and result.

In accordance with these views, Rewbell and Larévellière determined that it was necessary to act without delay, and to put an end to all further uncertainty. Barras alone still appeared to hesitate, and caused his colleagues great uneasiness. They were in constant dread lest he might coalesce after all with the royalist faction or unite with the Jacobins to perpetrate a massacre. They watched him, however, with attention, and strove diligently to secure Augereau, by flattering his vanity, and endeavouring to render him sensible to the esteem of honest men. Still the preparations were not complete; the grenadiers of the legislative body were yet to be gained, the movements of the troops to be regulated, and, most important of all, money to be procured. A postponement, therefore, for a few days was indispensable. The directors were averse to request funds of the minister Ramel, from a wish not to compromise him; and they accordingly waited for those Bonaparte had offered, and which never came.

Bonaparte, as we have related, had dispatched his aide-de-camp Lavalette to Paris, in order that he might be supplied with accurate information touching all current affairs. An insight into the state of matters at Paris had tended to disgust M. de Lavalette, and he had communicated his impressions to Bonaparte. So much of individual feeling is mingled with political antagonism, that too near a view of parties is apt to prove repulsive to an ingenuous mind. Nay, if an observer regard merely the personal element in political discords, he will be tempted to believe there is nothing generous, sincere, or patriotic, in the motives of public men. Such was the effect that the contentions of the three directors, Barras, Larévellière, and Rewbell, with Carnot and Barthélemy, of the Conventionalists with the Clichyans, might fairly produce: a deplorable conflict in which egotism and self-interest might well seem, at the first aspect, to be the chief actuating principles. The military sojourning in Paris, likewise, tended by their pretensions to aggravate the tumult of those already in collision. Although incensed against the faction of Clichy, they were not prepared to declare unreservedly for the Directory. Men are prone to become petulant and exacting when they imagine themselves necessary. Thus, collecting around the minister Schérer, these military affected to consider themselves ill-used, as if the government had not done sufficient for them. Kleber, one of the noblest but the most intractable of characters, and who has been well described in the phrase that he would be neither the first nor the second, had stated to the Directory in his own original language: "I will draw against your enemies if they attack you; but in showing my front to them I will turn my back on you." Lefebvre, Bernadotte, and the others, expressed themselves in similar terms. Struck with this chaos, M. de Lavalette wrote to Bonaparte in a strain calculated to induce him to remain neutral. He, accordingly.

The Right Hon.ble William Pitt

Engraved by S. Freeman

From an Original Painting by Gainsborough.

A Fullarton & C.° [illegible]

satisfied with having given the impulse, refused to implicate himself further, and resolved to await the issue. He, therefore, wrote no more. The Directory then applied in its need to the trusty Hoche, who, having alone any reason to be discontented, sent fifty thousand francs, a sum which constituted the greater portion of his wife's dowry.

It was already the tenth day in the month Fructidor, and Larévellière had replaced Carnot the presidency of the Directory. In this capacity it was his function to receive the envoy of the Cisalpine republic, Visconti, and General Bernadotte, bearer of standards taken but not previously transmitted by the army of Italy. On this occasion he resolved to speak out in the most undisguised manner, and thereby drive Barras to a decision. He delivered, accordingly, two forcible harangues, in which he replied, without mentioning them, to the reports of Thibaudeau and Tronçon-Ducoudray. In allusion to Venice and the other Italian states recently emancipated, Thibaudeau had stated in substance that their fate would not be fixed so long as the legislative body of France was not consulted. Larévellière glanced at this expression in his address to Visconti, saying that the Italian people had determined to have liberty, possessed the right to secure it for themselves, and had no need of any earthly consent therefor. "This liberty," he added with energy, "of which it is sought to deprive you, both you and us, we will defend it together, and shall know how to preserve it." The menacing tone of these two orations dissipated the last shadow of doubt as to the intentions of the Directory; men who spoke in that style must have their resolution taken and their forces all prepared. The Clichyans were driven wild with sudden apprehensions. In the first paroxysms of fury they revived their project of impeaching the Directory. The Constitutionalists, however, repudiated the proposal, because they felt it would afford the Directory a feasible ground for violence, and they threatened, if it were persisted in, to produce proofs of treason against certain Deputies and move their impeachment. This menace deterred the Clichyans, and prevented the exhibition of articles of impeachment against the directors.

For some time past the Clichyans had been desirous of adding to the committee of inspectors Pichegru and Willot, who were regarded as the two generals of the party. But this addition of two new members, increasing the number to seven, was contrary to regulation. They waited, therefore, for the reappointment of the committee, which took place at the beginning of each month, and nominated thereon Pichegru, Vaublanc, Delarue, Thibaudeau, and Emery. This committee of inspectors was charged with the police of the hall; it issued orders to the grenadiers of the legislative body, and formed in some sort the executive power of the Councils. The Ancients had a similar committee, which fraternized with that of the Five-Hundred, and both in conjunction watched over the common safety. Numerous deputies resorted to the place of their meeting who had no business there, and thus constituted a new Clichy club, in which propositions equally violent and fruitless were submitted and debated. One of their first projects was to organize a police, to be employed in obtaining information touching the designs of the Directory. The superintendence of this police was intrusted to one Dossonville. As no fund for its payment existed, each contributed his quota; but a very moderate sum was raised. Furnished as he was, Pichegru might have proffered a large donation; but it does not appear that he applied any of the funds received from Wickham to this purpose.

The use of these police-spies seems to have been principally the collection of idle tales and rumours, with which they afterwards came to terrify the committees. Every day they repeated, "To-day, this very night, the Directory intends to arrest two hundred deputies, and have them massacred by the faubourgs." Such reports naturally excited alarm, and this alarm inspired suggestions of the most indiscreet character. The Directory, on the other hand, received through its spies exaggerated accounts of the proceedings in the committees, and imbibed in its turn fears of the gravest nature. Then expressions dropped in the saloons of the Directory, to the effect that it was time to strike if it were intended to avoid being anticipated, and revengeful threats were uttered, which, quickly conveyed to their ears, revisited upon the Clychians terror for terror.

Cut off from connection with either of the two parties, the Constitutionalists became every day more sensible of their faults and danger, and were overwhelmed with the direst consternation. Carnot, still more isolated than they, at enmity with the Clichyans, odious to the patriots, suspected even by the moderate republicans, calumniated and disowned, received the most rueful warnings. Constant rumours reached him of his doom to death by the orders of his colleagues. Barthélemy, who stood in the like predicament, was in the utmost trepidation and gave himself up for lost.

At the same time, similar warnings were given on all sides. Larévellière had been informed, in a manner to leave no doubt of the fact, that certain Chouans had been hired to assassinate him. Finding him the firmest of the three members of the majority, a resolution had been taken, he was told, to remove him as the means of annihilating it. His death assuredly would have changed the whole state of affairs, for the new director nominated by the Councils, would, without question, have voted with Carnot and Barthélemy. The advantages to be reaped from the crime, and the circumstantial details furnished to Larévellière, were calculated to make him keep on his guard. But he quailed not, and continued his evening promenades in the Jardin des Plantes. One man was found to offer him an atrocious insult. This proved to be Malo, colonel of the 21st dragoons, who had slaughtered the Jacobins in the camp at Grenelle, and had afterwards denounced Brottier and his accomplices. He was a creature of Carnot and Cochon, and had, without designing it, inspired the Clichyans with hopes which rendered him suspected. Being cashiered by the Directory, he attributed his dismissal to Larévellière, and attended at the Luxumbourg to threaten him. The intrepid magistrate was undismayed by the bravadoes of this cavalry officer, and thrust him from his presence by the shoulders.

Rewbell, though sincerely attached to the common cause, was distinguished rather for warmth of temper than firmness. He was informed one day that Barras was treating with an envoy of the pretender, and negotiating to betray the republic. Barras' connections with all parties might undoubtedly warrant apprehensions of any kind.—"We are lost," cried Rewbell, "Barras is betraying us, we are doomed to be killed; it only remains for us to fly, for we can no longer hope to save the republic."—Larévellière, more calm, replied to Rewbell that, so far from taking to flight, it behoved them to see Barras, speak to him with energy, force him to an explanation, intimidate him to compliance. They both forthwith repaired to Barras, interrogated him with sternness, and demanded why he still procrastinated. Barras, who was really occupied in making arrangements with Augereau, begged for a delay of three or four days, and promised that no further interval should elapse. Rewbell felt reassured and consented to wait. This occurred on the 13th or 14th Fructidor.

Barras and Augereau, in fact, had prepared all for the execution of the blow so long meditated. Hoche's troops were disposed around the constitutional limit, ready to pass it and be at Paris within a few hours. A great part of the grenadiers of the legislative body had been gained through the instrumentality of Blanchard the second in command, and of several other officers, who were devoted to the Directory. A sufficient number of defections in the ranks of the grenadiers had been thus secured to prevent a battle. The commander-in-chief, Ramel, remained faithful to the Councils, on account of his obligations towards Carnot and Cochon; but his influence was not much to be dreaded. As a measure of precaution, the troops in garrison, and even the grenadiers of the legislative guard, were daily drilled in musket practice. This martial commotion and roar of guns were intended to deceive as to the actual day of execution.

Every day was expected to witness the consummation of the crisis. It was believed to be appointed for the 15th Fructidor, then for the 16th; but the 16th answered to the 2d September, and the Directory would not have selected a day of such terrible reminiscences. Meanwhile, the Clichyans were in an agony of dread. The police of the inspectors, misled by false appearances, had persuaded them that the event was fixed for the night of the 15th-16th. They assembled tumultuously towards evening in the room of the two committees. Rovère, that furious reactionist, now one of the committee of the Ancients, read a report from the police, according to which two hundred deputies were to be arrested during the night. Others, panting for breath, rushed in to announce that the barriers were shut, that four columns of troops were entering Paris, and that the executive committee was assembled at the Directory. They stated, moreover, that the hotel of the minister of police was all lighted up. A fearful uproar ensued. The members of the two committees, who ought to have been but ten, and were in reality fifty, complained that it was impossible for them to deliberate. At length messengers were dispatched, both to the barriers and the hotel of the police, to ascertain the truth of the reports, when it was found that perfect tranquillity prevailed in every quarter. A communication was then made that the police agents could not be paid on the following day, for lack of funds; every one emptied his pockets to eke out the requisite sum. The meeting thereafter separated. Several Clichyans surrounded Pichegru beseeching him to act; they proposed in the first place, to declare the Councils permanent, and then to collect the emigrants and Chouans that were in Paris, reinforce them with young men, march on the Directory, and capture the three directors. Pichegru pronounced these schemes ridiculous and impracticable, and again repeated that nothing could be done. The more hotbrained of the party vowed, nevertheless, to usher in the morrow by a motion to proclaim the sittings permanent.

The Directory was apprized, by its police, of the confusion amongst the Clichyans, and their desperate projects. Barras, who had all the means of execution at command, determined to put them in force during the ensuing night. Everything was arranged to enable the troops to clear the constitutional limit in a few hours. The garrison of Paris would suffice in the interim. A grand parade exercise was commanded for the next day, in order to be prepared with a pretext. No one was informed of the time selected, neither the ministers nor the directors Rewbell and Larévellière, so that every body was kept in ignorance of the event being on the eve of occurrence. The day of the 17th (3d September) passed in comparative tranquillity; no motion was made in the Councils. Many of the deputies absented themselves in the fond hope of eluding the catastrophe they had so imprudently provoked.

The meeting of the Directory took place as usual. All the five directors were present. At four o'clock in the afternoon, when the sitting was over, Barras took Rewbell and Larévellière aside, and intimated to them that it had become necessary to strike the blow that very night, to anticipate the enemy. He had demanded a delay of four days, but he forestalled that period to avoid a surprise. The three directors thereupon repaired to Rewbell's apartments, where they established themselves. It was agreed to summon all the ministers to Rewbell's, to remain there until the event was accomplished, and to permit no one to leave. Communications with the outside were to be made only through Augereau and his aides-de-camp. This plan settled, the ministers were convoked for the evening. Assembled altogether with the three directors, they set themselves to frame the necessary orders and proclamations. The design was to surround the palace of the legislative body, force the grenadiers from the posts they occupied, disperse the committees of inspectors, close the halls of the two councils, appoint another place of meeting, summon thither the deputies that could be relied upon, and make them pass a law against all the obnoxious parties. They reckoned with confidence that no deputies who were enemies of the Directory would venture to appear at the new place of meeting. Accordingly they proceeded to draw up proclamations announcing that a grand plot had been formed against the republic, whereof the principal authors were members of the two committees of inspectors, whence indeed it had been arranged the conspirators were to start, and that, to prevent their criminal purpose, the Directory had caused the halls of the legislative body to be shut, and fixed other places for the meeting of deputies faithful to the republic. The Five-Hundred were invited to assemble in the Odeon theatre, and the Ancients in the amphitheatre of the School of Medicine. A recital of the conspiracy, founded on the declaration of Duverne de Presle, and on the document discovered in the portfolio of d'Entraigues, was appended to these proclamations. The whole was immediately printed and ordered to be posted during the night on the walls of Paris. The ministers and three directors remained with closed doors at Rewbell's, whilst Augereau departed with his aides-de-camp to put the plan in execution.

Carnot and Barthélemy, having retired into the privacy of their own apartments at the Luxembourg, were ignorant of what was in preparation. The Clichyans in great excitement crowded the chamber of the committees. But Barthélemy, himself effectually deceived, had intimated as from authority that nothing would be attempted that night. Pichegru, too, had just quitted Schérer, and he gave his assurance that no preparations were as yet made. Some movements of troops had been remarked, but they were, it was stated, on account of the exercises to be held the next day, and they accordingly suggested no uneasiness. Thus every one feeling satisfied retired to his own abode. Rovère alone remained in the chamber of the inspectors, and sought repose in a bed designed for the member of the committees on guard.

Shortly after midnight, Augereau had disposed the troops of the garrison around the palace and brought up a numerous artillery. A perfect calm pervaded Paris, no sound being heard but the tramp of soldiers and the rolling of guns. The first great object was to gain the posts occupied by the grenadiers of the legislative-body without a conflict. About one in the morning an order was conveyed to their commander, Ramel, to attend the minister at war. He refused, at once divining what was intended, hastened to arouse the inspector Rovère, who could not even then believe in the danger, and afterwards proceeded to the barracks of his grenadiers for the purpose of calling out the reserve and placing it under arms. Scarcely four hundred men held the different posts of the Tuileries; the reserve comprised eight hundred. These were speedily marshalled in arms and drawn up in battle-array across the garden of the Tuileries. The utmost order and deepest silence reigned throughout their ranks.

Nearly ten thousand men, all troops of the line, now surrounded the palace and prepared to storm it. The firing of a cannon charged with powder about three o'clock in the morning served as the signal. The commanders of columns presented themselves at the different posts. An officer advanced on the part of Augereau to order Ramel to evacuate the post of the Turning-Bridge, which formed the communication between the garden and the Place Louis Quinze; but Ramel declined. Fifteen hundred men, however, having appeared at the post, the grenadiers, the greater part of whom were gained, surrendered it. The same thing occurred at the other posts. All the approaches to the garden and the Carrousel were given up, and on all sides the palace was encompassed by large bodies of infantry and cavalry. Twelve pieces of cannon ready yoked were pointed on the building. The only obstacle that remained was the reserve of grenadiers, eight hundred men strong, ranged in form for action, and having the commander Ramel at its head. A portion of the grenadiers was disposed to do their duty; the remainder, seduced by the emissaries of Barras, were inclined on the contrary to unite with the troops of the Directory. Murmurs began to be heard in the ranks.—"We are not Swiss," cried several voices.—"I was wounded on the 13th Vendémiaire by the royalists," exclaimed an officer, "and I have no inclination to fight for them on the 18th Fructidor."—The defection soon spread through the companies. Blanchard, the second in command, promoted it by his words and presence. Ramel, however, was still determined to perform his duty, when he received an order, sent from the chamber of the inspectors, forbidding him to fire. At the same moment Augereau came up at the head of a numerous staff. "Commander Ramel," he said, "do you acknowledge me as chief of the 17th military division?"—"Yes," replied Ramel. "Then, as your superior, I order you to submit to arrest."—Ramel obeyed; but he was subjected to ill-treatment by some furious Jacobins on the staff of Augereau. The latter disengaged him from their brutality and ordered him to be conducted to the Temple. The report of the cannon and the investment of the palace had by this time startled every one from slumber. It was now five in the morning. The members of the committees had hurried to their post, and were assembled in their chamber. They were surrounded, and could no longer doubt the danger that threatened them. A company of soldiers stationed at their door had instructions to admit all who presented themselves with the medal of a deputy, but to allow none to come out. They saw their colleague Dumas approaching, hastening to his post; they threw him a note from the window to apprize him of the peril and warn him to save himself. Augereau took their swords from Pichegru and Willot, and sent them both to the Temple, besides several other deputies apprehended in the chamber of the inspectors.

Whilst this operation was in progress against the Councils, the Directory had instructed an officer to place himself at the head of a detachment and proceed to arrest Carnot and Barthélemy. Carnot, cautioned in time, had fled from his apartments and succeeded in escaping through a wicket in the garden of the Luxembourg of which he possessed the key. But Barthélemy was found at home and captured. His arrest was rather embarrassing to the Directory. With the exception of Barras, the directors were gratified at Carnot's [illegible], and they [illegible] Barthélemy had imit[illegible] his example. [illegible] proposed to connive at his escape. [illegible] agreed, on condition he was permitted to [illegible] openly and under his own name to Hamburgh. [illegible] directors however could not sanction such a step. Intending to transport several members of the legislative-body, they could not show so much partiality towards one of their own colleagues. Barthélemy was therefore conveyed to the Temple, where he arrived at the same moment with Pichegru, Willot, and the other deputies taken in the chamber of the inspectors.

The morning meanwhile was advancing; it was eight o'clock. Many of the deputies, now aware of all that had occurred, courageously resolved to confront the danger. Siméon, president of the Five-Hundred, and Lafond-Ladebat, president of the Ancients, proceeded to their respective halls, which were not yet closed, and took their seats accompanied by several deputies. But officers soon appeared and ordered them to withdraw. They had merely time to declare that the national representation was dissolved. The members retired to the house of one of their number, where the more intrepid urged a fresh attempt. They determined, in fact, to collect a second time, traverse Paris on foot, and present themselves, with the presidents at their head, at the doors of the Legislative Palace. Eleven o'clock was striking. All Paris was astir, acquainted with the events of the night, but the tranquillity of that immense city was not disturbed. It had not been a rising stimulated by passions; simply a methodical stretch of authority against a body of representatives. A multitude of people encumbered the streets and public places without uttering a shout; save some groups from the faubourgs, composed of Jacobins, who paraded the streets vociferating: Long live the republic! Down with aristocrats! They provoked no response or opposition from the mass of the inhabitants. Principally around the Luxembourg these groups assembled. There they cried: The Directory for ever! and a few voices: Barras for ever!

The procession of deputies moved in silence through the crowd gathered on the Carrousel, and paused at the gates of the Tuileries. Access was denied them. They persisted in demanding it. Thereupon a detachment drove them rudely away, and pursued them until they dispersed. A sad and deplorable spectacle, which foreboded the too near and inevitable domination of prætorian guards! Alas! why had a perfidious faction obliged the revolution to invoke the aid of bayonets! The deputies thus pursued retreated, some to the residence of the president Lafond-Ladebat, others to a house in the vicinity. There they deliberated in tumult, and were occupied in framing a protest, when an officer appeared bearing orders for them to separate. A certain number of them was arrested; namely, Lafond-Ladebat, Barbé-Marbois, Tronçon-Ducoudray, Bourdon de l'Oise, Goupil de Préfeln, and some others. These were conducted to the Temple, whither the members of the two committees had already preceded them.

During this period the directorial deputies had repaired to the new localities assigned for the meeting of the legislative-body. The Five-Hundred assembled at the Odéon, and the Ancients at the School of Medicine. Noon was approaching, and they were as yet few in number; but every instant added to the muster, both from intelligence of this extraordinary convocation being diffused more widely, and from all the waverers, fearing to be pronounced dissidents, hastening to show themselves in the novel legislature. From time to time the members present were counted; and when at length the Ancients numbered one hundred and twenty-six, and the Five-Hundred two hundred and fifty-one, more by one than the half of the two Councils, they began to deliberate. There was, at first, some embarrassment in both assemblies, for the act they were called to legalize was only too manifestly a coup-d'etat. Their primary step was to declare themselves permanent, and to apprize each other they were constituted. Poulain-Grandpré, member of the Five Hundred, was the first to speak. "The measures which have been taken," he said, "the locality we occupy, all announce that the country has incurred great dangers, and is yet exposed to them. Let us return thanks to the Directory; it is to it we owe the salvation of the country. But it is not enough that the Directory is on the watch; it is likewise our duty to take measures for securing the public safety and the constitution of the year III. With this view, I move the appointment of a committee of five members."

This proposition was adopted, and a committee nominated, composed of deputies devoted to the system of the Directory. They were Sieyes, Poulain-Grandpré, Villers, Chazal, and Boulay de la Meurthe. A message from the Directory to the two Councils was announced about six o'clock in the evening. This message contained a recital of the conspiracy, such as it was known to the Directory, copies of the two famous documents of which we have already often spoken, and fragments of letters found amongst the papers of the royalist agents. These pieces comprised all the evidence that had been acquired; they proved simply that Pichegru was in negotiation with the pretender, that Imbert-Colomés corresponded with Blankenburg, that Mersan and Lemerer were the heads of the conspiracy as regarded the Clichyans, and that a vast association of royalists extended over the whole of France. There were no other names mentioned than those already quoted. These documents produced, nevertheless, a great effect. In carrying a moral conviction, they demonstrated at the same time the impossibility of resorting to a judicial process, from the want of direct and positive testimony. The committee of five soon presented a report founded on the message. The Directory not having the initiative of measures, it was for the committee to exercise it; but this committee was in concert with the Directory, and prepared to propose the decrees it had premeditated. Boulay de la Meurthe, appointed to speak in the name of the committee, expounded the reasons upon which extraordinary measures are usually justified, reasons which, in this instance, were unfortunately too well founded. After stating that they were placed, as it were, on a field of battle, that it was necessary to take prompt and decisive steps, and, without shedding a drop of blood, reduce the conspirators to impotence for mischief, he submitted the motions projected. The principal consisted in annulling the electoral proceedings of forty-eight departments, thus delivering the legislative-body from deputies bound to a faction, and in selecting, out of the number, the most dangerous for banishment. The Councils had scarcely any choice as to the measures to be adopted; the crisis, in fact, admitted none others than were proposed to them, and the Directory, moreover, had assumed so formidable an attitude that they dared not reject them. The fluctuating and uncertain portion common to all assemblies, which vigour is so apt to overawe, was now ranged on the side of the directorialists and ready to vote all they might demand. The deputy Chollet, however, requested a delay of twelve hours to consider these propositions; but cries of to the vote! silenced him. The only alteration conceded was the erasure of certain names from the list of the exiled, to wit, those of Thibaudeau, Doulcet de Pontécoulant, Tarbé, Crecy, Detorcy, Normand, Dupont de Nemours, Remusat, and Bailly; some upon the plea of their being good patriots despite their opposition, and others as being too insignificant to be dangerous. After these obliterations, the resolutions as propounded were passed forthwith into decrees. The electoral operations of forty-eight departments were quashed. These departments were the following:—Ain, Ardèche, Arriége, Aube, Aveyron, Bouches-du-Rhone, Calvados, Charente, Cher, Côte-d'Or, Côtes-du-Nord, Dordogne, Eure, Eure-et-Loir, Gironde, Hérault, Ille-et-Vilaine, Indre-et-Loire, Loiret, Manche, Marne, Mayenne, Mont-Blanc, Morbihan, Moselle, Deux-Nèthes, Nord, Oise, Orne, Pays-de-Calais, Puy-de-Dôme, Bas-Rhin, Haut-Rhin, Rhone, Haute-Saône, Saône-et-Loire, Sarthe, Seine, Seine-Inferieure, Seine et-Marne, Seine-et-Oise, Somme, Tarn, Var, Vaucluse, and Yonne. The deputies returned by these departments were expelled from the legislature. All the functionaries, such as judges or municipal administrators, elected by these departments, were likewise degraded from their offices. The following individuals were condemned to banishment, the place of exile being referred to the Directory:—in the Council of the Five-Hundred, Aubry, Job Aymé, Bayard, Blain, Boissy-d'Anglas, Borne, Bourdon-de-l'Oise, Cadroi, Couchery, Delahaye, Delarue, Doumère, Dumolard, Duplantier, Duprat, Gilbert-Desmolières, Henri Larivière, Imbert-Colomès, Camille-Jordan. Jourdan des Bouches-du-Rhone, Gau, Lacarrière, Lemarchant-Gomicourt, Lemerer, Mersan, Madier, Maillard, Noailles, André, Mac-Curtain, Pavée, Pastoret, Pichegru, Polissart, Praire-Montaud, Quatremère-Quincy, Saladin, Simeon, Vauvilliers, Vaublanc, Villaret-Joyeuse, and Willot; in the Council of Ancients, Barbé-Marbois, Dumas, Ferraut-Vaillant, Lafond-Ladebat, Laumont, Muraire, Murinais, Paradis, Portalis, Rovère, and Tronçon-Ducoudray.

The two directors, Carnot and Barthélemy, the ex-minister of police Cochon, his creature Dossonville, the commander of the guard of the legislative-body Ramel, and the three royalist agents, Brottier, Laville-Heurnois, and Duverne de Presle, were likewise condemned to transportation. Nor did the course of vengeance stop here. The journalists had not been less dangerous than the deputies, and the same incapacity existed for smiting them judicially. It was decided, therefore, to proceed revolutionally with regard to them, as had been done with the members of the legislature. Accordingly the proprietors, editors, and writers of no less than forty-two papers were sentenced to exile; for no conditions being at that time imposed upon political journals, their number was prodigious. Amongst the forty-two the Quotidienne figured conspicuously. To these measures against individuals, were added others tending to strengthen the authority of the Directory, and re-establish the revolutionary laws which the Councils had abolished or modified. Thus the Directory was empowered to nominate all the judges and municipal magistrates, whose elections were cancelled in the forty-eight departments. As to the seats of the deputies, they were to remain vacant. The articles of the famous law of the 3d Brumaire, which had been repealed, were again put in force, and even extended. The relatives of emigrants, excluded by that law from the exercise of public functions until the conclusion of peace, were excluded by the new law until a period of four years subsequent to peace; and were moreover wholly deprived of the electoral franchise. Emigrants who had returned under pretence of seeking the erasure of their names, were to leave the communes in which they lurked within twenty-four hours, and the territory of France within a fortnight. Any of them who should be apprehended in contumacy, were to undergo the application of the laws within twenty-four hours. The laws recalling banished priests and relieving them from the oath, substituting a simple declaration, were rescinded. All the enactments relative to the [illegible] of religious ceremonies were restored. [illegible] Directory was likewise invested with the power of banishing, on a simple order, priests whom it had reason to know were misconducting themselves. As to newspapers, it had the privilege in future of suppressing such as seemed to it dangerous. Political societies, that is to say clubs, were again legalized; but the Directory was armed with the same power against them that it held against journals: it might silence them at pleasure. Lastly, what was not less important than all the rest, the organization of the national guard was suspended, adjourned to happier times.

These measures could not be denounced as sanguinary, for the era of blood-spilling was in truth past, but they conferred on the Directory an authority wholly revolutionary. They were voted on the evening of the 18th Fructidor (4th September), in the Five-Hundred. Not a voice was raised against their adoption; certain deputies applauded, the majority were cowed and silent. The decree embodying them was instantly carried to the Ancients, who were in permanence as well as the Five-Hundred, and who were waiting to be supplied with a subject of deliberation. The mere reading of the decree and the report occupied them until the morning of the 19th. Fatigued by so long a sitting, they adjourned for a few hours. The Directory, impatient to obtain the sanction of the Ancients, and to be provided with legal weapons for consummating the blow it had struck, transmitted a second message to the legislative body. "The Directory," the message bore, "has devoted itself to the salvation of liberty, but it relies upon you to support it. To-day is the 19th, and you have done nothing yet to second its endeavours."—The decree was immediately afterwards passed and sent to the Directory.

The moment it was armed with this law, the Directory hastened to put it in force, determining to fulfil its purpose with promptitude, and return with all possible dispatch to a state of order. Several of those condemned to banishment had fled. Carnot had secretly directed his steps towards Switzerland. The Directory would have allowed Barthélemy also to escape, but he refused for the reasons mentioned above. Out of the list of the exiles it selected fifteen, deemed either more dangerous or more culpable than the rest, and adjudged them to a transportation which for some was less merciful than death itself. These were sent off that very day in grated vans to Rochefort, whence they were to be conveyed in a frigate to Guyenne. They included Barthélemy, Pichegru, and Willot, thus doomed on account of their superior importance or delinquency; Rovère, because of his known relations with the royalist faction; Aubry, on account of the part taken by him in the reaction; Bourdon de l'Oise, Murinais and Delarue, on account of their conduct in the Five-Hundred; Ramel, for his behaviour at the head of the grenadiers; Dossonville, for the functions he had performed under the committee of inspectors; Tronçon-Ducoudray, Barbé-Marbois, and Lafond-Ladebat, on account, not of their criminality, for they were sincerely attached to the republic, but of their influence in the council of the Ancients; and lastly, Brottier and Laville-Heurnois, on account of their conspiracy. Their accomplice Duverne de Presle was spared in consideration of his revelations. Personal animosity had undoubtedly its share in this choice of victims, for of these fifteen individuals none was really dangerous but Pichegru. The number was increased to sixteen through the attachment of one Letellier, a servant of Barthélemy, who begged permission to follow his master. They were hurried off to their destination without delay, and were exposed, as always happens, to the brutality of subordinates. The Directory, however, having learnt that General Dutertre, leader of the escort, behaved harshly towards the [illegible] immediately superseded him. These [illegible] cause of royalism were thus sent to follow Billaud-Varennes and Collot-d'Herbois, and consort with them in the same desolate habitation. The remainder of the proscripts were banished to the isle of Oleron.

During these two days, Paris remained perfectly calm. The patriots of the faubourgs, it is true, found the penalty of banishment too gentle, for they had been accustomed to revolutionary measures leading to a different issue. Confiding in Barras and Augereau, however, they still hoped for better things. They formed in groups, and loitered under the windows of the Directory, shouting—Long live the republic! Long live the Directory! Barras for ever! Attributing the affair mainly to Barras, they [illegible] desirous that the charge of effectually [illegible] aristocrats should be committed to him for a [illegible] days. But these inconsiderable assemblages in no degree disturbed the general tranquillity of Paris. The sectionaries of Vendémiaire, who would shortly, but for the decree of the 19th, have been reorganized in a national guard, were destitute of energy sufficient to prompt a spontaneous assumption of arms. They offered no show of opposition to the full execution of the coup-d'etat. For the rest, opinion was undecided. True republicans allowed that the royalist faction had rendered some act of vigour requisite, but they deplored the violation of the laws, and the intervention of military power. They were almost disposed to question the guilt of the conspirators too, on finding a man like Carnot involved in their crime. They feared that antipathies had unduly influenced the determinations of the Directory. In short, even granting that its proceedings might have been necessary, they felt grieved and sad, and with reason; for it had become evident that the constitution, on which they rested all their hopes, was to prove no termination to discord and strife. The mass of the population submitted in silence, and from this time forth almost wholly abjured politics. We have seen it on the 9th Thermidor, pass from the extremity of hatred against the ancient order of things, to that of hatred against the recent reign of terror. Since, it had never been roused to interfere in affairs except in opposition to the Directory, which it regarded in the same light as the convention and the committee of public welfare. Terrified at present by the energy of this same Directory, it learnt, from the events of the 18th Fructidor, the wisdom of keeping aloof from political struggles. Accordingly we find that, from this day, political feeling gradually abated, and in the end subsided into apathy.

Such were the consequences of the coup-d'etat of the 18th Fructidor. It has been argued that all necessity for it had ceased at the period of its execution; that the Directory, by alarming the royalist faction, had already succeeded in awing it; and that, by persisting in its determination, it prepared the way for military usurpation by an example of the violation of the laws. But, as we have already urged, the royalist faction was intimidated only for the moment; upon the accession of the next third, it would have infallibly reversed the whole order of things, and uprooted the Directory. A civil war must then have ensued between it and the armies. The Directory, by anticipating this royalist movement and crushing it in embryo, prevented the evils of a civil war, and if it thereby placed itself under the shield of the military power, it submitted to a sad but inevitable necessity. Legality was all a farce in the sequel of a revolution like the French. It was not under the shelter of a mere legal authority that the different parties could settle and find repose; a stronger power was needed to curb, harmonize, amalgamate them, and above all, protect them against Europe in arms: and this power was the military. The Directory, therefore, by the 18th Fructidor prevented a civil war, substituting for it a coup-d'etat, accomplished with force, but with all the calmness and moderation possible in a revolutionary epoch.

CHAPTER LV.

CONSEQUENCES OF THE 18TH FRUCTIDOR.—DISGRACE OF MOREAU.—DEATH OF HOCHE.—LAW AGAINST THE OLD NOBILITY.—RUPTURE OF THE CONFERENCES AT LILLE WITH ENGLAND.—NEGOTIATIONS AT UDINE.—PROCEEDINGS OF BONAPARTE IN ITALY; THE FOUNDATION OF THE CISALPINE REPUBLIC; THE LIGURIAN CONSTITUTION; ESTABLISHMENTS IN THE MEDITERRANEAN.—TREATY OF CAMPO-FORMIO.—RETURN OF BONAPARTE TO PARIS; TRIUMPHAL FESTIVAL.

THE 18th Fructidor threw terror into the ranks of the royalists. Priests and emigrants, already returned in great numbers, hurried in a panic from Paris and other large towns to regain the frontiers. Those who were preparing to return, again betook themselves to their haunts in Germany and Switzerland. The Directory had been re-invested, by the law of the 19th, with all the earlier revolutionary omnipotence, and none could venture to brave its wrath. It commenced by sweeping the administrations, as usual upon every change of system, and preferred decided patriots to the majority of vacated places. It had the power of nominating to all the elective offices in forty-eight departments, and was thus enabled greatly to extend its influence and multiply its partisans. One of its first cares was to replace the two directors, Carnot and Barthélemy. Rewbell and Larévellière, whose influence the late event had singularly increased, were unwilling to be accused of having deposed two of their colleagues to render themselves sole masters of the government. They insisted, therefore, that the legislative body should be immediately invited to elect two new directors. In this decision Barras did not concur, and still less Augereau. The latter was wonderfully elated with the day of the 18th, and proud of having so successfully conducted it. In mingling with affairs he had imbibed a taste for politics and power, and formed the ambitious project of aspiring to a place in the Directory. He was of opinion that the three directors, without applying to the legislative body for colleagues, should at once collate him to the vacant dignity. In this pretension he was not gratified, and no other mode of becoming a director remained for him than to obtain a majority in the Councils. But in that hope also he was disappointed. Merlin de Douai, minister of justice, and François de Neufchateau, minister of the interior, commanded the requisite number of votes above all competitors. After them, Massena and Augereau were the candidates who united most suffrages in their favour. Massena had a few more than Augereau. The two new directors were installed with the usual ceremonies. They were republicans, rather after the manner of Rewbell and Larévellière, than that of Barras; and differed even more essentially from the latter in habits and manners. Merlin was a lawyer, François de Neufchateau a man of letters. Both lived in the sober fashion suitable to their professions, and were formed in all respects to assimilate with Rewbell and Larévellière. Nevertheless, it was perhaps desirable, for the sake of the sway and consideration of the Directory with the armies, that some general of celebrity had been appointed a member of it.

In lieu of the two ministers raised to the Directory, that body appointed two excellent officers taken from the provinces. It desired in this manner to compose the government of men strangers to the intrigues of Paris and less accessible to favour. To the ministry of justice it promoted Lambrechts, who was commissary in the central administration of the department of la Dyle, that is to say, prefect; he had hitherto approved himself an upright magistrate. For the ministry of the interior it selected Letourneur, commissary in the central administration of the Loire-Inférieure, an able, active, and conscientious functionary, but too little acquainted with the capital and its usages to save himself at all times from incurring ridicule in the administration of a high department of state.

The Directory had so far every reason to be gratified with the manner in which events had proceeded. The only cause of disquietude existed in the silence of General Bonaparte, who had not written for a long interval, nor had sent the promised remittance. His aide-de-camp Lavalette had not appeared at the Luxembourg during the crisis, and he was suspected to have poisoned his general against the Directory, and to have forwarded him false information touching the state of affairs. It was in fact true that he had continually advised Bonaparte to hold himself aloof, to keep asunder from the coup-d'etat, and to content himself with the assistance he had already given the Directory by his proclamations. Barras and Augereau sent for M. de Lavalette and took him angrily to task, saying, he had doubtless deceived Bonaparte and would have been placed under arrest but for the respect due to his general. M. de Lavalette thereupon precipitately departed for Italy. Augereau hastily composed epistles to General Bonaparte and his friends in the army, for the purpose of describing the event in the most favourable colours.

Already discontented with Moreau, the Directory had resolved to recall him, when it received a communication from him which caused a very deep sensation. Moreau had seized, after the passage of the Rhine, the papers of General Klinglin, and found amongst them the whole correspondence between Pichegru and the prince of Condé. He had kept this correspondence secret; but he decided upon imparting it to the government immediately subsequent to the 18th Fructidor. He professed to have taken this resolution before knowing the events of the 18th, and solely with the view of supplying to the Directory the evidence it needed to confound its implacable enemies. But it is asserted that Moreau had received news of the event on the very day of the 18th by telegraph, and had then hastened to forward a denunciation which compromised Pichegru no more than he actually was, and which relieved himself from a heavy responsibility. Be the case as it may, it is, at all events, certain that Moreau had for a long while preserved an important secret, and had brought himself to reveal it only at the very moment of the catastrophe. It was the general impression with regard to his behaviour in this instance, that he loved not the republic sufficiently to expose the treachery of his friend, and yet was too lukewarm a friend to retain the secret to the end. His political character was here exhibited in its real light, that is to say, as weak, vacillating, and uncertain. The Directory summoned him to Paris to render an account of his conduct. On examining the correspondence it found a full confirmation of all it had otherwise learnt respecting Pichegru, and had only cause to regret it did not possess the knowledge sooner. It likewise discovered proof of Moreau's own fidelity to the republic; but it rewarded his supineness and procrastination by depriving him of his command and leaving him destitute of employment at Paris.

Hoche, still at the head of his army of the Sambre-and-Meuse, had undergone during the whole of the past month the most anxious solicitude. He remained in his head-quarters at Wetzler, keeping a carriage constantly ready to fly into Germany with his young wife, if the opposition in the Councils prevailed. It was in this predicament that, for the first time in his life, he turned a thought to his own interests and sought to secure a sum of money sufficient to answer his necessities during his absence. We have already seen that he had lent to the Directory the greater portion of his wife's dowry. The news of the 18th Fructidor filled him with joy and relieved him from all fear on his own account. To recompense his attachment, the Directory united the two great armies of the Sambre-and-Meuse and the Rhine into one, and appointed him its generalissimo. It was the most extensive command in the republic. Unfortunately the health of the young general prevented him from enjoying the triumph of the patriots and this testimony of regard on the part of the government. For some time a dry and troublesome cough, accompanied by nervous spasms, had alarmed his friends and physicians. A secret malady consumed the youthful hero, once so buoyant of health, and who to his great talents added the advantages of personal beauty and the most masculine vigour. Notwithstanding his untoward condition however, he employed himself in organizing into one the two armies confided to his command, and continued to fix his attention on the expedition to Ireland, which the Directory was desirous of holding in terrorem over the British government. But his cough became more violent towards the end of Fructidor, and he began to suffer insupportable torments. He was exhorted to suspend his labours, but he refused. He called his physician and said to him: Give me a remedy for fatigue, but let not that remedy be repose. Conquered by the disease, he at length took to his bed on the first complementary day of the year V (17th September), and expired on the following day amidst the most distressing agonies. The whole army was in the deepest consternation, for it adored its young general. The mournful intelligence spread with rapidity and struck with affliction all true republicans, who placed the greatest hopes in the talents and patriotism of Hoche. The report of poison immediately circulated; it seemed impossible to believe that one in such vigour of youth, strength, and health, should be thus carried off by natural means. A post mortem examination was instituted; the stomach and intestines were scrutinized by the Faculty, who found them loaded with dark ulcerations, and who, without announcing traces of poison, appeared nevertheless to believe in its existence. Many attributed the poisoning to the Directory, which was absurd, for no member of the Directory was capable of such a crime, so wholly foreign to French manners, and none moreover had any interest in its commission. In fact, Hoche was the most solid support of the Directory, both against the royalists and against the ambitious conqueror of Italy. Others surmised with more likelihood that he had been poisoned in the West. His physician thought he remembered that the alteration in his health dated from his last sojourn in Brittany, when he went to embark for Ireland. Some again supposed, but without any proof, that he had been poisoned at a banquet he had given to persons of all parties with the view of reconciling them.

The Directory instituted magnificent obsequies to his memory. They were celebrated on the Champ de Mars, in presence of all the bodies of the state, and amidst an immense concourse of people. A considerable army followed the procession. The aged father of the general officiated as chief mourner. This funereal pomp produced a deep impression, and remained a grand memorial of that heroic era.

Thus closed one of the fairest and most interesting existences that adorned the revolution. This time at least it was not by the scaffold. Hoche was only in his twenty-ninth year. As a private soldier in the French guards, a few months had sufficed to perfect his education. To the physical courage of the warrior, he added an energetic character, a superior intelligence, an accurate knowledge of men, an excellent capacity for political emergencies, and, moreover, the inspiring impulse of enthusiasm. This with him amounted to a passion, ardent and uncontrollable, and which proved perhaps the predisposing cause of his death. The peculiar circumstances of his career increased the interest his manifold qualities excited. He had always met with untoward accidents to arrest his fortune. Conqueror at Weissemburg and ready to enter upon a glorious scene of action, he was suddenly thrown into a dungeon; released from imprisonment to prosecute the harassing warfare of La Vendée, he on that unpropitious stage played an ever-memorable part, and at the moment he was about to execute his great project on Ireland, a tempest and failures in his combinations again defeated his expectations; removed to the army of the Sambre-and-Meuse, he gained an important victory at its head, and once more had his progress suspended by the preliminaries of Leoben; lastly, in command of the army of Germany, with Europe still disposed for war, he had a vast future before him when he was struck amidst his dazzling prospects, and hurried to the grave by a disease of forty-eight hours' virulence. If, however, a cherished memory can compensate the loss of life, he might be well content to surrender his even thus prematurely. A series of splendid victories, an arduous pacification, a universality of talent, a probity without stain, the belief general amongst republicans that he would have curbed the conqueror of Rivoli and the Pyramids, that his ambition would have remained republican and formed an insuperable obstacle to the imperious pride that aspired to a throne, in a word, lofty deeds, noble inspirations, a youth of the fairest promise,—these are what constitute his renown. And assuredly it is great enough! Let us not pity him then for dying young. It will always redound more to the glory of Hoche, Kleber, and Desaix, that they did not live to be marshals. They all bore the distinction of citizens and freemen to the tomb, and were not reduced like Moreau to become a fugitive in foreign armies.

The Directory gave the army of Germany to Augereau, and thus freed itself from his turbulence, which was becoming inconvenient at Paris.

In the course of a few days the Directory had completed all the arrangements that circumstances demanded; but the important subject of the finances remained to engage its attention. The decree of the 19th Fructidor, by delivering it from its most formidable enemies, reviving the law of the 3d Brumaire, endowing it with increased means of severity against priests and emigrants, arming it with the power of suppressing journals and clubs whose principles gave it offence, permitting it to fill all the vacant offices after the avoidance of the elections, postponing indefinitely the reorganization of the national guards,—this decree, we say, had restored to the Directory all the two Councils had attempted to wrest from it, and had even added a species of revolutionary omnipotence. But it had equally essential advantages to recover in the matter of finance, for in this respect its influence had not been less crippled than in all others. A grand scheme was propounded for the receipts and disbursements of the year VI. The first object was to restore to the Directory the functions of which it had been deprived relative to the negotiations of the Treasury, to the order of payments, in short, to the [illegible] ment of the funds. All the provisions ad[illegible] the two Councils, before the 18th Fructidor, [illegible] subject were accordingly rescinded. It ne[illegible] requisite to devise fresh sources of [illegible] th with the view of relieving property unduly [illegible] and of raising the revenue to a level with the [illegible] diture. The institution of a lottery was authorized, a toll on roads and a tax on pledges were likewise established. The imposts on registries were regulated in a manner to greatly augment their produce, and the duties on foreign tobacco were increased. By means of these new expedients, the government was enabled to reduce the property-tax to 228 millions and the personal to 50, and yet raise the sum-total of receipts for the year VI. to 616 millions. In this amount, the anticipated sales of national domains were estimated at only twenty millions.

The income being by these means elevated to 616 millions, it became necessary to diminish the expenditure to the same level. The war was assumed to cost this year, even in case of a fresh campaign, only 283 millions. The other general expenses were estimated at 247 millions, making 530 millions in the whole. The interest of the debt alone amounted to 258 millions; and if it had been actually paid, the charge would have reached a point far superior to the resources of the republic. It was proposed, therefore, to discharge only the third of it, that is to say, 86 millions. In this manner, the war, the general services of the state, and the interest of the debt, would require an expenditure of but 616 millions, answering to the income. But to bring it within this limit, a decisive measure with regard to the debt was necessary. Since the abolition of paper money and a return to specie, the payment of the interest could not be regularly kept up. A quarter had been paid in specie and three quarters in credits on the national domains, called debentures of the three quarters. This was in point of fact as if a fourth were paid in cash, and three-fourths in assignats. The public debt had therefore been principally provided for from the resource of the national domains, and it became imperative to devise some remedy on the subject, both for behoof of the state and of the creditors. A debt, the annual charge of which amounted to 258 millions, was in truth enormous for that period. The resources of credit and the effects of a sinking-fund were then unknown. The revenue was much less considerable than it has since become, for there had not yet been time to reap all the benefits of the revolution; and France, which has been able since to contribute a thousand millions in general taxation, could then scarcely raise 616 millions. Thus the debt was overwhelming, and the country was in the situation of an individual in hopeless insolvency. Hence, the expedient was proposed of continuing to meet a portion of the interest in cash, and, instead of paying the remainder by credits on the national property, of liquidating the capital itself out of that property. To effectuate this plan, one-third only of the debt would be preserved, to be styled the consolidated third, and to remain in the great book in the light of a perpetual annuity. The two remaining thirds would be paid off, at the rate of twenty times the interest, in securities receivable in payment of national domains. It is true that such securities bore in the market less than a sixth of their value, and that for those who had no desire to purchase lands, it was in reality tantamount to a bankruptcy.

Notwithstanding the quietude and docility of the Councils since the 18th Fructidor, this measure provoked a strenuous opposition. The opponents of the proposed liquidation maintained that it was an actual bankruptcy; that the debt, at the commencement of the revolution, had been placed under the safeguard of the national honour, and that it was to disgrace the republic to liquidate by such means two-thirds of it; that the creditors who did not purchase lands would lose nine-tenths in the negotiation of their credits, for the emission of so great a quantity of paper must of necessity considerably depress its value; that, setting aside the prejudices arising from the origin of the confiscated property, the creditors of the state were for the most part too poor to buy estates; that associations to purchase them in common were impracticable; that, in consequence, the loss of nine-tenths of their capital was unavoidable by the majority; that the pretended consolidated third, even placed above the chance of reduction in future, was only promised; that the promise of one-third was less desirable than the promise of three-thirds; and lastly, that if the republic could not at the moment meet all the charge of the debt, it was better for the creditors to wait as they had done hitherto, but to wait with the hope of seeing their situation ameliorated, than to be at once despoiled of their stock. Many even argued that a distinction should be drawn between the different conditions of stock inscribed in the great book, and that only such as had been acquired at a low price should be subjected to the liquidation. It had been sold indeed as low as ten and fifteen francs, and those who had purchased at that rate would still gain considerably notwithstanding the reduction to one-third.

The advocates of the directorial plan replied that a state possessed the right, like an individual, of abandoning its property to its creditors, when it could no longer pay them; that the debt far exceeded the resources of the republic; and that, in this position, it had the privilege of giving up the actual pledge for that debt, namely, the national domains; that by purchasing lands the creditors would lose very little; that those lands would improve in their hands, so as speedily to regain their old value, and that they would thus recover what they had lost; that 1,300 millions of property remained (the thousand millions promised to the armies being transferred to the creditors of the state); that peace was near at hand, and upon that event the debentures of liquidation would be alone received in payment for national property; that, in consequence, the portion of the capital liquidated, amounting to about 3,000 millions, would have an equivalent of 1,300 millions in domains, and would suffer a diminution at the utmost of two-thirds instead of nine-tenths; that at any rate the creditors had never been treated otherwise heretofore, since they had always been paid in domains, whether in the shape of assignats or of debentures of the three-fourths; that the republic was compelled to give them what it had; that they could gain nothing by waiting, inasmuch as it never would be able to provide for the whole debt; that by liquidating their claims, their situation became henceforth fixed; that the security of the consolidated third would be realized forthwith, for the means of discharging the interest subsisted; that the republic would, on its part, be relieved by the operation from an enormous burden, and be enabled to enter for the future upon a regular system; that it would appear in the face of Europe with a lightened debt, and thereby become more powerful and imposing to command peace; and lastly, that no distinction could be made between the different sorts of stock with reference to the price of acquisition, and that they must be all dealt with on an equal footing.

Some measure of this kind was inevitable. The republic merely proposed to do now what it had always done: all engagements above its capacity to meet, it had ever discharged with domains at the price to which they had fallen. It was by assignats it had paid the old burdens of the state as well as all the expenses of the revolution, and it was with lands it had redeemed the assignats. It was in paper-credits, in other words, lands, it had paid the interest of the debt, and it was with lands it finished by liquidating the capital itself. In a word, it gave what it possessed. The United States had done no more for the discharge of their public debt. All the satisfaction their creditors received was derived from the banks of the Mississippi. Measures of this nature cause, like revolutions, much individual suffering and ruin; but the result must be submitted to when they have become inevitable.

The plan was ultimately adopted. Thus, by means of new and improved taxation, whereby the income was raised to 616 millions, and by virtue of the reduction of the debt, whereby the expenditure could be limited to that sum, an equilibrium was re-established in the finances, and less difficulty might be reasonably anticipated in the operations of the year VI (from September 1797 to September 1798).

All these measures, the fruits of its signal victory, the republican party desired to crown by one more. Pleading that the republic would always be in peril so long as a hostile caste, that of the old nobility, should be suffered within its bounds, it proposed that all families which had been formerly noble, or pretended to be so, should be sent into exile, being permitted to realize their property, and carry it with them in French merchandise whithersoever they might choose to betake themselves, their prejudices, and their passions. This proposition was strongly supported by Sieyes, Boulay de la Meurthe, Chazal, and all decided republicans, but vehemently combated by Tallien and the friends of Barras. Barras was himself noble; the general of the army of Italy was of aristocratic birth; many of those who shared the pleasures of Barras, and filled his saloons, were likewise of old noble parentage; and although an exception was made in favour of those who had usefully served the republic, the apartments of the director resounded with angry denunciations of the proposed law. Even apart from these personal reasons, strong grounds of objection against such a measure existed in its danger and cruelty. It was submitted, however, to the two Councils, but excited such a storm of opposition that it was obliged to be withdrawn, for the purpose of being greatly modified. It was reproduced and passed in a different shape, whereby the penalty of exile was not pronounced, but simply that persons of noble lineage should be deemed aliens, and obliged, in order to recover the privileges of citizens, to observe the formalities and undergo the ordeal preparatory to naturalization. A saving clause was introduced in behalf of men who had served the republic with advantage either in the armies or in the assemblies. Barras, his friends, and the conqueror of Italy, at whose birth malicious inuendoes were constantly levelled, were thus freed from the consequences of this measure.

The Directory had in all things resumed an energy essentially revolutionary. The opposition, which in the Directory and Councils affected to advocate peace, being removed, the government exhibited more firmness and obduracy in the negotiations at Lille and Udine. It ordered all soldiers absent on furlough immediately to rejoin their regiments, and, replacing everything on a war-footing, sent fresh instructions to its envoys. Maret, at Lille, as we have seen, had succeeded in reconciling the pretensions of the maritime powers. The terms of peace were arranged, provided Spain would sacrifice Trinidad, and Holland Trincomalee, and France undertake never to seize the Cape of Good Hope into her own possession. It only remained, therefore, to obtain the consent of Spain and Holland. In this negotiation the Directory found Maret too pliable, and resolved accordingly to supersede him. In his place it accredited Bonnier and Treilhard with fresh instructions. According to these, France demanded the simple and unconditional surrender, not only of her own colonies, but of those likewise of her allies. With regard also to the negotiations at Udine, the Directory displayed an equally keen and positive spirit. It no longer consented to be bound by the preliminaries of Leoben, which gave Austria the limit of the Oglio in Italy; it now insisted that Italy should be wholly enfranchised to the banks of the Isonzo, and that Austria should find an indemnity in the secularization of certain ecclesiastical states in Germany. It recalled Clarke, who had been chosen and sent by Carnot, and who in his correspondence had spoken reproachfully of the generals reputed the most republican in the army of Italy. Bonaparte alone remained charged with the powers of the republic in the conferences with Austria.

The ultimatum which the Directory caused to be signified at Lille by its new envoys, Bonnier and Treilhard, occasioned a rupture of the negotiation almost concluded. Lord Malmesbury was deeply mortified at this result, for he desired peace, both as an honourable termination of his own career, and as the means of securing his government a moment of respite. He testified the most poignant regret, but it was impossible for England to relinquish all its naval conquests and receive nothing in exchange. Lord Malmesbury, at the same time, was so sincere in his wish to treat, that he urged Maret on his return to Paris to see whether it were not possible to influence the determination of the Directory, and even offered several millions to purchase the vote of one of the directors. Maret declined to undertake any negotiation of this sort, and quitted Lille. Lord Malmesbury and Mr. Ellis likewise immediately took their departure. Although the Directory may be reproached on this occasion with having repudiated a certain and advantageous peace for France, its motive nevertheless was creditable. It would have been certainly unjust on the part of France to abandon her allies and impose sacrifices on them for their devotion to her cause. Moreover, presuming on a speedy peace with Austria, or at least on intimidating her into one by another military movement, the Directory indulged the hope of being shortly relieved from its continental enemies, and enabled to concentrate all its forces upon the subjugation of England.

Meanwhile the instructions forwarded to Bonaparte displeased him exceedingly, for he could scarcely expect to act upon them with a prosperous issue. It was a difficult undertaking, in fact, to induce Austria to surrender Italy altogether, and content herself with the secularization of certain ecclesiastical states in Germany, under threat of marching on Vienna. Indeed Bonaparte could no longer aspire to that feat, for he had all the forces of the Austrian monarchy arrayed against him, and it was the army of Germany that must first force its way and penetrate into the hereditary states. To this subject of irritation was added another in the doubts conceived to his prejudice at Paris. Augereau had dispatched one of his aides-de camp with letters for several of the generals and officers of the army of Italy. This aide-de-camp appeared to fulfil a sort of mission, and to be employed in the charge of rectifying the opinions of the army touching the 18th Fructidor. Bonaparte gathered sufficient to convince him he was regarded with suspicion. He hastened to act the part of an injured person, and to complain with the vivacity and bitterness of one who feels himself indispensable; he accused the government of treating him with detestable ingratitude, and of behaving towards him as towards Pichegru after Vendémiaire, and he demanded his supercession. Here we find this man, with so grand and indomitable a spirit, and who knew so well how to assume a noble attitude, abandon himself to the spleen of an impetuous and froward boy. The Directory took no notice of his demand to be recalled, and solemnly assured him that the letters in question or the dispatch of an aide-de-camp covered no sinister intention towards him. Bonaparte was somewhat appeased, but still insisted on being superseded in the functions of negotiator and organizer of the Italian republics. He urged unceasingly that he was ill, that he could not support the fatigue of horse-exercise, and that it was impossible for him to prosecute a fresh campaign. Nevertheless, although in truth he was ill and oppressed by the prodigious labours he had undergone for the last two years, he had no desire to be replaced in any of his duties, and felt confident he might rely on the elasticity of his mind if strength of body were in emergency to fail him.

He resolved, in fact, to continue the negotiation, and crown his glory as first captain of the age with that of peacemaker. The ultimatum of the Directory, it is true, galled him; but he was not more disposed on this occasion than on many others to pay implicit obedience to his government. His occupations at this juncture appear almost overwhelming. He was engaged in organizing the Italian republics, creating a navy in the Adriatic, projecting great enterprises in the Mediterranean, and negotiating with the plenipotentiaries of Austria.

He had commenced by organizing into two separate states the provinces he had emancipated in Upper Italy. In his early progress he had formed the duchy of Modena and the legations of Bologna and Ferrara into the Cispadan republic. His design was to have united this petty dominion with revolutionized Venice, and thus recompense the latter for the loss of its provinces on terra-firma. He intended to organize Lombardy apart, under the title of the Transpadan republic. But his ideas soon underwent a change, and he preferred to constitute a single state of the enfranchised provinces. The spirit of locality, which at first appeared an obstacle to the incorporation of Lombardy with the other provinces, was now a motive for amalgamating them. Romagna, for example, was averse to a union with the legations and the duchy of Modena, but willing to depend on a central government established at Milan. Bonaparte saw that, each detesting its neighbour, it would be easier to merge the whole into subjection to a single authority. Moreover, the difficulty of determining the question of supremacy between Venice and Milan, and of assigning the preference to one of them as the seat of government, had ceased to fetter him. He was resolved to sacrifice Venice. The Venitians inspired him with no affection; he perceived that the change of government had not produced amongst them a change of disposition. The great nobility, the petty, and the people, were all alike still the enemies of France and the revolution, and unanimous in vows for the success of Austria. Merely a small number of the wealthier citizens cordially approved the new order of things. The democratic municipality evinced the most hostile spirit towards the French. Nearly the whole population seemed to hope that a return of fortune might enable Austria to restore the ancient government. Furthermore, the Venetians were contemptible in the eyes of Bonaparte under another aspect highly important in his view, to wit, prostration of power. Their canals and harbours were almost choked up; their navy was in a deplorable condition; they were themselves emasculated by indulgence in pleasures, and altogether incapable of energy. "They are a soft, effeminate, and cowardly people," he wrote, "without land or water, and we have only to dispose of them." He was well disposed, therefore, to abandon Venice to Austria, on condition that the latter, relinquishing the boundary of the Oglio, stipulated by the preliminaries of Leoben, would retrograde to the Adige. This river, forming an excellent line of demarcation, would then divide Austria from the new republic. The important fortress of Mantua, which, according to the preliminaries, was to be restored to Austria, would remain with the Italian republic, and Milan become the capital without dispute. Hence, Bonaparte greatly preferred the plan of erecting a single state, whereof Milan should be the metropolis, and giving to it the frontier of the Adige and Mantua, to the retention of Venice; and in this he was right from regard even to Italian freedom. The emancipation of all Italy to the Isonzo being impracticable, it was better to sacrifice Venice than the frontier of the Adige and Mantua. Bonaparte had found, in conferences with the Austrian envoys, that this new arrangement might be accepted. In consequence, he proceeded to incorporate Lombardy, the duchies of Modena and Reggio, the legations of Bologna and Ferrara, Romagna, the Bergamasco, the Brescian, and the Mantuan, into one state extending to the Adige, and possessing excellent fortresses, such as Pizzighitone and Mantua, a population of three millions six hundred thousand souls, an admirable soil, navigable rivers, canals, and harbours.

Without delay he set himself to mould this confederation into a republic. He was inclined towards the adoption of a different constitution from that of France. He deemed the executive power in that constitution too weak; and without having any decided predilection for this or that form of government, but moved solely by the necessity of forming a strong state, and one capable of contending with its aristocratic neighbours, he was in favour of a more concentrated and energetic organization. With this view he requested that Sieyes should be sent to him, that he might have the advantage of his assistance in the invention; but the Directory refused to acquiesce in his ideas, and insisted that the new republic should have the French constitution. Its mandate was obeyed, and forthwith the constitution of France was transplanted to Italy. In the first place, the new republic was christened the Cisalpine. The wish at Paris was to have it denominated the Transalpine; but this would have been as if Paris were to be the centre, whereas the Italians contemplated it being fixed at Rome, for all their vows tended to the enfranchisement and unity of their country, and to the re-establishment of the ancient metropolis. The term "Cisalpine," therefore, was more agreeable to them as suitable to that consummation. It was not deemed prudent, at the same time, to intrust the first composition of the government to the suffrages of the Italians. On this first occasion, therefore, Bonaparte himself nominated the five directors, and the members of the two Councils. He endeavoured to make the best selections, or at least the best his position permitted him. As one of the directors he appointed Serbelloni, one of the chief magnates in Italy. He instituted a general enrolment of national guards throughout the country, and assembled thirty thousand of them at Milan for the federation of the 14th July. The presence of the French army in Italy, its great achievements and renown, had begun to diffuse a spirit of military enthusiasm in this land where the use of arms seemed almost forgotten. Bonaparte laboured to stimulate it by every possible means. He was well aware how feeble the new republic was in a military aspect; the Piedmontese army alone commanded any of his esteem in Italy, because the court of Piedmont alone had waged war in the course of the century. He wrote to Paris that a single regiment of the King of Sardinia would suffice to overthrow the Cisalpine republic; that it was of paramount importance therefore to introduce warlike habits amongst its population; that it might then become a potential state in Italy; but that time was needed to accomplish this end, for such revolutions were not made in a few days. He was beginning to succeed, however, in his object, for he possessed in the highest degree the art of communicating to others the most ardent of his passions, that for arms. None ever knew better how to profit by his glory in order to excite enthusiasm for military triumphs, and to point in that direction all pride and ambition. From this period manners began to change in Italy. "The soutane (a sort of cassock), which was the dress in vogue amongst young men, gave place to a military uniform. Instead of passing their days at the feet of women, the young Italians frequented the riding-schools, fencing-schools, and practice-grounds. Children no longer followed their usual games; they formed regiments armed with weapons of tin, and imitated in their sports the evolutions of war. On the stage, and in street-farces, an Italian had been always represented as a coward though full of wit, whilst some blustering captain, either a Frenchman or more frequently a German, strong, bold, and rude, silenced his sallies by sundry rough blows and kicks, to the great enjoyment of the spectators. Now, the people would not permit such exhibitions; authors introduced on the stage, to the satisfaction of the public, brave Italians, putting foreigners to flight, in defence of their rights and honour. A national spirit was, in fact, forming. Italy had again its native songs at once patriotic and warlike. The women repelled with scorn the attentions of men who, with a view to please them, affected effeminate manners."*

This revolution was, however, only in progress; the aid of France was still requisite to uphold the new republic. Hence, it was intended to leave in it, as formerly in Holland, a part of the army, which might there rest from its fatigues, enjoy peaceably its glory, and communicate its own martial fire to the whole country. Moreover, with that foresight which embraced all objects, Bonaparte had conceived a vast and admirable undertaking for behoof of the Cisalpine republic. This state might be regarded as an advanced post to France, and it was essential that troops should be able to reach it with rapidity. With this view, he traced the plan of a road which, proceeding from France to Geneva, should thence traverse the Valais, cross the Simplon, and descend into Lombardy. He was already in treaty with Switzerland on the subject. He had commissioned engineers to make surveys and estimates, and arranged all the details of execution with the precision he observed in the most extensive and even apparently chimerical of his projects. He determined that this stupendous highway, the first directly piercing the Alps, should be spacious, solid, and magnificent, to remain a transcendent monument of liberty and French greatness.

Whilst thus occupied with a republic which owed to him its existence, he was called upon to administer justice likewise, being chosen as arbitrator between two communities. The Valteline had revolted against the sovereignty of the Grison league. The Valteline was composed of three valleys which belonged to Italy, for their waters flowed into the Adda. They were nevertheless subject to the dominion of the Grisons, an insupportable yoke, for there is none more heavy than that imposed by one people upon another. More than one tyranny of this description existed in Switzerland. That exercised by Berne over the Pays de Vaud was celebrated. The inhabitants of the Valteline rebelled, and demanded to be incorporated in the Cisalpine republic. They invoked the protection of Bonaparte, adducing, in order to obtain it, certain ancient treaties which placed the Valteline under the protectorate of the Dukes of Milan. Both people, the Grisons and the Valtelines, agreed to refer the matter to the decision of Bonaparte. He accepted the mediation with the sanction of the Directory. He recommended the Grisons to acknowledge the rights of the Valtelines and to associate with them in a new Grison league. They rejected this advice, and preferred to plead the cause of their sovereignty. Bonaparte assigned a period for their appearance before his tribunal. When the term arrived, the Grisons, at the instigation of Austria, declined to appear. Thereupon Bonaparte, proceeding upon the submission to his award, and upon the old treaties, condemned the Grisons by default, pronounced the Valtelines free, and permitted them to join the Cisalpine republic. This sentence, founded on right and equity, caused a profound sensation in Europe. It struck terror into the aristocracy of Berne, but diffused joy through the Pays de Vaud; and, for the rest, added to the Cisalpine republic a rich, valiant, and numerous population.

Genoa, at the same time, selected him as its counsellor in the choice of a constitution. Not having been conquered, Genoa was free to adopt its own laws, and remained independent of the Directory in that respect. The two parties, aristocratic and democratic, were in consequence at variance. A revolt had broken out, as we have seen, in the month of May; a second had followed more general in the valley of La Polcevera, which was nigh proving fatal to Genoa. It was excited by the priests against the new constitution. The French general Duphot, who was on the spot with some troops, succeeded in restoring order. The Genoese then made application to Bonaparte, who sent them in reply an austere letter, in which he gave them much wholesome advice and rebuked their democratic ardour. He ordered certain changes in their constitution. Instead of five magistrates intrusted with the executive power, he allowed them but three; the members of the Councils too were reduced in number; in fact, the whole government was organized in a manner less popular but more strong. He granted additional privileges to the priests and nobles, to reconcile them with the new order of things; and, inasmuch as a proposal had been made to exclude them from public functions, he condemned it in emphatic terms. "You would do," he said to the Genoese, "what they themselves have done." The letter containing this expression he purposely made public. It conveyed a censure upon the measures taken in Paris with reference to the old nobility. He was well-pleased thus to interfere indirectly in politics, to proclaim opinions, to utter them in opposition to the Directory, and to detach himself at once from the successful party; for it was his boast to be independent, to neither support nor serve any faction, but to hold them all equally in contempt and awe.

Whilst thus engaged in the various duties of legistor, arbitrator, and counsellor of the Italian populations, he was intent upon other objects of not less magnitude, and which marked his profound forethought in a different manner. He had appropriated the navy of Venice, and ordered Admiral Brueys into the Adriatic, with the design of taking possession of the Grecian islands held by Venice. He had in this way been led to reflect on the Mediterranean, on its importance, and on the part which France might play therein. The result was a conviction that, if on the ocean France must yield to a master, she ought to reign in the Mediterranean. Whether Italy were wholly or only partially emancipated, whether Venice were finally ceded to Austria or not, he determined that France should possess the Ionian Islands, Corfu, Zante, Santa-Maura, Cerigo and Cephalonia. The people of those islands were indeed eager to become French subjects. Malta, too, the most important post in the Mediterranean, belonged at present to an order, which, long in a state of decrepitude, must necessarily vanish before the influence of the French revolution; and, besides, if left unoccupied by the French, it would inevitably fall into the hands of the English. Under this persuasion, Bonaparte had caused the property of the knights in Italy to be everywhere confiscated to cripple their resources and hasten their fall. He had also opened intrigues at Malta itself, which was defended by only a few knights and a feeble garrison; and he proposed to dispatch thither his squadron and take possession of it. "From these different points," he wrote to the Directory, "we shall command the Mediterranean, watch over the Ottoman empire crumbling to decay on all sides, and be in a position either to sustain it or secure our portion of its ruins. We shall do more," he added; "we shall render the dominion of the ocean almost useless to the English. They refused us at Lille the Cape of Good Hope; we will contrive to dispense with it. Let us occupy Egypt; we shall then possess the direct route to India, and it will be easy for us to establish there one of the finest colonies in the world."

* Memoirs of Napoleon, edited by Count de Montholon, vol. iv p. 106.

It was therefore in Italy, when directing his attention to the Levant, that he formed the first idea of the celebrated expedition which was adventured the following year. "It is in Egypt," he wrote, "that England is to be assailed." (Letter of the 16th August 1797—29th Thermidor, year V.)

To accomplish these views, he had directed Admiral Brueys to sail into the Adriatic with six ships of the line, and an attendant force of frigates and corvettes. He had speedily devised a way for gaining the Venitian navy in addition. According to the treaty concluded with Venice, she was to furnish him with three millions in naval stores. Under pretext of this covenant, he appropriated all the hemp, cables, &c., in the Venitian arsenals, of which in truth they formed the solitary contents. After having possessed himself of the stores, under pretence of securing his three millions, Bonaparte seized upon the navy itself, under pretence of subjecting the islands to the new Venitian democracy. He caused such vessels as were on the stocks to be forthwith finished, and thus contrived to launch six sail of the line, six frigates, and several corvettes, which he added to the squadron Brueys had brought from Toulon. He found another million in lieu of the one arrested by the Treasury, supplied Brueys with funds to pick up experienced crews in Albania and on the coasts of Greece, and thus created a marine capable of commanding the whole Mediterranean. He fixed its principal station at Corfu, for very excellent reasons, which met the approval of the Directory. From Corfu the fleet could readily repair into the Adriatic, and act in concert with the army of Italy in case of fresh hostilities; thence it kept the court of Naples in check, was within easy sail of Malta, and, if wanted in the Atlantic to aid in any enterprise, it could reach the Straits more promptly than from Toulon. Moreover, at Corfu the fleet might be practised in the execution of manœuvres, and be better inured for action than at Toulon, where it was generally kept riding lazily. "You will never have sailors," Bonaparte wrote angrily, "by keeping them locked up in harbours."

Such was the manner in which Bonaparte occupied his time during the studied delays of Austria. Meanwhile his military position with regard to that power was likewise a source of uneasiness. Austria had made gigantic preparations since the signing of the preliminaries of Leoben. She had moved the greatest part of her forces into Carinthia, to protect Vienna and shield herself from a sudden irruption by Bonaparte. Hungary had been raised en masse. Eighteen thousand Hungarian cavalry had for the last three months been constantly exercising on the banks of the Danube. Thus she deployed ample means to support the negotiations at Udine. Bonaparte had not more than seventy thousand men under his command, of whom only a small number was mounted. He importuned the Directory for reinforcements to enable him to confront his enemy, and he especially urged the ratification of the treaty of alliance with Piedmont, whereby he would obtain six thousand of those Piedmontese soldiers he prized so highly. But the Directory was loath to send him reinforcements, fearing the removal of troops would be attended by numerous desertions; so it preferred, by accelerating the march of the army of Germany, to disengage rather than reinforce the army of Italy. Moreover it hesitated to ratify the alliance with Piedmont, being unwilling to guarantee the stability of a throne whereof it expected and desired the spontaneous downfall. Accordingly only a few troopers were dispatched into Italy on foot. Means were to be found in that country for mounting and equipping them.

Deprived of the auxiliaries on which he had relied, Bonaparte saw himself exposed to a storm gathering on the side of the Julian Alps. Thus menaced, he endeavoured to supply, by expedients, the additional resources denied him. He fortified and armed Palma Nuova with extraordinary activity, and rendered it a fortress of the first order, capable by itself of withstanding a long siege. This precaution sufficed greatly to improve his position. He likewise threw bridges over the Isonzo and erected têtes-de-pont, to be prepared for making a forward movement with his accustomed promptitude. If the rupture occurred before the snow began to fall, he hoped to surprise the Austrians, scatter them in disorder, and, despite the superiority of their forces, rapidly penetrate to the gates of Vienna. If, however, the recommencement of hostilities were delayed till snow covered the mountains, he could no longer anticipate the Austrians, but must be content to receive them on the plains of Italy, where they might readily debouch at any time, and then the disparity of numbers would be no longer compensated by the advantage of the offensive. In such an emergency he considered he would be in imminent danger.

Hence it was desirable for Bonaparte that the negotiations should be brought to a speedy close. We remember that after the absurd note of the 18th July, in which the Austrian envoys had again insisted upon holding the congress of Berne, and reclaimed against the proceedings at Venice, Bonaparte had replied in very vigorous terms, calculated to convince Austria that he was quite ready to resume his march on Vienna. Messieurs de Gallo and de Meerwelt, with a third negotiator, M. Degelmann, had arrived on the 31st August (14th Fructidor), and the conferences had immediately recommenced. But it was evidently their object to protract a settlement; for, albeit entering into a separate negotiation at Udine, they still kept in reserve this general congress at Berne. They argued also that as the congress of Rastadt, for peace with the empire, was about to open, the negotiations should be conducted simultaneously with those at Udine, which would have tended greatly to complicate questions and given rise to as many difficulties as a general congress at Berne. Bonaparte observed in reply, that peace with the empire could only be negotiated after peace with the emperor, and that if the congress were opened, France would take no part therein; adding, that if peace with the emperor were not concluded by the first of October, the preliminaries of Leoben would be considered at an end. Things were at this point, when the 18th Fructidor (4th September) extinguished all the false hopes of the Austrian cabinet. M. de Cobentzel forthwith hastened from Vienna to Udine. Bonaparte himself repaired to Passeriano, a charming seat some distance from Udine, and appearances seemed to betoken a sincere desire on both sides to come to terms. The conferences were held alternately at Udine in the house of M. de Cobentzel, and at Passeriano, the residence of Bonaparte. M. de Cobentzel was subtle and argumentative, without being a severe logician; in deportment he was sour and pompous. The three other plenipotentiaries preserved a respectful silence. Bonaparte was the sole representative of France, having no colleague since the recall of Clarke. He was sufficiently haughty, and in speech prompt and bitter enough, to be a match for the Austrian count.

Although it was apparent that M. de Cobentzel was actuated by a real desire to treat, he not the less propounded very extravagant pretensions. True, Austria ceded the Low Countries, but she refused to guarantee the boundary of the Rhine, on the plea that it belonged to the Empire to make that concession. In recompense for the rich and populous provinces of Belgium, she required possessions, not in Germany, but in Italy. The preliminaries of Leoben had assigned her the Venitian states as far as the Oglio, that is to say, Dalmatia, Istria, Friuli, the Brescian, the Bergamasco, and the Mantuan, with the fortress of Mantua; but those provinces did not compensate half her loss in the cession of Belgium and Lombardy. It was not too much, M. de Cobentzel maintained, not only to leave her Lombardy, but also to give her Venice and the legations, and to re-establish the Duke of Modena in his duchy.

To M. de Cobentzel's oratory Bonaparte replied only by a disdainful silence, to his demands by opposing pretensions equally exorbitant, expressed in a firm and imperious tone. He demanded the limit of the Rhine for France, including Mayence, and the limit of the Isonzo for Italy. Between these conflicting claims a medium was to be struck. Bonaparte, as we have already said, had conceived that by surrendering Venice to Austria (a cession not comprehended in the preliminaries of Leoben, because the annihilation of that republic was not then contemplated), he might obtain in requital that the emperor should recede from the boundary of the Oglio to the Adige; that the Mantuan, the Bergamasco, and the Brescian should be relinquished to the Cisalpine republic, which would thus possess the frontier of the Adige and Mantua; that the emperor, moreover, would recognise the Rhine as the boundary of France, and yield to it Mayence; and that finally he would consent to grant it the Ionian islands. He resolved to treat on these conditions. He saw plainly the substantial advantages accruing from them to France, and that they were all she could obtain at the moment. By accepting Venice, the emperor would dishonour himself in the eyes of Europe, for it was on his account Venice had betrayed France. By abandoning the Adige and Mantua, the emperor gave the new Italian republic a formidable consistence; by surrendering the Isles of Greece to France, he prepared for her the command of the Mediterranean; by acknowledging the boundary of the Rhine, he deprived the Empire of any power to refuse it; in fine, by yielding Mayence to France, he secured her the veritable possession of that limit, and compromised himself in the gravest manner with the Empire by ceding a place belonging to one of the Germanic princes. It was true that by prosecuting the war the total destruction of the Austrian monarchy seemed inevitable, or at least the entire conquest of Italy. But Bonaparte had more than one personal reason for avoiding another campaign. On the eve of October, it was too late to hazard an inroad into Austria. The army of Germany, too, now commanded by Augereau, enjoyed a manifest superiority of position, for there was no power to oppose its progress. The army of Italy, on the contrary, had to contend with the whole Austrian forces; it must play a secondary part by being reduced to the defensive; in short, it could not be first at Vienna. Furthermore, Bonaparte was really fatigued, and longed to enjoy a little of his great renown in peace. A victory or two more would not exalt the marvels of his two campaigns, and by concluding a pacification he would crown himself with a double glory. To the fame of a warrior he would add that of a diplomatist, and be the only general of the republic who combined the two, for none had yet signed treaties. He would satisfy one of the most ardent desires of his country and return to its bosom with every species of applause. No doubt he committed a formal disobedience by completing a treaty on these conditions, for the Directory insisted on the total emancipation of Italy; but Bonaparte felt assured the Directory dared not refuse to ratify the treaty, for it would thereby act in opposition to the whole public opinion of France. The Directory had already outraged it by the rupture at Lille; far more would it do so by similar conduct at Udine, since it would justify all the reproaches of the royalist faction, which accused it of desiring a perpetual war. He was therefore sure that if he signed the treaty, he would compel the Directory to ratify it.

Bonaparte therefore boldly presented his ultimatum to M. de Cobentzel. Its terms were Venice for Austria, but the Adige and Mantua for the Cisalpine republic, the Rhine and Mayence for France, with the Ionian islands. On the 16th October, the final conference was held at Udine in the house of M. de Cobentzel. On both sides a determination was manifested to break off the negotiation, and M. de Cobentzel even announced that his carriages were ready. The plenipotentiaries were seated at a long rectangular table, the four Austrians on one side, and Bonaparte alone facing them on the other. M. de Cobentzel once more repeated all he had previously advanced, maintaining that the emperor when he gave up the keys of Mayence must receive those of Mantua, and that he could not act otherwise without forfeiting his honour; and he added that, at any rate, France had never concluded a more glorious peace, nor could she desire a more advantageous one, that she above all things longed for peace, and would know how to appreciate the conduct of a negotiator who sacrificed the interest and repose of his country to military ambition. Bonaparte, remaining calm and imperturbable during this insulting peroration, allowed M. de Cobentzel to finish his harangue; then moving to a stand on which stood a porcelain vase, given to M. de Cobentzel by Catherine the Great and displayed as a precious object, he seized it and dashed it on the floor, pronouncing these words: "War is declared; but remember that in less than three months I will break your monarchy as I break this porcelain." This extraordinary act and speech struck the Austrian plenipotentiaries dumb with amazement. Stiffly bowing to them he abruptly left the apartment, and, jumping into his carriage, ordered an officer to proceed with all haste to inform the Archduke Charles that hostilities would recommence in twenty-four hours. But M. Cobentzel, effectually intimidated, quickly dispatched the ultimatum signed to Passeriano. One of the conditions of the treaty was the liberation of M. de Lafayette, who had supported for five tedious years, with heroic fortitude, his dreary incarceration at Olmütz.

On the following day, the 17th October (26 Vendemiaire), the treaty was signed at Passeriano. It was dated from a small village situated between the two armies, which, however, was not actually visited as it possessed no building fitted for the accommodation of the negotiators. This village was called Campo-Formio. It gave its name to this celebrated treaty, the first concluded between the emperor and the French republic.

It was stipulated that the emperor, as sovereign of the Low Countries and member of the Empire, should acknowledge the Rhine as the boundary of France and deliver Mayence to the French troops, and that the Ionian Islands should remain in the possession of France; and that the Cisalpine republic should henceforth possess in perpetuity Romagna, the legations, the duchy of Modena, Lombardy, the Valteline, the Brescian, and the Mantuan, with the frontier of the Adige and Mantua. The emperor furthermore subscribed to sundry conditions springing out of this treaty and of others formerly concluded binding the French republic. In the first place he engaged to give the Brisgau to the Duke of Modena in compensation for his duchy. Next he bound himself to use his influence to procure an indemnity for the Stadtholder in Germany for the loss of Holland, and another for the king of Prussia on account of the small territory he had surrendered to France on the left bank of the Rhine. Under pressure of these engagements, the suffrage of the emperor was secured to France in the congress of Rastadt, touching the solution of all questions in which she was chiefly interested. In return for his valuable cessions, the emperor received Friuli, Istria, Dalmatia, and the mouths of the Cattaro.

France had never made so brilliant a peace. She had at length obtained her natural limits, and obtained them with the consent of Europe. A great revolution was consummated in Upper Italy. There an ancient state was annihilated and a new one founded. But the first was a despotic aristocracy, the irreconcilable enemy of liberty; the latter a republic democratically constituted, fitted to communicate freedom through the whole of Italy. It might be regretted, indeed, that the Austrians were not driven beyond the Isonzo, that all Upper Italy and the city of Venice itself were not incorporated in the Cisalpine republic: one campaign more and this result would have been secured. Personal considerations had prevented the young victor from making that campaign. Selfish interests began to sway the calculations of the man of genius, and now tarnished this the earliest and perhaps the best achievement of his life.

Bonaparte could scarcely doubt the ratification of the treaty; yet he was gnawed by a certain anxiety, for it was in direct contravention to the instructions of the Directory. He forwarded it by the hands of his trusty and pliant chief of the Staff, Berthier, to whom he was much attached, and whom he had not yet sent into France to enjoy the admiration of the Parisians. With his usual tact, he associated with the mere soldier a man of science, Monge, who had been named on the commission appointed to select works of art in Italy, and who, notwithstanding his extreme demagogical principles and mathematical tenacity, had been fascinated, like many others, by the magic influence of genius and glory.

Monge and Berthier reached Paris in a few days. They arrived in the middle of the night and aroused from his bed the president of the Directory, Larévellière-Lépeaux. Although the bearers of a treaty of peace, the two messengers were far from feeling the exuberance and confidence usual on such joyful occasions; on the contrary, they were embarrassed, like men condemned to open their mission with a painful exordium: in truth, they had to announce disobedience to the orders of government. It was only after a propitiatory preamble, in exculpation of the general, that they unfolded the actual tenor of the treaty. Larévellière received them with all the attention due to two such distinguished personages, one of whom at least was celebrated in the walks of science; but he refrained from pronouncing any opinion on the treaty, and simply intimated that the Directory would decide upon its merits. He presented it accordingly on the following morning to that body. Tidings of the peace had meanwhile circulated to the remotest corners of Paris and diffused unspeakable gladness; the conditions were unknown, but whatever they might be, a certainty prevailed they must be brilliant. Bonaparte was extolled as the marvel of his age, thus resplendent with a two-fold glory. As he had anticipated, the enthusiasm was boundless at his union of the pacificator with the warrior; and a peace he had signed in pure egotism was eulogized as an unparalleled act of military disinterestedness. "This young hero," so every body said, "has denied himself the renown of a fresh campaign to give peace to his country."

The manifestation of joy was so unequivocal and prompt, that the Directory could hardly venture to damp it by rejecting the treaty of Campo-Formio. True, the treaty itself was the result of flagrant contumacy, nor did the Directory lack good and sufficient reasons to withhold its ratification: nay, it had been advisable perhaps to teach an audacious officer, guilty of violating precise orders, a severe lesson. But it was impossible to defy public expectation, nor durst the Directory a second time reject peace after refusing it at Lille. It would have given weight to all the imputations of its enemies and rudely exasperated opinion. Another danger not less great warned it to submit. If the treaty were repudiated Bonaparte threw up his command, and reverses would surely follow the resumption of hostilities in Italy. How serious the responsibility to be braved in such a case! Moreover, the treaty secured enormous advantages; over and above the acquisitions of Leoben it gave Mayence and Mantua; it opened the way to a splendid future; in a word, it left all the forces of France disposable to crush and overwhelm England.

The Directory therefore approved the treaty: and the public gratification was only the more intense and heartfelt. With admirable cunning, the Directory sought, at the same time, to direct all animosities against England. The hero of Italy and his invincible comrades were but to fly from one enemy to another, and, on the very day the treaty was published, an ordinance nominated Bonaparte commander-in-chief of the army of England.

Bonaparte now prepared to quit Italy, to snatch at length a few moments of repose and reap the full harvest of his glory, the most exalted known in modern times. He had been appointed plenipotentiary at Rastadt, in conjunction with Bonnier and Trielhard, to negotiate peace with the Empire. It was arranged that he should likewise meet M. de Cobentzel at Rastadt to exchange the ratifications of the treaty of Campo-Formio. He purposed at the same time to observe the execution of the articles relative to the occupation of Mayence. With his accustomed forethought, he had taken care to stipulate that the Austrian troops should not enter Palma-Nuova until his own had obtained possession of Mayence.

Before departing for Rastadt he put the finishing touch to the affairs of Italy. He completed the nominations that remained for him to make in the Cisalpine republic, and settled the conditions of the sojourn in Italy of the French troops and their relations with the new republic. These troops were to be under the command of Berthier and to form a corps of 30,000 men maintained at the expense of the Cisalpine government, to remain until the general pacification of Europe. He withdrew the corps he had at Venice and delivered that city into the hands of the Austrians. The Venitian patriots were furiously incensed on finding themselves transferred to Austria. Bonaparte had assured them an asylum in the Cisalpine states, and stipulated for them with the Austrian government the privilege of realizing their property. They were not sensible of these favours, but railed with vehement imprecations against the conqueror who sacrificed them. Villetard, who had in some sort pledged the French government in their behalf, addressed a memorial to Bonaparte and was visited in return with his harshest displeasure. At the same time, it was not only the patriots who manifested a profound grief upon this occasion; the nobles and the people, who heretofore preferred Austria to France, because they liked the principles of the one and abhorred those of the other, felt all their national feelings rekindle, and now, at the last moment, displayed an affection for their ancient country which inspired an interest they had not previously awakened. A gloomy despair pervaded the whole community. One noble lady was driven to swallow poison, and the old Doge fell senseless at the feet of the Austrian officer who administered to him the oath of allegiance.

Ere he went Bonaparte addressed a proclamation to the Italians, in which he bid them adieu and gave them his last advice. It was characterized by that noble, emphatic, and somewhat oratorical strain which marked all his public language. "We have given you liberty," he said to the Cisalpines, "learn to preserve it. To be worthy your destiny, let your laws be wise and moderate, but executed with force and energy. Promote the spread of knowledge and respect religion. Form your battalions, not of men void of principles, but of citizens who live in the faith of the republic, and are closely attached to its prosperity. Most of you require to be impressed with a sense of your own strength and of the dignity which befits a freeman: divided and bowed for ages beneath tyranny, you could not have achieved your liberty; but in a few years, if left to yourselves, no power on earth will be strong enough to wrest it from you. Till then, the great nation will protect you against the attacks of your neighbours; its political system will be identified with yours. I leave you in a few days. The orders of my government and some imminent danger threatening the Cisalpine republic will alone recall me amongst you."

This last phrase furnished an answer to those who asserted he wished to make himself king of Lombardy. There was nothing he preferred to the title and distinction of the first general of the French republic. One of the Austrian plenipotentiaries had offered him, on the part of the emperor, a dominion in Germany; he had replied that he would owe his fortune only to the gratitude of the French people. Had he a prophetic glimpse of the future? No, certainly; but were he to remain merely the first citizen of the republic, we can understand he would elect to do so at this moment.

The Italians followed him with their regrets, and saw with pain this brilliant meteor disappear from amongst them. He traversed Piedmont with rapidity, on his way, through Switzerland, to Rastadt. Magnificent fêtes, and presents for himself and his wife, awaited him on the route. Princes and people were alike eager to behold a warrior so famous, the arbiter of so many destinies. At Turin the king had prepared gifts for presentation to him, in testimony of his gratitude for the support he had received from him with the Directory. In Switzerland, the reception by the inhabitants of the Pays-de-Vaud of the liberator of the Valteline was most enthusiastic. Young girls, attired in the three colours, brought him offerings of crowns. Everywhere was seen inscribed the maxim so dear to the Vaudois: One community cannot be the subject of another community. At Morat he visited the ossuary; wherever he went multitudes thronged around him. Cannons were discharged in the towns through which he passed. The government of Berne, which viewed with anger the enthusiasm inspired by the liberator of the Valteline, prohibited its officers from firing these salutes, but was not obeyed. On his arrival at Rastadt, Bonaparte found all the German princes impatient to see him. He forthwith put the French negotiators in an attitude becoming their mission and character. He refused to receive M. de Ferson, whom Sweden had chosen to represent her in the congress of the Empire, and whom his connection with the old court of France rendered unfit to treat with the French republic. This refusal occasioned a great sensation, and showed the constant care that Bonaparte took to exalt the great nation, as he called France in all his public papers. After having exchanged the ratifications of the treaty of Campo Formio, and made the necessary arrangements for the occupation of Mayence, he resolved to set out for Paris. He found nothing momentous to discuss at Rastadt, and foresaw interminable delays in arranging the affairs of all these petty German princes. Such a part was not according to his taste; besides, he was worn out with fatigue, and some impatience to reach Paris and ascend the capitol* of the modern Rome was only natural.

He left Rastadt, traversed France incognito, and arrived at Paris on the evening of the 15th Frimaire year VI. (5th December 1797). He proceeded straightway to seclude himself in a small house he had purchased in the rue Chantereine. This singular man, in whom pride was so paramount a quality, had all a woman's art in keeping out of sight. At the surrender of Mantua, he evaded the honour of personally superintending Wurmser's evacuation; now at Paris, he sought to hide himself in an obscure dwelling. He affected in his language, dress, and habits, a simplicity which struck the imaginations of men, and the more profoundly, from the effect of contrast. All Paris, apprized of his arrival, was on the alert to behold him. The minister of foreign affairs, M. de Talleyrand, for whom, at a distance, he had imbibed a predilection, proposed to visit him that same evening. Bonaparte begged to be excused receiving him, and deferred seeing him till the following day. In the morning the saloon at the Foreign office was crowded with great personages eager to salute the hero. Silent to all, he perceived Bougainville standing apart, and advancing to salute him, addressed to him a few words, such as, falling from his lips, carried with them an indefinable weight and charm. Already he seemed to ape the condescension of a sovereign towards a useful and celebrated subject. M. de Talleyrand afterwards presented him to the Directory. Although there were grounds of dissatisfaction existing between the Directory and the general, their interview nevertheless was full of cordiality. It suited the Directory to feign satisfaction and the general deference, if they did not feel it. But, in fact, the services were so great, the glory so dazzling, it was all but impossible to harbour discontent, or keep aloof from the general admiration. The Directory forthwith determined to prepare a triumphal festival for the formal presentation of the treaty of Campo Formio. It was appointed to be celebrated, not in the hall of audience, but in the great court of the Luxembourg. Everything was disposed to render this solemnity one of the most imposing of the revolution. The directors were ranged at the bottom of the court, on a platform, apparelled in the Roman costume. Around them, the ministers, the ambassadors, the members of the two councils, the magistracy, and the heads of administrations, were placed on seats piled in form of an amphitheatre. Splendid trophies composed of the numberless standards taken from the enemy were raised at equal distances, and gorgeous tri-coloured draperies festooned the walls. Galleries were crowded with the choicest portion of Parisian society. Bands of musicians were stationed in the enclosure. A numerous artillery was planted around the palace, to add its thunders to the swell of music and the roar of acclamations. Chenier had composed for the occasion one of his finest hymns.

The day selected for the ceremony was the 20th Frimaire, year VI. (10th December 1797). The Directory, the public functionaries, and the spectators, were all in their places awaiting with impatience the illustrious mortal whom few amongst them had yet seen. He appeared at length, accompanied by M. de Talleyrand, who was deputed to present him; for it was the diplomatist to whom the immediate homage was tendered. Survivors of that epoch, who in common with all beholders were struck by the attenuated frame, the pallid yet Roman countenance, the bright and flashing eye, of the young hero, still speak to this day of the effect he produced, of the indefinable impression of genius and authority he left upon their minds. An extraordinary emotion thrilled through the assembly. A thousand acclamations burst forth as he advanced upon the arena. Long live the republic! Long live Bonaparte! were the cries which resounded from all sides. When they subsided M. de Talleyrand raised his voice, and, in a judicious and concise speech, affected to refer the glory of the general, not to himself, but to the revolution, to the armies, to the great nation, in fine. He seemed in this to consult the modesty of Bonaparte, and, with his usual aptitude, to divine how he would wish to be spoken of in his own presence. M. de Talleyrand afterwards alluded to "what might be called," as he said, "his ambition;" but considering his primitive taste for simplicity, his love for the sciences, his favourite authors, the sublime Ossian with whom he learnt to detach himself from the earth, M. de Talleyrand expressed his fear lest some day it might need urgent solicitations to drag him from his studious retreat. The sentiment thus expressed by M. de Talleyrand was in all mouths, and re-echoed in the various orations pronounced during this great solemnity. Everybody said and repeated that the young general was devoid of ambition, for great was the apprehension of the contrary. When M. de Talleyrand had ceased, Bonaparte spoke, and uttered in a firm tone the disjointed paragraphs which follow:—

* [It is to be presumed that M. Thiers here alludes to the custom at Rome for victorious generals to mount in triumph to the Capitol upon their return from a successful expedition.]

"Citizens,

"The French people, to be free, had kings to combat.

"To obtain a constitution founded on reason, they had eighteen centuries of prejudices to overcome.

"The constitution of the year III. and you have triumphed over these obstacles.

"Religion, feudality, royalty, have successively during twenty centuries governed Europe; but from the peace you have just concluded dates the era of representative governments.

"You have succeeded in organizing the great nation, whose vast territory is circumscribed only because nature herself has assigned it bounds.

"You have done more. The two fairest regions of Europe, formerly so celebrated for the arts, the sciences, the great men to whom they gave birth, behold with the loftiest hopes the genius of liberty arise from the ashes of their ancestors.

"They are two pedestals on which the fates will plant two powerful nations.

"I have the honour to present to you the treaty signed at Campo Formio, and ratified by his majesty the Emperor.

"Peace guarantees the liberty, prosperity, and glory of the republic.

"When the happiness of the French people shall repose on better organic laws, all Europe will become free."

No sooner had he concluded this oration than fresh acclamations greeted him in deafening echoes. Barras, being president of the Directory, exercised the privilege of replying. His discourse was long, diffuse, and generally inappropriate; he eulogized with hyperbole the modesty and simplicity of the hero, and hazarded an adroit homage to the memory of Hoche, the supposed rival of the conqueror of Italy. "Why is Hoche not here," exclaimed the president of the Directory, "to meet, to embrace his friend?" --Hoche had, in fact, defended Bonaparte in the preceding year with generous warmth. Following the new impulse given to the public mind, Barras offered fresh laurels to Bonaparte, and invited him to gather them in England. After these three harangues, Chenier's hymn was chaunted in chorus, with the accompaniment of a magnificent orchestra. Two generals next advanced, ushered by the minister-at-war: they were the brave Joubert, the hero of the Tyrol, and Andréossy, one of the most distinguished officers of the artillery. Aloft, and fluttering in the breeze, they carried with them a resplendent flag, consecrated by the Directory to the army of Italy at the close of the campaign: the new oriflamme of the republic. It was studded with numberless characters embossed in gold, and those characters bore the following mementos: The army of Italy has made one hundred and fifty thousand prisoners; it has captured one hundred and sixty-six standards, five hundred and fifty pieces of siege artillery, six hundred pieces of field artillery, five bridge equipages, nine ships of the line, twelve frigates, twelve corvettes, eighteen galleys.—Armistices with the kings of Sardinia and Naples, the Pope, the dukes of Parma and Modena.—Preliminaries of Leoben.—Convention of Montebello with the republic of Genoa.—Treaties of peace of Tolentino and Campo Formio.—Liberty given to the people of Bologna, Ferrara, Modena, Massa-Carrara, Romagna, Lombardy, Brescia, Bergamo, Mantua, Cremona, a part of the district of Verona, Chiavenna, Bormio, and the Valteline; to the people of Genoa and of the Imperial fiefs, to the people of the departments of Corcyra, the Egæan sea and Ithaca.—Transmitted to Paris the master-pieces of Michael-Angelo, Guerchin, Titian, Paul Veronese, Corregio, Albano, Carraccio, Raphael, Leonardo da Vinci, &c.—Triumphed in eighteen pitched battles, MONTENOTTE, MILLESIMO, MONDOVI, LODI, BORGHETTO, LONATO, CASTIGLIONE, ROVEREDO, BASSANO, SAINT-GEORGES, FONTANA-NIVA, CALDIERO, ARCOLE, RIVOLI, LA FAFORITA, THE TAGLIAMENTO, TARWIS, NEUMARCKT.—Fought sixty-seven engagements.

Joubert and Andréossy delivered orations in their turn, and elicited flattering responses from the president of the Directory. After the speeches were concluded, the generals advanced to receive the embrace of the president of the Directory. At the moment Bonaparte was clasped to the bosom of Barras, the four other directors, impelled as it were by an involuntary impulse, threw themselves into the arms of the general. Tumultuous acclamations rent the air; the people outside, clustered in the adjoining streets, re-echoed the shouts; the cannon boomed, the music played; all brains were in a delirium, a whirl of intoxication. Thus it was that France cast herself headlong into the arms of an extraordinary man! Let us not accuse the weakness of our fathers; the glory of that hour comes to us through the mists of time and misfortunes, and yet how it transports us! Let us repeat with Æschylus: What would it have been had we seen the thing itself!

CHAPTER LVI.

GENERAL BONAPARTE AT PARIS; HIS RELATIONS WITH THE DIRECTORY.—PROJECT OF AN INVASION OF ENGLAND.—CONGRESS OF RASTADT.—CAUSES OF DIFFICULTY IN THE NEGOTIATIONS.—REVOLUTIONS IN HOLLAND, ROME, AND SWITZERLAND.—DOMESTIC SITUATION OF FRANCE; ELECTIONS OF THE YEAR VI.; NOMINATION OF TREILHARD TO THE DIRECTORY.—EXPEDITION TO EGYPT SUBSTITUTED FOR AN INVASION OF ENGLAND; PREPARATIONS FOR THAT EXPEDITION.

THE triumphal reception accorded by the Directory to General Bonaparte was followed by a series of splendid entertainments given in his honour by the directors, the members of the Councils, and the ministers. Each strove to excel in the sumptuousness of preparation. The hero of these festivities had occasion to remark the regard evinced towards him by the minister of foreign affairs, and to feel the attractive influence of the old French elegance. Amidst all these pomps, he preserved his simplicity, being affable though austere, seeming almost insensible to pleasure, and ever seeking out the gifted and the celebrated to converse apart of the art or science which they illustrated. The greatest names deemed it an honour to be distinguished by General Bonaparté.

The information of the young general scarcely exceeded that of an officer recently emerged from the military college. Yet with the inspiration of genius he was able to discourse upon topics the most strange to him, and to throw out those occasional bold, but original, suggestions, which are often the mere impertinences of ignorance, but which, coming from superior minds and expressed in their emphatic style, create illusions and deceive even professors themselves. This facility of treating all subjects was observed with surprise. The journals, which sought with avidity the minutest details regarding his person and movements, reporting daily in what house he had dined and what disposition he had shown, whether he was sad or cheerful, made special observation that when dining with François (de Neufchâteau) he had talked of mathematics with Lagrange and Laplace, of metaphysics with Sieyes, of poetry with Chenier, of legislation and law with Daunou. Though none dared venture to question him in company, a strong desire was universally entertained to lead him to speak of his campaigns. If he chanced to do so, he never spoke of himself, but of his army, of his soldiers, of republican valour; he depicted with force the movement and tumult of battles, portrayed with precision the decisive moment, showed the manner it was to be seized, and transported all who heard him by his lucid, stirring, and dramatic recitals. If his exploits had bespoke him a great captain, his conversation revealed an original and teeming mind, either vast or precise by turns, and always captivating whenever he pleased to throw aside his habitual reserve. He had dazzled masses by his glory; he now began to conquer, one by one, the principal men in France by personal intercourse. Admiration, previously excessive, became almost infatuation after he had been seen. Everything about him, even to those marks of a foreign origin, which time had not yet effaced in him, contributed to effect. Singularity always adds to the prestige of genius, especially in France, where, with the greatest uniformity of manners, oddity is strangely idolized. Bonaparte affected to shun the crowd and hide himself from the public gaze. He even sometimes resented extravagant proofs of enthusiasm. Madame de Stäel, who adored, as she had reason, grandeur, genius, and glory, evinced a lively impatience to encounter Bonaparte and pour forth her homage. To his imperious character, disposed to repress undue assumptions, it was offensive that she seemed to transgress the female province; he found her too spiritual and of too exalted aspirations; he detected perhaps her independence peering through her admiration; at all events he was cold, repulsive, unjust to her. She asked him one day, somewhat abruptly, who in his estimation was the greatest woman; he answered harshly, "she who has borne the most children." Thus was laid the foundation of that mutual antipathy, which entailed on her such unmerited sufferings, and incited him to acts of petty and brutal tyranny. Meanwhile he seldom appeared abroad, but lived secluded in his modest house in the rue Chantereine, the name of which had been changed, the department of Paris having ordered it to be called the rue de la Victoire. He saw only a few men of learning, Monge, Laplace, Lagrange, and Berthollet; a few generals, Desaix, Kleber, Caffarelli; certain artists, and particularly the celebrated actor whom France has lately lost, Talma, for whom he ever after manifested a strong predilection. When he left his residence it was usually in a plain vehicle; if he visited the theatre he sat shrouded in a grated box, and appeared to partake none of the glittering and dissipated tastes of his wife. Nevertheless he exhibited the warmest affection for her; he was enthralled by that enchanting grace which, in private life as on the throne, never forsook Madame Beauharnois, and with her supplied the place of beauty.

A seat having become vacant in the Institute by the banishment of Carnot, it was at once offered to him. He accepted it with alacrity, appeared on the day of his reception between Lagrange and Laplace, and ever after wore on public occasions the costume of a member of the Institute, affecting to conceal the warrior under the garb of science.

Such general homage was calculated to give umbrage to the heads of the government, who, possessing neither antiquity of rank nor personal greatness, were totally eclipsed by the soldier-pacificator. Still they testified towards him unbounded regard, and he responded by ostentatious marks of deference. The feeling which is uppermost is precisely that which is least shown. The Directory was far from evincing any of the fears it experienced. It received numerous reports from its spies, who frequented taverns and public places to hear the language used respecting Bonaparte; and, according to them, he was soon to place himself at the head of affairs, overturn an enfeebled government, and thus save France from the royalists and Jacobins. The Directory, feigning an excess of candour, showed him these reports, and professed to treat them with contempt, as if it believed the general wholly incapable of ambition. The general, equally dissembling on his part, expressed his gratitude for this frankness, and gave assurances he was worthy of the confidence reposed in him. But, notwithstanding, an indelible distrust prevailed on both sides. If the spies of the police warned the Directory of an intended usurpation, the officers who surrounded Bonaparte cautioned him against poison. The premature death of Hoche had originated absurd suspicions, and Bonaparte, who, although free from puerile apprehensions, was nevertheless prudential, adopted extreme precautions when he dined at the table of a certain director. He ate but little, and tasted only of the food he had observed the director himself partake, and of the wine he had seen him drink.

Barras took pains to represent himself as the author of Bonaparte's fortune, and, now that he had ceased to need his patronage, as a devoted friend. He exhibited an extraordinary affection for his person, and sought, with his usual suppleness, to convince him of his unfeigned attachment. He separated himself from the cause of his colleagues, and affected to stand apart. Bonaparte disregarded the advances of this director, whom he held in little esteem, and rewarded his sycophancy with no measure of confidence.

Meanwhile, Bonaparte was often consulted on various questions. A minister was deputed to summon him to the Directory, whither he repaired, took his seat by the side of the directors, and gave his opinion with that superiority of discernment which distinguished him equally in matters of administration and government as in those of war. In politics he inclined to the direction which resulted from the position he had assumed. On the occasion of the 18th Fructidor, we have seen that, when the impulse was once given and the defeat of the royalist faction assured, he stopped short, and refused to afford the government more support than exactly sufficed to prevent the restoration of monarchy. This object obtained, he would not even appear to connect himself with the Directory; he preferred to remain aloof, the speculation of all parties, neither allied nor embroiled with any. The attitude of a censor was one agreeable to his ambition. The part is an easy one to play with regard to a government assailed by factions on opposite sides, and constantly exposed to the risk of dissolution; and it is advantageous, because it attracts all malcontents, that is to say, all parties, who soon grow disgusted with a government which strives to curb without having sufficient power to crush them. Bonaparte's proclamations to the Cisalpines and the Genoese regarding the laws proposed against nobles, had served to indicate the actual tendency of his views. It was evident, and he studied no disguise, that he condemned the conduct the government had adopted subsequent to the 18th Fructidor. The patriots had naturally resumed a certain ascendency since that event, and the Directory, though not governed, was assuredly influenced by them. This was seen in its appointments, its measures, its whole spirit. Bonaparte, without departing from a suitable reserve, sufficiently marked his censure of the direction followed by the government; he seemed to contemn it as feeble and incapable, abandoning it to be conquered by one faction after being coerced by another. In a word, he made it clear that he did not partake its sentiments. He even acted so as to prove that, whilst determined to oppose the restoration of royalty, he was not disposed to accept the whole revolution and all its deeds. The anniversary of the 21st January * was approaching; and it required much negotiation to induce his appearance at the festival held on this the fifth celebration of the day. He had arrived at Paris in December, 1797. The year 1798 had opened (Nivose and Pluviose year VI). He declined to be present at the ceremony, as if he disapproved the act to be celebrated, or at least wished to make some reparation to the men whom his proclamations, antecedent to the 18th Fructidor, and the cannonade of the 13th Vendemiaire, had alienated. It had been proposed that he should officiate in all his capacities. Heretofore general-in-chief of the army of Italy and plenipotentiary of France at Campo-Formio, he was now one of the plenipotentiaries at the congress of Rastadt, and general of the army of England; hence, he ought to assist in the solemnities of his government. He alleged that these functions in no way bound him to take part in the celebration, and therefore his presence, being voluntary, would argue an approval he had no desire to give. At length a compromise was devised. The Institute was to appear in a body at the ceremony; he mingled in its ranks, and appeared to fulfil a mere corporate duty. Among all the titles already accumulated on his head, that of a member of the Institute was assuredly the most convenient, and he knew how to avail himself of it to advantage.

A rising fortune speedily attracts worshippers. A crowd of officers and parasites already surrounded Bonaparte, who asked him whether he would for ever restrict himself to the command of armies, and not at length take that position in the government of the country to which his ascendency and political genius justified him in aspiring. Without being yet able to determine what he might or ought to be, he felt distinctly enough that he was the first man of his time. Reflecting on the influence of Pichegru in the Five-Hundred, and on that of Barras in the Directory, he might well conclude a high political part was feasible to him; but there was none for him at this moment to play. He was too young to be a director; it was requisite to be forty years old, and he was not thirty. A dispensation of age was indeed spoken of, but that involved a concession which would alarm the republicans, give rise to a prodigious outcry, and certainly not repay the annoyances it would occasion. Besides, to take part as a fifth unit in the government, to have simply his vote in the Directory, to weary himself in struggles with councils still independent, offered no attractions to him; the odium of provoking a breach of the laws was not worth incurring for such a result. France had yet a powerful enemy to encounter, England; and, though Bonaparte was covered with glory, the most advisable course for him was to go forth and reap fresh laurels, leaving the government to exhaust itself in its painful struggle with contending parties.

We have seen that on the same day the treaty of Campo-Formio was ratified at Paris, the Directory, designing to arouse the public mind against England, created an army styled that of England, and gave the command of it to Bonaparte. The government was quite sincere in its intention to take the shortest course with England, and make a descent on her shores. In the audacity of ideas that prevailed at this epoch, such an enterprise was regarded as perfectly feasible. The expedition already attempted in Ireland, proved that the straits might be passed under favour of fogs, or a gale of wind. It was not imagined that the British people, with all their patriotism, not having then an adequate land-army, could resist the redoubtable warriors of Italy and the Rhine, and especially the genius of the hero of Castiglione, Arcole, and Rivoli. The government resolved to leave only 25,000 men in Italy, and recalled the remainder. As to the grand army of Germany, composed of the two armies of the Rhine, and the Sambre-and-Meuse, it proposed to reduce it to the strength required to awe the Empire during the negotiations at Rastadt, and distribute the residue along the coasts of the ocean. The same destination was assigned to all the disposable troops. Engineer officers were commissioned to survey the coasts, and select the best points for embarkation; orders were issued to assemble large flotillas in the different ports, and the greatest activity was infused into all the naval establishments. The hope was still entertained that a breeze would ultimately scatter the English squadron blockading the roads of Cadiz, and that the Spanish fleet might then be able to sail out and join the French. As to the Dutch fleet, which was likewise expected to strengthen the French navy, it had recently suffered a severe check off the Texel, and its shattered remains driven back into the ports of Holland. But the combined French and Spanish squadrons would suffice to cover the passage of a flotilla, and protect the transport of sixty or eighty thousand men into England. To carry out all these designs, some fresh means for raising money were to be devised. The budget, fixed, as we have mentioned, at 616 millions for the year VI., was not calculated to meet an extraordinary armament. It was determined, therefore, to make trade co-operate in an enterprise peculiarly adapted to promote its interests, and the scheme of a voluntary loan of eighty millions was planned, to be hypothecated on the state. Part of the advantages to result from the expedition were to be converted into prizes, and drawn by lot amongst the lenders. The Directory negotiated the opening of this loan through some of the most eminent merchants. The project was communicated to the legislature, and, at first, appeared to be received with favour. From fifteen to twenty millions of subscriptions were at once obtained. At the same time, the Directory levelled against England not only its preparations, but its rigours too. A law existed interdicting the import of English goods; the executive was now armed with authority to make domiciliary visits for the purpose of discovering them, which it caused to be put in force throughout the whole of France on the same day and at the same hour. †

Bonaparte seemed to abet this great movement

* [The day of Louis XVI.'s execution.]

† The 15th Nivose year VI. (4th January 1798.)

and to give himself to it; but, at heart, he was indisposed towards the enterprise. To land sixty thousand men in England, march on London and occupy it, was not in his opinion the chief difficulty. But he felt conscious that to conquer the country and retain possession of it was impossible; it might be ravaged, plundered of much of its wealth, thrown back, annihilated, for half a century; still the invading army must be eventually sacrificed, and he its leader might have to return almost in solitude, after executing a mere barbarous incursion. Later, with a power more gigantic, a greater experience of his means, and an intense personal exasperation against England, he seriously thought of engaging her on her own soil and hazarding his fortune against hers; but at present he had other ideas and other designs. One reason especially prevailed to divert him from the enterprise. The preparations would still require several months; the spring and summer were yet to come and pass away, and the fogs and gales of the next winter to be awaited, ere a descent could be safely attempted. Now, he was averse to remain a whole year idle at Paris, adding nothing to his great name, and descending in opinion by the very fact of his not rising. He turned therefore to a project of another kind, one equally stupendous as a descent on England, but more original in design, more productive in its results, more consonant with the temper of his imagination, and above all more prompt of execution. We have seen that while in Italy the Mediterranean occupied a large share of his attention, that he had created a navy of no inconsiderable force, and that, in the partition of the Venitian dominions, he had taken care to reserve the isles of Greece for France; that he had opened intrigues in Malta, with the hope of wresting it from the Knights and the English; and, lastly, that he had often directed his eyes to Egypt, as the intermediary station France ought to hold between Europe and Asia, in order to monopolize the commerce of the Levant, and possibly that of India. This idea had rivetted itself in his imagination and now almost wholly engrossed him. Some valuable documents on Egypt, on its colonial, maritime, and military importance, were deposited in the ministry of Foreign Affairs, which he procured from M. de Talleyrand and perused with avidity. Obliged to traverse the coast in furtherance of the preparations against England, he filled his carriage with books of travels and memoirs relating to Egypt. Thus, whilst apparently promoting the views of the Directory, he had another enterprise in his mind, and if in person he scoured the strands of ancient Batavia, his imagination was wandering on the shores of the East. Dim visions of some vast future floated in his fancy. To plunge into those countries of early enlightenment and glory, where Alexander and Mahomet had overthrown and founded empires, to make his name famous in their regions, and have it wafted back to France resounding with the echoes of Asia, formed the phantasmagoria of a delicious reverie.

He devoted then the months of Pluviose and Ventôse (January and February) to a mission along the coast, imparting an active direction to the preparations in progress, but absorbed in other schemes and prospects.

Whilst the republic was thus concentrating all its resources for an attack on England, it had still important interests to arrange on the continent. Its political province was in truth sufficiently ample. It had to treat at Rastadt with the Empire, that is to say, with the whole extant feudal system, and it had to tutor in their new career three republics, its offspring, to wit, the Batavian, Cisalpine, and Ligurian republics. Placed at the head of the democratic system and in presence of the feudal, its immediate object was to prevent fresh collisions between the antagonist principles, in order to avoid a renewal of the conflict it had recently terminated with so much glory, but which had cost it such fearful efforts. Such was its task, and its accomplishment presented difficulties not less great than those obstructing the invasion and conquest of England.

The Congress of Rastadt had been assembled for two months. Bonnier, a man of considerable capacity, and Treilhard, a straightforward but rude personage, represented France. Bonaparte, during the few days he remained at Rastadt, had secretly settled with Austria the plan to be followed in the occupation of Mayence and the tête de pont of Manheim. It had been agreed that the Austrian troops should retire on the approach of the French, and abandon the contingents of the Empire; whereupon the French troops were to seize Mayence and the tête de pont of Manheim, either by intimidating the contingents of the Empire, reduced to themselves, or by assault and battery. And thus the affair was executed. The troops of the Elector, seeing themselves forsaken by the Austrians, evacuated Mayence. Those at the tête de pont of Manheim, attempted resistance, but were compelled to succumb. A few hundred men were nevertheless sacrificed. After this event it became manifest that, by the secret articles of the treaty of Campo Formio, Austria had conceded the limit of the Rhine to France, since she consented to surrender the most important points on that river. It had been furthermore agreed that during the negotiations the French army should quit the right bank of the Rhine and retrograde to the left, from Basle to Mayence; whilst at that height it might continue to occupy the right bank, skirting the Maine but not crossing it. As to the Austrian armies, they were to withdraw beyond the Danube and even to the Lech, and evacuate the fortresses of Ulm, Ingolstadt, and Philipsbourg. Their position accordingly became, with respect to the Empire, nearly similar to that of the French army. The deputation of the Empire had in fact to deliberate within a circle of soldiers. Austria evaded an exact fulfilment of the secret articles, for, under favour of a specious device, she left garrisons in the three fortresses specified. France winked however at this infraction of the treaty, not wishing to disturb the good understanding. The question of mutually accrediting ambassadors had been likewise mooted; but to this Austria objected, alleging that for the moment it was sufficient to correspond by means of the ministers of the two powers at Rastadt. This refusal certainly evinced no great eagerness to institute amicable relations with France; but after her defeats and humiliations, a little ill-humour on the part of Austria might be expected and pardoned.

The first explanations between the deputation of the Empire and the Austrian envoys were very bitter. The states of the Empire complained, in truth, that Austria contributed to despoil them by confirming the line of the Rhine to the French republic, and by surrendering in a perfidious manner the city of Mayence and the tête de pont of Manheim; and they, moreover, complained that Austria, after having dragged the Empire into her special quarrel, abandoned it and gave away its provinces to procure for herself Italian possessions in exchange. The ministers of the emperor retorted that he had been driven into the war from regard for the interests of the Empire and in defence of the Alsatian feudatories; that after having taken up arms in their behalf, he had made extraordinary efforts during six consecutive years; that he had found himself successively abandoned by all the states of the Confederation; that he had sustained almost alone the whole burden of the war; that he had lost in the conflict a considerable part of his own dominions, and especially the rich provinces of Belgium and Lombardy; and that, after such efforts so cruelly rewarded, he had hoped to experience gratitude and not reproaches. The real fact was that the emperor had used the pretext of the Alsatian feudatories to commence the war, which he had prosecuted for his individual aggrandisement; that he had involved the Germanic confederation therein in its own despite; and that now he betrayed it to indemnify himself at its expense. After lively recriminations, which ended in nothing, the parties cooled and proceeded to discuss the bases of the negotiation. The French demanded the left bank of the Rhine, and proposed, in order to compensate the princes dispossessed of their dominions, the medium of secularizations. Austria, who, not content with having acquired the greatest portion of the Venitian territory, desired to obtain a further equivalent in certain bishoprics, and had besides a secret understanding with France; Prussia, who had stipulated with France to be recompensed on the right bank, for the duchy of Cleves which she had lost on the left; the dispossessed princes, who preferred to have possessions on the right of the Rhine, sheltered from the proximity of the French, to the recovery of their ancient principalities;—all, Austria, Prussia, and the dispossessed princes, upheld the cession of the limit of the Rhine and the adoption of secularizations as the means of indemnity. It was difficult therefore for the Empire to resist such a concurrence of potential voices. But as the powers given to the deputation made the integrity of the Germanic empire an express condition, the French plenipotentiaries declared them too limited and insufficient, and insisted upon others. The deputation procured fresh powers from the Diet in consequence; but, although then authorized to concede the line of the Rhine, it persisted in a refusal. It alleged various reasons, for reasons are never wanting in such cases.—"The German empire," the deputation argued, "had not been the first to declare war. Before the Diet of Ratisbon had promulgated the declaration, Custine had surprised Mayence and invaded Franconia. It had therefore simply defended itself. The deprivation of a part of its territory would lead to the overthrow of its constitution and endanger its existence, which was of importance to all Europe. The provinces on the left side, which were proposed to be torn from it, were of small consideration to a state become so enormous as the French republic. The line of the Rhine might be replaced by another military line, the Moselle for example. In fine, the republic would lose, for very miserable advantages, the ineffable and to it useful glory of displaying political moderation." Accordingly, the deputation offered to convey all that the Empire had possessed beyond the Moselle, and to accept that stream as the boundary. To these arguments France replied by others equally cogent.—"True, she had taken the offensive and commenced the war de facto; but the veritable war, that of intention, of machinations, of preparations, had been commenced by the Empire. It was at Treves and Coblentz that emigrants had been protected and organized; it was from there the phalanxes destined to humble, brutalize, dismember France, were appointed to issue forth on their mission. Now, France, instead of being conquered, was victorious; whereof she was disposed to profit, not by returning the evil intended for her, but by indemnifying herself for the war waged against her by claiming her natural boundary, the course of the Rhine."

Thus was the dispute prolonged, for concessions, even when unavoidable, are always contested. Yet it was evident that the deputation would eventually yield the left bank, and only continued this resistance to obtain better terms on other points in controversy. Such was the state of the negotiations at Rastadt in the month of Pluviose year VI. (February 1798).

It was found that Augereau, to whom the Directory, to get rid of him, had given the command of the army of Germany, had congregated around him the most violent Jacobins. He afforded manifest ground of offence to the Empire, which dreaded above all things the contagion of the new principles, and loudly protested against the circulation of incendiary writings in Germany. So general a ferment prevailed throughout Europe, that the supposition of French interference was not necessary to account for the propagation of revolutionary works. But the Directory deemed it incumbent to obviate all causes of complaint; besides, it was dissatisfied with the turbulent conduct of Augereau, and it accordingly deprived him of his command, deputing him instead to Perpignan under pretence of there assembling an army, destined, it was said, to act against Portugal. The Portuguese court, at the instigation of Pitt, had delayed to ratify the treaty concluded with the republic, and condign chastisement was threatened it as the ally of England. At the same time, nothing more was intended than an idle demonstration, and the commission bestowed on Augereau amounted in fact to a covert disgrace.

Besides the immediate relations now renewed with the powers of Europe, France had to direct, as we have mentioned, the three new republics. These were naturally agitated by opposite parties. The mission of France was to save them from the convulsions by which she had herself been torn. For this she was invoked and subsidized. She had armies in Holland and in the Cisalpine and Ligurian states, maintained at the expense of those republics. If, to avoid the appearance of menacing their independence, she left them to themselves, the danger was incurred of inducing either a counter-revolution or an outbreak of Jacobinism. In the first event, the republican system was put in peril; in the latter, the continuance of a general peace. If the Jacobins became masters in Holland, they were almost sure to give umbrage to Prussia and Germany; if in Liguria and the Cisalpine, they might provoke convulsions in Italy and recall Austria into the field. Hence, it was essential to moderate the course of these republics; but in so doing an inconvenience of another kind was engendered. Europe upbraided France with having made the Dutch, the Cisalpines, and the Genoese, subjects rather than allies, and with aspiring to universal dominion. It was incumbent, therefore, to select agents possessing precisely the shade of opinion suitable to the country appointed for their residence, and with sufficient tact to make the influence of France felt without being visible. Thus there were difficulties, we perceive, of divers kinds to encounter, in maintaining face to face, and maintaining without a collision, the two systems which had been recently arrayed against each other in Europe. We have seen them engaged in warfare for a series of six years. We are now to behold them for one year consumed in negotiations, and that year will demonstrate, yet better than actual hostilities, their natural incompatibility.

We have already had occasion to specify the different parties which divided Holland. The moderate and prudent party, which desired a national and temperate constitution, had to combat the Orangeists, partisans of the Stadtholder, the Federalists, upholders of the old provincial divisions, ambitious to domineer in their several provinces, and content to admit only a feeble federal connection, and lastly, the Democrats or Jacobins, advocates of a pure democracy and unity. The Directory was naturally inclined to support the first party in opposition to the three others, because it hoped, without deviating into any of the contrary extremes, to combine the old federative system with an adequate concentration of government. The Directory has been largely abused for desiring everywhere a republic one and indivisible, and much imperfect reasoning has been wasted on its system in this respect. The republic one and indivisible, conceived in 1793, had always been a profound idea, had it not been the offspring of a resistless instinct. A country so homogeneous, so thoroughly amalgamated as France, could not adopt the federal system. A country threatened with such peril as France, would have been ruined by adopting it. It was suitable neither to its geographical configuration nor to its political situation. Assuredly to insist upon unity and indivisibility in all cases to the same extent as in France would have been absurd; but the Directory, placed at the head of a new system, and constrained to procure powerful auxiliaries, must necessarily seek to give strength and consistence to its new allies; and there can be neither strength nor consistence without a certain degree of unity and concentration. Such was the idea, or to speak more correctly, the instinct, which governed, which could not fail to govern almost unwittingly, the heads of the French republic.

Holland with its old federal system would have been reduced to perfect impotency. Its national assembly had not yet been able to give it a constitution. This assembly was fettered by all the regulations of the old states-general of Holland, and federalism predominated. The partisans of unity and a moderate constitution demanded the abolition of these regulations and the prompt establishment of a constitution. The French envoy, Noël, was accused of favouring the federalists. France could no longer delay taking a part. Joubert was sent to command the army of Holland,—Joubert, who had been one of Bonaparte's lieutenants in Italy, and gained celebrity for his march through the Tyrol, a modest, disinterested, brave, and devoted patriot. Noël was replaced by Delacroix: it must be confessed a more discreet choice might have been made. The Directory was unfortunately deficient in characters adapted for diplomacy. There were many well informed and distinguished men amongst the members of the existing and dissolved assemblies, but they were unacquainted with the forms of diplomatic intercourse; they were stiff and dogmatic, and it was rare to find any who united firmness of principles with pliancy of manners, such as it behoved envoys to foreign courts to possess, in order that they might at once impose respect for the new doctrines and conciliate antiquated prejudices. On arriving in Holland, Delacroix attended a festival given by the diplomatic committee. All the foreign ministers were invited to be present. After holding in their presence the most demagogical language, Delacroix at last started up, glass in hand, and exclaimed: "Why is there not a Batavian brave enough to poniard the regulations on the altar of the country?" The effect which such an effusion was calculated to produce on strangers may be easily conceived. The regulations, in fact, were speedily poniarded. Forty-three deputies had already protested against the operations of the national assembly. These met on the 3d Pluviose (22d January 1798), at the palace of Haarlem, and there supported by the French troops, proceeded according to the example set at Paris, four months previously, on the 18th Fructidor. They expelled from the national assembly a certain number of suspected deputies, caused some to be imprisoned, annulled the regulations, and organized the assembly into a species of convention. In a few days, a constitution nearly similar to that of France was framed and put in force. Desirous of imitating the convention in all things, the new lawgivers composed the government of the members of the existing assembly and constituted themselves into a Directory and Legislative-body. The men who come forward to effectuate movements like these are always the most decided of their party. Hence, it was to be feared that the new Batavian government would be strongly tainted with democracy, and that, under the influence of an ambassador like Delacroix, it would transgress the bounds the French Directory was anxious to prescribe it. For the rest, this Dutch parody on the 18th Fructidor failed not to provoke from European politicians, and particularly from the Prussian, acrimonious remarks that France governed Holland, and extended in reality to the waters of the Texel.

The Ligurian republic was pursuing a satisfactory course, although secretly agitated, like all new states, by two parties equally exaggerated in principles. As to the Cisalpine, it was abandoned to furious discords. The spirit of locality was an inevitable source of disunion to the Cisalpins, who of old belonged to several states successively amalgamated by Bonaparte. But besides this inherent element of division, the agents of Austria, the nobles, the priests, the violent democrats, all conspired to distract the new republic. Of these the democrats were the most dangerous, inasmuch as they had a powerful support in the army of Italy, composed, as we know, of the most hot-brained patriots in France. The Directory experienced as much difficulty in checking the impulse of its armies abroad as in guiding the tone of its ministers, and encountered, in this respect, as many obstacles as in any other. Hitherto it had not accredited a minister to the new republic. Berthier alone, in his capacity of general-in-chief, still represented the French government. It was now proposed to regulate, by a treaty of alliance, the relations between the two republics, parent and child. Such a treaty was accordingly framed at Paris, and transmitted for the ratification of the two Cisalpine Councils. An alliance, offensive and defensive in all contingencies, was therein stipulated, and until the Cisalpine republic should become a military state, France covenanted to lend it the succour of 25,000 men on the following conditions:—the Cisalpine was to find barracks, magazines, and hospitals, and furnish ten millions a-year for the maintenance of these troops. In case of war it was to contribute an extraordinary subsidy. France presented to her ally a considerable portion of the artillery captured from the enemy, in order that he might fortify his strongholds. These conditions bore nothing outrageous on the face of them; yet several of the Cisalpine deputies in the Council of Ancients, ill-disposed towards the republican system and France, pretended that the treaty was too onerous, that undue advantage had been taken of the dependent state of the new government, and prevailed to reject the treaty. A manifest perversity was thereby displayed. Having been obliged of himself to choose the individuals composing the Councils and government, Bonaparte had been unable to insure the eligibility of all his selections, and some amendment now proved necessary. The present councils, nominated arbitrarily by Bonaparte, were, therefore, modified arbitrarily by Berthier. Some of the most obstinate members were cashiered, and the treaty again presented, when it met an immediate approval. It was to be regretted that France found herself compelled thus openly to interfere, as Austria instantly protested that, notwithstanding all the pledges given at Campo-Formio, the Cisalpine was not an independent republic, but clearly a mere province of France. She even opposed difficulties to the reception of Marescalchi, who had been accredited at Vienna as the Cisalpine minister.

The territories occupied by France and the new republics intermingled with those of still feudal Europe, in a manner dangerous to the continuance of peace between the two rival systems. Switzerland wholly feudal, though republican, was enclosed between France, Savoy, now a French province, and the Cisalpine. Piedmont, with which France had contracted an alliance, was enveloped by France, Savoy, the Cisalpine, and the Ligurian. The Cisalpine and the Ligurian republics, again, encompassed the duchies of Parma and Tuscany, and approached near enough to communicate their own excitement to Rome, and even Naples. The Directory, however, had taken the precaution to enjoin upon its agents the strictest reserve, and prohibited them to hold out hopes to the democrats. On the contrary, Ginguené in Piedmont, Cacault in Tuscany, Joseph Bonaparte at Rome, and Trouvé at Naples, had all orders to evince the most amicable dispositions towards the potentates at whose courts they resided. They were instructed to give assurances that the Directory harboured no intentions of propagating revolutionary principles; that it was satisfied to maintain the republican system where it was established, but would encourage no steps to extend it among powers which kept faith with France. The intentions of the Directory on the point were sincere and prudent. It desired, doubtless, the progress of the revolution; but was no longer impelled to accelerate it by arms. It resolved that if a revolution broke out in any fresh places, France should not be reproached with an active participation. Moreover, Italy was full of princes, the relatives or allies of the great monarchs, who could not be injured without provoking superior hostilities. Austria, for instance, would not fail to interfere in behalf of Tuscany, Naples, and perhaps Piedmont; whilst Spain would assuredly step to the rescue of the prince of Parma. It was good policy, therefore, to avoid the responsibility if any important disturbances occurred.

Such were the views of the Directory; but it was beyond its capacity to control passions, and particularly those of liberty. Could it prevent French, Ligurian, Cisalpine democrats from corresponding with Piedmontese, Tuscan, Roman, Neapolitan democrats, and inspiring them with the ardour of their own opinions, sanguineness, and hopes? These told them that policy hindered the French government from openly interfering in the revolutions everywhere preparing, but that it would protect them when once accomplished; that courage only was wanted to make the attempt, and that succours would soon arrive to them.

True, all the Italian states were more or less agitated. Arrests were numerous in every city, but the French ministers interposed only by occasional reclamations in favour of individuals unjustly persecuted. In Piedmont, where wholesale incarcerations took place, the intercession of France was often tendered with success. In Tuscany much greater moderation was observed. At Naples a large class of men existed who had embraced the new opinions, against the increase of which a court, equally destitute of morality and sense, strove madly with fetters and punishments. The French ambassador, Trouvé, was loaded with insults. He was isolated as if infected with the plague. The Neapolitans were forbidden to visit him. He had even difficulty in procuring the attendance of a physician. All were thrown into prison who were accused of holding communication with the French legation, or who wore their hair cut and without powder. The ambassador's letters were seized, broken open, and detained by the police for ten or twelve days. Frenchmen, too, had been assassinated. Even when Bonaparte was in Italy, he had found it difficult to restrain the fury of the court of Naples, and now that the terror of his presence was removed, we may judge of what it was capable. The French government had forces sufficient severely to chastise its offences; but to avoid disturbing the general peace, it instructed Trouvé to observe the utmost forbearance, restrict himself to representations, and endeavour to reclaim it to the dictates of reason.

The government, however, tottering nearest to its ruin was the papal. Not that it took no pains to defend itself, for it likewise made multitudinous arrests; but an aged pontiff with his spirit quenched, and a few feeble incompetent cardinals, could with difficulty struggle against the evils of the times. Already, at the instigation of the Cisalpins, the March of Ancona had revolted and formed itself into a republic. Thence the democrats preached rebellion throughout the whole Roman state. They had not many partisans, it is true, but they were aided by the general discontent. The papal government had lost its imposing splendour in the eyes of the people, since the contributions levied at Tolentino had compelled it to part with the most costly goods and jewels of the Holy See. New taxes, the creation of a paper currency depreciated below a third of its nominal value, the alienation of a fifth of the possessions of the clergy, had sufficed to exasperate all classes, even the ecclesiastics themselves. The Roman grandees, who had imbibed some of the enlightenment shed over Europe during the eighteenth century, also murmured loudly against an emasculated and imbecile government, and avowed that it was time the temporal power should pass from the hands of ignorant incapable monks, unused to the treatment of human affairs, into those of citizens conversant with the customs and practices of the world. Thus the dispositions of the Roman people were far from favourable to the Pope. Still the democrats were not numerous; they inspired prejudices on the ground of religion, to which they were deemed enemies. The French artists studying at Rome encouraged them by exhortations; but Joseph Bonaparte laboured to restrain them, representing that they had not sufficient force to achieve a decisive movement; that they would only ruin themselves and uselessly compromise France; and that, at all events, she would afford them no support but leave them exposed to the consequences of their imprudence.

Nevertheless, on the morning of the 6th Nivôse (26th December 1797), they came to apprize him that a movement was prepared. He dismissed them with an admonition to remain quiet, but they disbelieved the protestations of the French minister. The system of all the promoters of revolutions was to hazard an insurrectionary blow and trust to involving France in spite of herself. Accordingly, they assembled on the 8th Nivôse (28th December) to commence a revolt. Dispersed by the papal dragoons they sought refuge within the jurisdiction of the French ambassador, under the porticoes of the Corsini palace which he inhabited. Joseph hastened to the scene accompanied by some French officers and General Duphot, a distinguished young soldier of the army of Italy. He attempted to interpose between the papal troops and the insurgents in the hope of preventing a massacre. But the papal soldiery, paying no respect to the ambassador, fired and killed at his side the unfortunate Duphot. This young man was about to espouse a sister-in-law of Joseph Bonaparte. His death caused an extraordinary sensation. Several of the foreign ministers hurried to the French embassy, and amongst the first the Spanish envoy, D'Azara. The Roman government alone allowed fourteen hours to elapse without sending to the French minister's, although he had repeatedly written to it in the course of the day. Bonaparte, highly incensed, immediately demanded his passports. They were given to him, and he forthwith took his departure for Tuscany.

This event produced a lively impression. It was clear that the Roman government might have obviated the occurrence, since it was anticipated two days previously, but had preferred to encourage the outbreak with the view of inflicting upon the democrats a severe punishment, and that, in the tumult, it had neglected to take the precautions necessary to prevent a violation of the rights of nations and an outrage upon the French embassy. Great indignation was manifested in the Cisalpine republic and by all the Italian patriots against the Holy See. The army of Italy demanded with loud shouts to be led against Rome.

The Directory was embarrassed. It acknowledged in the Pope the spiritual head of the party inveterately opposed to the revolution, and to destroy this high-priest of an antiquated and tyrannical religion, garbed as Christian, was a sore temptation, notwithstanding the danger of offending the European powers and provoking their intervention. So, disregarding caution and the inconveniences of hostile determination, revolutionary zeal prevailed, and the Directory ordered Berthier, who commanded in Italy, to march upon Rome. It hoped, at the same time, that as the Pope was neither the kinsman nor ally of any sovereign, his fall would no occasion any powerful interposition.

Boisterous was the exultation of all true republicans and adherents of philosophy. On the 22 Pluviose (10th February 1798), Berthier arrived in sight of the ancient capital of the world, which the French army had not yet visited. The soldiers paused for an instant to contemplate the venerable and magnificent city. The Spaniard D'Azara, the usual mediator of the Italian powers with France, hastened to the head-quarters of the army to negotiate a convention. The castle of Saint-Angelo was delivered to the French, on the condition, natural amongst civilized nations, of respecting religion, public establishments, persons and property The Pope shut himself in the Vatican, and Berthier, introduced by the gate of the People, was escorted to the Capitol, like some old Roman triumpher. The democrats at the summit of their wishes, assembled in the Campo-Vaccino, where the vestiges of the ancient forum are perceptible, and, surrounded by a stupid populace, ready to applaud any novelty, proclaimed the Roman republic. A notary drew up an instrument whereby the people, who styled themselves "the Roman People," declared they resumed their sovereignty and constituted themselves into a republic. The Pope had been left in solitude at the Vatican. A deputation waited on him to demand his abdication of the temporal sovereignty, for it was not intended to intermeddle with his spiritual supremacy. He answered, with some dignity, that he could not strip himself of a possession which belonged not to him but to the successors of the Apostles, and which he held only in trust. This theological thesis appeared of little weight in the eyes of republican generals. The pontiff, treated with all the attentions due to his age and office, was abstracted from the Vatican during the night and conducted into Tuscany, where he found an asylum in a convent. The people of Rome seemed to regret but indifferently the loss of this ruler, who had nevertheless reigned over them upwards of twenty years.

Unfortunately, excesses, not against persons, but against property, sullied the entry of the French into the ancient metropolis of the world. There was no longer at the head of the army that stern and inflexible chief, who, less from virtue than an abhorrence of disorder, had so severely punished plunderers. Bonaparte alone could have bridled cupidity in a country so stocked with riches. Berthier had departed for Paris, and Massena succeeded him. This general, to whom France owes everlasting gratitude for saving it at Zurich from inevitable ruin, was accused of having set the first example. It was one at all events that found numerous imitators. Palaces, convents, superb collections, were mercilessly rifled. Jews, in the train of the army, purchased for insignificant sums magnificent objects recklessly abandoned to them by the depredators. The waste was as revolting as the pillage itself. We are bound to record the melancholy fact: it was not the subaltern officers or the soldiers who gave way to these temptations, but the superior officers. All the articles carried off, and to which the rights of conquest applied, ought to have been deposited in a common receptacle and sold for the profit of the army, which had received no pay for five months. The want of an efficient financial organization had delayed the payment of the subsidy by the Cisalpine republic stipulated in the treaty with France. The soldiers and subalterns were in the most horrible destitution; and they naturally felt indignant at the spectacle of their leaders indecently gorging themselves with spoil and tarnishing the glory of the French name, without any relief or advantage to the army. A mutiny broke out against Massena; the officers assembled in a church and resolved that they would no longer serve under him. Some of the people, evilly-inclined towards the French, prepared to seize the opportunity of this misunderstanding to attempt reprisals. Massena forthwith withdrew the army out of Rome, leaving a garrison in the castle of Saint-Angelo. The danger put an end to the mutiny; but the officers remained in combination, and persisted in demanding the punishment of the plunderers and the supercession of Massena.

Here we see exemplified the fact that to the difficulty of tempering the course of the new republics, of selecting and directing agents, was added that of curbing the armies, and all this at immense distances for administrative communications. The Directory recalled Massena, and dispatched to Rome a commission, composed of four upright and enlightened individuals, to organize the new republic: they were Daunou, Monge, Florent, and Faypoult. The latter, an able and honest administrator, was charged with all that related to the finances. The army of Italy was divided into two corps: that which had been instrumental in dethroning the Pope was called the army of Rome.

It was necessary to excuse this fresh revolution to other powers. Spain, whose piety might be supposed to be shocked, but who was under French influence, offered no remonstrance. But interest is keener than religious zeal. Accordingly, the discontented courts were found to be those of Vienna and Naples. To Austria the extension of French influence in Italy was extremely unpalatable. To mitigate her anger, the intention of incorporating the new republic with the Cisalpine was forborne, and it was erected a separate state. The union of the two would have too forcibly awakened the idea of Italian unity, and accredited the imputed design of rendering all Italy democratic. Although the emperor had not sent a minister to Paris, yet Bernadotte was deputed to appease him with explanations and to reside at Vienna. As to the court of Naples, its rage partook of frenzy at witnessing the revolution thus striding towards it. Nothing less than two or three of the Roman provinces would serve to pacify it. It demanded especially the duchy of Benevento and the territory of Ponte-Corvo, which lay very conveniently for its dominion. Garat was sent to negotiate with it: Trouvé being transferred to the Cisalpine republic.

The revolution then was making formidable progress, and more rapidly than was altogether agreeable to the Directory. We have already mentioned a country into which it threatened to penetrate, namely Switzerland. It might seem that Switzerland, the ancient land of liberty, famed for its primitive and pastoral manners, had nothing to learn from France and could have no cause for change; yet, though the thirteen cantons were governed with republican forms, it did not thence result that equity was paramount in the mutual relations of the different republics, or more especially in their relations with the people. On the contrary, feudalism, which is simply a military hierarchy, prevailed with regard to those republics, and there were communities dependent on other communities, as a vassal on his suzerain, and groaning beneath a yoke of iron. Aargau and the Pays de Vaud were in this manner subject to the aristocracy of Berne, the Lower-Valais to the Upper-Valais, and the Italian bailiwicks, that is to say, the valleys pending on the side of Italy, to different cantons. Numerous communes moreover belonged to certain towns. The canton of Saint-Gall rested under the feudal jurisdiction of a convent. Nearly all the subject districts had become so on conditions specified in charters now buried in oblivion, and which it was forbidden to bring to light. The country in almost every instance depended on the neighbouring town, and was harassed by odious monopolies; nowhere was the tyranny of trade-corporations more oppressively exercised. In all the several governments, aristocracy had gradually engrossed the whole of the powers. At Berne, the first of these petty states, a few families had usurped the authority to the perpetual exclusion of all others; they had their golden-book, in which the privileged families were enrolled. Manners often tend to mitigate the injustice of institutions, but it was not so here. These aristocracies exacted vengeance with the vindictive spirit characteristic of local despotisms. Berne, Zurich, and Geneva, had often, and very recently, inflicted punishments of the severest kind. In every part of Europe Swiss might be found forcibly banished from their country, or seeking in voluntary exile protection from aristocratic outrage. Furthermore, the thirteen cantons, disunited and not seldom opposed to each other, no longer possessed any force, and were quite incapable of defending their independence. With the true instinct of bad-fellowship, common among federative bodies, they all sought the countenance of foreign powers in their domestic squabbles, and had particular treaties, some with Austria, some with Piedmont, others with France. Switzerland therefore was nothing now but a romantic recollection and a picturesque region; politically, she presented but one unbroken chain of petty and humiliating tyrannies.

Thus we may conceive the effect likely to be produced within it by the example of the French revolution. At Zurich, Basle, and Geneva, especially, great excitement had been manifested. In the latter city indeed sanguinary tumults had occurred. Over the whole of the French division, and particularly the Pays de Vaud, revolutionary ideas had circulated extensively. On their side, the aristocrats had omitted nothing to discredit France and to injure her as much as they could without provoking her vengeance. The grandees of Berne had harboured the emigrants and rendered them all possible services. Almost all the plots hatched against the republic had been effectuated in Switzerland. It was at Basle, we remember, the English agent Wickham had directed the counter-revolutionary machinations. The Directory therefore had good reason to be dissatisfied. Luckily, it chanced to possess a very convenient mode of avenging France on Switzerland. The Vaudois, persecuted by the Bernese magnates, had invoked the interposition of France. Now, when the Duke of Savoy ceded their country to Berne, France had guaranteed their rights by a treaty bearing the date of 1565: which treaty had been frequently appealed to and enforced by France. Hence there was good precedent for the interference of the Directory now demanded by the Vaudois. Besides several other of these dependent communities had foreign protectors.

We have witnessed with what enthusiasm the Vaudois had received the liberator of the Valteline, when he passed through Switzerland on his way from Milan to Rastadt. Inspired with renewed hope, they had since dispatched envoys to Paris and warmly pressed for the shield of French protection. Their countryman, the brave and unfortunate La Harpe, had died for France in Italy at the head of a division; they were shamefully tyrannized over, and, in default even of any political motive, common humanity would have sufficed to induce the intervention of France. It was not to be imagined that with her new principles, France should shrink from the execution of a treaty securing the liberties of a neighbouring people, which had been enforced by the old monarchy. Political considerations alone might have weighed to prevent her entertaining the appeal, for fresh alarm would be given to Europe, especially at a time when the pontifical throne was shaking so violently at Rome. But, although feeling it incumbent to propitiate Germany, Piedmont, Parma, Tuscany, and Naples, the Directory recognised no necessity for the same deference towards Switzerland, and was moreover greatly tempted to promote the establishment of an analogous government in a country justly deemed the military key of Europe. Here also, as in the instance of Rome, the Directory was drawn from its prescribed policy by an irresistible seduction. To replace the Alps in friendly hands constituted a motive equally persuasive with that which incited to the demolition of the Papacy.

Consequently, on the 8th Nivôse (28th December 1797), the Directory proclaimed that it took the Vaudois under the protection of France, and would hold the members of the governments of Berne and Fribourg responsible for the security of their property and persons. General Ménard, at the head of Massena's old division, immediately repassed the Alps and pitched his camp at Carouge, in sight of the lake of Geneva. General Schawembourg at the same time ascended the Rhine with a division of the army of Germany, and planted himself in Erguel, in the environs of Basle. This demonstration gave to the people of the Pays de Vaud, the diocese of Basle, and the district of Zurich, the utmost joy and confidence. The Vaudois forthwith preferred a claim for their ancient assemblies. Berne replied that individual petitions would be received, but that no state meetings would be permitted, and demanded a renewal of the oath of fealty. This sufficed as a signal of insurrection to the Vaudois. The bailiffs, whose oppression had been long execrated, were expelled, though without ill-treatment; trees of liberty were everywhere reared, and in a few days the Pays de Vaud, constituted itself into the Lemanique republic. The Directory hastened to recognise it, and authorized General Ménard to occupy it, signifying to the canton of Berne that its independence was guaranteed by France. Meanwhile a revolution was in progress at Basle, of which the tribune Ochs, a man of spirit, a staunch revolutionist, and in close relation with the French government, was the chief promoter. The country population had been admitted with the townsmen to form a species of national convention to digest a constitution. It was drawn up by Ochs in terms almost similar to that of France, which served at this time as a model to all republican Europe. It was translated into three languages, French, German, and Italian, and circulated through all the cantons to stimulate their zeal. Mengaud, who was the French minister in Switzerland and resident at Basle, contributed to impart the impulse. At Zurich also, the people of the surrounding district had raised the standard of revolt and demanded the restoration of their rights.

In the interim, the Bernese aristocrats had collected an army and convoked a general diet, at Arau, to consult on the state of Switzerland and levy from the several cantons the federal contingents. They represented to their German subjects that the French portion of Switzerland wished to detach itself from the confederation and unite with France, and that the cause of religion was at stake, for the atheists of Paris had vowed to destroy it. They thus excited to descend from the mountains of the Oberland a simple, ignorant, and fanatical population under the belief that its ancient faith was menaced with subversion. They mustered nearly twenty thousand men, who were divided into three corps and stationed at Fribourg, Morat, Buren, and Soleure, guarding the line of the Aar and observing the French. At the time this movement was effected, namely in Pluviose (February), the diet assembled at Arau gave symptoms of embarrassment and seemed undecided what course to pursue. Its presence, at all events, was insufficient to deter the inhabitants of Arau from breaking into rebellion, planting the tree of liberty and declaring themselves free. The Bernese troops however entered Arau without delay, chopped down the tree of liberty and committed sundry disorders. The French agent Mengaud thereupon announced that the people of Arau were under the protection of France.

The respective forces were thus in array without any actual war being declared. France, in answer to the appeal of the people whose rights she had guaranteed, shielded them with her troops, and threatened hostilities if the least injury were inflicted on them. On its part, the Bernese oligarchy reclaimed its rights of sovereignty, protesting anxiety to live in peace with France, but on condition of recovering its possessions. Unluckily for it, the other governments around all gave way, either voluntarily or by compulsion. Basle enfranchised the Italian bailiwicks, and the Upper-Valais the Lower-Valais. Fribourg, Soleure, and Saint-Gall were in a state of revolution. The Bernese oligarchy, finding itself pressed on all sides, agreed to certain concessions, and admitted fifty individuals, selected from the country districts, to participation in the privileges hitherto confined to the governing families; but it postponed any modification of the constitution for twelve months. This was an insignificant amendment conducive to results altogether inadequate. Meanwhile a French messenger had been dispatched to the Bernese troops stationed on the frontiers of the Pays de Vaud, to intimate that if they advanced they would be opposed. This messenger was assaulted, and two troopers of his escort assassinated. Such an outrage was an inevitable precursor of war. Still Brune, who was intrusted with the command, held some conferences at Payerne, but they proved fruitless, and on the 12th Ventôse (2d March) the French troops moved forward. General Schawembourg, with the division brought from the Rhine, and cantoned in the territory of Basle, occupied Soleure and the course of the Aar. Brune, with the Italian division, seized on Fribourg. General d'Erlach, who commanded the Bernese troops, retired into the positions of Fraubrunnen, Guminen, Laupen, and Neuneck. These positions covered Berne on all sides, whether the enemy debouched from Soleure or Fribourg. This retrograde movement produced upon the Bernese troops the effect usual with fanatical and undisciplined bands. They believed themselves betrayed, and murdered their officers. Part of them disbanded. Nevertheless there remained with d'Erlach some of those battalions, distinguished in all the armies of Europe for their discipline and bravery, and a certain number of determined peasants. On the 15th Ventôse (5th March), Brune on the Fribourg road, and Schawembourg on that of Soleure, simultaneously attacked the positions of the Swiss army. General Pigeon, who led Brune's vanguard, assailed the position of Neuneck. The Swiss offered an heroic resistance, and, favoured by the advantage of the ground, checked the veterans of Italy. But at the same moment Schawembourg, issuing from Soleure, carried against d'Erlach the position of Fraubrunnen, and the city of Berne was thus uncovered on that side. The Swiss found themselves obliged to retreat, and fell back in disorder on Berne. The French encountered in front of the city a multitude of infatuated and desperate mountaineers. Even women and old men rushed headlong on their bayonets. The soldiers were reluctantly compelled to exterminate these pitiable zealots who sacrificed their lives so uselessly. Berne was eventually entered. The denizens of the Swiss mountains sustained their ancient reputation for valour, but exhibited all the blind and irrational ferocity of an Andalusian horde. They perpetrated a fresh massacre of officers, and assassinated the unfortunate d'Erlach. The celebrated avoyer of Berne, Steiger, head of the Bernese aristocracy, evaded with difficulty the fury of these fanatics, and sought refuge across the mountains of the Oberland in the small cantons, whence, still insecure, he extended his flight into Bavaria.

The capture of Berne decided the submission of all the great Swiss cantons. Brune, called, as had befallen so many French generals, to be the founder of a republic, proposed to incorporate the French part of Switzerland, the lake of Geneva, the Pays de Vaud, a portion of the canton of Berne, and the Valais, into a single republic to be called the Rhodonique. But the Swiss patriots had desired a revolution chiefly in the hope of obtaining two principal advantages: the abolition of all jurisdictions of one people over another, and national unity. They longed to witness the extirpation of all domestic tyrannies, and to mould the whole into a general commonwealth by the institution of a central government. They prevailed that a single republic only should be carved out of the various subdivisions of Switzerland. A convention was summoned at Arau to consider the constitution devised at Basle. The Directory deputed the ex-conventionalist, Lecarlier, to assist the deliberations of the Swiss and promote harmony among them in the establishment of a satisfactory constitution. A remnant of resistance was still exhibited nevertheless in the small mountain cantons of Uri, Glaris, Schweitz, and Zug. The priests and discomfited aristocrats persuaded these simple mountaineers that their religion and independence were alike doomed to destruction. They circulated, amongst other absurd tales, a rumour that France, having need of soldiers to fight the English, intended to kidnap the robust natives of Switzerland, smuggle them on board of ships, and cast them to perish on the shores of Britain.

On entering Berne, the French seized the exchequer of government, which is a usual proceeding and the least contested right in war. All the public property of a vanquished government belongs to the conqueror. In all these petty states, equally parsimonious and extortionate, there were long-hoarded treasures. Berne possessed a small coffer of its own, which has furnished to all the enemies of France a fruitful subject of calumny. It has been represented to contain thirty millions, whereas it held but eight. France is accused of having engaged in the war merely to seize this fund and apply the proceeds in the Egyptian expedition; as if she could have supposed the authorities of Berne would not have the sense to remove it; or as if it were probable she would make war and risk the consequences of such an invasion to gain eight millions. Such absurdities refute themselves.* A contribution to defray the maintenance and pay of the troops was levied on the members of the old oligarchies of Berne, Fribourg, Soleure, and Zurich.

The winter of 1797–8 was drawing rapidly to a close. Five months only had elapsed since the treaty of Campo-Formio, but the situation of Europe had greatly changed in the interval. The republican system had made gigantic strides; to the three republics previously founded by France, two others had been added, created within two months. Europe heard with a shudder the continual echo of the words: Batavian republic, Helvetian republic, Cisalpine republic, Ligurian republic, Roman republic. Instead of three governments, France had now five to superintend—involving an additional complication of cares and further explanations for foreign powers. The Directory thus found itself impelled insensibly. There is nothing more insatiable than a system; it creeps onward almost alone, expanding and overcoming even in spite of its authors.

* We find them repeated, notwithstanding, by Madame de Staël and a crowd of authors.

Whilst so many external objects demanded its attention, the domestic subject of the elections likewise forced itself on the anxious notice of the Directory. Since the 18th Fructidor there remained in the Councils only such deputies as the Directory had voluntarily left there, and upon whom it could rely. These were they who had either promoted or acquiesced in the coup d'etat. Six months of quietude between the executive power and the Councils had ensued, which the Directory had employed, as we have seen, in negotiations, maritime projects, and the creation of new states. But although so dead a calm had reigned, it did not thence result a perfect union existed: two bodies with opposite functions could scarcely preserve complete concord for so long an interval.

A new opposition was forming, composed no longer of royalists but of patriots. We may have already remarked that shortly after one faction had been routed, the government found itself involved in a contest with the other which had assisted it to conquer, because the latter became too exacting, and broke into mutiny in its turn. Since the 9th Thermidor, an epoch when the factions, rendered nearly equal in strength, began to sustain a singular alternation of defeats and victories, the patriots had revolted in Germinal and Prairial, and, immediately after them, the royalists in Vendémiaire. Since Vendémiaire and the institution of the Directory, the patriots had shown their teeth and evinced a dangerous audacity in the wild enterprise of the camp at Grenelle. Subsequently to that event, the royalists had resumed the ascendant, had lost it on the 18th Fructidor, and it was now for the patriots to raise their heads. By way of characterizing this course of things, a term had been invented which we have since seen revived, that of see-saw. The political condition which consisted in alternately exalting and depressing each party was called the see-saw system. The Directory was upbraided with having employed it, and with being by turns the mere creature of the faction whose aid it sought. This reproach was unfounded; for, unless seizing the reins of power at the point of the sword, no government can silence all parties at once, and rule without and in spite of them. At each change of system, administrative changes must also be made, and those are naturally selected who have professed opinions conformable to the system presently victorious. All the adherents of the successful party, redolent of hopes, start up with claims, press forward to besiege the government, and, if their desires be unsatisfied, rail against and attack it. The patriots had thus clamoured, supporting their pretensions by the influence of the deputies who had voted with the Directory in the Councils. The Directory had withstood many demands, but had been obliged to comply with some. It had nominated several patriots commissaries in the departments (prefects). Numerous others aspired to enter the legislative body at the approaching elections. To these the authorities recently appointed promised inestimable advantage.

Besides the new opposition formed by the patriots who were disappointed with the results of the 18th Fructidor, there was another, self-styled the constitutional. It emerged again at this juncture, affecting to lean towards neither the royalists nor the patriots, but boasting independence, moderation, and attachment to the laws, and composed of men who, without being enrolled in any party, had personal grounds of discontent. Some had not obtained an embassy, a promotion, or a contract for a relative; others had failed to attain the vacant seats in the Directory by a few votes. Nothing is more common than this species of dissatisfaction under a new government, reared by contemporaries, and constituted of men who were yesterday in the rank of simple citizens. Inheritance is said to be a check on ambition, and rightly, if it be restricted to certain functions. Incalculable is the importunity wherewith men are assailed who have sprung to dignity from the common herd. Numbers have contributed to raise them, some feel they are above them only by the chance of a few votes: it seems undeniable that such have a right to urge claims and have them gratified. Hence, the Directory, without any intention on its part, had made numerous malcontents amongst the deputies who were formerly classed as directorialists, and whom their services in Fructidor had rendered extremely difficult to satisfy. One of Bonaparte's brothers, Lucien, elected by Corsica to the Five-Hundred, had planted himself in this constitutional opposition, not from any cause of personal pique, but that he imitated his brother, and assumed the office of censor of the government. It was the attitude which suited a family that aspired to take a position apart. Lucien was a man of ability, and endowed with an eminent talent for the tribune. He there produced considerable effect, recommended as he was by the glory of his brother. Joseph too, since his retreat from Rome, had returned to Paris, where he maintained a large establishment, and dispensed a generous hospitality to generals, deputies, and distinguished men. The two brothers, Joseph and Lucien, were thus in a capacity to effect many things, which propriety and his studied reserve prohibited to the general.

Still, if shades might be thus detected in opinions which had continued almost unanimous for six months, no marked dissension was yet apparent. Forbearance and circumspection prevailed in the Councils, and an immense majority sanctioned all the propositions of the Directory.

All appearances indicated that the elections of the year VI. would terminate in favour of the patriots. They predominated in France and in the new republics. The Directory, however, was determined to employ all legal means to avert their too complete ascendency. Its commissaries issued moderate circulars containing sundry exhortations, but no menaces. It had not at its disposition, in fact, any of those influences or infamous devices used in our days to decide elections agreeable to the reigning power.* In the elections of the year V. several assemblies had divided, and, to avoid violence, part of the electors had retired to vote separately. This example was recommended in the electoral assemblies of this year. Accordingly, schisms took place almost universally; everywhere the electors in a minority alleged the pretexts of an infraction of the law, or of some violence exercised towards them, to collect apart and make their particular returns. It is proper to state, at the same time, that, in many of the departments, the patriots conducted themselves with their accustomed turbulence, and justified the withdrawal of their opponents. In some assemblies it was the patriots who were in a minority and made the secession; but almost everywhere they were in a majority, because the mass of the population opposed to them (and which had participated in the two preceding elections of the years V. and VI.), at present intimidated by the 18th Fructidor, had, so to speak, abjured public affairs, and ventured to take no part therein. At Paris, considerable excitement prevailed. There were two assemblies held, one at the Oratory, wholly composed of patriots, and mustering six hundred electors at least; the other at the Institute, comprehending moderate republicans, and counting scarcely two hundred and twenty-eight electors. This latter, however, returned a leet of excellent nominations.

* [M. Thiers had not been a deputy or a minister when he penned this phrase, or he would have probably modified it. At the same time, it is scarcely possible to conceive a more wretched parody on an election than he is proceeding to unfold. This he feels, for he is almost unintelligible in describing it.]

In general the elections were twofold. Various apprehensions were thereby occasioned. The discontented, the lovers of change, all in fact who, from different motives, desired to subvert the existing order of things, exclaimed—"This can go no farther; after executing an 18th Fructidor against the royalists, we are exposed to have another against the patriots." They reported too, that the constitution was about to be altered. The Directory was even applied to on the subject, but it indignantly spurned the idea.

Different parts might be taken with regard to these elections. Acting in accordance with strict principles, the Councils were bound to sustain the returns made by the majorities; for otherwise it would occur that the minorities, by seceding, would secure the privilege of making the nominations. Disturbances and informalities might be reasons for annulling the elections made by the majorities, but not for adopting those of the minorities. The patriots in the Councils strongly contended for this position, because, their party having been most numerous in almost all the assemblies, it insured them a successful issue of the question. But the bulk of the two Councils was not inclined to allow them this advantage, and two modes of meeting the difficulty were suggested: either to take the returns made by the seceding assemblies, or to execute a new eighteenth Fructidor. This last was inadmissible; the first was milder and more natural. It was accordingly adopted. In almost every instance the elections of the patriots were quashed, and those of their opponents confirmed. The leet chosen at Paris in the assembly held at the Institute, although it numbered but two hundred and twenty-eight electors, whilst that at the Oratory contained six hundred, was in this manner approved. Nevertheless, the new third, notwithstanding this reversal, brought no inconsiderable accession of strength to the patriot party in the Councils. Yet was that party sorely irritated at the expedient adopted for excluding the men of its selection, and became henceforth more active and embittered against the Directory.

A new director was next to be chosen. The lot fell on Francois de Neufchateau to retire. He was replaced by Treilhard, one of the French plenipotentiaries at Rastadt. Treilhard held identically the opinions of Larévellière, Rewbell, and Merlin. His appointment, therefore, caused no change in the spirit of the Directory. He was an upright, honest man, sufficiently accustomed to affairs. Hence, there were four stanch republicans in the government, all voting in perfect unison, and combining intelligence with probity. Treilhard was succeeded at Rastadt by Jean Debry, an ex-member of the legislature and of the national convention.

Since, by the establishment of the Constitution of the year III., parties were obliged to carry on their warfare within the narrow limits of a constitution, domestic scenes and transactions had lost much of their former zest and stirring incident. Especially, since the 18th Fructidor, the tribune had been shorn of its importance. All eyes were fixed on abroad. The colossal influence of the republic in Europe, its singular and complicated relations with other states, its train of dependent republics, the revolutions it was on all sides promoting, and finally, its designs against England, engrossed all attention. How was France to assail this rival in his most vulnerable part, and to inflict on him the terrible blows she had already given Austria? This was the question repeated from ear to ear. Men had grown so accustomed to feats of chivalric boldness, and to astounding prodigies, that the passage of the channel seemed an ordinary affair. Both the friends and enemies of England deemed her in imminent peril. She herself felt uneasy, and made extraordinary efforts to defend herself. The world at large had its gaze concentrated on the coasts of the British channel.

Bonaparte, who thought upon Egypt as he had two years previously thought upon Italy, as he thought upon every thing, that is to say, with uncontrollable energy, had submitted his project to the Directory, which was discussing it at this moment. The great geniuses who have attentively studied the map of the world have all centred their attention on Egypt. We may cite three, Albuquerque, Leibnitz, and Bonaparte. Albuquerque was sensible that the Portuguese, who had just opened the route to India by the Cape of Good Hope, might be deprived of that great trade if the Nile and the Red Sea ever came to be used. Accordingly, he entertained the gigantic idea of turning the course of the Nile, and throwing it into the Red Sea, to render the way for ever impracticable, and assure to the Portuguese the perpetual commerce of India. Vain premeditations of genius, which would constitute fortunes immutable in an unstable and changeable world! If the visionary scheme of Albuquerque had been realized, the Herculean labour would have redounded to the profit of the Dutch, and eventually of the English. In the reign of Louis XIV., the great Leibnitz, whose high capacity embraced all subjects, addressed to that monarch a memorial, which remains one of the most admirable records of political logic and eloquence. Louis designed, in a vain-glorious mood, to invade Holland.—"Sire," so Leibnitz spoke oracularly, "it is not in their own country you will succeed in vanquishing these republicans; you will not be able to cross their dykes, and you will range all Europe on their side. It is in Egypt they must be struck. There, you will find the true route for the commerce of India; you will wrest that commerce from the Dutch, you will insure the everlasting domination of France in the Levant, you will gladden all Christianity, you will fill the world with astonishment and admiration; Europe will applaud you, far from combine against you."

Such were the vast conceptions, slighted by Louis XIV., which stirred the brain of the young republican general.

Even quite recently, moreover, Egypt had been an object of consideration to French politicians. M. de Choiseul had favoured the idea of occupying it, when the American colonies were in danger. Again it was resumed when Joseph II. and Catherine threatened the Ottoman empire. Also M. Magallon, the French consul at Cairo, a distinguished man, and thoroughly conversant with the state of Egypt and the East, had very lately addressed memorials to government, both to denounce the confiscations of the Mamelukes on French traders, and to expose the advantages which would result from their punishment. Bonaparte had provided himself with all these documents and formed his plan with reference to their contents. Egypt was, in his view, the true intermediary point between Europe and India; there it behoved France to establish herself to ruin England; thence, she must for ever rule the Mediterranean, making of it, according to one of his expressions, a French lake, and be able to prolong the existence of the Turkish empire, or secure the best portion of its spoils. Once consolidated in Egypt, the French might effect one or both of two objects: either create a navy in the Red Sea and proceed to destroy the factories on the great Indian peninsula, or make of Egypt a colony and entrepôt. The commerce of India could not fail to be speedily transferred thither to avoid the circuitous route of the Cape of Good Hope. The numerous caravans of Syria, Arabia, and Africa, already intersected at Cairo. The trade of these countries alone might become immense. Egypt was the most fertile country in the world. Besides her prolific harvests of grain, she could supply all the products of America, and wholly supersede the necessity of reliance on that continent. Thus, whether Egypt were used as a point of departure for a crusade against the Indian establishments of the English, or simply as an entrepôt, the high road of commerce was sure to take this its legitimate beat, and end as its ultimate goal in France.

This bold enterprise possessed, moreover, in the eyes of Bonaparte, other signal recommendations. According to the luminous reports of M. Magallon, now was the proper season to depart for Egypt. By hurrying the preparations and the voyage, the French might reach it in the early part of summer. They would then find the crops cut and garnered, and the winds favourable to ascend the Nile. Bonaparte urged that it was impossible to land in England before the winter, and that in any case her government was too well forewarned; that the expedition to Egypt being, on the contrary, wholly unforeseen, would encounter no obstacles; that a few months would suffice for the establishment of the French; that he would return in person by the autumn to execute the descent upon the English coast; that the opportunity would then be more favourable, for a considerable portion of the English fleet would have sailed for India, and the difficulties to overcome in effecting a landing be materially lessened. Besides all these reasons of a public nature, Bonaparte had others personal to himself. The idleness of Paris was insupportable to him; there was nothing to attempt in civil politics; he was fearful of losing lustre; he was on fire to aggrandize his name yet more. He had been heard to say: Great names are made only in the East.

The Directory, who has been accused of desiring to get rid of Bonaparte by sending him to Egypt, offered on the contrary serious objections to the project. Larévellière-Lépeaux, especially, manifested extreme obstinacy in opposing it. He argued that it would endanger thirty or forty thousand of the best troops in France, and expose them to all the hazards of a naval warfare; that it would take from France her greatest commander, him whom Austria dreaded the most, at a moment when the continent was far from being pacified, and when the creation of the new republics had excited violent resentments; and that, furthermore, it would probably exasperate the Porte to a declaration of war, invading thus one of its provinces. Bonaparte was prompt with his rejoinder. He contended that nothing was more easy than to escape the English by keeping them in profound ignorance of the scheme; that France with three or four hundred thousand soldiers, could not be dependent on thirty or forty thousand, more or less; that, for himself, he would shortly return; that, as to the Ottoman Porte, it had long ago lost Egypt by the usurpation of the Mamelukes, and would witness with pleasure their chastisement by France; that at all events an understanding might be arranged with the Sultan; that the continent would not break into hostilities so soon, &c. &c. He alluded also to Malta, which he proposed to wrest from the knights as he passed and secure for France. The discussions were often very warm, and on one occasion led to a scene which has been always incorrectly reported. Bonaparte, in a moment of impatience, pronounced the word "resignation."—"I am far from wishing to demand it," Larévellière retorted with firmness, "but if you offer it, I am of opinion it should be accepted." *— From this time Bonaparte was careful to avoid any mention of resignation.

Overcome at length by the instances and reasons of Bonaparte, the Directory consented to the proposed expedition. It was incited by the grandeur of the enterprise, by its commercial advantages, and by the promise of Bonaparte to return before winter and then undertake the descent on England. It was agreed to observe the most perfect secrecy, and, that it might be better guarded, the presence of secretaries was dispensed with. Merlin, president of the Directory, wrote the instructions with his own hand, and even they did not specify the nature of the enterprise. It was settled that Bonaparte should take with him 36,000 men of the old army of Italy, a certain number of generals and officers of his own selection, men of science and learning, surveyors, geographers, workmen of all kinds, and the squadron under Brueys reinforced by part of the vessels remaining at Toulon. Orders were issued to the Treasury to furnish him a million and a half per decade. He was permitted to appropriate three out of the eight millions captured at Berne. It has been said that Switzerland was invaded to procure means for the invasion of Egypt. We may now judge of the truth of such a supposition.

Bonaparte forthwith nominated a commission to visit the harbours of the Mediterranean and prepare the necessary means of transport. This commission was styled a commission for arming the coasts of the Mediterranean. Its members were ignorant, with all the world, of the object of the armament. The secret reposed with Bonaparte and the five directors. As preparations were proceeding in all the ports at once, it was supposed that the Mediterranean armament was only a consequence of that in progress on the ocean. The army collected upon the Mediterranean was called the left wing of the army of England.

Bonaparte applied himself to the work with that extraordinary activity which he imparted to the execution of all his projects. Hurrying alternately to the ministers of war, of the navy, of finance, and to the officers of the treasury, noting with his own eyes the accomplishment of his orders, employing all his ascendency to accelerate their dispatch, corresponding with the whole of the ports, with Switzerland, with Italy, he caused all the preparations to be completed with incredible rapidity. He fixed four points as depôts for the convoys and the troops the principal convoy was to start from Toulon, the second from Genoa, the third from Ajaccio, and the fourth from Civita-Vecchia. He directed towards Toulon and Genoa the detachments of the army of Italy returning to France, and towards Civita-Vecchia one of the divisions which had marched on Rome. He treated both in France and Italy with owners and captains of merchant vessels, and thus contrived to muster in the ports of departure four hundred sail of ships. He selected a numerous artillery to accompany him, and picked out 2,500 troopers, the best in the army, to embark without horses, as he proposed to equip them at the expense of the Arabs. He determined to carry with him saddles and harness only, and shipped but three hundred horses, so as to have upon arrival at least a few mounted cavalry and yoked pieces. He collected artisans of all descriptions; appropriated the Greek and Arab presses of the Propaganda at Rome, and allotted a body of printers to work them. He formed also a complete collection of philosophical and mathematical instruments. The scientific and

This speech has been by turns ascribed to Rewbell and to Barras. To the discussion itself likewise, a totally different cause from the true one has been assigned. It was with reference to the Egyptian expedition and with Larévellière that the scene took place learned men, the artists, the surveyors, the designers, the geographers, whom he took, amounted to nearly a hundred individuals. The most celebrated names were associated in his enterprise: Monge, Bertholet, Fourrier, Dolomieux, were of the expedition; as were likewise Desgenettes, Larrey, and Dubois. All the world was eager to join the fortunes of the young general. None knew whither the destination tended; but all were ready to follow him anywhere. During the negotiations at Udine, Desaix had gone to inspect the fields of battle become so celebrated in Italy. Thenceforth he had attached himself to Bonaparte, and now resolved to accompany him. Kleber was at Chaillot, grumbling, as usual with him, against the government, and refusing to solicit employment. He was accustomed often to visit the great master in the art he loved so passionately. Bonaparte pressed him to go with him. Kleber consented with joy: "but the lawyers," said he, "what will they say?" It was thus he designated the directors. Bonaparte undertook to remove all objections. "So good!" exclaimed Kleber, who believed England the object of attack, "if you send a fire-ship into the Thames, put Kleber on board of it, and you will see what he can do." To these two generals of the first distinction, Bonaparte added Reynier, Dugua, Vaubois, Bon, Menou, Baraguey-d'Hilliers, Lannes, Murat, Belliard, and Dammartin, who had all so courageously seconded him in Italy. The brave and accomplished Caffarelli-Dufalga, who had left a leg on the Rhine, commanded the artillery. The weak but useful Berthier was appointed chief of the staff. Smitten with love, he was on the point of forsaking the general to whom he owed his fortune; but he grew ashamed, expressed penitence, and hastened to embark at Toulon. Brueys commanded the fleet; Villeneuve, Blanquet-Duchaila, and Decrès served as vice-admirals. Gantheaume was nominated chief of the naval staff. Thus, all that France possessed most illustrious in war, science, and art, prepared to embark, on the faith of this young general, for an unknown destination.

France and Europe rung with the sound of the preparations going forward in the Mediterranean. They gave rise to conjectures of all kinds. "Where is Bonaparte going?" asked every one. "Whither go these generals, these men of science, all this array?" "They go," said some, "into the Black Sea, to restore the Crimea to Turkey." "They go to India," said others, "to support Sultan Tippoo-Saib." A few, who scented the object, asserted that it was intended to pierce the isthmus of Suez, or otherwise to land on the shores of the isthmus and reimbark in the Red Sea for an excursion to India. Others fell upon the design itself, and maintained that Egypt was the destination. A memoir read at the Institute the preceding year gave weight to this latter speculation. Recondite soothsayers augured a combination more profound. All this parade of preparation, which seemed to betoken a scheme of colonization, was according to them a mere feint. Bonaparte designed simply, with the Mediterranean fleet, to double the straits of Gibraltar, attack Lord St. Vincent who was blockading Cadiz, disperse his squadron, relieve the Spanish fleet from thraldom, and conduct it to Brest, where would be effected the long desired junction of all the Continental navies. It was with this view the troops on the Mediterranean were entitled the left wing of the army of England.

This chanced to be precisely the conviction of the British cabinet. It had been in a state of alarm for the last six months, and knew not on what side to expect the bursting of the storm so long brewing. In the general anxiety, the opposition had for a moment coalesced with the ministry, and made common cause with it. Sheridan had turned his eloquence against the insatiable ambition and turbulence of the French people, and, save the suspension of the Habeas-Corpus act, had supported on all points the ministerial propositions. Pitt, meanwhile, lost no time in equipping a second squadron. To prepare it for sea extraordinary exertions were used, and the fleet of Lord St. Vincent was reinforced by six sail of the line to enable him effectually to bar the mouth of the Straits, toward which Bonaparte was so confidently supposed to be steering. Nelson was detached by Lord St. Vincent with three ships to scour the Mediterranean and watch the movements of the French.

Every arrangement was completed for the embarkation. Bonaparte was on the point of setting out for Toulon, when an occurrence at Vienna, coupled with the dispositions manifested by divers cabinets, threatened to detain him in Europe. The creation of two new republics had roused to the highest pitch the dread of the revolutionary contagion. England, wishful to foment this feeling, had distributed emissaries amongst all the European courts. She urged the new king of Prussia to throw off his neutrality, in order to preserve Germany from the torrent; she laboured to inflame the weak and violent mind of the Emperor Paul; she sought to alarm Austria upon the occupation of the Alps by the French, and offered her subsidies to recommence the war; in fine, she exerted her influence to stimulate the insane fury of the queen of Naples and her minion. The court of this latter potentate evinced greater irritation than ever. It insisted that France should evacuate Rome, or cede to it a part of the Roman provinces. The new ambassador, Garat, had in vain displayed an extreme moderation; his patience was severely tested by the mortifications he endured at the hands of the Neapolitan cabinet. The state of the continent, therefore, was calculated to inspire apprehensions, and an incident happened to aggravate them. Bernadotte had been sent to Vienna, upon a mission of explanation to the Austrian cabinet, and he was instructed to take up his residence there, although no ambassador had been yet accredited to Paris. This general, of a restless and susceptible temperament, was very unfit for the post he was appointed to fill. A proposal had been entertained to celebrate at Vienna on the 14th April the enrolment of the Imperial volunteers. We remember the zeal these volunteers had shown in the preceding year, and the fate they met at Rivoli and La Favorita. Bernadotte had the folly to protest against this celebration, affirming that it would be an insult to France. The Emperor replied with justice that he was master in his own dominions, that France was free to commemorate her victories, and that he also was at liberty to commemorate the devotion of his subjects. Bernadotte, thus repulsed, then determined to give an opposition-fête, and accordingly celebrated in his hotel one of the victories of the army of Italy, of which it chanced to be the anniversary, rearing at his door the tri-coloured flag, inscribed with the words equality, liberty. The populace of Vienna, excited, it is said, by the emissaries of the English ambassador, attacked the hotel of the French minister, broke the windows, and committed other disorders. The Austrian ministry hastened to send assistance to Bernadotte, and conducted itself with regard to him very differently from the Roman government in the case of Joseph Bonaparte. Bernadotte, whose own imprudence had provoked the outrage, retired from Vienna and betook himself to Rastadt.

The court of Vienna was unquestionably chagrined at this unpleasant circumstance. It was certain that this government, even supposing it to have every inclination to resume hostilities, would not take the initiative by insulting the French ambassador, and thus precipitate a war for which it was wholly unprepared. On the contrary, it is undoubted that, albeit greatly displeased with France and her late encroachments, and foreboding that the day would come when she must renew the struggle with her, Austria was not yet disposed to try the experiment, deeming both her people too exhausted and her means too inadequate to assault anew the republican colossus. The cabinet, therefore, immediately published a disavowal of the event, and wrote to Bernadotte with the view of appeasing him.

The Directory judged this occurrence at Vienna indicative of a rupture. It forthwith issued counter-orders to Bonaparte, and even urged him to proceed to Rastadt for the purpose of overawing the Emperor, and forcing him either to give satisfaction, or take the consequences of war. Bonaparte, highly displeased at the delay occasioned to his own design, refused to go to Rastadt, and, estimating the position of affairs with more discernment than the Directory, maintained that the event was far from possessing the gravity attributed to it. In fact, Austria speedily intimated that she purposed at length to send an envoy to Paris, in the person of M. Degelmann; made a show of disgracing the prime-minister Thugut; and offered to let M. de Cobentzel repair to any place fixed by the Directory, and meet a French agent to give and receive explanations on the occurrence at Vienna and the changes effected in Europe since the treaty of Campo-Formio. The storm, therefore, appeared to be dissipated. Moreover, the negotiations at Rastadt had begun to make a favourable progress. After disputing the left bank of the Rhine inch by inch, after striving to preserve the territory lying between the Moselle and the Rhine, and ultimately a small strip of land between the Roehr and the Rhine, the deputation of the Empire had finally conceded the whole left bank. The line of the Rhine was at last recognised as the natural boundary of France. Another principle of equal moment had been admitted, that of indemnifying the dispossessed princes by means of secularizations. Nevertheless, points not less difficult of adjustment remained for discussion: the appropriation of the islands of the Rhine, the conservation of fortified posts, bridges, and bridge-heads (têtes de pont), the condition of monasteries and of the intermediate nobility on the left bank, the liquidation of the debts of the countries ceded to France, the application of the emigration laws to those countries, and many others. These were questions of difficult solution, especially when left to the proverbial tardiness of Germans.

Such was the state of the Continent. The horizon appearing comparatively serene, Bonaparte at length obtained permission to depart for Toulon. It was agreed that M. de Talleyrand should start immediately after him for Constantinople, in the hope of inducing the Porte to regard with complacency the expedition to Egypt.

CHAPTER LVII.

EXPEDITION TO EGYPT.—DEPARTURE FROM TOULON; ARRIVAL AT MALTA; REDUCTION OF THAT ISLAND. — DISEMBARKATION AT ALEXANDRIA; CAPTURE OF THAT CITY.—MARCH UPON CAIRO.—BATTLE OF THE PYRAMIDS; OCCUPATION OF CAIRO. — ADMINISTRATIVE LABOURS OF BONAPARTE IN EGYPT; ORGANIZATION OF THE NEW COLONY.—BATTLE OF ABOUKIR; DESTRUCTION OF THE FRENCH FLEET BY THE ENGLISH.

BONAPARTE arrived at Toulon on the 20th Floreal year VI. (9th May 1798). His presence spread gladness through the army, which had begun to murmur, and to fear that he was not at the head of the expedition. It was the old army of Italy. Its soldiers were loaded with riches and with glory, and it might be truly said that its fortune was made. Accordingly, their passion for war was considerably abated, and it needed all the zeal which their commander inspired to determine them to embark and depart for an unknown destination. Still they were seized with enthusiasm on beholding him at Toulon. Eight months had elapsed since he had been amongst them. He proceeded, without enlightening them as to their destination, to address them in the following proclamation—

"Soldiers!

"You form one of the wings of the army of England. You have practised the war of mountains, of plains, and of sieges; it remains for you to practise war on the seas.

"The Roman legions, whom you have sometimes imitated, but not yet equalled, encountered Carthage alternately on this sea and on the plains of Zama. Victory never forsook them, because they were ever brave, patient in supporting fatigue, disciplined and united amongst themselves.

"Soldiers, Europe has its eyes upon you! You have high destinies to fulfil, battles to wage, dangers, fatigues to overcome; you will accomplish more than you have yet done for the prosperity of your country, the happiness of mankind, and your own glory.

"Soldiers, sailors, infantry, cavalry, artillery, be united; remember that on the day of battle you have need of each other.

"Soldiers, sailors, you have been hitherto neglected; at the present moment the chief solicitude of the republic is for you: you will prove worthy of the army of which you form a part.

"The genius of liberty which has rendered the republic, since its birth, the arbiter of Europe, wills that it shall be so also of the seas and of nations the most remote."

A great enterprise could not have been more impressively announced,—still leaving it veiled in the obscurity in which it was incumbent to shroud it.

The fleet under the command of Admiral Brueys, was composed of thirteen ships of the line, one, the Orient, carrying the Admiral and the General-in-chief, being of 120 guns, two of 80, and ten of 74. There were, moreover, two Venitian ships of 65 guns each, six Venitian frigates and eight French, seventy-two corvettes, cutters, gun-boats, and small craft of all kinds. The transports collected, as well at Toulon as at Genoa, Ajaccio, and Civita-Vecchia, amounted to four hundred. Five hundred sail in all therefore were to crowd the waters of the Mediterranean. Never had such an armament covered the seas. The fleet had on board about forty thousand men of all arms, and ten thousand sailors. It was watered for one and provisioned for two months.

The sails were hoisted on the 30th Floreal (19th May), amidst the roar of cannon, and the acclamations of the whole army. A strong breeze occasioned some damage to a frigate in sailing out of port. The same wind had caused such disasters to the three ships with which Nelson was cruising, that he was obliged to make for the islands of Saint Peter to refit. He was thus removed to a distance from the French squadron, and consequently failed to see it. The fleet made in the first instance for Genoa, to take up the convoy waiting in that port under the command of General Baraguey-d'Hilliers. It afterwards proceeded towards Corsica, picked up the convoy of Ajaccio, which was under the orders of Vaubois, and ultimately steered for the Sicilian sea to receive the convoy of Civita-Vecchia, which was under the orders of Desaix. Bonaparte's design was to shape his course for Malta, and attempt on the way an audacious enterprise, the success of which he had long ago taken means to secure by secret practices. This was to seize upon that island, which, commanding the navigation of the Mediterranean, became an important acquisition for Egypt, and would assuredly soon fall into the grasp of the English, if they were not anticipated.

The order of the Knights of Malta was in a similar predicament to all the institutions of the middle ages; its object was gone, and with it its dignity and strength. It was now simply an abuse, profitable only to those who partook it. The Knights enjoyed large possessions in Spain, Portugal, France, Italy, and Germany, which had been bestowed on them by the piety of the faithful to protect Christians visiting the Holy Land. Now that pilgrimages of this sort had ceased, the vocation and duty of the Knights were to protect Christianity against the states of Barbary, and to extirpate the pirates who infested the Mediterranean. The revenues of the order sufficed for the maintenance of a considerable navy, but the Knights took no pains to form one; they kept but two or three decayed frigates, moored constantly in port, and a few galleys in which they jaunted round the coasts of Italy, giving and receiving festivities. The bailiffs, or commanders, living in the various countries of Europe, consumed in luxury and idleness the riches of the order. Not a knight survived who had waged war against the Infidel corsairs. All interest in the order, moreover, had expired. In France its possessions were confiscated, and Bonaparte had caused those in Italy to be seized without exciting a single reclamation in its favour. We have stated that Bonaparte had already endeavoured to establish an intelligence in the island. He had, in fact, gained some of the Knights, and proposed to intimidate the remainder by a bold demonstration and awe them into a surrender, as he had neither time nor means for a regular attack upon a place deemed impregnable. The Order, which had for some time apprehended its danger from the predominance of the French squadrons in the Mediterranean, had placed itself under the guardianship of Paul of Russia.

Bonaparte, in spite of strenuous exertions, was baffled in his attempt to take up the division of Civita-Vecchia, and the junction with it was only effected at Malta. The five hundred sail of the French fleet hove in sight of that island on the 21st Prairial (9th June), twenty-two days after the departure from Toulon. The spectacle occasioned sore tribulation in the minds of the islanders. To make a pretext for stopping, and to originate a cause of quarrel, Bonaparte demanded from the Grand-Master permission to take in water. The Grand-Master, Ferdinand de Hompesch, replied by a positive refusal, pleading the regulations which allowed the introduction of only two vessels at a time belonging to belligerent powers. The English had met with a very different reception when they appeared before Malta. Bonaparte proclaimed this denial a proof of unexampled malevolence, and immediately ordered a debarkation. On the following day, the 22d Prairial (10th June), accordingly, the French landed on the island and completely invested Valetta, which contained a population of nearly 30,000 souls, and was one of the strongest fortresses in Europe. Bonaparte likewise landed artillery to bombard the forts. The knights answered his fire, but inefficiently. They attempted a sally and many of them were captured. Disorder then commenced within the walls. Certain knights of the French tongue declared they would not fight against their countrymen. Some of these were thrown into dungeons. Great trouble reigned nevertheless, and the inhabitants clamoured for a surrender. The Grand-Master, a man of feeble energies, calling to mind the generosity of the hero of Rivoli at Mantua, bethought himself to save his fortunes from shipwreck, and forthwith releasing one of the French knights he had cast into prison, sent him to Bonaparte with a commission to negotiate. An accommodation was soon arranged. The knights relinquished to France the sovereignty of Malta and the dependent isles; and, in return, France promised her intervention at the Congress of Rastadt, to obtain for the Grand-Master a principality in Germany, and, in case of failure, guaranteed him a pension of 300,000 francs for life, and an indemnity of 600,000 francs in money. She settled, moreover, a pension of 700 francs on each knight of the French tongue, and 1,000 on sexagenarians; and engaged to exert her influence that the knights of other tongues might be allowed to enjoy the estates of the Order in their several countries. Such were the conditions on which France gained possession of the first port in the Mediterranean, and of one of the strongest fortresses in the world. It needed the overawing ascendency of Bonaparte to succeed almost without a contest; and it assuredly needed his confident audacity to hazard the delay of such an undertaking with the English in full pursuit. Caffarelli-Dufalga, equally distinguished for wit and valour, remarked as he walked round the place and admired its fortifications: We are truly fortunate that there was some one inside to open the gates.

Bonaparte selected Vaubois to command at Malta with a garrison of 3,000 men, and appointed Regnault de Saint-Jean-d'Angely civil commissary. He made all the administrative regulations necessary for the establishment of the municipal system in the island, and then prepared in all haste to continue his voyage to Egypt.

He weighed anchor on the 1st Messidor (19th June), after an interval of ten days. His great object now was to avoid an encounter with the English. Nelson, having refitted at the Saint-Peter islands, had received from Lord St. Vincent a reinforcement of ten ships of the line and several frigates, which constituted him a fleet of thirteen sail of the line and sundry vessels of less calibre. He had reappeared on the 13th Prairial (1st June) before Toulon; but the French squadron had left twelve days previously. He then hastened from Toulon to the roads of Tagliamon, and thence to Naples, where he arrived on the 2d Messidor (20th June) almost at the very moment Bonaparte was quitting Malta. Learning that the French had been seen in the direction of Malta he followed them, prepared to attack if he succeeded in overtaking them.

Throughout the French squadron every thing was prepared for battle. The possibility of meeting the English occurred to all on board, and alarmed none. Bonaparte had distributed to each ship of the line five hundred picked men, who were daily practised at the guns, and over whom was placed one of those generals so well trained to fire under his orders. It was a principle in naval tactics that each ship should have but one aim, that of grappling with another, fighting, and boarding her. Orders were given in conformity, and Bonaparte relied in the event of a conflict on the bravery of the chosen troops stationed in the ships upon which the brunt of the engagement would fall. These precautions taken, he proceeded in tranquillity towards Egypt. This man, who, according to malignant detractors, dreaded the hazards of the sea, abandoned himself calmly to fortune amidst the English fleets, and had even been sufficiently rash to lose several days at Malta to effect its reduction. Gaiety meanwhile prevailed in the fleet; none knew exactly whither it was bound, but the secret began to be whispered, and sight of the land designed for conquest was impatiently expected. In the evenings, the general officers who were on board the L'Orient assembled in the cabin of the general-in-chief, and there the ingenious and learned discussions of the "Institute of Egypt" were commenced. At one time, but for an instant, the English squadron was only a few leagues from the immense French convoy, and the proximity was unknown on either side. Nelson, beginning to imagine that the French had a design on Egypt, made sail for Alexandria, and got there before them; when failing to find them he hurried to the Dardanelles, in the hope of an encounter. With singular good fortune the French expedition arrived in sight of Alexandria only on the second day after he had left it, to wit, on the 13th Messidor (1st July). Nearly six weeks had elapsed since its departure from Toulon.

Bonaparte's first step was to send for the French consul. He learnt that the English had appeared two days before, and in the fear they might be still hovering on the coast, he determined to attempt an immediate debarkation. He could not enter the harbour of Alexandria for a disposition to oppose his access was betrayed; hence it became necessary to land at some distance upon the adjoining strand, in a bay called Marabout. The wind blew violently, and the sea broke with fury on the shelves of the coast. It was towards the close of evening. Bonaparte gave the signal, resolved to reach the shore without delay. He was the first to leap into a boat; the soldiers clamoured aloud to accompany him. They began to descend from the ships, but the heaving of the waves threatened every instant to dash the boats together and break them to pieces. At length, after incurring great danger, the coast was reached. At this moment a strange sail appeared in the horizon: it was believed to be an English vessel. "Fortune," exclaimed Bonaparte, "thou forsakest me! What! Not give but five days!" Fortune did not forsake him, for it proved to be a French frigate rejoining the fleet. Infinite difficulty was experienced in disembarking between four and five thousand men during the evening and night. Bonaparte determined to march immediately on Alexandria, in order to surprise the place, and not allow the Turks time to make preparations of defence. No sooner had he gained a footing, therefore, than he set out. Not a single horse had been unshipped; but Bonaparte, his staff, and Caffarelli even, despite his wooden leg, accomplished four or five leagues over the sand on foot, and arrived at break of day in sight of Alexandria.

This ancient city, the eldest-born of Alexander, had no longer its magnificent edifices, its innumerable habitations, its countless multitudes; three-fourths of it lay in ruins. The Turks, the wealthy Egyptians, and the European merchants, resided in the modern town, which was the only part preserved. A few Arabs lurked in the remains of the ancient city. A decayed wall, flanked by towers, encompassed the old and new towns, whilst all around stretched a wilderness of sand, which in Egypt everywhere advances as civilization recedes.

The four thousand French, led by Bonaparte, arrived before it, as we have said, at break of day. During their night-march across the sandy plain, they had encountered only a few Arabs, who, after an exchange of shots, plunged into the desert. Bonaparte divided his troops into three columns. Bon, with the first, marched to the right on the Rosetta gate; Kleber, with the second, in the centre on the gate of the Column; Menou, with the third, to the left on the gate of the Catacombs. The Arabs and Turks, who are first-rate warriors behind a wall, sustained a well-directed fire from the defences; but the French planted ladders and speedily cleared the crumbling rampart. Kleber fell amongst the first, struck by a ball in the forehead. The Arabs were pursued from ruin to ruin, even to the new town. The combat threatened to be prolonged from street to street, and to become murderous; when a Turkish officer interposed to negotiate an accommodation. Bonaparte declared that he had not come to ravage the land of Egypt, or to dispossess the Grand-Signor, but solely to rescue it from the dominion of the Mamelukes, and avenge the outrages they had perpetrated to the injury of France. He engaged that the authorities of the country should be maintained, the ceremonies of religion continued as heretofore, property respected: with other pledges of an analogous character. Under favour of these conditions resistance ceased: and the French were installed masters of Alexandria that very day. In the meantime, the army had landed in safety. These preliminary objects accomplished, the next points for consideration were to place the squadron in safety, either in the harbour or in one of the neighbouring roads, to form at Alexandria an administration conformable to the manners of the country, and to arrange a plan of invasion for the entire conquest of Egypt. For the moment the dangers of the sea and of a rencontre with the English were passed; the chief obstacles had been surmounted with the auspicious fortune which seems invariably to attend the dawn of a great man.

Egypt, which the French had thus entered, is the most singular and aptly situated country, as well as one of the most productive in the world. Its position on the globe is well known. Africa adheres to Asia only by a neck of sand called the Isthmus of Suez, and which, if it were cut through, would afford an outlet from the Mediterranean into the Indian Ocean, and save navigators the toil of sailing immense distances and of doubling, amid tempestuous gales, the Cape of Good Hope. Egypt extends in a parallel line to the Red Sea and the Isthmus of Suez. She holds the keys of this isthmus. In ancient times, and in the middle ages, during the greatness of Venice, she was the medium through which the commerce of India flowed. Such is her intermediate position between the Eastern and Western hemispheres. Her physical constitution and form are not less peculiar. The Nile, one of the principal rivers in the world, takes its source in the mountains of Abyssinia, traverses six hundred leagues of the deserts of Africa, then enters, or rather plunges, into Egypt, rushing over the cataracts of Syena, and proceeds for two hundred leagues farther before it joins the sea. Its banks constitute the whole of Egypt. They form a valley two hundred leagues in length, and from five to six leagues only in breadth. On both sides this valley is bounded by an ocean of sand. Chains of mountains, low, arid, and dislocated, trail tristfully through these sands, scarcely casting over their immensity a poor and broken shade. On one side they interpose between the Red Sea and the Nile, on the other they skirt the desert, retreating until lost in its solitudes. On the left bank of the Nile, some distance in the desert, two tongues of cultivable earth meander, which break the surface of the sand and display an appearance of verdure. These are the Oases, vegetable islands in a sea of sand. They are known as the greater and the lesser Oasis. By opening a channel from the Nile, the industry of man might render them regions of fertility. Fifty leagues above the sea the Nile divides into two branches, which flow into the Mediterranean sixty leagues apart, the one at Rosetta, the other at Damietta. Antiquity assigns seven mouths to the Nile: they may be still detected, but there are only two navigable. The triangle formed by these two branches and the sea, is sixty leagues at its base, and fifty on each of its sides. It is called the Delta. It is the most fertile part of Egypt, because it is the best irrigated and intersected by canals. The whole country is divided into three parts: the Delta or Lower Egypt, otherwise Bahari; Middle Egypt, otherwise Vostani; and Upper-Egypt, otherwise Saïd.

The Etesian winds, blowing constantly from north to south during the months of May, June, and July, sweep away all the clouds formed at the mouth of the Nile, leaving not one to linger in the ever-serene atmosphere of this land, and bear them to the tops of the Abyssinian mountains. There they agglomerate, dissolve in rain during the months of July, August, and September, and occasion the celebrated phenomenon of the inundation of the Nile. Thus the country receives from the overflowing of the river the waters denied to it from the skies. No rain ever falls; and the swamps of the Delta, which would be pestilential in the climate of Europe, produce not a single malady. On retiring into its bed, the Nile deposits a rich loam, a sediment which constitutes the only productive soil on its shores, and whence are raised those copious harvests formerly devoted to the nourishment of Rome. The farther the inundation spreads, the more cultivable land is obtained. The owners of this land, levelled undistinguishably by the water every year, apportion it by mensuration. Consequently the Egyptians are adepts in that branch of knowledge. Canals might widen the sphere of the inundation, and be useful in lessening the rapidity of the stream, in retaining it longer, and in extending fertility at the expense of the desert. Nowhere could the ingenuity of man produce more salutary effects, or civilization be more desirable. The Nile and the desert dispute the possession of Egypt, and from civilization alone can the Nile derive the means of overcoming its rival, and compelling it to recede. Egypt is believed to have formerly supported twenty millions of inhabitants, independently of the Roman people: She could with difficulty feed three millions when the French appeared in her territory.

The inundation terminates in September. Then commence the labours of the field. During the months of October, November, December, January, and February, the country of Egypt presents a ravishing landscape of fertility and abundance. It is then covered with the richest crops, luxuriant with flowers, and studded with innumerable flocks. In March, the summer-heats prevail; the land cracks so deeply that it is sometimes dangerous to cross it on horseback. The work of husbandry is then finished. The Egyptians have gathered all the riches of the year. Besides grain, Egypt produces the finest rice, the most succulent vegetables, sugar, indigo, senna, cassia, barilla, flax, hemp, and cotton, all with a marvellous fecundity. Olives she has not, but she finds them opposite to her, in Greece; tobacco and coffee also are wanting, but she has them at her side, in Syria and Arabia. She is likewise destitute of wood, for heavy vegetation is incapable of taking root in the slimy deposit which the Nile annually renews over a bed of sand. A few sycamores and palms are the only trees in Egypt. In lieu of wood, the dung of cows is used for fuel. Egypt supplies with sustenance immense flocks of cattle. Domestic fowls of all kinds abound. She possesses those admirable horses, so celebrated over the world for their beauty, spirit, and attachment to their masters. She boasts also that matchless quadruped, the camel, which can store food and drink for several days, whose hoof is formed to tread the loose and shifting sand without fatigue, and which is as a living bark to navigate the ocean of the desert.

Every year numberless caravans arrive at Cairo, which emerge from the depths of the desert on both sides like fleets approaching from the horizon. Some come from Syria and Arabia, others from Africa and the coasts of Barbary. They are freighted with all the commodities proper to the climes of the sun, gold, ivory, plumes, inimitable shawls, perfumes, gums, aromatics of all kinds, coffee, tobacco, precious woods and slaves. Cairo becomes a magnificent entrepôt for the choicest productions of the globe, those which the genius of the Occidentals, mighty as it is, can never hope to rival, for they are gems of the sun, but of which their refined tastes will always render them eager consumers. Thus the commerce of India is the only one which the progress of nations will never tend to extinguish. It would not be necessary therefore to make a military post of Egypt in order to destroy by violence the trade of England. It would be sufficient to establish there an entrepôt, with security, good laws, and European commodities, to draw with an irresistible attraction the riches of the world.*

The population which dwells in Egypt is, like the ruins of the cities that cover it, the wrecks of several races. Copts, the ancient inhabitants of Egypt, Arabs, conquerors of Egypt from the Copts, and Turks, conquerors over the Arabs,—such are the tribes whose relics miserably fructify on the face of a land which they pollute. The Copts, when the French entered the country, did not exceed two hundred thousand at the utmost. Impoverished, degraded, and despised, they filled, like all proscribed classes, the most abject callings. The Arabs formed nearly the whole bulk of the population; the descendants of the companions of Mahomet. Their condition varied greatly; some, of high birth, tracing their lineage to Mahomet himself, large proprietors, retaining some tokens of the old Arabian knowledge, and combining with nobility of descent the functions of religion and the magistracy, were, under the name of Scheiks, the veritable grandees of Egypt. In divans they represented the country when its tyrants thought fit to address it for any purpose; in the mosques, they composed a sort of colleges, in which they taught religion, the ethics of the Koran, and a little philosophy and jurisprudence. The great mosque of Djemil-Azar was the principal learned and religious institution in the East. After these chiefs came the smaller proprietors, composing the second and most numerous class of Arabs; and lastly, the labourers, who had fallen into the condition of actual Helots. These latter were bond peasants, tillers of the soil, under the appellation of fellahs, and living in misery and subjection. There was a fourth class of Arabs, the Bedouins or wandering Arabs. These had never been induced to settle on the land: they were veritable sons of the desert. Mounted on horses or camels, and driving before them numerous herds, they roamed in search of pasturage on some oasis, or came annually to sow the ridges of cultivable ground skirting the confines of Egypt. Their vocation was to escort caravans, or lend their camels for transport. But, faithless brigands, they often pillaged the merchants they escorted or to whom they had lent their camels. Sometimes indeed, violating the hospitality accorded them on the margin of the cultivable lands, they broke into the valley of the Nile, which, only five leagues broad, is easily penetrated, sacked the villages, and, remounting their horses, bore their booty into the heart of the desert. Turkish supineness left their ravages almost invariably unpunished, contending with no better effect against the robbers than against the sands of the desert. These wandering Arabs amounted in number to a hundred or a hundred and twenty thousand, and furnished twenty or five and twenty thousand cavalry, valorous enough, and effective to harass an enemy, but incapable of withstanding the shock of close combat.

* [Every reflective reader will perceive the exaggerations of M. Thiers in the importance he thus assigns to Egypt. It is, however, a favourite dream with the French, that if they could get hold of Egypt they would crush English commerce, and with it England itself. At the time of Bonaparte's expedition, the state of India and other circumstances would have rendered its success in all probability vastly prejudicial to this country. At the present era, from the entire supremacy of England in India, and the progress of commerce and manufactures, the possession of Egypt by the French could have but a very small effect in deranging the trade of England. For, despite M. Thiers' theory of the immutability of Indian traffic, it has undergone, of late years, great changes, and is likely to undergo yet greater.]

Finally, the third race was that of the Turks; one equally scanty with the Copts, counting not more than two hundred thousand at the most. It was divided into Turks and Mamelukes. The Turks, inhabitants since the last conquest by the Sultans of Constantinople, were almost all enrolled on the list of janissaries; but we know that they usually procure insertion on these lists, merely to enjoy the privileges of janissaries, and that but a small proportion actually enters the service. There were but few of them consequently in the militia of the Pacha. This Pacha, delegated by the Sublime Porte, represented the Sultan in Egypt; but supported only by a slender force of janissaries, he had found his authority weakened, through the very precautions formerly taken by the Sultan Selim to strengthen it. That Sultan judging from its distance that Egypt might shake off the yoke of Constantinople, or that an ambitious and able pacha might erect an independent empire, had devised a counterpoise in the institution of the Mamelukes. But, as it is impossible to overturn the physical conditions which render a country dependent or independent of another, instead of the Pacha it proved to be the Mamelukes who became independent of Constantinople and masters of Egypt. These Mamelukes were slaves purchased in Circassia. Chosen from amongst the most beautiful boys of the Caucasus, transported young into Egypt, and reared in ignorance of their origin, in the profession and practice of arms, they formed the bravest and most expert horsemen in the universe. They plumed themselves chiefly on their want of origin, on the prices that had been paid for them, on their beauty and valour. They had twenty-four Beys, who were both their owners and their commanders. These Beys had each five or six hundred Mamelukes. This troop they took care to keep up, and they sometimes transmitted it to their sons, but more frequently to some favourite Mameluke, who became a Bey in his turn. Each Mameluke was attended by two fellahs. The whole body was composed of about twelve thousand horsemen, attended by twenty-four thousand Helots. They were the real masters and tyrants of the country. They subsisted either on the produce of the lands belonging to the Beys or on the income of taxes levied in all shapes. The Copts, who, we have already said, performed the most ignoble functions, acted as their collectors, spies, and men of business; for the degraded always cling to the service of the powerful. The twenty-four Beys, peers in rank, were not so in fact. They were accustomed to wage war on each other, and the strongest, subduing the others, exercised a sovereignty for life. He was wholly independent of the Pacha representing the Sultan of Constantinople, tolerated him at most in Cairo as a state-cipher, and frequently withheld from him the miri or land-tax, which, symbolical of the rights of conquest, was payable to the Porte.

Egypt, therefore, was in an actual feudalism, such as prevailed in Europe during the middle-ages. It contained at once a conquered people, a dominant soldiery in rebellion against its sovereign, and a primitive degraded class, in the service and employment of the most powerful.

Two Beys superior to the others ruled Egypt at this moment. The one, Ibrahim-Bey, wealthy, astute, and potent; the other, Mourad-Bey, intrepid, valiant, and full of energy. They had agreed upon a certain partition of authority, by virtue of which Ibraham-Bey directed the civil and Mourad-Bey the military departments. The latter was the man of war; he excelled in the art, and engrossed the affection of the Mamelukes, who were all devoted to him.

Bonaparte, who joined to the genius of the captain the skill and aptitude of the founder, and who, moreover, had administered conquered countries sufficiently to have acquired a particular art in the task, saw at a glance the policy he had to follow in Egypt. The first object was to wrest the country from the hands of its real masters, namely, the Mamelukes. They were the parties whom it behoved him to attack and crush by arms and policy. He had, besides, peculiar reasons for calling them to account, since they had continually oppressed and ill-treated the French. As to the Porte, it was incumbent to avoid the appearance of assailing its sovereignty, but affect on the contrary to respect it. Such as it had become, this sovereignty was of little value. A negotiation might be opened with the Porte, either for the cession of Egypt, by offering certain advantages elsewhere, or for a division of authority, which would involve no loss; for in leaving the Pacha at Cairo as he had hitherto been, and simply succeeding to the power of the Mamelukes, there was no cause of regret given. As to the inhabitants, all care must be taken to conciliate them, and especially the true population of the country, the Arabs. By honouring the Scheiks, flattering their patriarchal pride, increasing their influence, and encouraging a secret desire found in them, as it had been found in Italy, and may be found everywhere, for the restoration of the old dominion, of the Arabian sway, the French were sure to command the country and attach it wholly to them. Furthermore, by respecting persons and property amongst a people accustomed to consider victory as conferring the right to murder, pillage and devastate, they would cause an astonishment highly advantageous to them; and if, in addition, they reverenced the women and the Prophet, the conquest of all hearts followed as certainly as that of the soil.

Bonaparte acted upon these impressions so marked by sagacity and forethought. Endowed with a truly oriental imagination, it was easy for him to assume the solemn and imposing style in vogue amongst the Arabs. He issued proclamations which were translated into Arabic and circulated through the country. He addressed the Pacha thus: "The French republic has determined to send a powerful army to terminate the robberies of the Beys of Egypt, as it has been obliged to do several times during the century against the Beys of Algiers and Tunis. Thou, who ought to be the master of these Beys, and whom they hold nevertheless at Cairo without authority, and without power, thou shouldst witness my arrival with pleasure. Thou art doubtless already informed that I have not come to effect anything against the Koran or the Sultan. Thou knowest that the French nation is the only and solitary ally which the Sultan has in Europe. Come then to meet me, and join with me in cursing the impious race of the Beys."

Addressing the Egyptians, Bonaparte spoke to them in these words: "People of Egypt, you will be told that I am come to destroy your religion. Believe it not; reply that I have come to restore your rights, to punish usurpers, and that I respect more than the Mamelukes, God, his Prophet, and the Koran." Denouncing the tyranny of the Mamelukes, he said: "Is there a fine property? It belongs to the Mamelukes. Is there a beautiful slave, a good horse, a fine house? It belongs to the Mamelukes. If Egypt be their farm, let them show the lease God has given them of it. But God is just and merciful to his people, and he has ordained that the empire of the Mamelukes shall pass away." Describing the sentiments of the French he added: "We too, we are true Mussulmans. Is it not we who have destroyed the Pope, who taught that war must be made on the Mussulmans? Is it not we who have destroyed the knights of Malta, because those fools believed that God wished them to make war on the Mussulmans? Thrice happy they who are with us! They will prosper in fortune and in rank. Happy they who remain neuter! They will have time to know us and will take part with us. But woe, three-fold woe to those who arm for the Mamelukes and fight against us! There is no hope for them, they will utterly perish!"

To his soldiers, Bonaparte said: "You are about to undertake a conquest the effects of which on the civilization and commerce of the world are incalculable. You will give England the surest and most vital stab, until you are enabled to deal her the final death-blow.

"The people with whom you are going to live are Mahometans. Their principal article of belief is this: There is no other God but one God, and Mahomet is his prophet. Do not contradict them; behave to them as we have behaved to the Jews and the Italians. Have respect for their muphtis and their imauns, as you have had for rabbis and bishops. Show the same toleration towards the ceremonies prescribed by the Koran and towards mosques that you have exhibited for synagogues, and for the religion of Moses and for that of Jesus Christ. The Roman legions protected all religions. You will find here different usages from those of Europe; you must accustom yourselves to them. The people whose houses we shall enter treat women differently from us. Remember that, in all countries, he who violates them is a coward and a knave.

"The first city we shall meet was built by Alexander. At each step we shall encounter great mementos worthy to excite the emulation of Frenchmen."

Without delay, Bonaparte made his dispositions for establishing the French authority at Alexandria, and for subsequently quitting the Delta to take possession of Cairo, the capital of all Egypt. It was already July, and the Nile was about to rise. He proposed to arrive at Cairo before the inundation, and to employ the time it lasted in consolidating his power. He gave directions that everything should remain in the same state at Alexandria, that the religious usages should be continued and justice be administered as before by the Cadis. His design was simply to take the place of the Mamelukes, and he accordingly appointed an officer to receive the accustomed taxes. He formed a divan or municipal council, composed of the scheiks and notables of the city, with a view that they might be consulted on all measures taken by the French authority. He left 3,000 men in garrison at Alexandria, and gave the command to Kleber, whom his wound necessarily condemned to inaction for a month or more. He instructed a young officer of rare merit, who promised to be a great engineer for France, to put Alexandria in a state of defence, and to execute for that purpose all necessary works. This was Colonel Cretin, who, at little cost, and in a short time, erected at Alexandria admirable fortifications. Bonaparte likewise issued orders to place the fleet in safety. It was a question whether the large ships could enter the harbour of Alexandria, and in consequence a naval commission was formed to sound the harbour and make a report. In the meantime the fleet was brought to anchor in the roadstead of Aboukir. Bonaparte enjoined Brueys to have the doubt promptly solved, and, if it were ascertained that the ships could not get into Alexandria, to repair forthwith to Corfu.

After providing for these objects, he prepared to put his troops in motion. A considerable flotilla, loaded with provisions, artillery, munitions of war, and baggage, was dispatched to skirt the coast as far as the embouchure of Rosetta, there to enter the Nile, and to ascend it at the same time with the army. He then set forth with the bulk of his forces, which, weakened by the two garrisons left at Malta and Alexandria, mustered scarcely thirty thousand men. He had ordered his flotilla to rendezvous at the point of Ramanieh, on the banks of the Nile. There he proposed to join it and ascend the Nile simultaneously with it, his purpose being to leave the Delta and enter Middle-Egypt or Vostani. To Ramanieh from Alexandria there were two routes: the one through an inhabited country along the shores of the sea and the Nile; the other shorter and straight as the bird flies, but across the desert of Damanhour. Bonaparte hesitated not, and decided for the latter. It behoved him to arrive promptly at Cairo. Desaix marched with the vanguard; the main-body followed at some leagues' distance. The army commenced its march on the 18th Messidor (6th July). When the soldiers saw themselves fairly embarked on this boundless plain, with a slippery sand beneath their feet, a burning sky above their heads, without water, without shade, scanty clumps of palm-trees the sole objects to relieve the dreary monotony of the scene, not a living being visible save hovering troops of Arab horsemen, who appeared and disappeared on the horizon, sometimes concealing themselves behind hillocks of sand to slaughter stragglers, they were oppressed with sadness. The desire of repose had already arisen in their minds after the long and harassing campaigns of Italy. They had followed their leader into a distant country, because their faith in him was blind, and because a land of promise had been held out to them, whence they would return rich enough to buy each of them his field of acres. But when they looked upon this wilderness, a heavy depression crept over them, which increased almost to despair. They found all the wells, which at intervals lined the route through the desert, destroyed by the Arabs. Scarcely a few drops of brackish water remained, wholly insufficient to quench their thirst. They had been told they would find relief and comfort at Damanhour; they found only a few miserable hovels, and could procure neither bread nor wine, but merely lentils to satisfy the cravings of appetite, with a small supply of water. It was necessary to move onward and plunge afresh into the desert. Bonaparte saw even the intrepid Lannes and Murat snatch off their hats, throw them on the sand, and trample them under foot. But he overawed all; his presence imposed silence, and sometimes revived a spark of gaiety. The soldiers refused to attribute their sorrows to him; they charged them upon those who evinced such interest in examining the country. Observing the savants pause to scrutinize each little ruin, they asserted it was for them they had come there, and avenged themselves by witticisms after their fashion. Caffarelli especially, brave as a grenadier, curious as an antiquary, passed in their eyes for the man who had deceived the general, and enticed him into this dismal region. As he had lost a leg on the Rhine, they said: He cares nothing, not he, he has one foot in France! However, after cruel sufferings, supported at first discontentedly, but ultimately with levity and courage, they reached the banks of the Nile on the 22d Messidor (10th July), after a march of four days. At sight of the Nile and of the water so long thirsted for, the soldiers rushed into the stream, and, floundering in its current, soon forgot their calamities. Desaix's division, which from the van had passed to the rear, descried two or three hundred Mamelukes capering in front of it, and dispersed them with a few volleys of grape. They were the first that had been seen. They announced an approaching rencontre with the hostile army. The valiant Mourad-Bey, in fact, duly forewarned of the coming storm, was collecting all his forces around Cairo. Pending their concentration, he hovered with a thousand horse around the French to reconnoitre and watch their march.

At Ramanieh the army awaited the arrival of the flotilla; it reposed until the 25th Messidor (13th July), and started on that day for Chebreiss. Mourad-Bey attended its movements with his Mamelukes. The flotilla, having departed first and thus got in advance of the army, became engaged with the enemy before it could be supported. Mourad had his flotilla also, and both from the shore and his djérmes (light Egyptian vessels) he directed his fire. The French had a tough encounter to sustain. The naval officer in command, Perrée, displayed an heroic courage; he was well seconded by the dismounted troopers, who, until equipped at the expense of the Mamelukes, travelled by water. He retook two gun-boats from the enemy and repulsed him. At this moment the army came up. It was arranged in five divisions. It had not yet fought against these singular enemies. To velocity of action, the impetuous charge of horse, the onslaught of scimitars, were to be opposed the immobility of the foot soldier, his long bayonet, and masses fronting on all sides. Bonaparte formed his five divisions into five squares, in the midst of which were placed the baggage and the staff. The artillery was planted at the angles. The five divisions were stationed to flank each other. Mourad-Bey darted on these living bastions a thousand or twelve hundred intrepid horsemen, who, rushing on with loud cries, and at the utmost speed of their horses, discharging their pistols, then drawing their formidable sabres, came plunging on the front of the squares. Encountering on all quarters a forest of bayonets and a terrible fire, they fluttered around the French ranks, and strewed the ground before them or escaped over the plain at full gallop. After losing two or three hundred of his bravest troops, Mourad retired to gain the top of the Delta, and to await in the vicinity of Cairo, at the head of all his forces, the advance of the French.

This conflict sufficed to familiarize the army with the new description of enemies it had raised, and to suggest to Bonaparte the tactics he must employ against them. Meanwhile the army continued its progress towards Cairo. The flotilla kept up the Nile abreast of the army. The march was prosecuted without cessation during the ensuing days. The soldiers had fresh sufferings to brave, but they skirted the Nile, and were permitted to bathe in the evenings. The sight of the enemy had revived their ardour. "These soldiers, already somewhat averse to fatigues, as will always happen when sufficient glory has been gained, I invariably found," says Bonaparte, "admirable in action." During the marches discontent often recurred, however, and after it had worn away pleasantries succeeded. The savants began to inspire respect by the bravery they had shown; Monge and Bertholet especially had exhibited an heroic courage on board the flotilla. Even whilst passing jokes upon them, the soldiers were at bottom full of regard for them. Seeing no appearance of this capital of Cairo, so vaunted as the great wonder of the East, they said no such place existed, or that it was sure to be like Damanhour, a mere collection of hovels. They mourned, besides, over the deception that had been practised on their poor general, saying he had allowed himself to be decoyed away and transported like a good simple man, he and his companions in glory. At night, when a halt was made, the soldiers who had read or heard related the stories of the Thousand and One Nights, repeated them to their comrades, and they began to promise themselves magnificent palaces, all-dazzling with gold and jewels. In the meantime they were without bread to eat; not that corn was wanting, for it was everywhere found, but they had no mills or ovens. They were compelled to subsist on lentils, pigeons, and an exquisite water-melon, known in southern climates under the name of pasteque. The French soldiers called it Saint pasteque.

The French now drew near to Cairo, where the decisive engagement was to be fought. Mourad-Bey had assembled there the greatest part of his Mamelukes, ten thousand or thereabouts. They were attended by a double amount of fellahs, to whom arms were given, and who were appointed to fight behind the intrenchments. He had likewise collected a few thousand janissaries or spahis belonging to the Pacha, who, notwithstanding Bonaparte's letter, had tamely suffered himself to be dragged into the party of his oppressors. Mourad-Bey had made his preparations of defence on the banks of the Nile. The capital of Cairo stands on the right bank of the river. It was on the opposite side, namely, on the left bank that Mourad had pitched his camp, in a wide plain extending between the Nile and the pyramids of Ghizeh, the loftiest in Egypt. His dispositions were these. A large village called Embabeh, rose from the margin of the river. Mourad had here erected certain works, conceived and executed with true Turkish ignorance. They were a simple trench encompassing the circuit of the village, and immoveable batteries, whose pieces not having field-frames could not be shifted. Such was the intrenched camp of Mourad. He had stationed within it his 24,000 fellahs and janissaries, to battle with the accustomed obstinacy of the Turks behind ramparts. This village, intrenched and defended on the side of the river, formed his right. The Mamelukes, to the number of ten thousand horsemen, were stretched over the plain between the Nile and the pyramids. Some thousands of Arab cavalry, auxiliaries of the Mamelukes only to pillage and massacre in case of a victory, occupied the space between the pyramids and the Mamelukes. Mourad's colleague, Ibraham-Bey, less warlike and valiant than himself, kept on the other side of the Nile with a thousand Mamelukes, guarding his women, slaves, and treasures, ready to fly from Cairo and take refuge in Syria if the French proved victorious. A considerable number of djermes covered the Nile, freighted with all the moveable wealth of the Mamelukes. Such was the position in which the two Beys awaited Bonaparte.

On the 3d Thermidor (21st July), the French army was in motion before daylight. The soldiers knew that they were on the point of beholding Cairo and encountering the enemy. At break of day, accordingly, they at length discovered on their left, beyond the river, the lofty minarets of that great capital, and on their right, in the desert, the gigantic pyramids, gilded by the rays of the sun. At sight of these eternal monuments, they paused, arrested by amazement and admiration. The countenance of Bonaparte was radiant with enthusiasm; he galloped before the ranks of the army, and pointing to the pyramids exclaimed: "Reflect that from the summit of those pyramids forty ages look upon you." The troops answered with a shout of exultation and moved rapidly onward. On approaching nearer, they saw the spires and minarets of Cairo rise more proudly, the pyramids grow more vast to the view; they saw the multitude congregated in Embabeh, and the glittering array of those ten thousand horsemen, resplendent in gold and steel, stretched in an interminable line over the plain. Bonaparte quickly arranged his plan of battle. The army, as at Chebreiss, was separated into five divisions. The divisions under Desaix and Regnier formed the right, towards the desert; the division under Dugua formed the centre; the divisions of Menou and Bon formed the left along the course of the Nile. Bonaparte, who since the combat of Chebreiss had duly estimated the peculiarities of the ground and the enemy, made his dispositions accordingly. Each division formed a square, each square had six ranks. Behind were the companies of grenadiers in platoons, ready to support the points of attack. The artillery was on the angles; the baggage and the generals in the centre. The squares were shifting. When they were in motion, two sides marched on the flanks. When they were charged, they were to halt and face round. Again, when they intended to attack a position, the front ranks were to detach themselves and form in columns of attack, whilst the others remained behind, still maintaining the square, but only three files deep, and ready to embrace again the columns of attack. Such were the dispositions ordered by Bonaparte. He was afraid lest the impetuous soldiers of Italy, accustomed to advance at quick march, would have difficulty in resigning themselves to this cold and passionless system of bulwarks. He had taken every pains to train them however. Above all, injunctions were given not to fire too soon, but to wait calmly for the enemy, and to fire only within musket-range.

The French advanced almost within reach of the enemy's cannon. Bonaparte, who was in the centre square formed by Dugua's division, surveyed with a telescope the state of the camp of Embabeh. He perceived that the artillery of the camp, not being on field-frames, could not be moved into the plain, and that the motley garrison was not likely to sally from the intrenchments. Upon this conclusion he based his operations. He resolved to bear down with his divisions on the right, that is to say, on the army of Mamelukes, wheeling out of range of the cannon of Embabeh. His intention was to separate the Mamelukes from the intrenched camp, surround them, drive them into the Nile, and not attack Embabeh until he had disposed of them. It would not be a difficult task, he surmised, to reduce the multitude cooped up in that camp after having exterminated the Mamelukes.

He forthwith gave the signal. Desaix, who formed the extreme right, was the first to march. After him went Regnier's square, and then Dugua's, in which Bonaparte stood. The two others wound round Embabeh, beyond reach of the cannon. Mourad-Bey, who, although without education, was endowed with a high intelligence and keen perception, immediately divined the purpose of his adversary, and determined to charge during the execution of so decisive a movement. Leaving two thousand Mamelukes to support Embabeh, he advanced at speed with the remainder on the two squares of the right. That of Desaix, entangled amidst palms, was not formed when the front Mamelukes came up. But it formed instantly, and was ready to receive the charge. Eight thousand cavalry galloping under one impulse across the plain form a terrific force. They fell with extraordinary impetuosity on Desaix. His brave soldiers, now as cool as they were wont to be headstrong, awaited them with calmness, and received them at musket-shot with a terrible discharge of balls and grape. Checked by the fire, these innumerable horsemen flew along the ranks, and encircled the bristling citadel. Some of the bravest precipitated themselves on the bayonets, and turning their horses and backing them on the French, succeeded in making a breach, and thirty or forty fell dead at the feet of Desaix, in the very centre of the square. The mass, wheeling round, recoiled from Desaix's square upon that of Regnier which followed. Accosted by a similar fire, they turned towards the point they had started from; but they found in their rear Dugua's division which Bonaparte had moved towards the Nile, and immediately broke into a complete rout. They fled in the utmost confusion. Part of the fugitives escaped on the French right towards the pyramids; others, passing under Dugua's fire, threw themselves into Embabeh, whither they carried trouble and dismay. All immediately became confusion in the intrenched camp. Bonaparte, perceiving the moment auspicious, ordered his two left divisions to approach Embabeh and storm it. Bon and Menou advanced under the fire of the intrenchments, and when they reached a suitable distance, halted. The squares unlined; the front ranks formed in columns of attack, whilst the others remained in square, still presenting the appearance of living citadels. But at this moment, the Mamelukes, as well those Mourad had left at Embabeh as those who had sought refuge within it, attempted to anticipate the assault. They charged on the French columns of attack whilst under march. But these, instantly halting and forming in square with matchless rapidity, received them with firmness, and killed a great number. Some retreated into Embabeh, where the disorder became extreme; others, flying into the plain, between the Nile and the French right, were shot down or driven into the river. The attacking columns then vigorously assailed Embabeh, stormed the intrenchments, and forced into the Nile the unfortunate multitude of fellahs and janissaries. Many were drowned; but as the Egyptians are excellent swimmers, the great majority contrived to save themselves. The action was finished, and the day over. The Arabs, who had lurked near the pyramids in expectation of a victory, plunged into the desert. Mourad, with the wreck of his fine cavalry and his own face dyed in blood, retired in the direction of Upper-Egypt. Ibrahim, who contemplated the disastrous conflict from the opposite bank, fled towards Balbeis in retreat for Syria. The Mamelukes set fire to the djermes in the river which contained their valuables. This prey escaped the French, who had the mortification to witness the flames during the whole of the night successively devouring the rich and multifarious booty.

Bonaparte fixed his head-quarters at Ghizeh, on the banks of the Nile, where Mourad-Bey had a sumptuous residence. Both at Ghizeh and Embabeh, considerable stores of provisions were found, and the French soldiers were enabled to make amends for their long privation. They discovered in the gardens of Ghizeh vines loaded with luscious grapes, and failed not to celebrate a speedy vintage. But on the field of battle they gathered fruits of another kind: magnificent shawls, splendid weapons, horses, and purses containing two to three hundred pieces of gold, for the Mamelukes carried their wealth principally on the person. They passed the evening, night, and following day in collecting these spoils. From five to six hundred Mamelukes had been killed. More than a thousand were drowned in the Nile. The French soldiers assiduously commenced to fish up the bodies in order to rifle them; a pursuit in which they consumed several additional days.

The battle had scarcely cost the French a hundred killed and wounded; for if defeat be destruction to broken, so is the loss almost null to compact and victorious squares. The Mamelukes had lost their best horsemen on the field or in the water. Their forces were dispersed, and the fall of Cairo into the hands of the French was inevitable. That capital was in great disorder and agitation. It contained upwards of three hundred thousand inhabitants, and was filled with a ferocious and degraded populace, which abandoned itself to revolting excesses, and attempted to profit by the occasion to plunder the rich palaces of the Beys. Unfortunately, the French flotilla had not yet ascended the Nile, and they had not the means of crossing it to proceed and take possession of Cairo. Some French merchants who happened to be in the city were sent by the scheiks to Bonaparte for the purpose of arranging as to the occupation of the place. He contrived to procure some djermes to carry over a detachment, which restored tranquillity and shielded life and property from the outrages of the mob. On the second day thereafter he entered Cairo in person and took up his abode in the palace of Mourad-Bey.

No sooner was he established at Cairo than he began to put in vogue the policy he had already adopted at Alexandria, and which was so well calculated to attach the country to him. He visited the principal scheiks, flattered their prejudices, cajoled them with hopes of the restoration of the Arab dominion, promised them the perpetuation of their religion and customs, and completely succeeded in gaining them by a happy blending of adroit blandishments with imposing language, stamped with oriental grandeur. An essential point was to obtain from the scheiks of the mosque of Djemil-Azar a declaration in favour of the French. This would operate as a brief from the Pope amongst the Catholics. Bonaparte exerted all his address to attain this object and he fully succeeded. The great scheiks made the declaration desired, and exhorted the Egyptians to submit to the envoy of God, who revered the Prophet and was come to avenge his children on the tyranny of the Mamelukes. Bonaparte established at Cairo a divan in the same manner as at Alexandria, composed of the principal scheiks and other inhabitants. He intended this divan or municipal council to be instrumental both in securing the good-will of the Egyptians by the show of consulting them, and also in imparting information upon the details of the existing internal administration. It was determined that similar ones should be established in all the provinces, and that these separate divans should send deputies to the divan of Cairo, which would thus become the grand national divan.

Bonaparte resolved to leave the administration of justice in the hands of the Cadis. In execution of his design to succeed the Mamelukes in their domination, he confiscated their property, and continued for the advantage of the French army the perception of the taxes previously levied. For this latter purpose he required the co-operation of the Copts. He omitted no means to gain their attachment, alluring them by hopes of an amelioration of their condition. He dispatched generals with detachments down the Nile to complete the occupation of the Delta, which had been as yet merely traversed. He sent others up the Nile to take possession of Middle-Egypt. Desaix was stationed with his division at the entrance of Upper-Egypt, which it was intended to wrest from Mourad-Bey as soon as the waters of the Nile subsided in the autumn. Each of the generals, furnished with detailed instructions, was to repeat in every part of the country what had been done at Alexandria and Cairo. They were to call the scheiks around them, conciliate the Copts, and provide for the receipt of the taxes to meet the necessities of the French army.

The comfort and health of his soldiers likewise commanded the attention of Bonaparte. Egypt was beginning to please them; they found in it repose, abundance, a pure and healthy climate. They were becoming accustomed to the singular manners of the country, which afforded them a continual subject of banter. Comprehending the intention of the general with their usual sagacity, they also feigned great reverence for the Prophet, and laughed with him at the part policy compelled them to play. Bonaparte caused ovens to be constructed that they might be supplied with bread. He lodged them in the excellent habitations of the Mamelukes, and enjoined them above all things to respect the women. They had met in Egypt an admirable variety of the ass and in great quantity. Upon these animals it was their delight to make excursions in the environs and scour the face of the country. Their vivacity sometimes occasioned unpleasant accidents to the grave denizens of Cairo. It became necessary to prohibit them from traversing the streets otherwise than at a sedate and orderly pace. The cavalry was now mounted on the finest horses in the world, to wit on the Arab chargers captured from the Mamelukes.

Bonaparte also applied himself to maintain relations with the neighbouring countries, in order to preserve and monopolize the rich commerce of Egypt. He himself nominated the emir-hadjée. This is an officer chosen annually at Cairo to protect the great caravan of Mecca. He wrote to all the French consuls on the coast of Barbary, instructing them to apprize the Beys that the emir-hadjée was appointed and that the caravans might depart in safety. He caused the scheiks to communicate to the scherif of Mecca that the pilgrims would be protected and the caravans have security and protection. The pacha of Cairo having followed Ibrahim-Bey to Balbeys, Bonaparte addressed to him, as also to the pachas of St. Jean d'Acre and Damascus, letters affirming the cordial dispositions of the French towards the Sublime Porte. This precaution was unfortunately unavailing. The officers of the Sultan could with difficulty be persuaded that the French, who had invaded one of their sovereign's richest provinces, were in reality his truest friends.

The Arabs were captivated by the character of the young conqueror. They marvelled at the phenomenon of a mortal who wielded the thunderbolts of war being at the same time clement and courteous. They called him the adopted son of the Prophet, the favourite of the great Allah, and had chaunted in the great mosque the following hallelujah:

"The great Allah is no longer angry with us! He has pardoned our sins, sufficiently punished by the long oppression of the Mamelukes. Let us sing the mercies of the great Allah!

"Who is he that has preserved from the perils of the sea and the rage of his enemies the favourite of Victory? Who is he that has conducted in safety to the shores of the Nile the warriors of the West?

"It is the great Allah, the all-powerful Allah, who is no longer wroth with us! Let us sing the mercies of the great Allah!

"The Mameluke-Beys put their confidence in their horses; the Mameluke-Beys ranged their infantry in battle.

"But the Favourite of Victory, at the head of the warriors of the West, destroyed the infantry and horses of the Mamelukes.

"Even as the vapours which rise at dawn from the waters of the Nile are dissipated by the rays of the sun, so has the army of the Mamelukes been dispersed by the warriors of the West, because the great Allah is truly enraged against the Mamelukes, because the warriors of the West are the apple of the eye of the great Allah."

To enter more completely into the manners of the Arabs, Bonaparte resolved to take part in their festivals. He assisted at that of the Nile, which is one of the greatest in Egypt. That river is the benefactor of the country; it is accordingly held in deep veneration, and is the object of a species of worship. During the inundation it is introduced into Cairo by a large canal; a dam bars the entrance of this canal, until the water has reached a certain height; then it is cut, and the day appointed for this operation is one of jubilee. The height to which the river has attained is proclaimed, and when a plentiful inundation is expected general gladness diffuses itself, for it is a presage of abundance. It was on the 18th of August (1st Fructidor) that this festival was celebrated. Bonaparte had ordered the whole army under arms and ranged it on the banks of the canal. An immense crowd was assembled, which viewed with pleasure the warriors of the West participate in their enjoyments. Bonaparte, at the head of the staff, accompanied the principal authorities of the country. First, a scheik declared the height to which the Nile had risen: it was twenty-five feet, which caused acclamations of joy. Then the labour of cutting the dam commenced. The whole French artillery resounded at the moment the waters of the river rushed in. According to custom, a number of boats was launched into the

to obtain the prize awarded to the one first boat. Bonaparte delivered this prize in person. Multitudes of men and boys plunged into the stream, attaching peculiar virtues to this immersion. Women threw into it hair and pieces of cloth. Bonaparte afterwards caused the city to be illuminated, and the day closed amidst festivities. The commemoration of the Prophet was celebrated with equal pomp. Bonaparte repaired to the great mosque, seated himself on cushions, his legs crossed like the scheiks, and repeated with them the homilies of the Koran, poising his body and bowing his head as a true moslem. He edified all the members of the holy college by his orthodox piety. He subsequently attended the entertainment given by the grand scheik, who is elected on that day.

It was by such means Bonaparte, an equally profound politician as great captain, succeeded in conciliating the attachment of the country. But whilst thus flattering its prejudices for a time, he strove to prepare the way for the spread of knowledge within it, by the creation of the celebrated "Institute of Egypt." Assembling the savants and artists he had brought over, and associating with them the best-informed amongst his officers, he formed this Institute, to which he assigned revenues, and one of the most capacious mansions in Cairo. Some were appointed to make an exact description of the country, and draw detailed maps; others to survey the ruins and furnish new lights to history; others to study the productions and digest treatises of utility to medicine, astronomy, and natural history; others, in fine, to consider the benefits that might be conferred on the inhabitants by the introduction of machines, by canals, works on the Nile, and processes adapted to a soil so singular and different from that of Europe. If fortune was one day to tear this fine country from France, she could not at least rob her of the conquests science was about to achieve on its territory. a monument was in embryo, destined to illustrate the genius and perseverance of her savants, as much as the expedition itself the heroism of her soldiers.

Monge was the first who exercised the presidency. Bonaparte obtained the distinction only after him. He submitted the following subjects of inquiry: the best construction for water and wind mills; a substitution for hops, which are not grown in Egypt, in the brewing of beer; the places best adapted for the cultivation of the vine; the best means of procuring water conveyed to the citadel of Cairo; the expediency of digging wells in different parts of the desert; the mode of clarifying and cooling the water of the Nile; a plan for rendering useful the accumulations of rubbish with which Cairo was choked, as well as all the old towns of Egypt; the materials necessary for the manufacture of powder in Egypt. From these topics, selected by him, we may conceive the young general's turn of mind. Forthwith, the surveyors, designers, and savants, spread themselves through the provinces to form a description and map of the country.

Such were the objects of attention to the new colony, and such the manner in which the founder, Bonaparte, directed its labours. The reduction of the provinces of Lower and Middle Egypt was completed without difficulty, leading only to a few skirmishes with the Arabs. A forced march on Balbeis had sufficed to scare Ibrahim-Bey into Syria. Desaix was obliged to await the arrival of autumn to conquer Upper-Egypt from Mourad-Bey, who had retreated thither with the remains of his army.

But, in the meantime, fortune inflicted on Bonaparte the most terrible of reverses. On quitting Alexandria he had strongly urged Admiral Brueys to place his squadron in safety from the English, either by securing it in the harbour of Alexandria or by removing it to Corfu, but on no account to remain in the roadstead of Aboukir, for it was better to encounter the enemy under sail than to receive him at anchor. A warm dispute had arisen consequent upon the question whether ships of 80 and 120 guns could enter the harbour of Alexandria. There was no doubt about vessels of smaller calibre; but the two of 80 and the one of 120 guns would require to be lightened, so as to lessen their draught at least three feet. To effect this it was necessary to disarm them or to construct floaters. Admiral Brueys refused to let his squadron enter the port under this condition. He contended that if such precautions must be taken with regard to his three most powerful ships, he would never be able to leave it again in presence of an enemy, and might be thus blockaded by a very inferior force: so he determined to depart for Corfu. But being strongly attached to General Bonaparte, he was unwilling to set sail before hearing news of his entry into Cairo, and of his safe establishment in Egypt. The time which he consumed, first in sounding the channel of the Alexandrian harbour, and secondly in awaiting intelligence from Cairo, occasioned his own ruin and one of the most fatal events of the revolution: one of those too, which, to the present era, have exercised the greatest influence over the destinies of the world.

Admiral Brueys, then, was still moored in the bay of Aboukir. This bay is an almost regular simicircle. His thirteen vessels formed a semicircular line, parallel with the coast. To secure his line of anchorage, the admiral had extended it on one side towards a small islet, named the islet of Aboukir. He conceived that no ship could pass between this islet and his line to take it in rear; and in this persuasion was content with erecting on it a twelve-gun battery, simply to prevent an enemy from landing. He judged himself so unassailable on this side, that he had stationed there his worst vessels. He feared more for the other extremity of his half-moon. On that side he believed it possible for an enemy to pass between the shore and his anchorage-ground; so he had placed there his strongest and best-commanded ships. Moreover he was consoled by an important consideration, which was, that his line being to the south and the wind blowing from the north, the enemy who should attack on that side would have the wind foul, and would doubtless not expose himself to fight under such a disadvantage.

In this situation, protected on his left by an islet which he deemed sufficient to shut the bay, and on his right by his best ships and the advantage of the wind, he awaited in security the tidings which were to be the signal of his departure.

Nelson, after having scoured the Archipelago, after returning to the Adriatic, to Naples, and to Sicily, had at length obtained certain intelligence of the debarkation of the French at Alexandria. He immediately sailed in that direction, more sure than ever of at length finding their squadron and giving it battle. He dispatched a frigate in advance to seek out and reconnoitre its position. This frigate having found it in the bay of Aboukir, was enabled to pry at leisure into the whole mystery of the French half-moon. If the admiral, who had in the harbour of Alexandria a multitude of frigates and light vessels, had taken the precaution to keep some of them under sail, he might have held the English always at a distance, prevented them from scrutinising his line, and at all events been apprized of their approach. Unfortunately he did nothing of the kind. The English frigate, after having concluded its observations, returned to Nelson, who, being informed of all the particulars of the French position, instantly bore towards Aboukir. He reached the mouth of the bay on the 14th Thermidor (1st August), about six o'clock in the evening. Admiral Brueys was at dinner: but upon seeing the English he immediately hoisted the signal for battle. However the French so little expected to receive an enemy that no preparations for an engagement were made in any of their ships, and part of the crews were on shore. The admiral hurried away officers to bring the sailors on board, and to collect some of those in the transports. He concluded Nelson would not venture to attack that evening, and he trusted to have time for the reception of the reinforcements he had sent in quest of.

Nelson resolved to attack immediately, and to hazard a bold manœuvre, on the success of which he grounded his hopes of victory. This was to approach the French line on the left, namely, by the islet of Aboukir, to pass between that islet and their squadron, despite all the dangers of shallows, and to place himself thus between the shore and their line of battle. This manœuvre was very perilous, but the intrepid Englishman hesitated not. The number of ships was equal on both sides, that is to say, thirteen sail of the line. Nelson began the attack about eight in the evening. His tactics did not at first promise to be successful. The Culloden, in attempting to steer between the islet of Aboukir and the French line, took the ground. The Goliath, which followed her, was more fortunate, and sailed through; but driven by the wind, she ran beyond the first French ship, and was only hauled up opposite the third. The Zealous, the Audacious, the Theseus, and the Orion followed in her wake, and succeeded in taking up positions between the shore and the French. They advanced as far as Le Tonnant, which lay eighth in the French line, and thus engaged their whole centre and left. Their other vessels advanced outside the line and thus placed it between two fires. As the French had not anticipated being attacked in this way, the guns towards the shore were not slung, and their two first ships could only fire from one side, consequently one was disabled and the other unmasted. But in the centre, where the Orient lay, bearing the Admiral's flag, the fire was terrible. The Bellerophon, one of Nelson's principal ships, had her rigging shot away, her masts sent by the board, and was obliged to be drifted off. Other English vessels, dreadfully crippled, were obliged to be removed from the field of battle. Admiral Brueys had received only a part of his sailors; nevertheless, he maintained the conflict with advantage; he even hoped, notwithstanding the success of Nelson's manœuvre, to gain the victory, if the orders which he gave at this moment to his right were executed. The English had engaged only the left and the centre; the right, comprising five of the best ships, had no enemy before it.' Brueys signalled it to weigh, and turn outside the line of battle; which manœuvre succeeding, the English ships attacking externally would have been placed between two fires; but the signals were not seen. In a similar case, a subordinate ought not to hesitate in flying to the scene of danger, and to the rescue of his chief. Vice-admiral Villeneuve, brave but irresolute, remained quiescent, awaiting orders. The left and centre, therefore, continued exposed to the battery of two fires. Still the Admiral and his captains worked prodigies of valour, and gloriously sustained the honour of the French flag. The French had lost two ships, the English likewise had lost two, one grounded, the other dismasted; the French fire was superior. The unfortunate Brueys had been wounded, but refused to quit the deck of his vessel. "An admiral," he exclaimed, "ought to die giving orders." A ball killed him on his quarter-deck. About eleven o'clock the magnificent vessel L'Orient took fire and blew up. This fearful explosion suspended for a time the desolating struggle. Without losing courage, however, the five French ships engaged, Le Franklin, Le Tonnant, Le Peuple-Souverain, Le Spartiate, and L'Aquilon, kept up their fire during the night. There was still time for the right to hoist sail and come to their aid. Nelson trembled lest this manœuvre should be executed; he was so shattered that he could not have sustained the attack. Villeneuve did, in fact, at length weigh anchor and stand out, but it was for the purpose of making off and saving his wing, which he deemed incapable of encountering Nelson with advantage. Three of his ships ran ashore; he got away with the two others, and two frigates, and crowded all sail for Malta. The battle had now lasted upwards of fifteen hours. All the crews on board the French vessels engaged, had exhibited an heroic valour. The brave captain Du Petit-Thouars lost two limbs at a shot; he asked for a pinch of snuff, remained on his quarter-deck, and waited, like Brueys, to be killed by a cannon-ball. The whole French squadron, with the exception of the ships and frigates draughted by Villeneuve, was destroyed. Nelson was so crippled that he could not pursue the fugitive vessels.*

* [This of course is the most favourable version of the affair for the French. It may be interesting to the reader to have in juxtaposition a good English account of this famous battle, which unquestionably exercised a prodigious effect on the destinies of the world, and one is therefore subjoined from the pen of Mr. Alison:—"No sooner did Nelson perceive the situation of the French fleet, than he resolved to penetrate between them and the shore, and in that way double with his whole force on part of that of the enemy. 'Where there is room for the enemy to swing,' said he, 'there must be room for us to anchor.' His plan was to place his fleet half on the outer, and half on the inner side of the French line, and station his ships, so far as practicable, one on the outer bow and another on the outer quarter of each of the enemy's. Captain Berry, his flag captain, when he was made acquainted with the design, exclaimed with transport, 'If we succeed, what will the world say?'—'There is no "If" in the case,' replied Nelson; 'that we shall succeed is certain; who may live to tell the story is a very different question.' The number of ships of the line on the two sides was equal, but the French had a great advantage in the size of their vessels; their ships carrying 1196 guns, and 11,230 men, while the English had only 1012 guns and 8068 men. The British squadron consisted entirely of seventy-fours; whereas the French, besides the noble L'Orient of 120 guns, had two 80-gun ships, the Franklin and Guillaume Tell. The battery on Aboukir fort was mounted with four pieces of heavy cannon and two mortars, besides pieces of a lighter calibre. The squadron advanced to the attack at three o'clock in the afternoon. Admiral Brueys at first imagined that the battle would be deferred till the following morning; but the gallant bearing and steady course of the British ships as they entered the bay, soon convinced him that an immediate assault was intended. The moment was felt by the bravest in both fleets; thousands gazed in silence, and with anxious hearts, on each other, who were never destined again to see the sun, and the shore was covered with multitudes of Arabs, anxious to behold a fight on which, to all appearance, the fate of their country would depend. When the English fleet came within range, they were received with a steady fire from the broadsides of all the vessels and the batteries on the island. It fell right on the bows of the leading ships; but, without returning a shot, they bore directly down upon the enemy, the men on board every vessel being employed aloft in furling sails, and below in tending the braces, and making ready for an anchorage. Captain Fowley led the way in the Goliath, outsailing the Zealous, under Captain Hood, which for some time disputed the post of honour with him; and when he reached the van of the enemy's line, he steered between the outermost ship and the shoal, so as to interpose between the French fleet and the shore. In ten minutes he shot away the masts of the Conquerant, while the Zealous, which immediately followed, in the same time totally disabled the Guerrier, which was next in line. The other ships in that column followed in their order, still inside the French line, while Nelson, in the Vanguard, at the head of five ships, anchored outside of the enemy, within pistol-shot of their third ship, the Spartiate. The effect of this manœuvre was to bring an overwhelming force against two-thirds of the enemy's squadron, while the other third, moored at a distance from the scene of danger, could neither aid their friends nor injure their enemies. Nelson had arranged his fleet with such skill, that from the moment that the ships took up their positions, the victory was secure. Five ships had passed the line, and anchored between the first nine of the enemy and the shore, while six had taken their station on the outer side of the same vessels, which were thus placed between two fires, and had no possibility of escape. Another vessel, the Leander, was interposed across the line, and cut off the Vanguard from all assistance from the rearmost ships of the squadron, while her guns raked right and left those between which she was placed. The Culloden, which came up sounding after it was dark, ran aground two leagues from the hostile fleets, and, notwithstanding the utmost efforts of her captain and crew, could take no part in the action which followed; but her fate served as a warning to the Alexander and Swiftsure, which would else have infallibly struck on the shoal and perished. The way in which these ships entered the bay and

Such was the celebrated naval battle of Aboukir, or the Nile, the most disastrous that the French navy had ever sustained, and the military consequences of which threatened to be most fatal. The fleet which had borne the French to Egypt, which could have succoured or recruited them, which was to second their movements on the coasts of Syria if they undertook any, which was to overawe the Porte, force it to be content with insufficient reasons, and compel it to sanction the invasion of Egypt, which was in fine to carry back the French into their own country in the event of reverses,—this fleet was annihilated. The ships of the French were burnt, but they had not set fire to them of their own accord, which made a vast difference in the moral effect. Tidings of the misfortune rapidly circulated through Egypt, and caused a moment of despair to the army. Bonaparte received the intelligence with imperturbable calmness. "So be it!" he cried; "we must die here or issue forth great as the ancients!" He wrote to Kleber:—"This will oblige us to perform greater things than we contemplated. We must hold ourselves on the alert." The undaunted soul of Kleber was worthy of such language. "Yes," he replied, "we must do great things; I am preparing my faculties."—The fortitude of these great men cheered the army under its affliction, and restored its tone. Bonaparte sought to distract his soldiers by different expeditions, and soon taught them to forget the disaster. At the fête of the foundation of the republic, celebrated on the 1st Vendemiaire, he strove to exalt their imagination: he caused to be engraved on Pompey's pillar the names of the forty soldiers first killed in Egypt. These were the forty who had fallen in the assault of Alexandria. Their names, furnished from the obscure villages of France, were thus associated with the immortality of Pompey and Alexander. He likewise addressed to his army a grand and thrilling allocution, retracing its wondrous history. It ran thus—

"Soldiers,

"We celebrate the first day of the year VII. of the Republic.

"Five years ago the independence of the French people was menaced; but you took Toulon,—it was the presage of the ruin of your enemies.

"A year after you beat the Austrians at Dego.

"The year subsequent you were on the summit of the Alps.

"Two years ago you fought against Mantua, and won the famous victory of Saint George.

"Last year you were at the sources of the Drave and the Isonzo, on your return from Germany.

"Who would then have said that you would this day be on the banks of the Nile, in the centre of the ancient world?

"From the English, renowned in arts and commerce, to the hideous and ferocious Bedouin, you attract the eyes of all nations.

"Soldiers, your destiny is glorious, because you are worthy of what you have done, and of the opinion entertained of you. You will die with honour, like the brave men whose names are written on this column, or you will return to your country covered with laurels, and the admiration of the universe.

"During the five months we have been absent from Europe, we have been the constant object of solicitude to our countrymen. On this day forty millions of citizens celebrate the era of representative governments; forty millions of citizens think of you; all say: 'It is to their labours, to their blood, that we owe general peace, tranquillity, the prosperity of commerce, and the blessings of civil liberty.'"

CHAPTER LVIII.

EFFECT OF THE EXPEDITION OF EGYPT IN EUROPE. — FATAL CONSEQUENCES OF THE BATTLE OF ABOUKIR.—DECLARATION OF WAR BY THE PORTE. —EFFORTS OF ENGLAND TO FORM A NEW COALITION. — CONFERENCES WITH AUSTRIA. — FRESH COMMOTIONS IN HOLLAND, SWITZERLAND, AND THE ITALIAN REPUBLICS.—CHANGE IN THE CISALPINE CONSTITUTION.—DOMESTIC SITUATION OF FRANCE. A NEW OPPOSITION IN THE COUNCILS.

took up their stations amidst the gloom of night by the light of the increasing cannonade, excited the admiration of all who witnessed it. The British ships, however, had a severe fire to sustain as they successively passed along the enemy's line to take up their appointed stations; and the great size of several of the French squadron rendered them more than a match for any single vessel the English could oppose to them. The Vanguard, which bore proudly down, bearing the admiral's flag and six colours on different parts of the rigging, had every man at the first six guns on the forecastle killed or wounded in a few minutes, and they were three times swept off before the action closed. The Bellerophon dropt her stern anchor close under the bow of the L'Orient, and, notwithstanding the immense disproportion of force, continued to engage her first rate antagonist till her own masts had all gone overboard, and every officer was either killed or wounded, when she drifted away with the tide, overwhelmed, but not subdued, a glorious monument of unconquerable valour. As she floated along, she came close to the Swiftsure, which was coming into action and not having the lights at the mizen-peak, which Nelson had ordered as a signal by which his own ships might distinguish each other, she was at first mistaken for an enemy. Fortunately, Captain Hallowell, who commanded that vessel, had the presence of mind to order his men not to fire, till he ascertained whether the hulk was a friend or an enemy, and thus a catastrophe was prevented which might have proved fatal to both of these ships. The station of the Bellerophon in combating the L'Orient was now taken by the Swiftsure, which opened at once a steady fire on the quarter of the Franklin and the bows of the French admiral, while the Alexander anchored on his larboard quarter, and, with the Leander, completed the destruction of their gigantic opponent. It was now dark, but both fleets were illuminated by the incessant discharge of above two thousand pieces of cannon, and the volumes of flame and smoke that rolled away from the bay gave it the appearance as if a terrific volcano had suddenly burst forth in the midst of the sea. Victory, however, soon declared for the British; before nine, three ships of the line had struck, and two were dismasted; and the flames were seen bursting forth from the L'Orient, as she still continued, with unabated energy, her heroic defence. They spread with frightful rapidity, the fire of the Swiftsure was directed with such fatal precision to the burning part, that all attempts to extinguish it proved ineffectual; and the masts and rigging were soon wrapped in flames, which threw a prodigious light over the heavens, and rendered the situation of every ship in both fleets distinctly visible. The sight redoubled the ardour of the British seamen, by exhibiting the shattered condition and lowered colours of so many of their enemies, and loud cheers from the whole fleet announced every successive flag that was struck. As the fire approached the magazine of the L'Orient, many officers and men jumped overboard, and were picked up by the English boats; others were dragged into the port-holes of the nearest British ships, who for that purpose suspended their firing; but the greater part of the crew, with heroic bravery, stood to their guns to the last, and continued to fire from the lower deck. At ten o'clock she blew up, with an explosion so tremendous, that nothing in ancient or modern war was ever equal to it. Every ship in the hostile fleets was shaken to its centre; the firing by universal consent ceased on both sides, and the tremendous explosion was followed by a silence still more awful, interrupted only, after the lapse of some minutes, by the splash of the shattered masts and yards falling into the water from the vast height to which they had been thrown. The British ships in the vicinity, with admirable coolness, had made preparations to avoid the conflagration; all the shrouds and sails were thoroughly wetted, and sailors stationed with buckets of water to extinguish any burning fragments which might fall upon their decks. By these means, although large burning masses fell on the Swiftsure and Alexander, they were extinguished without doing any serious damage. After a pause of ten minutes, the firing recommenced, and continued without intermission till after midnight, when it gradually grew slacker, from the shattered condition of the French ships and the exhaustion of the British sailors, numbers of whom fell asleep beside their guns, the instant a momentary cessation of loading took place. At daybreak the magnitude of the victory was apparent; not a vestige of the L'Orient was to be seen; the frigate La Serieuse was sunk, and the whole French line, with the exception of the Guillaume Tell and Genereux, had struck their colours. These ships having been little engaged in the action, cut their cables, and stood out to sea, followed by the two frigates: they were gallantly pursued by the Zealous, which was rapidly gaining on them; but as there was no other ship of the line in a condition to support her, she was recalled, and these ships escaped. Had the Culloden not struck on the shoal, and the frigates belonging to the squadron been present, not one of the enemy's fleet would have escaped to convey the mournful tidings to France."—History of Europe, vol. iii. pp. 445—450.]

—GENERAL DISPOSITION FOR WAR. LAW OF THE CONSCRIPTION.—FINANCES OF THE YEAR VII.—RESUMPTION OF HOSTILITIES. INVASION OF THE ROMAN STATES BY THE NEAPOLITAN ARMY.—CONQUEST OF NAPLES BY GENERAL CHAMPIONNET.—ABDICATION OF THE KING OF SARDINIA.

THE expedition to Egypt remained a mystery in Europe long after the departure of the fleet. The capture of Malta first tended to fix conjecture. That fortress deemed impregnable, and reduced on the way, threw over the French Argonauts an extraordinary lustre. The debarkation in Egypt, the occupation of Alexandria, the battle of the Pyramids, struck with singular amazement the imaginations of men in France and Europe. The name of Bonaparte, which had appeared so mighty when echoed from the Alps, produced a stronger and yet more startling effect reverberated from the distant regions of the East. Bonaparte and Egypt formed the theme of all conversations. Things done were as nought; still more gigantic enterprises were anticipated. Bonaparte designed, it was said, to traverse Syria and Arabia, and penetrate to Constantinople or India.

Intelligence of the battle of Aboukir came, not to destroy the prestige of the enterprise, but to revive the hopes of all the enemies of France, and hasten the success of their devices. England, who was greatly alarmed for her commercial supremacy, and waited but the favourable moment to raise fresh enemies against France, had filled Constantinople with her intrigues. The Sultan was not sorry to witness the punishment of the Mamelukes, but he had no desire to lose Egypt. M. de Talleyrand, who was to have repaired to Constantinople for the purpose of satisfying the Divan, had not proceeded on his mission. The agents of England had the field free; they instilled into the Porte that the ambition of France was insatiable; that after having convulsed Europe, she proposed to overturn the East; and that in contempt of an old alliance she had invaded the richest province of the Ottoman empire. These representations, with all the gold scattered in the Divan, would not have sufficed to determine it, if the powerful fleet of Brueys had been in a condition to bombard the Dardanelles; but the battle of Aboukir robbed the French of all their ascendency in the Levant, and transferred to England a decisive predominance. The Porte solemnly declared war against France,* and, for the sake of a province long ago lost, quarrelled with her natural ally, and coalesced with her most formidable enemies, Russia and England. The sultan ordered the formation of an army for the reconquest of Egypt. This event rendered the situation of the French extremely critical. Separated from France, and cut off from succour by the victorious fleets of England, they were exposed to the attacks of all the ferocious hordes of the East. They were but thirty thousand to contend against such perils.

The conqueror Nelson repaired to Naples to refit his crippled squadron, and receive the honours of a triumph. Notwithstanding the treaties which bound the court of Naples to France, and forbid it to furnish aid to her enemies, all the ports and dock-yards of Sicily were opened to Nelson. He himself was welcomed with extraordinary distinction. The king and queen advanced to receive him at the entrance of the harbour, and saluted him as the hero-liberator of the Mediterranean. It began to be insinuated that the success of Nelson ought to be the signal of a general rising, that the powers of Europe ought to take advantage of the moment, when the most formidable army of France and her greatest captain were imprisoned in Egypt, to march against her and repel within her own confines her soldiers and her principles. Such suggestions soon became rife in all the courts. Tuscany and Piedmont were especially exhorted, to stimulate the animosity they had hitherto disguised. This was the moment, they were told, to second the court of Naples, to league together against the common enemy, to rise all at once upon the rear of the French, and exterminate them from one end of the peninsula to the other. Austria was urged that she ought to seize the moment when the Italian states took the French in rear to attack them in front, and wrest Italy from their possession. The thing would be of easy accomplishment, she was reminded, for Bonaparte and his terrible army were no longer on the Adige. The Empire was incited by the remembrance of the territory it had lost, and of the compulsory cession of the limit of the Rhine. Urgent endeavours were made to draw Prussia from her neutrality; and lastly, with Paul of Russia influences were used fitted to operate on his diseased mind, and decide him to grant the assistance so long and idly promised by his predecessor Catherine.

These suggestions could scarcely fail to be favourably entertained in the various courts of Europe; but all were not in a condition to act upon them. The nearest to France were the most irritated and the most disposed to drive back the revolution; but for the very reason of their propinquity to the republican colossus, they were compelled to use the greater reserve and discretion ere venturing to declare openly against it. Russia, the most distant from France, and least exposed to her vengeance, both from its remoteness and the moral peculiarities of its populations, was the most easily induced to take the initiative. Catherine, whose wily policy had always tended to complicate affairs in Europe, both to gain a pretext for intervention and to pursue at leisure her designs on Poland, was dead, but her policy survived. This policy is inherent in the Russian cabinet; it results from its very position: it may vary in its manifestations, in its mode of action, according as the sovereign is astute or violent, but it constantly aims at an identical object, moved by an irresistible impulse. The able Catherine had been content to give hopes and subsidies to the emigrants; she had preached a crusade without contributing a soldier. Her successor had the self-same objects in view, but pursued them with the difference befitting his character. At first indeed this prince, violent in temper, and almost deranged, but of a certain generosity nevertheless, had appeared to discard the policy of Catherine, and refused to execute the treaty of alliance concluded with England and Austria; but after this momentary deviation he had speedily returned to the policy of his court. We have seen him afford an asylum to the pretender, and take the emigrants into his pay after the treaty of Campo-Formio. He was persuaded that he ought to place himself at the head of European nobility to defend it against the assaults of demagogues. The proceeding of the Knights of Malta, who took him for their protector, contributed to inflame his mind, and he embraced the ideas suggested to him with the inconstancy and ardour of the Russian character. He tendered his protection to the Empire, and proposed to constitute himself the guarantee of its integrity. The capture of Malta filled him with rage, and he hastened to offer the co-operation of his armies against France. England, therefore, was in the ascendant at St. Petersburg as well as at Constantinople, and enabled to move in unison enemies hitherto irreconcilable in their hate.

The same zeal was not displayed by other powers. Prussia found too much advantage in her neutrality, and in the exhaustion of Austria, to have any wish to interfere in the conflict between the two systems. She contented herself with watching narrowly her frontiers on the side of Holland and France to prevent the intrusion of the revolutionary mania. She had ranged her armies in a manner to form a cordon sanitaire. The Empire, which had acquired, at a heavy cost, a wholesome knowledge of the power of France, and was always exposed to become the theatre of war, desired peace. The dispossessed princes themselves also wished it, because they were assured of obtaining indemnities on the right bank; the ecclesiastical princes alone, threatened with secularization, were favourable to war. The Italian powers of Piedmont and Tuscany were looking forward to a fitting occasion; but for the present trembled under the republican rod. They dared not stir until Austria or Naples gave them the signal. As to Austria, although the best disposed of the courts forming the monarchical coalition, she still hesitated, with her usual tardiness, to take a decided part, apprehensive doubtless on account of her subjects who had been much exhausted in the late war. France had set up against her two new republics in Switzerland and Rome, the one on her flank, the other in Italy, which greatly irritated her, and wholly disposed her for war; nevertheless, she would have overlooked these fresh encroachments of the republican system, if she had been compensated by certain cessions. It was with this view she had proposed conferences at Selz. Those conferences were appointed to be held in the summer of 1798, not far from the congress of Rastadt, and concurrently therewith. On their result depended the determination of Austria, and the success of the efforts made to form a new coalition.

* On the 18th Fructidor, year VI. (4th September 1798)

François de Neufchâteau was the envoy chosen by France. It was on this account that the small town of Selz had been selected for the place of meeting, on account of its situation on the banks of the Rhine, not far from Rastadt, but on the left side. This last condition was necessary, inasmuch as the constitution prohibited a retiring director from leaving France before a fixed period. M. de Cobentzel was deputed to represent Austria. From the first moment the real dispositions of that court were apparent. Its object was to obtain compensation, by an extension of territory, for the advances the republican system had made in Switzerland and Italy. France was mainly anxious to arrive at an understanding touching the affair of Vienna, and to procure satisfaction for the insult to Bernadotte. But Austria evaded explanations on that point, and always adjourned this part of the negotiation. The French envoy, on the contrary, constantly recurred to it; at the same time he had orders to be satisfied with the least atonement. France would be content if the minister Thugut, disgraced in appearance, were so in reality, and if a slight concession, the most insignificant in the world, were made to Bernadotte for the outrage committed on him. M. de Cobentzel contented himself with stating that his court disavowed what had passed at Vienna, but he offered no reparation, and persisted in demanding the extensions of territory he claimed. It was clear that the sacrifices of pride would be commensurate only with the gratifications of ambition. Austria contended that the institution of the two republics, the Roman and Helvetian, and the palpable influence exercised over the Cisalpine, Ligurian, and Batavian republics, were violations of the treaty of Campo-Formio, and a dangerous alteration in the state of Europe; in consequence France must give indemnities if she wished these her last usurpations to be forgiven; and, in the shape of an equivalent, the Austrian negotiator demanded additional provinces in Italy. He asked that the line of the Adige should be moved farther back, and the Austrian possessions extended to the Adda and the Po, or in other words, that the best half of the Cisalpine republic should be transferred to Austria. M. de Cobentzel, however, proposed to compensate the Cisalpine republic with a part of Piedmont, the surplus of that kingdom being made over to the Grand-duke of Tuscany, and the King of Piedmont receiving in lieu the states of the Church. Thus, for the bribe of an aggrandizement for himself in Lombardy, and for the Tuscan branch of his family, the emperor would have sanctioned the establishment of the Helvetian republic, the overthrow of the Pope, and the partition of the monarchy of Piedmont. It was impossible, nevertheless, for France to acquiesce in these propositions for several reasons. In the first place, she could not consent to dismember the scarcely formed Cisalpine state, and to replace, under the Austrian yoke, provinces she had emancipated, to which she had solemnly promised liberty, and on which she had levied contributions to insure it; and secondly, she had only the year before concluded a treaty with the King of Piedmont by which she guaranteed his dominions. This guarantee was particularly stipulated against Austria. Hence, France could not sacrifice Piedmont. François de Neufchâteau, therefore, was obliged to reject the propositions of M. de Cobentzel. They separated without effecting any arrangement. No satisfaction was given for the affair of Vienna. M. Degelmann, who was to have appeared at Paris as ambassador, did not present himself, and it was announced that the two cabinets would continue to communicate through their ministers at the congress of Rastadt. This separation was generally regarded as a species of rupture.

The determination of Austria was evidently taken from that moment; but before recommencing hostilities with France, she desired to secure the cooperation of the principal powers of Europe. M. de Cobentzel departed for Berlin, with instructions to proceed from Berlin to St. Petersburg. The object of this journey was to aid the efforts of England in forming a new coalition. The emperor of Russia had sent to Berlin one of the most important personages in his empire, Prince Repnin. M. de Cobentzel was to combine his influence with that of Prince Repnin and the English embassy to sway the young king.

France, on her part, dispatched to Berlin one of her most illustrious citizens,—Sieyes. The reputation of Sieyes had been immense before the reign of the Convention, but had altogether vanished under the committee of public-welfare. It suddenly revived when things began to resume their natural course, and the name of Sieyes was again become the greatest in France after that of Bonaparte; for, in France, a character for profundity is that which commands most regard after a high military renown. Sieyes was therefore one of the two chief personages of his country. Always discontented with and criticizing the government, not, like Bonaparte through ambition, but from pique against a constitution he had not himself framed, he was nevertheless an importunate applicant. The idea of giving him an embassy had suggested itself. It afforded an opportunity of removing him, of rendering him useful, and especially of furnishing him the means of existence. The revolution had swept all these away by abolishing ecclesiastical benefices. A great embassy would supply a medium for restoring them. The greatest at present was the Prussian, for the French had no envoys in Austria, Russia, or England. Berlin was the theatre of all intrigues, and Sieyes, though indifferently adapted for the management of affairs, was still a subtle and keen observer. Moreover, his fame rendered him peculiarly fitted to represent France, above all in Germany, which his genius tallied with better than any other country.

To the Prussian monarch the arrival in his dominions of so celebrated a revolutionist was by no means a source of pleasure; yet he ventured not to reject him. Sieyes comported himself with circumspection and dignity; the reception accorded him was of a similar character, but he was left to pine in solitude. Like all the French envoys to foreign courts he was observed with caution, and so to speak isolated The Germans were curious to see him, but durst not visit him. His influence at the court of Berlin was null. The consideration of his own interests alone weighed with the king in resisting the instances of England, Austria, and Russia.

Whilst endeavours were thus concentrated to vanquish the reluctance of the king of Prussia, the court of Naples, inflated with exultation and insolence since the victory of Aboukir, was making vast preparations for war, and redoubling its solicitations at the courts of Tuscany and Piedmont. France, through an excess of complaisance, had permitted it to occupy the duchy of Benevento. But this concession was far from tranquillizing it. The Neapolitan cabinet flattered itself with gaining by immediate hostilities a moiety at least of the ancient possessions of the Pope.

Meanwhile the negotiations at Rastadt were progressing favourably for France. Treilhard, elected a director, and Bonaparte, absent in Egypt, had been replaced at the congress by Jean Debry and Roberjot. After having secured the line of the Rhine, a variety of questions, military, political, and commercial, remained for solution. The French legation had become extremely exorbitant and demanded much more than it had any right to expect. In the first place, it claimed all the islands of the Rhine, an important acquisition, especially in a military point of view. Next it sought to retain Kehl and its territory opposite Strasburg, with Cassel and its territory opposite Mayence. It insisted that the commercial bridge between the two Brisachs should be re-established; that fifty acres of land should be given to France in front of the old bridge of Huninguen, and that the important fortress of Ehrenbreitstein should be demolished. It required furthermore that the navigation of the Rhine and of all the German rivers flowing into it should be free, all tolls abolished, merchandise on both banks subjected to the same dues, and the towing-tracks preserved and maintained by the river-side populations. In conclusion, it proposed a final condition of great moment, to wit that the debts of Germany of the countries on the left bank, ceded to France, should be transferred to the countries on the right bank, appointed to be given by way of indemnity.

The deputation of the Empire contended with reason that the line of the Rhine ought to afford equal security to both nations; that it was this very argument of equal security which had been principally relied upon in sustaining the claims of France to the line in question; but that this security would no longer exist for Germany if France possessed all the offensive points, as would happen by her retention of the islands, of Cassel and Kehl, of fifty acres opposite Huninguen, &c. The deputation of the Empire therefore refused to admit the demands of France, and proposed as the real line of demarcation the thalweg, that is to say the centre of the principal navigable channel: all the islands on the right of this line to belong to Germany, and those on the left to France. In this manner the true impediment which renders a river a military line was placed between the two people, namely the principal navigable stream. In sequence of this basis, the deputation required the demolition of Cassel and Kehl, and refused the fifty acres opposite Huninguen. It was resolute that France should not preserve any offensive point when Germany retained none. With less reason it objected to the demolition of Ehrenbreitstein, which was incompatible with the security of the city of Coblentz. It yielded the free navigation of the Rhine, but insisted upon the freedom extending throughout its course, and called upon France to compel the Batavian republic to recognise this principle. As to the free navigation of the internal rivers of Germany, the stipulation exceeded, it said, its powers, and concerned each state individually. The condition regarding towing-tracks was acceded to. It preferred that the question relative to tolls and their abolition were left to be settled by a treaty of commerce. Finally, it maintained that the debts of the countries on the left bank ceded to France should remain charged upon them on the maxim that the debt follows its pledge, and that the possessions of the intermediate nobility should be deemed private property and secured accordingly. The deputation demanded in addition that the French troops should evacuate the right bank and relinquish the blockade of Ehrenbreitstein, seeing it subjected the inhabitants to the horrors of famine.

These incompatible pretensions gave rise to a series of notes and counter-notes during the whole summer. At last, in the month of Vendémiaire year VI. (August and September), the thalweg was admitted by the French legation. The principal navigable branch was assigned as the limit between France and Germany, and the islands were to be divided in accordance with that basis. France consented to the demolition of Cassel and Kehl, but demanded the isle of Pettersau, which lies in the Rhine almost abreast of Mayence and is of great importance to that place. On its side, the German Empire agreed to the demolition of Ehrenbreitstein. The free navigation of the Rhine and the abolition of tolls were accorded. There still remained for settlement the questions touching the establishment of bridges for traffic, the application of the emigration-laws in the ceded countries, the possessions of the intermediate nobility, and the debts of the ceded territories. The secular princes had declared that all concessions compatible with the honour and security of the Empire ought to be made, in order to obtain peace, so indispensable to Germany. It was evident that the majority of those princes were anxious to arrange terms, and Prussia exhorted them to that effect. But Austria began to evince contrary dispositions, and to stimulate the resentment of the ecclesiastical princes against the course of the negotiations. The deputies of the Empire, albeit declaring emphatically for peace, nevertheless observed extreme caution, from the apprehensions Austria caused them, and fluctuated between her and Prussia. As to the French ministers, they manifested an austere reserve; they lived apart and in a species of isolation, like all the French envoys in Europe. Such was the state of the Congress at the close of summer.

Whilst these events were passing in the East and in Europe, France, still burdened with the task of directing the five republics around her, had encountered cares innumerable. These arose from the constant difficulties of controlling public opinion in those republics, obtaining sustenance for the troops stationed in them, maintaining harmony between the generals and the ambassadors deputed to them, and lastly preserving concord between them and adjoining states.

Almost everywhere the same course had been found necessary as in France, that is to say, after having crushed one party to crush another immediately afterwards. In Holland a sort of Fructidor had been executed, on the 3d Pluviose (22d January), for the purpose of expelling the federalists, annulling the ancient regulations, and giving the country a unitarian constitution almost similar to that of France. But this revolution had turned too much in favour of the democrats. They had seized on all the powers of the government. After excluding from the national assembly all the deputies they adjudged suspected, they had constituted themselves into a directory and two councils, without having recourse to fresh elections. They had designed in this respect to imitate the national convention of France and its famous decrees of the 5th and 13th Fructidor. Since then they had arrogated the entire direction of affairs, and departed from the line in which the French Directory wished to keep all the republics confided to its care. General Daendels, one of the most distinguished men of the moderate party, was summoned to Paris, held conferences with the directors, and returned into Holland to deal the democrats the blow recently administered to their brethren at Paris, namely, excluding them from the legislative body by means of electoral secessions. Thus everything done in France, it became immediately necessary to repeat in the countries which depended on her. Joubert had orders to support Daendels. The latter, in concert with the ministers, and by the aid of the Batavian and French troops, dispersed the directory and the councils, formed a provisional government, and ordained fresh elections. The French ambassador, Delacroix, who had abetted the democrats, was recalled. These scenes produced the ordinary effect. The reproach failed not to be urged that republican institutions could not subsist of themselves, that they required every moment the lever of bayonets, and that the new states were in the most abject dependence on France.

In Switzerland the establishment of the republic one and indivisible had not been effected without bloodshed. The petty cantons of Schweitz, Zug, and Glaris, stirred up by the priests and the aristocrats, had sworn to oppose the adoption of the new system. General Schauembourg, averse to reduce them by force, had interdicted all communication between them and the other cantons. The refractory cantons immediately flew to arms and invaded Lucerne, which they pillaged and laid waste. Schauembourg marched against them, and after sundry obstinate conflicts reduced them to sue for peace. The pledge of this peace was the acceptance of the new constitution. It had been requisite, also, to use the sword and even fire in repressing the peasants of the Upper-Valais, who had made a descent into the Lower-Valais, with the design of re-establishing their old dominion. Notwithstanding these impediments, the constitution was everywhere in force by Prairial (May 1798). The seat of the Helvetian government was fixed at Arau. Composed of a directory and two councils, it commenced the labours of the administration of the country. The new French commissioner was Rapinat, brother-in-law of Rewbell. He was to assist with his counsels the Helvetian government in the administration of affairs. Circumstances combined to render this administration peculiarly difficult. The priests and the aristocrats, posted in the mountains, were only watching the favourable moment to arouse the population again. It was necessary to keep on guard against them, to support and pacify the French army retained to oppose them, to organize the administration, and to put things in a train for subsisting independently. This task was not less difficult for the Helvetian government than for the French commissioner placed by its side.

It was natural that France should appropriate the exchequers of the old aristocratic cantons to defray the expenses of the war. The money contained in those depositaries, and the stores accumulated in the magazines formed by the late cantons, were indispensable to her for the support of her army. It was an ordinary exercise of the right of conquest; she might doubtless have waived the right, but necessity compelled her to enforce it at the moment. Rapinat was ordered, therefore, to affix seals on all coffers holding treasure. Many of the Swiss, even amongst those who had promoted the revolution, took it amiss that the funds and magazines of the old governments should be seized. The Swiss are, like all mountaineers, prudent and brave, but extremely avaricious. They were sufficiently pleased that liberty had been conferred on them, that they were freed from their oppressive oligarchies, but they demurred to bear the expense of the enfranchisement. Whilst Holland and Italy had endured, almost without complaining, the heavy burden of long and devastating campaigns, the Swiss patriots raised a prodigious clamour about a few millions rightfully forfeited. The Helvetian directory hastened, on its part, to place other seals on those affixed by Rapinat, and thus protested against the proceeding which confiscated the coffers to the purposes of France. Rapinat immediately caused the seals of the Helvetian directory to be removed, and communicated to that directory that it was restricted to administrative functions, that it was not competent to act contrary to the authority of France, and that for the future its laws and its decrees would possess no force except in so far as they contained nothing in opposition to the ordinances of the French commissioner and general. The enemies of the revolution, and more than one had contrived to creep into the Helvetic councils, exulted at this contest, and railed against tyranny. They vociferated that their independence was outraged, and that the French republic, which pretended to bring them liberty, had brought them in reality nothing but slavery and misery. Contumacy was not confined to the two councils; it was manifested also in the directory and the local authorities. At Lucerne and Berne old aristocrats occupied the administrations, and raised obstacles of every kind to the levy of the fifteen millions imposed on noble families for the necessities of the army. Rapinat deemed it incumbent to purge the government and administrations. In a letter dated the 28th Prairial (16th June), he demanded from the Helvetian government the dismissal of two directors, named respectively Bay and Pfiffer, and of the minister for foreign affairs, and the reconstruction of the administrative chambers of Lucerne and Berne. This demand, expressed in the peremptory tone of an order, could not be refused. The dismissals specified were immediately given; but the roughness with which Rapinat conducted himself excited fresh murmurs, and fixed all the wrong on his side. He in fact compromised his government by openly violating forms to effect changes which might have been easily wrought by other means. Without loss of time, the French Directory wrote to the Helvetian disavowing the conduct of Rapinat, and offering satisfaction for this violation of formalities. Rapinat was recalled; nevertheless the dismissed functionaries were not reinstated. In place of the two deposed directors, the Helvetic councils nominated Ochs, the author of the constitution, and Colonel Laharpe, brother of the general killed in Italy, one of the authors of the revolution in the Pays de Vaud, and also one of the most worthy and best-intentioned citizens in the country.

An alliance, offensive and defensive, was concluded between the French and Helvetian republics on the 2d Fructidor (19th August). According to this treaty, either of the two powers which chanced to be at war had a right to require the intervention of the other, and to demand from it an auxiliary force, the strength of which was to be determined by circumstances. The requiring power was to pay the troops furnished by the other. The free navigation of all the rivers of Switzerland and France was mutually stipulated. Two routes were to be open, the one from France to the Cisalpine republic, traversing the Valais and the Simplon, the other from France into Suabia, ascending the Rhine and following the eastern shore of the lake of Constance. By this system of leagued republics, France secured two great military routes to penetrate into the territories of her allies, and be enabled to debouch rapidly either in Italy or in Germany. It is said that these two routes had the effect of transferring the theatre of war to the allied states. It was not the routes, but the alliance with France which exposed those states to become the theatre of war. The routes were but a means of accelerating movements and of timeously protecting them by permitting France to assume the offensive in Germany or Italy.

The city of Geneva was united with France, as likewise the borough of Mulhausen. The Italian bailiwicks, which had long hesitated between the Cisalpine and the Helvetian republics, declared for the latter, and voted their junction accordingly. The Grison leagues, which the Directory was disposed to incorporate with Switzerland, were divided into two rival factions, and wavered between the Austrian and Helvetian domination. The French troops were stationed in observation on them. The monks and foreign agents provoked a fresh disaster in Underwalden. They incited the peasants of that valley to rise against the French soldiers. A desperate conflict took place at Stanz, and it proved necessary to fire that unfortunate hamlet to expel the fanatics who had intrenched themselves within it.

Similar difficulties occurred on the other side of the Alps. A species of anarchy reigned between the subjects of the new states and their governments, between those governments and the French armies, between the French generals and the French ambassadors. Everything was in frightful confusion. The petty Ligurian republic was infuriated against Piedmont, and vowed at all costs to introduce the revolution into it. A great number of Piedmontese democrats had taken refuge in the Ligurian territory, and had emerged therefrom armed and organized, to make incursions in their country and endeavour to subvert the regal government. Another band of them had sallied out of the Cisalpine and advanced by Domo-d'Ossola. But these inroads were repelled and a multitude of lives uselessly sacrificed. The Ligurian republic persevered nevertheless in its design of harassing the government of Piedmont; it collected and armed fresh refugees, and determined to make war on its own account. The French minister at Genoa, Sotin, had the utmost difficulty in restraining it. On the other hand, the French minister at Turin, Ginguené, experienced equal difficulty in silencing the continual complaints of Piedmont and moderating its projects of vengeance against the patriots.

The Cisalpine republic was in a truly deplorable condition. In constituting it, Bonaparte had not had time to calculate exactly the proportions expedient to be observed in the territorial divisions and in the number of functionaries, or to organize effectively the municipal and fiscal systems. This puny state consequently had no less than two hundred and forty representatives. The departments being too numerous, it was devoured by an army of functionaries. It had no regular and uniform system of taxation. With adequate sources of wealth, it had no finances, and could scarcely contrive to pay the subsidy stipulated for the maintenance of the French troops. Moreover, in all other respects, intolerable disorder reigned throughout the country. Since the exclusion of sundry members from the councils by Berthier, when it was found necessary to compel acceptance of the treaty of alliance with France, the revolutionists had gained a complete ascendency, and the phraseology of the Jacobins alone prevailed in the councils and the clubs. The French army abetted this impulse, and lent a ready aid to every variety of exaggeration. After having accomplished the submission of Switzerland, Brune had returned into Italy, where he had received the general command of all the French troops since the departure of Berthier for Egypt. He belonged to the party of the most vehement patriots. Lahoz, the commandant of the Lombard troops, whose organization had been commenced under Bonaparte, boasted similar tendencies. There existed, besides, other causes of disorder in the misconduct of the French officers. They conducted themselves in the Cisalpine state as in a conquered country. They maltreated the inhabitants, appropriated quarters, which, according to the existing treaties, were not exigible by them, devastated the localities in which they sojourned, often levied requisitions as in times of war, extorted money from the local authorities, and emptied the coffers of towns without alleging even the shadow of a pretext beyond their own good pleasure. The commanders of fortresses approved themselves relentless extortioners. The governor of Mantua, for instance, was sufficiently audacious to farm for his own profit the fishing of the lake. The general officers proportioned their exactions to their grade, and independently of all they wrung by such flagitious courses, they netted scandalous profits from companies. The one which had the contract for provisioning the army in Italy, allowed a bonus of forty per cent to the staff; and we may judge what its gains must have been to afford such a bribe to its patrons. Furthermore, from the effect of desertions, there were not half the men in the ranks entered on the rolls, insomuch that the republic paid double what it ought to have done. Notwithstanding all these malpractices, the soldiers were indifferently provided, and the pay of the greater number was several months in arrear. Thus, the country the French occupied was horribly oppressed, without the soldiers being at all benefited. For the rest, the Cisalpine patriots tolerated all these atrocities without a murmur, because the staff extended to them its support and countenance.

At Rome things were in a more satisfactory train. There a commission composed of Daunou, Florent, and Faypoult, governed with prudence and probity the enfranchised country. These three individuals had framed a constitution which had been accepted, and which, with some few exceptions, and a variation in appellations, exactly resembled the French constitution. The directors were styled consuls, the council of Ancients the senate, the second council the tribunate. But the mere gift of a constitution availed little; the essential point was to put it in operation. To this the chief obstacle opposed was not, as might have been imagined, the fanaticism of the Romans but their indolence. The only actual malcontents were some peasants on the Apennines, excited by the monks, who were easily subdued. But there was discovered in the inhabitants of Rome, called to compose the consulate, senate, and tribunate, a surprising indifference, an extreme inaptitude for labour. Great exertions were needed to induce them to sit one day out of two, and they absolutely mutinied for holidays in summer. To this idleness was joined a complete inexperience and incapacity in the business of administration. There was much more zeal among the Cisalpines, but it was an unenlightened, unbridled zeal, which rendered it equally mischievous with supineness. There was reason to apprehend that, upon the departure of the French commission, the Roman government would fall to pieces from the pure inertness or retreat of its members. And yet places were well liked at Rome, indeed keenly relished, as in all countries more remarkable for sloth than industry.

The commission had put an end to all the malversations practised at the first entry of the French into Rome. It had assumed the care of the finances and managed them with skill and integrity. Faypoult, who was an able and upright administrator, had instituted a well-planned system of taxation for the whole Roman state. He had thus succeeded in satisfying the necessities of the army, and had discharged all arrears of pay not only to the army of Rome, but also to the division embarked at Civita-Vecchia. If the finances had been as well administered in the Cisalpine, the country would not have been oppressed as it was, and the French soldiers might have enjoyed comfort and plenty. The military power at Rome was wholly under the control of the commission. General Saint-Cyr, who had succeeded Massena, was distinguished for inflexible honesty; but partaking the taste for authority which had become so general amongst his comrades, he betokened impatience at his subjection to the commission. At Milan, indeed, the utmost dissatisfaction was felt at the state of matters in Rome. The Cisalpine democrats were highly indignant at the curb so effectually fastened by the commission on the Roman democrats. The French staff, which held authority over the divisions stationed at Rome, saw with pain a rich portion of the conquered countries escape it, and sighed for the moment when the functions of the commission should determine.

It is an error to reproach the French Directory with the disorders that prevailed in the allied states. No resolution, however strong, could have obviated the outbreak of passions which disturbed them; and as to the exactions, the prohibition of Bonaparte himself had not succeeded to prevent them in the conquered provinces. What a single individual, powerful in genius and vigour and on the spot, could not effect, was much less possible to a government composed of five members and seated at a great distance. Still, the majority of the Directory was animated with the purest zeal to promote the welfare of the new republics, and viewed with lively indignation the insolence and extortions of the generals, and the palpable robberies of the companies. Excepting Barras, who shared in the profits of these companies and was the patron-saint of all the corruptionists at Milan, the four directors denounced in the strongest terms the proceedings in Italy. Larévellière especially, whose stern probity was shocked by such atrocities, submitted a plan to the Directory which met its approval. He proposed that a commission should continue to direct the Roman government, and restrain the military authority; that an ambassador be sent to Milan to represent the French government and deprive the staff of all influence; that this ambassador be empowered to make the alterations in the Cisalpine constitution which were needful, such as reducing the number of local divisions, of public functionaries, and of members in the two councils; and that this ambassador have for assistant an administrator capable of organizing a system of taxation and responsibility. This plan was adopted. Trouvé, formerly French minister at Naples, and Faypoult, one of the members of the Roman commission, were deputed to Milan to execute the measures recommended by Larévellière.

Trouvé was instructed, on his arrival at Milan, to collect around him the most enlightened men of the Cisalpine state and consult with them on the alterations requisite both in the constitution and in the departments of government. When all these changes were agreed upon, he was to cause them to be proposed in the Cisalpine councils by deputies in his interest, and if necessary to support them by the authority of France. At the same time he was counselled to mask his design until ripe for accomplishment.

Trouvé, repairing from Naples to Milan, acted as he had been ordered. But the secret of his mission was difficult of concealment. It soon transpired that he had come to change the constitution, and particularly to reduce the number of places of all kinds. The patriots, judging from the demeanour of the ambassador that these reductions would fall on them, were furious. They enlisted in their cause the staff of the army, itself incensed against the new authority destined to supersede its own, and a disgraceful feud forthwith commenced between the French legation and the French staff, backed by the Italian patriots. Trouvé and the men who assorted with him were denounced with extreme violence in the Cisalpine councils. It was asserted that the French minister had been sent to violate the constitution, and to repeat one of those acts of oppression which the Directory had already perpetrated in other allied republics. Trouvé was exposed to all the annoyances of petty malice on the part of the Italian patriots and the French officers. The latter behaved with signal indecency at a ball he gave, and occasioned a scene of surpassing scandal. Such occurrences were most deplorable, especially on account of the effect they produced on foreign ministers. And not only were they edified by this spectacle of shameful dissensions, but they were insulted, at diplomatic dinners, by toasts, proclaimed in their teeth, to the extermination of all kings. The most outrageous jacobinism, we see, reigned at Milan. Brune and Lahoz set out for Paris to seek the support of Barras. But the Directory, apprized beforehand, was inflexible in its determination. Lahoz had orders to leave Paris the moment he arrived. As to Brune, he was enjoined to return to Milan and co-operate in effecting the alterations Trouvé had been commissioned to introduce.

After digesting the various modifications expedient in the constitution, Trouvé assembled the most moderate of the deputies and submitted the details to them. They approved them, but the irritation was so great that they dared not undertake to propose them in the two councils. Trouvé was therefore obliged to deploy the French authority and visibly exercise a power he would have fain kept out of view. But, after all, the actual mode employed was of little moment. It would have been absurd in France, who had created these new republics and upheld them by her aid, not to profit by her force to establish therein the order she deemed most advisable. The evil was that she had not managed better at first, so as to avoid the necessity of repeating thus frequently these acts of forcible interference. On the 13th Fructidor (30th August) Trouvé convoked the directory and the two councils of the Cisalpine republic, and presented to them the new constitution and the administrative and financial laws prepared by Faypoult. The councils were reduced from two hundred and forty to one hundred and twenty in number. The individuals to be retained in the councils and the government were specified. A regular system of taxation was established. Both personal and indirect taxation was instituted, a system in progress of execution at the moment in France, and which grievously offended the patriots. All these measures were sanctioned and adopted. Brune had been compelled to afford the support of the French troops. So the rage of the Cisalpine patriots was vain, and the revolution accomplished without an obstacle. By a further provision it was ordered that an immediate convocation of the primary assemblies should be held in order to ratify the alterations made in the constitution.

The object of Trouvé's mission was fulfilled; but the French government, perceiving the ferment that minister had excited, and judging it impossible to leave him in the Cisalpine, came to the conclusion that another embassy must be selected for him, and a person unconnected with the late disputes sent to Milan in his stead. Unfortunately the Directory allowed to be imposed on it an ex-member of the Jacobin club, who had since become a supple and servile creature of Barras, and been admitted by him to a participation in the traffic of the companies, and placed in the way of honours: it was Fouché, whom Barras thus contrived to foist on his colleagues. Fouché accordingly proceeded to succeed Trouvé, who was appointed to the mission at Stutgardt. But Brune, taking advantage of Trouvé's departure, presumed, with an audacity to be explained only by the military license of the times, to make grave alterations in the work of the French minister. He demanded the resignation of three of the directors nominated by Trouvé, changed several of the ministers, and introduced sundry alterations into the constitution. One of the three directors whose resignation he had demanded, Sopranzi, having courageously refused to give it, he caused him to be seized by his soldiers and forcibly ejected from the palace of the government. He then hastened to convoke the primary assemblies to obtain their approval of the constitution framed by Trouvé and modified by himself. Fouché, who arrived in the interval, ought to have opposed this convocation and not allowed modifications to be sanctioned which the general had no authority to make; but he left Brune to act at his pleasure. The result was that the constitution as altered by Trouvé, with the more recent improvements of Brune, was adopted by the primary assemblies influenced at once by military power and patriot violence.

When the French Directory learnt these particulars, it betrayed no vacillation. It annulled all that Brune had done, cashiered him, and commissioned Joubert to restore things to the state in which they had been placed by Trouvé. Fouché tendered objections; he represented that the new constitution being ratified with the changes introduced into it by Brune, it would have a bad effect to alter it afresh. In this he was right, and he even gained over Joubert to his opinion. But the Directory felt it incumbent to reprove such usurpations on the part of its generals, and especially to deter them from attempting the exercise of such powers in the allied states. It recalled Fouché himself, who thus enjoyed a very brief career in the Cisalpine, and it ordered the establishment of the constitution integrally such as Trouvé had framed it in the name of France. With regard to the individuals from whom Brune had wrung resignations, they were invited to renew them in order to avoid fresh changes.

The Cisalpine republic therefore finally remained constituted as the Directory had designed, save the absence of certain individuals superseded by Brune. But these constant turmoils, these rapid vicissitudes, all these conflicts of civil and military authorities, had a very injurious effect, tending to discourage the newly-enfranchised populations and bring odium on the parent republic, although they demonstrated too truly the difficulty of keeping such numerous bodies in their several orbits.

The conduct of the Directory was severely reprobated with reference to these occurrences in the Cisalpine republic, for it is a custom with men to convert everything into a subject of complaint against a government they oppose, and even to charge upon it as a crime the very obstacles that impede its course. The twofold opposition now assuming consistence in the Councils, assailed variously the operations executed in Italy. The argument was quite simple to the patriot opposition: the Directory had committed an outrage against the independence of an allied republic; it had even committed a breach of the French laws, for the Cisalpine constitution so recently altered was guaranteed by a treaty of alliance, and this treaty, approved by the Councils, could not be infringed by the Directory. As to the constitutional or moderate opposition, it was natural to expect its approbation rather than its reproaches, since the changes made in the Cisalpine were directed exclusively against the patriots. But to this section of the opposition appertained Lucien Bonaparte. It was his province to seek topics of censure against the government, and here he had the farther motive of defending the work of his brother, attacked by the Directory. He declaimed therefore, like the patriots, about infringements on the independence of allies, violations of treaties, and other attendant offences.

These two oppositions declared themselves more openly from day to day. They began to contest the exercise of certain powers conferred on the Directory by the law of the 19th Fructidor, and which it had occasionally used. That law, amongst other high prerogatives, gave it the right of closing clubs or suppressing journals, the conduct of which might appear to it dangerous. The Directory had in fact shut up certain clubs become too violent, and suppressed certain journals which had given false intelligence, manifestly invented with a malevolent intention. One journal in particular pretended that the Directory was about to annex the Pays de Vaud to France: this journal the Directory suppressed. The patriots exclaimed against this arbitrary act, and moved the repeal of several of the articles of the law of the 19th Fructidor. The Councils decided that those articles should continue in force until the enactment of a law on the press, and an investigation was ordered preparatory to the introduction of such a law.

The Directory encountered much virulent contention too on the subject of the finances. The time had come to close the budget of the year VI. (1797–8), and devise that of the year VII. (1798–9). The budget of the year VI. had been fixed at 616 millions; but upon these 616 millions there was an actual deficit of 62 millions, and, besides this deficit, a considerable arrear outstanding. The state-creditors, notwithstanding the solemn pledge to discharge the interest of the consolidated third, had not been wholly paid. It was resolved they should receive, in liquidation of the residue, bills receivable in acquittance of taxes. In the budget of the year VII., now about to be entered upon, the expenditure was taken at 600 millions, without the contingency of a new continental war. A reduction was proposed in the land and personal taxes, which were found too onerous, and an increase in the stamp and registration duties and in the customs. Additional centimes were imposed for local expenses, and dues at the gates of towns for the support of hospitals and other establishments. In spite of these augmentations, the minister Ramel contended that the receipts would not exceed at the utmost three-fourths of the estimate, judging from the results of previous years, and that it would be a wilful exaggeration to reckon the effective income above 450 or 500 millions. He accordingly craved fresh resources virtually to cover the expenditure of 600 millions, and proposed for the purpose a tax on doors and windows, and a duty on salt. This proposition gave rise to violent reclamations. In the end, the tax on doors and windows was decreed, and a report ordered touching the duty on salt.

These altercations were not of serious import in themselves; but they were indicative of a lurking animosity, to which an occasion of public misfortune alone was wanting to explode in open hostility. The Directory, perfectly acquainted with the state of Europe, was conscious that fresh dangers were gathering, and that war was again imminent on the continent. It was scarcely possible longer to doubt the fact from the manifestations of the different cabinets. Cobentzel and Repnin had failed to seduce Prussia from her neutrality, and had left Berlin in dudgeon. But Paul of Russia, completely dazzled, had concluded a treaty of alliance with Austria, and his troops were even reported to be on their march. Austria was arming with activity; the court of Naples had ordained the enlistment of its whole population. It would have betrayed great imprudence not to make preparations in the face of such a movement from the banks of the Vistula to those of the Volturna. The French armies being seriously attenuated by desertion, the Directory originated a scheme to provide for their recruitment by a great institution, which it yet remained to create. The Convention had twice drawn upon the population of France, but in an extraordinary manner, and without leaving any permanent law for the annual levy of soldiers. In March 1793, it had ordered a levy of 300,000 men; in August of the same year it had planned the grand and magnificent enterprise of the levy en masse, generation by generation. Since then, the republic had existed upon this measure alone, compelling those to remain under their colours who had taken arms at that period. But war and sickness had thinned the ranks, and peace had restored to their homes a multitude of men. True, only twelve thousand furloughs had been granted, but desertions were tenfold; and it was difficult to exercise severity towards men who had defended their country for six years and caused it to triumph over Europe at the price of their blood. The depôts still subsisted and upon an excellent footing. These it was of moment to amplify by new levies, and in so doing to adopt, not an extraordinary and temporary expedient, but a comprehensive and permanent measure; in short, to pass a law which should become, to a certain extent, an inherent part of the constitution. In a word, the conscription was eliminated.

General Jourdan was the reporter of this great and salutary measure, which in course of time grew to be abused like all other things in this world, but which was not the less an instrument of salvation to France, and the means of exalting her glory to the highest pitch. By the enactment every Frenchman was declared a soldier in law for a certain period of his life. This period was from the twentieth to the twenty-fifth year of his age complete. The young men between those ages were divided into five classes, year by year. According to exigency the government called out men, commencing with the first class, that of twenty years, and with the youngest of each class. It could successively call out the five classes as necessities arose. In time of peace the conscripts were obliged to serve until twenty-five years old. Thus the period of service varied from one to five years, according to the age of the soldiers as they were enlisted. In time of war this period was unlimited; but the government might grant furloughs when deemed not inconsistent with the public service. There was no exemption of any kind, except for those who had married before the law, or who had already earned their freedom in previous wars. This enactment thus provided for ordinary cases; but in extraordinary emergencies, when the country was declared in danger, the government had a right, as in 1793, to the whole population, and the levy in mass would be again resorted to.

This measure was passed without opposition and regarded as one of the most important creations of the revolution.* The Directory forthwith claimed to make use of it, and requested the levy of two hundred thousand conscripts to complete the armies and place them on a respectable footing. This demand was granted by acclamation on the 2d Vendémiaire year VII. (23d September 1798.) Although the two oppositions often harassed the Directory from dislike or jealousy, still they desired that the republic should preserve its ascendency in presence of the powers of Europe. But a levy of men requires also a levy of money. The Directory asked, in addition to the items of the budget, 125 millions, to wit, ninety for the equipment of 200,000 conscripts and thirty-five to repair the late disaster to the navy. The question was, where they were to be obtained. The minister Ramel replied by showing that the debentures for the liquidation of two-thirds of the debt had almost all returned to the exchequer, and that there still remained 400 millions in national property, which were consequently free and might be dedicated to the new exigencies of the republic. The sale of 125 millions of national property was accordingly decreed. One-twelfth was to be paid in cash, the remainder in obligations of the purchasers, negotiable at will, and payable successively over a period of eighteen months. They were to bear interest at five per cent. This paper might be considered equivalent to money from the facility of passing it to the companies. The estates were to be sold for eight times the rent. This financial operation was hailed with equal unanimity as the law of conscription of which it was a consequence.

The Directory thus assumed a position to retort the menaces of Europe, and sustain the dignity of the French republic. Two events, meanwhile, of minor importance had recently occurred, the one in Ireland, the other at Ostend. Ireland was in a state of rebellion, and the Directory had dispatched thither General Humbert with 1,500 men. A remittance of funds to be made by the Treasury having been unfortunately delayed, a second division of 6,000 men, commanded by General Sarrazin, was unable to set sail, and Humbert remained without support. He had maintained himself for some time, and sufficiently to prove that the arrival of the expected reinforcement would have signally changed the face of affairs. But, after a series of honourable engagements, he had been obliged to surrender with all his corps.† A check of the same nature, sustained by the English, occurred to compensate this misfortune. The English were accustomed to appear at intervals to throw bombs into the French ports on the ocean. About this time they formed a scheme to land at Ostend for the purpose of destroying the sluices; but, chased at the point of the bayonet, they were cut off from their ships and captured, to the number of two thousand men.

Although Austria had contracted an alliance with Russia and England, and could rely upon a Sclavonian army and a British subsidy, she still hesitated nevertheless to re-enter the lists against the French republic. Spain, who viewed with concern the flames of war rekindled on the continent, dreading equally the progress of the revolutionary system and her own ruin, for in one case she might be revolutionized, and in the other punished for her alliance with France,—Spain, we say, once more interposed to calm the irritated antagonists. Her mediation, by raising discussions and suggesting the possibility of an arrangement, led to further hesitations at Vienna, or at least to further procrastination. At Naples, where zeal amounted to phrenzy, all delay was scouted, and a determination formed to provoke hostilities, in order to force Austria to draw the sword. The infatuation of this petty court was without example. It was the calamity of the Bourbons at this epoch to be urged by their wives to the commission of all their errors. Three had been seen at once in the same predicament: Louis XVI., Charles IV., and Ferdinand. The fate of the unfortunate Louis XVI. is known to us. Charles IV. and Ferdinand, though in different ways, were driven by the like influence to inevitable destruction. The people of Naples had been made to wear the English cockade, and Nelson was invoked as a tutelary god. A levy of the fifth of the population had been ordered, an instance of singular extravagance, for to arm efficiently the fiftieth part would have sufficed to enrol Naples amongst the great powers. Each convent was enjoined to furnish a horseman fully equipped; part of the possessions of the clergy had been exposed to sale, and all the taxes doubled; finally, that planner of unlucky enterprises, all whose military schemes had so egregiously failed, and whom fate reserved for reverses of the strangest character, Mack was solicited to place himself at the head of the Neapolitan forces. The honours of a triumph were awarded him before the victory, and the title of liberator of Italy, the same borne by Bonaparte, was prematurely bestowed on him. To these material preparations were added ovations to all the saints, supplications to Saint-Januarius, and chastisements on all suspected of leaning to the opinions of the French.

* It was passed on the 19th Fructidor, year VI. (5th Sept.)

† He disembarked on the 5th Fructidor (22d August), and was beaten and made prisoner by General Lord Cornwallis on the 22d (8th September).

The court of Naples likewise continued its machinations in Piedmont and Tuscany. It insisted that the Piedmontese should rise on the rear of the army guarding the Cisalpine state, and the Tuscans on the rear of that guarding Rome. The Neapolitans would profit by the occasion to attack in front the army of Rome, the Austrians would seize the like opportunity to fall on the army in the Cisalpine, and from all these combinations it was augured not a Frenchman would escape. The king of Sardinia, being a religious prince, was fettered by certain scruples arising from the treaty of alliance which bound him to France; but he was told that faith pledged to oppressors was not binding, and that the Piedmontese enjoyed a right to exterminate the French to the last man. At the same time, scruples were less the veritable obstacle than the rigorous watchfulness of the French Directory. As to the Grand-Duke of Tuscany, he was wholly destitute of means. To decide him, Naples promised to send him an army by Nelson's squadron.

On the other hand the Directory was on its guard, and took precautions. It chanced that the Ligurian republic, still embittered against the king of Sardinia, had at length declared war against that potentate. To an antipathy of principles was joined an old animosity of neighbourhood, and these puny powers were resolute to have a fight at all hazards. The Directory interposed in the quarrel, signifying to the Ligurian republic a command to lay down its arms, and declaring to the king of Sardinia that it took upon itself to maintain tranquillity in his dominions, but that, for this purpose, it must occupy an important post. In consequence, it asked permission to occupy with its troops the citadel of Turin. Such a pretension was only to be justified by the apprehensions the court of Piedmont inspired. There existed an irreconcilable incompatibility between the old and the new states, which prevented them from reposing any trust in each other. The king of Piedmont proffered urgent remonstrances, but he had no power to resist the instances of the Directory. The French took possession of the citadel, and forthwith commenced to arm it. The Directory had detached the army of Rome from that of the Cisalpine, and given the command to General Championnet, who had distinguished himself on the Rhine. This army was scattered over the surface of the Roman state. In the March of Ancona were four to five thousand men commanded by general Casa-Bianca; on the opposite slope of the Apennines, towards Terni, stood General Lemoine with two or three thousand men. Macdonald, with the right, about five thousand strong, was stationed upon the Tiber. A small reserve held Rome itself. The army called that of Rome contained, therefore, from fifteen to sixteen thousand men at the utmost. The necessity of keeping a vigilant guard upon the country, and the difficulty of procuring provisions in sufficient abundance, had obliged the French thus to disperse their troops; and if an active and well-disciplined enemy had known how to seize the opportunity, he might have made the French rue their inter-isolation.

In truth, this circumstance was duly estimated at Naples: it appeared easy to surprise the French and destroy them in detail. What glory to take the initiative, to gain the first success, to force reluctant Austria to enter upon the career, after having opened it to her! Such were the considerations that impelled the court of Naples to precipitate hostilities. It expected that the French would be easily beaten, and that Austria could no longer vacillate when once the sword was drawn. M. de Gallo and Prince Belmonte-Pignatelli, who understood Europe and affairs somewhat better, opposed the initiative being taken; but their prudent exhortations were spurned. To embolden the poor king and tear him from his innocent occupations, it is said, a counterfeit letter from the Emperor was used, which recommended the commencement of hostilities. Instant orders to march were issued towards the close of November. The whole Neapolitan army was put in motion. The king himself set forth with great pomp to assist in the operations. There was no declaration of war, but a summons to the French to evacuate the Roman state: a summons they answered by preparing for combat, despite the disproportion of numbers.

Considering the respective situations of the two armies, nothing was more easy than to overwhelm the French, dispersed as they were over the Roman provinces, to the right and left of the Apennines. It was simply requisite to march directly on their centre and move the mass of the Neapolitan forces between Rome and Terni. Thus the left of the French, placed beyond the Apennines to guard the Marches, would have been severed from their right, stationed on this side to defend the banks of the Tiber. They would have been thereby prevented from concentrating, and driven in disorder into Upper Italy. The Peninsula at least would have been delivered; and Tuscany, the Roman state, and the Marches, would have fallen under the domination of Naples. The preponderance of the Neapolitan troops rendered this plan only the more easy and sure, but it was impossible for Mack to employ a manœuvre so simple. As in his old plans, he would envelop the enemy by a multitude of detached corps. He had nearly 60,000 men under his command, of whom 40,000 formed the active army and 20,000 the garrisons. Instead of directing this prodigious mass on the essential point of Terni, he divided it into six columns. The first, filing along the reverse of the Apennines and the shore of the Adriatic, was to proceed, by the route of Ascoli, into the Marches; the second and third, acting upon the other side of the mountains and communicating with the first, were to march, the one on Terni, the other on Magliano; the fourth and principal, forming the main-body, was directed on Frascati and Rome; a fifth, skirting the Mediterranean, had the task of traversing the Pontine Marshes and joining the main-body upon the Appian way; the sixth and last, shipped on board Nelson's squadron, was dispatched to Leghorn with the view of arousing Tuscany and intercepting the retreat of the French. Thus all was prepared to surround and entrap them to a man, but nothing unfortunately to defeat them in the first instance.

Such was the order in which Mack set out with his forty thousand men. The quantity of his baggage, the indiscipline of his troops, and the bad state of the roads, combined to render his movements very slow. The Neapolitan army wound tardily along like a huge tail, without order or cohesion. Championnet, warned in time of the danger, detached two corps to observe the march of the enemy and protect the isolated corps as they fell back. Not deeming it feasible to retain Rome, he resolved to take up a position beyond it, on the banks of the Tiber, between Civita-Castellana and Civita-Ducale, and there to concentrate his forces to resume the offensive.

Whilst Championnet wisely retired and evacuated Rome, leaving eight hundred men in the castle of Saint-Angelo, Mack advanced fiercely on all the routes, never dreaming apparently of the possibility of resistance. He arrived at the gates of Rome on 9th Frimaire year VII. (29th November), and entered the city without obstacle. A triumphal reception had been prepared for the king. That weak prince, hailed as a conqueror and liberator, was intoxicated with the military glory he was persuaded he had earned. A noble use of victory was however inculcated on him, and he invited the Pope to resume possession of his dominions. His army, less magnanimous than its sovereign, committed horrible excesses. The Roman populace, with the instability characteristic of it, rushed into the houses of those accused of being revolutionists and laid them waste. The mortal remains of the unfortunate Duphot were exhumed and barbarously outraged.

During the time the Neapolitans thus consumed at Rome, Championnet executed with commendable activity the skilful determination he had formed. Sensible that the essential point was in the centre upon the Upper-Tiber, he ordered Macdonald to occupy a strong position at Civita-Castellana, and reinforced him with all the troops he could spare. He transported part of the forces he had in the Marches over the Apennines, and left with General Casa-Bianca only as many as were strictly necessary to retard on that side the progress of the enemy. He himself posted to Ancona to hasten the dispatch of his parks and munitions. Not more alarmed than needful at what was preparing on his rear in Tuscany, he commissioned an officer, with a feeble detachment, to observe what passed in that quarter.

The Neapolitans at length encountered the French on the different routes which they traversed. They were three-times more numerous, but were opposed to the famous bands of Italy and found their task harder than they anticipated. In the Marches the column advancing by Ascoli was repulsed and pursued to a distance by Casa-Bianca. On the Terni route, a Neapolitan colonel was captured with all his corps by General Lemoine. These first experiences of hostilities against the French were little calculated to encourage the Neapolitans. However, Mack made his dispositions to force the position he deemed the most important, that of Civita-Castellana, where Macdonald was stationed with the bulk of the French troops. Civita-Castellena is the ancient Veii. It is situated above a ravine, in a very strong position. The French held several distant posts which covered the approaches. On the 14th Frimaire year VII. (4th December), Mack attacked Borghetti, Nepi, and Rignano, with considerable forces. He directed by the opposite side of the Tiber an accessory column with orders to seize on Rignano. None of his attacks succeeded. One of his columns, put to flight, lost all its artillery. A second, enveloped, lost three thousand prisoners. The others, disheartened, confined themselves to simple demonstrations. In fact, in no quarter could the Neapolitans withstand the shock of the French troops. Mack, somewhat disconcerted, relinquished his design of carrying the central position of Civita-Castellana, and began to perceive it was not on that point he ought to have attempted to force the enemy's line. It was at Terni, a point nearer the Apennines and less defended by the French, that he ought to have struck the principal blow. He now strove to mask the movement of his troops and bear them from Civita-Castellana upon Terni. But to conceal this movement a rapidity of execution was required impossible with troops devoid of discipline. It took up several days to repass the bulk of the army over the Tiber, and Mack delayed still more by his own fault an operation already too tardy. Macdonald, whom he expected to retain at Civita-Castellana by demonstrations, had already moved from Civita-Castellana beyond the Tiber; Lemoine had been reinforced at Terni. Thus the Neapolitans had been anticipated on all the points they contemplated surprising. The very first step taken by General Metsch, in advance from Calvi on Otricoli, led to nothing but disaster. On the 19th Frimaire (9th December), driven back from Otricoli on Calvi, that general was surrounded and obliged to lay down his arms with four thousand men, before a corps of only three thousand five hundred. From that moment, Mack thought only of returning to Rome and of recoiling from Rome to the foot of the mountains near Frascati and Albano, there to rally his army and reinforce it with fresh battalions. This was but a sad resource, for it was not so much in the quantity of his soldiers he wanted augmentation as in their quality change; and he could not hope, by withdrawing a few leagues from the field of battle, to enjoy sufficient opportunity for improving them in discipline and valour.

The King of Naples, on learning these dismal circumstances, hurried furtively from Rome, which he had entered a few days previously in triumph. The Neapolitans evacuated it in disorder, to the great joy of the Romans, who were already much more weary of their presence than they had ever been of that of the French. Championnet returned to Rome seventeen days after his departure from it. He had truly earned the honours of a triumph. Ably concentrating himself with fifteen or sixteen thousand men, he had contrived to resume the offensive against forty thousand and driven them in confusion before him. Not satisfied with merely defending the Roman states, he now conceived the bold design of conquering the Kingdom of Naples with his small force. The enterprise was difficult, less on account of the strength of the Neapolitan army than of the disposition of its inhabitants, who, it was to be feared, might wage a long and dangerous guerilla-warfare against the French. Championnet, however, persisted in advancing, and hastened from Rome to pursue the retreat of Mack. He secured, on the road, a great number of prisoners, and completely routed the column which had been disembarked in Tuscany, of which only three thousand men escaped.

Mack, totally demoralized, fell back rapidly into the Neapolitan dominions, and halted only before Capua, on the line of the Volturna. He here picked out his best troops, and planted them in front of Capua, and along the whole line of the river, which is very deep, and forms a barrier not easy to surmount. In the meantime the King had returned to Naples, where his sudden appearance caused a direful commotion. The populace, infuriated at the reverses experienced by the army, raised the cry of treachery, demanded arms, and threatened with slaughter the generals, the ministers, all in fact to whom it imputed the disasters of the war. It vociferated similar menaces against those accused of favouring the French and the revolution. The infamous court actually consented to place arms in the hands of these lazzaroni, with a clear foresight of the use they would make of them. Scarcely had these semi-barbarians received the spoils of the arsenals than they broke into insurrection, and rendered themselves masters of Naples. Exclaiming constantly against treachery, they seized upon a messenger of the King and tore him to pieces. The favourite Acton, to whom the public calamities began to be ascribed, the queen, the king, the whole court, trembled in dismay. Naples no longer appeared safe as a habitation; the idea of taking refuge in Sicily was immediately suggested and adopted. On the 11th Nivôse (31st December), the precious moveables of the crown, all the riches in the palaces of Caserte and Naples, and a treasure of twenty millions, were embarked on board Nelson's squadron, which set sail for Sicily. Acton, the author of the whole mischief, shrunk from braving the dangers of a further sojourn in Naples, and accompanied the queen to sea. Dock-yards and other things that could not be removed, were committed to the flames. It was amidst a howling tempest, and covered with the sinister glare of a conflagration, that this cowardly and guilty court abandoned to its fate the nation it had compromised. It left orders, as has been said, to destroy the upper class of citizens, suspected of entertaining revolutionary principles. All were to be immolated even to the notaries. Prince Pignatelli remained at Naples charged with the powers of the king.

Championnet, meanwhile, advanced towards Naples. He had committed in his turn the same fault as Mack; he had divided into several columns, appointed to unite before Capua. Their junction through a difficult country, amidst a fanatical population, in arms on all sides against the alleged enemies of God and St. Januarius, was of very uncertain accomplishment.

On arriving with his main-body upon the banks of the Volturna, Championnet resolved to make an attempt upon Capua. Repulsed by a numerous artillery, he was compelled to renounce the design of an assault, and to retrograde with his troops, awaiting the arrival of his other columns. This abortive enterprise occurred on the 14th Nivôse year VII. (3d January 1799). The Neapolitan peasants, swarming in all directions, intercepted the French couriers and convoys. Championnet could gain no tidings of his other columns, and his position might be considered extremely critical. Mack profited by the occasion to tender amicable overtures. Championnet, confident in the fortune of France, boldly rejected the propositions of Mack. Fortunately he was soon after joined by his columns, and he then agreed to an armistice on the following conditions: Mack was to relinquish the line of the Volturna, surrender the town of Capua to the French, retire behind the line of the Regi-Lagni, on the side of the Mediterranean, and of the Ofanto, on the side of the Adriatic, and cede moreover a large portion of the kingdom of Naples. Besides these concessions of territory, a payment of eight millions in money was stipulated. This armistice was signed on the 22d Nivôse (11th January).

When news of the armistice reached Naples, the populace was inflamed with wrath, and shouted yet more vehemently that it was betrayed by the officers of the crown. The appearance of the commissioner charged to receive the contribution of eight millions stimulated it to excesses; it raged in tumultuous insurrection, and prevented the execution of the armistice. Such was the extent of the commotion that Prince Pignatelli abandoned the city in consternation. That beautiful capital was left at the mercy of the lazzaroni. There was no longer any recognised authority, and a total dissolution of society seemed inevitable. At length, however, after three days of convulsion, a successful effort was made to nominate a chief who possessed the confidence of the lazzaroni, and also some means of curbing them: this was Prince Moliterne. In the meantime, a similar explosion had taken place in the army under Mack. His soldiers, far from ascribing their defeat to their own cowardice, laid it to the charge of their general, and vowed to massacre him. The pretended liberator of Italy, who a month ago had received the honours of a triumph, had now no other asylum but the very camp of the French. He craved permission of Championnet to take refuge with him. The generous republican, overlooking the improper language of Mack in his correspondence, afforded him the desired asylum, seated him at his table, and permitted him to retain his sword.

Authorized by the refusal at Naples to execute the conditions of the armistice, Championnet advanced on that city with the design of capturing it. The affair was difficult; for an immense population, which in the open field might have been swept away by a few squadrons of cavalry, became very formidable behind the walls of a town. The French had sundry engagements to encounter in their approach, and the lazzaroni certainly showed more courage than the Neapolitan army. The imminence of the danger had excited their fury to the highest pitch. The Prince Moliterne, who attempted to restrain them, soon lost his popularity amongst them, and they took for leaders two of themselves, men named Paggio and Michael the Mad. From that moment they abandoned themselves to the wildest disorders, and committed every species of violence against the citizens and nobles accused of Jacobinism. So desperate was the state of things that every class interested in the preservation of order desired the entrance of the French. Many of the inhabitants sent word to Mack that they would unite with him to deliver Naples into his hands. The Prince Moliterne himself undertook to seize the fortress of Saint Elmo, and surrender it to the French. On the 4th Pluviose (23d January), Championnet marched to the assault. The lazzaroni defended themselves valiantly, but the citizens, having obtained possession of Saint Elmo and different posts in the city, gave access to the French. Nevertheless, the lazzaroni, intrenched in the houses, prepared to contest the victory from street to street, perhaps even to fire the town; but one of their leaders being taken prisoner, he was treated with consideration, and assured of due respect being paid to Saint Januarius, whereupon he pursuaded his followers to lay down their arms.

Championnet forthwith found himself master of Naples, and of the whole kingdom: his first act was to re-establish order, and disarm the lazzaroni. In accordance with the intentions of the French government he proclaimed the new republic. An ancient denomination was assigned to it, that of the Parthenopean republic. Such was the result of the follies and offences of the court of Naples. A few thousand French and the lapse of two months sufficed to dissipate its mighty projects, and convert its dominions into a republic. This brief and successful campaign invested Championnet with a brilliant reputation. The army of Rome henceforth took the title of the army of Naples, and was detached from the army of Italy. Championnet became independent of Joubert.

Whilst these events occurred in the peninsula of Italy, the fall of the Piedmontese monarchy was finally consummated. Through a precaution which circumstances sufficiently justified, Joubert had already possessed himself of the citadel of Turin, and armed it with the artillery found in the Piedmontese arsenals. But this was an insufficient security in the present state of things. Disturbances continually prevailed in Piedmont; the republicans were incessantly making fresh attempts, and had recently lost six hundred men in an endeavour to surprise Alessandria. A masquerading party from the citadel of Turin, in which the whole court was personated, composed both of Piedmontese and French officers, whom the generals could not always restrain, had almost led to a sanguinary conflict in the streets of Turin itself. It was impossible that the court of Piedmont could be friendly to the French, and the correspondence between the minister of Naples and M. de Priocca, prime minister of Piedmont, sufficiently avouched the fact. Under such circumstances, France, threatened with a fresh war, could not allow to continue, on the line of communication over the Alps, two parties in active contention and a hostile government. She held, with regard to the court of Piedmont, the right that defenders of a fortress may exercise over buildings which embarrass or endanger its defence. It was decided, therefore, that the king should be compelled to abdicate. The republicans were supported, and the French aided them to seize Novarro, Alessandria, Suza, and Chivasso. The king was then told that his reign over a revolted country was no longer feasible, a country, too, likely to become the theatre of war, and his immediate abdication urged, the island of Sardinia being left to him. The act of abdication was accordingly signed on the 19th Frimaire (9th December 1798). Thus, the two most powerful monarchs in Italy, those of Naples and Piedmont, preserved, of their respective dominions, but two islands. In expectation of coming events, the French government declined the troublesome task of creating a new republic, and, pending the result of the war, it was determined that Piedmont should be provisionally administered by France. No state now survived to grasp in Italy but Tuscany. A simple demonstration would have sufficed to reduce it; but this demonstration was deferred, it being deemed advisable to wait until Austria had openly declared herself.

CHAPTER LIX.

STATE OF THE ADMINISTRATION OF THE REPUBLIC AND OF THE ARMIES AT THE COMMENCEMENT OF 1799.—MILITARY PREPARATIONS.—LEVY OF 200,000 CONSCRIPTS.—DECLARATION OF WAR AGAINST AUSTRIA.—OPENING OF THE CAMPAIGN—INVASION OF THE GRISONS.—BATTLE OF STOCKACH.—RETREAT OF JOURDAN.—MILITARY OPERATIONS IN ITALY.—BATTLE OF MAGNANO.—RETREAT OF SCHERER.—ASSASSINATION OF THE FRENCH PLENIPOTENTIARIES AT RASTADT.—ELECTIONS OF THE YEAR VII.—SIEYES ELECTED A DIRECTOR IN PLACE OF REWBELL.

Such was the state of things at the commencement of the year 1799. War, from the events we have just recorded, appeared almost inevitable. Moreover, the correspondences intercepted, the aggressive movement of the court of Naples, which would not have taken the initiative without the certainty of a powerful intervention, the vast preparations of Austria, and the arrival of a Russian corps in Moravia, seemed to render the occurrence still more sure. The new year, 1799, had opened, and it was too evident that hostilities would commence within a couple of months. Thus was the incompatability of the two great systems which the revolution had brought in array proved by facts. France had begun the year 1798 with three republics dependent on her, the Batavian, the Cisalpine, and the Ligurian, and at the end of the year six were in existence, by the creation of the Helvetian, Roman, and Parthenopean republics. This extension had been less the result of a spirit of conquest than of the spirit of system. The French had been obliged to succour the oppressed Vaudois; at Rome, they had been provoked to avenge the death of the unfortunate Duphot, slain in attempting to separate the two parties; at Naples they had merely repelled an aggression. They had been led by force of circumstances to keep the struggle alive. It is certain that the Directory, though reposing great confidence in the French power, nevertheless desired peace, for reasons both political and financial; it is equally certain that the Emperor, though desirous of war, wished to postpone it. Still, all had conducted themselves as if anxious for an immediate renewal of the contest, so absolute was the imcompatibility of the two systems.

The revolution had imparted to the French government an extraordinary confidence and daring. The last event at Naples, although inconsiderable in itself, encouraged the belief that nothing could withstand the French bayonet. This in truth was the opinion of Europe. It needed all the prodigious force combined against France to embolden her enemies to enter the lists against her. But this confidence of the French government in its strength was exaggerated, and concealed from it part of the difficulties of its position. The sequel has shown that its resources were immense, but that at this moment they were not sufficiently developed to secure victory. Besides France, the Directory had to govern Holland, Switzerland, and Italy divided into several republics. To administer these countries through the medium of their own governments was, as we have witnessed, more difficult than if the immediate command over them had been assumed. Scarcely any assistance could be obtained from them, either in money or men, from defect of organization. It was requisite, notwithstanding, to defend them, and thus to combat upon a line which extended from the Texel without interruption to the Adriatic, a line which, assailed in front by Austria and Russia, was taken in reverse by the English fleets both in Holland and at Naples. The forces which such a military situation demanded were to be drawn from France alone. Now the armies were singularly weakened; 40,000 soldiers, the best belonging to France, were in Egypt under her great captain. The armies remaining in the country were diminished one-half by the effect of desertions, which peace always brings in her train. The government continued to pay the same number of men, but it had not perhaps 150,000 effective troops. The administrations and the staffs made a profit on the pay, which operated as a useless surcharge on the finances. These 150,000 effective men would form excellent depôts into which the new levies of conscripts might be draughted; but time was required for such an operation, and sufficient time had not elapsed since the establishment of the conscription. Moreover, the finances were in the same pitiable condition, from the inefficient system of collection. A budget of 600 millions had been voted, and an extraordinary item of 125 millions charged on the 400 millions remaining in the national domains; but the tardiness of payments and errors in the estimate of certain products left a considerable deficit. Furthermore, subordination, so necessary in a machine of such magnitude, was beginning to fail. The military were becoming every day more difficult to keep in order. The perpetual state of war made them too sensible of their importance, and they showed themselves imperious and insatiable. Stationed in rich countries, they took flagrant advantage of the opportunity, and were implicated in every description of spoliation and exaction. They attempted likewise to insure the triumphs of their own opinions in the places where they sojourned, and obeyed with reluctance the direction of the civil agents. An instance of this we have seen in the quarrel between Brune and Trouvé. Finally, at home, the opposition which took its rise after the 18th Fructidor, appearing in two phases or characters, was becoming more hostile. The patriots, crushed in the last elections, were preparing to recover their lost ground in the new. The moderates criticized coldly but bitterly all the measures of the government, and according to the practice of all oppositions, reproached it with the very obstacles it had to overcome, and which were for the most part insurmountable. Government is like any other force: it must conquer; and woe betide it if it fail. Its excuses are never heeded, when it would explain the causes of its ill-success.

Such was the situation of the Directory at the moment war was about to recommence in Europe. It made great efforts to infuse order through the complicated machinery committed to its guidance. Italy offered a perpetual derangement. The resources of that fine country were spoiled and squandered, not to the advantage of the army, but to the enrichment of a few plunderers. The commission appointed to establish and administer the Roman republic had recently ceased its functions, and forthwith the influence of the staffs had come into play. The consuls who appeared too moderate were displaced. Advantageous contracts for the maintenance of the army were broken. The commission, in which Faypoult held the financial direction, had concluded a contract for the support and payment of the troops stationed at Rome, and for the transport of all objects of art sent into France. In return it had assigned national property confiscated from the clergy. The contract, besides being moderate in respect of terms, had the advantage of turning to account the national domains. It was annulled however, and subsequently given to the firm of Baudin which literally devoured Italy. This company fortified itself by debauching the staffs, to which it allowed one per cent profit. Piedmont, now placed in French occupation, presented a new and tempting object of prey, and the probity of Joubert, general-in-chief of the army of Italy, formed but a slender guarantee against the cupidity of the staff and the companies. Naples, above all, was eyed greedily as a field of legitimate pillage. Happily, there were four honest men in the Directory, Rewbell, Larévellière, Merlin, and Treilhard, to whom these iniquities were detestable. Larévellière especially, the most severe and the best informed as to facts from his intimate relations with the ambassador Trouvé and with the members of the Roman commission, recommended an exertion of strong authority. He proposed a very excellent plan on the subject, which his colleagues approved; namely, to institute in all the countries dependent on France, and which her armies occupied, commissions charged with the civil and financial departments, and altogether independent of the staffs. Accordingly, at Milan, Turin, Rome, and Naples, civil commissions would receive the contributions payable by the allies of France, conclude contracts, make all the financial arrangements, in a word, provide for the necessities of the armies, but allow no interference with funds by the military chiefs. The commissions would have orders, however, to pay the generals such sums as they might demand, without the latter being obliged to state the application; they were to account only to the government. Thus pains were still taken to propitiate the military power. The four directors decreed the adoption of the measure, and laid upon Scherer positive injunctions to put it into immediate operation with the utmost vigour. As he evinced some indulgence towards his comrades, he was warned that he would be held responsible for all the disorders permitted to continue.

This measure, however expedient it might be, was calculated to mortify the staffs. In Italy indeed they manifested a most mutinous spirit; they asserted that the military were disgraced by the precautions adopted with regard to them, that the generals would be completely fettered and stripped of all authority. Championnet, at Naples, had already arrogated the part of legislator and named commissions to administer the conquered country. Faypoult was dispatched to Naples to take charge of the financial department. He issued the necessary warrants to bring that administration under his charge, and rescinded certain ill-devised measures planned by Championnet. The latter, with all the irascible pride of men of his station, particularly when they are victorious, considered himself insulted; he had the hardihood to promulgate an ordinance commanding Faypoult and the other commissioners to quit Naples within twenty-four hours. Such conduct was too gross for endurance. To contemn the orders of the Directory and expel from Naples the delegates clothed with its powers, was an act which merited the severest reprehension, unless it were intended to abdicate the supreme authority and transfer it to the generals. The Directory wavered not an instant, but, through the energy of the upright members bent on uprooting the system of malversation, acted in the fulness of its might. It cashiered Championnet despite the lustre of his recent achievements, and consigned him to a military commission. Unhappily this was not the only instance of insubordination. The brave Joubert allowed himself to be persuaded that military honour was wounded by the decrees of the Directory; he refused to retain the command on the new conditions prescribed to generals and tendered his resignation. The Directory accepted it. Bernadotte declined to succeed Joubert from a similar motive. Nevertheless the Directory adhered to its determination and persisted in its decrees.

The Directory next devoted its attention to the levy of conscripts, which proceeded but slowly. The two first classes being unable to furnish the two hundred thousand recruits ordained, it obtained authority to raise them from all the classes until the required number was complete. To save time, it was decerned that the communes should be themselves charged with the equipment of the new recruits, and the expense allowed in deduction of the land-tax. When equipped the conscripts were to repair to the frontiers, there to be formed into garrison-battalions, relieve the old troops in the fortresses and reserve-camps, and, as soon as they were sufficiently drilled, be draughted into the active armies.

The deficit in the finances was a source of lively solicitude to the Directory. Ramel, who had administered the financial department with ability and probity since the institution of the Directory, after having tested the produce of the taxes, affirmed that the deficiency would be 65 millions, without reckoning the arrears resulting from delays in payments. A warm discussion arose in the Councils as to the amount of the assumed deficiency. The opponents of the Directory estimated it not to exceed 15 millions. Ramel demonstrated however that it would certainly amount to 65, and perhaps even to 75 millions. A tax had been imposed on doors and windows; but it was insufficient. A duty on salt was again submitted for enactment. The proposal excited a prodigious clamour: it was intended to oppress the people, the opposition vociferated, to fasten the public burdens on a single class, to revive the odious excise (gabelle), &c. Lucien Bonaparte, of all the speakers on the question, was the one who urged these objections with the greatest bitterness. The partisans of the government replied by alleging necessity. The duty was refused by the Council of Ancients. To make good its anticipated produce, the tax on doors and windows was doubled, that on street-gates even multiplied ten-fold. The possessions belonging to the protestant religion were directed to be sold, and it was decreed that the protestant clergy should receive salaries in exchange for their property. All sums receivable from the owners of property held jointly with the state were likewise placed at the disposition of government.

Unfortunately these various resources were not sufficiently prompt of realization. Besides the difficulty of eking out the produce of the taxes to the high level of 600 millions, there was the further inconvenience of retarded payments. The government was reduced, this year as in the preceding, to grant assignments to the contractors upon the outstanding amounts. The creditors, to whom, upon the liquidation of the two-thirds, the most scrupulous punctuality was promised, were themselves paid with securities receivable in acquittance of taxes. Thus was the government again constrained to resort to expedients for a subsistence.

It was not sufficient to muster soldiers and collect funds to maintain them; they were to be distributed in an efficient manner and proper generals selected for them. As we have said, it was necessary to defend Holland, the line of the Rhine, Switzerland, and all Italy, in other words, to operate from the Texel to the Gulf of Tarento. On one side Holland was covered by the neutrality of Prussia, which appeared certain of continuance; but an Anglo-Russian fleet was likely to effect a debarkation on its shores, and from this danger it was incumbent to protect it. The line of the Rhine was guarded by the two places of Mayence and Strasburg; and although there was little probability of Austria succeeding to force it, prudence rendered it fitting to cover it with a corps of observation. Whether the offensive were taken or awaited, it was on the banks of the Upper-Danube, in the vicinity of the Lake of Constance, that the Austrian armies must be encountered. An active army would be needed to advance, either from Alsace or Switzerland, into the plains of Bavaria. A corps of observation would be requisite to cover Switzerland itself, and, in fine, a powerful army to protect Upper-Italy against the Austrians, and Lower-Italy against the Neapolitans and English combined.

The field of battle was of vast dimensions, and was not known or understood as it has since been, in the sequel of long wars and immortal campaigns. It was then believed that the key of the plains lay in the mountains. Switzerland, lying in the centre of the immense line on which the conflict was to rage, appeared the key of the whole continent; and France, who occupied Switzerland, seemed to possess a decisive advantage;—as if by commanding the sources of the Rhine, the Danube, and the Po, she would also command their entire courses: an egregious error. We may conceive that two armies resting each a wing immediately on mountains, as the Austrians and French when they fought in the vicinity of Verona, and in the vicinity of Rastadt, should cling to the possession of those mountains, because either of the two being master of them might outflank the enemy by the heights. But when the field of battle is fifty or a hundred leagues from mountains, they cease to be of the same importance. Whilst a desolating struggle were maintained for the pass of St. Gothard, armies assembled on the Rhine or the Lower Po would have time to decide the fate of Europe. But the great is measured by the small: because eminences are important on a field of battle a few leagues in extent, it was concluded that the power, master of the Alps, became necessarily so of the continent. Switzerland enjoys but one real advantage, that of being able to open the direct approaches to France upon Austria, or to Austria upon France. Hence, for the repose of those two powers and the tranquillity of Europe, it is of consequence to keep those approaches barred. The more points of contact and the means of invasion are prevented so much the better, particularly between two states which cannot meet in collision without convulsing the continent. On this account it is that the neutrality of Switzerland interests all Europe, and that it has ever been good policy to consecrate it as a maxim of general security.

By occupying Switzerland, then, France had secured the advantage of direct approaches upon Austria and Italy, and, in this light, its possession might be regarded as important to her. But if the multiplicity of approaches be an advantage to the power intent to take the offensive and having adequate means, it becomes an inconvenience for the power reduced to the defensive by the inferiority of strength. The latter must naturally desire the points of attack as few as possible that he may concentrate his forces with advantage. If, therefore, it were good for France, sufficiently prepared for the offensive, to be able to debouch into Bavaria by Switzerland, it was bad for her, when reduced to the defensive, to be unable to rely upon the neutrality of Switzerland; it was bad for her to have to guard the whole expanse of frontier between Mayence and Genoa, instead of having the power, as in 1793, to concentrate her forces, between Mayence and Strasburg on one side, and between Mont-Blanc and Genoa on the other.

Thus, the occupation of Switzerland might become dangerous for France in the event of defensive operations. But she was far from believing herself in that predicament. The design of the government was to assume the offensive in every direction, and to proceed, as heretofore, by rapid inroads. But the distribution of its forces was most unfortunate. It stationed an army of observation in Holland, and another army of observation on the Rhine. An aggressive army was intended to start from Strasburg, traverse the Black Forest, and invade Bavaria. A second active army was to combat in Switzerland for the possession of the mountains, and thus support on one side that acting on the Danube, and on the other that to act in Italy. Another large army was to move from the Adige to drive the Austrians beyond the Isonzo. Lastly, a third army of observation was to cover Lower-Italy and guard Naples. It was proposed that the army of Holland should contain twenty thousand men, that of the Rhine forty, that of the Danube eighty, that of Switzerland forty, that of Italy eighty, and that of Naples forty, making in all three hundred thousand men, independently of garrisons. With such a force, this distribution would have been less erroneous. But if, by the levy of conscripts, France might some day swell her troops to that amount, she was far from possessing the capability at this moment. On the contrary, she could scarcely leave 10,000 men in Holland. On the Rhine she could with difficulty muster a few thousand. The troops destined to form that army of observation were retained in the interior, either to watch La Vendée again threatened, or to protect public tranquillity during the forthcoming elections. The army appointed to operate on the Danube amounted at the utmost to forty thousand men, that of Switzerland to thirty, that of Italy to fifty, and that of Naples to thirty. Thus France counted scarcely one hundred and sixty or one hundred and seventy thousand fighting men. To sprinkle these from the Texel to the gulf of Tarento, was of all dispositions the most imprudent.

Since the Directory, impelled by revolutionary audacity, was determined to take the offensive, it became of the utmost consequence, then more than ever, to select well the points of attack, to concentrate sufficient force upon those points, and not to disseminate troops for the purpose of engaging on all at once. Accordingly, instead of scattering its forces in Italy from Verona to Naples, it ought, after the example of Bonaparte, to have concentred the great majority on the Adige, and there operated with commanding effect. Whilst fighting the Austrians on the Adige, it had been sufficiently demonstrated that Rome, Florence, and Naples, might be kept in due subjection. Again, on the side of the Danube, instead of uselessly casting some thousands of men at the foot of Saint-Gothard, it should have diminished the armies of Switzerland and the Rhine, augmented the active army of the Danube, and waged with it decisive warfare in Bavaria. The points of attack might even have been narrowed, remaining in observation on the Adige, and acting aggressively only on the Danube, there to deal a blow all the stronger and surer for the increased mass agglomerated to strike it. Napoleon and the Archduke Charles have proved, the first by example, the latter by precept, that between Austria and France the quarrel must be decided on the Danube. Here lies the shortest passage to the ultimate goal. A French army, victorious in Bavaria, renders null all the successes of an Austrian army victorious in Italy, because it approximates so much more nearly to Vienna.

In exculpation of the plans of the Directory, it is to be remembered that so vast a field of operations had not yet been embraced, and that the only man then capable of doing so was in Egypt. The one hundred and sixty thousand men or thereabouts, actually disposable, were therefore dispersed over the immense line we have described, and in the order we have indicated. Ten thousand men were to observe Holland, a few thousand the Rhine; forty thousand formed the army of the Danube, thirty that of Switzerland, fifty that of Italy, thirty that of Naples. The conscripts were destined shortly to reinforce these masses and swell them to the amounts contemplated by the directorial project.

The choice of generals was not more happy than the conception of plans. True, since the death of Hoche, and the departure of Bonaparte, Kleber, and Desaix for Egypt, the selection was more confined. One general remained, however, whose reputation was high and deservedly merited,—Moreau. It was possible to be more bold, more enterprising, but scarcely more resolute or safe. A state, defended by such a man, could not perish. Disgraced on account of his conduct in the affair of Pichegru, he had modestly consented to act as a simple inspector of infantry. He was proposed to the Directory for the command in Italy. Since Bonaparte had drawn so much attention to that country, since it was become as the apple of discord between Austria and France, this command appeared the most important. On this account Moreau was suggested. Barras opposed his nomination with all his power. He rested his objection on high patriot grounds, and represented Moreau as open to suspicion from his conduct on the 18th Fructidor. His colleagues had the weakness to yield. Moreau was discarded, and remained a simple general of division in the army he ought to have commanded in chief. He nobly accepted this subordinate rank, one so beneath his talents. Joubert and Bernadotte had refused the command of the army of Italy from motives already stated. Scherer, minister at war, was then thought of. This general, by his successes in Belgium and the brilliant affair of Loano, had acquired considerable reputation. He possessed ability, but his frame was debilitated by age and infirmities; he was no longer capable of leading young soldiers full of vigour and daring. Moreover he had rendered himself obnoxious to the majority of his comrades, by enforcing with some rigour the repression of military license. Barras proposed him as general of the army of Italy. He did so, it was said, to remove him from the ministry of war, where he was beginning to grow distasteful from his severity. However, the military men who were consulted, especially Bernadotte and Joubert, having spoken of his capacity as it was universally estimated in the army, that is eulogistically, he was appointed general-in-chief of the army of Italy. He himself resisted, alleging his age, his health, and above all his unpopularity, arising from the functions he had exercised; but the Directory insisted, and he was obliged to yield.

Championnet, arraigned before a court-martial, was succeeded in the command of the army of Naples by Macdonald. Massena was intrusted with the command of the army of Helvetia. These were excellent appointments, and such as the republic had every reason to applaud. The important army of the Danube was confided to Jourdan. Notwithstanding his reverses in the campaign of 1798, the services he had rendered in 1793 and 1794 were not forgotten, and the hope was indulged that he would prove equal to his early career. Since it was not given to Moreau, the army of the Danube could not have been consigned to a more trustworthy guardian. Unfortunately it was so inferior in numbers, that to command it with assurance required the bold self-confident genius of the conqueror of Arcole and Rivoli. Bernadotte had the army of the Rhine; Brune the army of Holland.

Austria had made preparations greatly superior to the French. Not reposing like them on her successes, she had employed the two years elapsed since the armistice of Leoben, to raise, equip, and discipline fresh troops. She had provided them with all things necessary, and studied to place over them the most efficient generals. She could bring actually in line 225,000 effective men, without reckoning the recruits still under drill. Russia supplied her with an auxiliary force of 60,000 men, whose fanatical valour was vaunted throughout Europe, and who were commanded by the celebrated Suwarrov. Thus the new coalition would operate on the front of the French line with about 300,000 men. Two other Russian contingents were announced, to unite with the English troops, and intended, the one for Holland, the other for Naples.

The plan of campaign digested by the coalition was no better conceived than that by the French. It was the pedantic offspring of the Aulic Council, highly disapproved by the Archduke Charles, but imposed on him and the other generals without permission to modify it. This plan proceeded, like that of the French, on the principle that the mountains form the key of the plains. Consequently considerable forces were accumulated to guard the Tyrol and the Grisons, and to wrest, if possible, the great chain of the Alps from the French. The second object apparently most in favour with the Aulic Council was Italy. A large body of troops was stationed behind the Adige. The most important theatre of war, that of the Danube, seemed not so particularly to command its attention. The happiest arrangement it made in that quarter was placing there the Archduke Charles. Thus then were the Austrian forces distributed. The Archduke Charles, with 54,000 foot and 24,000 horse, was in Bavaria. In the Voralberg, along the course of the Rhine to its issue into Lake Constance, General Hotze commanded 24,000 foot and 2,000 horse. Bellegarde was in the Tyrol with 46,000 men, of whom 2,000 were cavalry, whilst Kray had on the Adige 64,000 foot and 11,000 horse, making 75,000 in all. The Russian corps, too, was intended to join Kray for the purpose of acting in Italy.

We see that Hotze's twenty-six thousand men, and Bellegarde's forty-six thousand, were to operate in the mountains. They were to win the sources of the rivers, whilst the armies in the plains were striving to conquer their streams. On the side of the French, the army of Helvetia was charged with the like task. Consequently, on both sides, a multitude of men were about to destroy each other uselessly on inaccessible rocks, whose possession could influence but remotely the fate of the war.*

The French generals failed not to remonstrate with the Directory on the insufficiency of their means. Jourdan, being obliged to detach several battalions into Belgium to repress some troubles there, and a demi-brigade to the army of Helvetia to replace another demi-brigade sent into Italy, had actually not more than 38,000 effective troops. Such a force was too greatly disproportioned with that under the Archduke to contend against him with any hope of advantage. He demanded the prompt formation of the army under Bernadotte, which as yet contained only from five to six thousand men, and especially the organization of additional field-battalions. He was desirous of permission to combine with his own the army either of the Rhine or of Helvetia, in which he evinced sound judgment. Massena, on his side, complained of having neither the magazines nor the means of transport indispensable for the sustenance of his army in sterile countries, and of such difficult access.

The Directory stated in reply to these complaints that the conscripts would speedily join and be formed into field-battalions; that the army of Helvetia should be forthwith augmented to forty thousand men, and the army of the Danube to sixty; and that as soon as the elections were over, the old battalions retained in the interior, should be sent to form the nucleus of the army of the Rhine. Bernadotte and Massena had orders to co-operate in the operations of Jourdan, and to act in conformity with his views. Still relying on the effect of the aggressive, and animated with boundless confidence in its soldiers, the government was eager, despite the disproportion of numbers, that its generals should precipitate the attack, and disconcert the Austrians by an impetuous incursion. Instructions were given in accordance with these sentiments.

* All these assertions are demonstrated at length by the Archduke Charles, Jomini, and Napoleon.

The Grisons, divided into two factions, had long vacillated between the Austrian and Swiss dominations. Eventually they had called the Austrians into their valleys. The Directory, considering them Swiss subjects, ordered Massena to occupy their territory, serving the Austrians with a preliminary summons to evacuate it. In case of their refusal, Massena was instantly to attack them. At the same time, as the Russians were still advancing in Austria, it addressed two notes on the subject, one to the congress of Rastadt, the other to the Emperor. Both to the Germanic confederation and to the Emperor it announced that unless, within the space of eight days, counter-orders were given to the march of the Russians, it would deem war declared. Jourdan was enjoined to pass the Rhine upon the expiration of that interval.

The congress of Rastadt had made great progress towards the conclusion of its labours. The questions touching the limit of the Rhine, the partition of the islands and the construction of bridges being adjusted, that relative to the debts alone remained for discussion. The majority of the German princes, saving the ecclesiastical, were undoubtedly solicitous for a settlement to avoid the alternative of war; but subject for the most part to the sway of Austria, they dared not give emphasis to their views. The members of the deputation successively abandoned the Congress, so that further deliberation threatened soon to become impossible. To the note of the Directory the Congress intimated it was not empowered to reply, and referred the matter to the diet at Ratisbon. The note to the Emperor was forwarded to Vienna and remained unnoticed. War was therefore in point of fact declared. Jourdan was directed to cross the Rhine and advance by the Black Forest to the sources of the Danube. He accordingly passed the Rhine on the 11th Ventôse (1st March). The Archduke Charles passed the Lech on the 13th Ventôse (3d March). Thus the boundaries the two powers had mutually prescribed were overstepped, and they were again about to meet in hostile array. Still, although executing an offensive movement, Jourdan had instructions to let the first shot be fired by the enemy, pending the approval of the declaration of war by the legislative body.

Meanwhile, Massena commenced operations in the Grisons. He summoned the Austrians to evacuate them on the 16th Ventôse (6th March). The Grisons comprise the upper valley of the Rhine and the upper valley of the Inn, or Engadin. Massena resolved to pass the Rhine near its fall into the Lake Constance, and thus cut off all the corps scattered in the superior valleys. Lecourbe, who led his right wing, and who from his extraordinary activity and temerity was admirably adapted for mountain warfare, was to start from the vicinity of Saint-Gothard, cross the Rhine towards its sources, and throw himself into the valley of the Inn. General Dessoles, with a division of the army of Italy, was to second him by moving from the Valteline into the valley of the Upper-Adige.

These skilful dispositions were realized with exemplary vigour. On the 16th Ventôse (6th March) the Rhine was breasted on all points. The soldiers hurled waggons into the river and passed over them as on a bridge. In two days Massena was master of the whole course of the Rhine, from its sources to its fall into Lake Constance, and had taken fifteen pieces of cannon and 5,000 prisoners. On his part, Lecourbe was not less successful in performing the operations intrusted to him. He crossed the superior Rhine, pushed from Disentis to Tusis in the valley of the Albula, and from that valley boldly threw himself into that of the Inn, traversing the highest mountains in Europe still covered with the snows of winter. A compulsory delay having prevented Dessoles from advancing to the Upper-Adige from the Valteline, Lecourbe found himself exposed to envelopment by all the Austrian forces cantoned in the Tyrol. In fact, whilst he was heroically urging his way into the valley of the Inn and marching on Martinsbrück, Laudohn planted himself with a corps on his rear; but the intrepid Lecourbe, retracing his steps, attacked Laudohn, repulsed him, captured a number of his troops, and resumed his course into the valley of the Inn.

This brilliant opening seemed to accredit the belief that everywhere, in the Alps as at Naples, the French could face triumphantly an enemy far superior in numerical force. It assuredly confirmed the Directory in the opinion that the aggressive must be pursued and deficiency of numbers compensated by greater hardihood.

The Directory forwarded to Jourdan the declaration of war it had procured from the councils,* with orders to attack immediately. Jourdan had debouched by the defiles of the Black Forest into the district comprised between the Danube and the lake of Constance. The angle formed by the river and the lake widens continually on the advance into Germany. Jourdan, desirous of resting his left on the Danube and his right on the lake of Constance, to communicate with Massena, was therefore obliged, in proportion as he advanced, to extend his line and consequently to weaken it in a dangerous manner, especially before an enemy far superior in number. He had at first pushed as far as Mengen on one side and Marckdorf on the other. But learning that the army of the Rhine would not be organized before the 10th Germinal (30th March), and fearing to be turned by the valley of the Neckar, he conceived apprehensions and made a retrograde movement. The reiterated commands of his government and the success of Massena induced him to resume his forward march. He made choice of a fair position between Lake Constance and the Danube. Two rapid streams, the Ostrach and the Aach, starting almost from the same point, and falling the one into the Danube and the other into Lake Constance, form one straight line, behind which Jourdan established himself. Saint-Cyr, leading his left, was at Mengen; Souham, with the centre, at Pfullendorf; Ferino, with the right, at Barendorf. D'Hautpoult was stationed in reserve. Lefebvre, with the vanguard division, was at Ostrach. This point was the most accessible of the line: placed at the source of the two streams, it presented a tract of marsh-ground which might be traversed by a long causeway. On this point the Archduke Charles, intent to avoid being anticipated, resolved to direct his principal effort. He dispatched two columns to the right and left of the French, against St.-Cyr and Ferino. But his main body, nearly 50,000 strong, was concentrated on the point of Ostrach, where 9,000 French at the utmost were planted. The battle began on the 2d Germinal (22d March), and was bloodily contested. In this first encounter the French displayed a valour and pertinacity which excited the admiration of the Archduke himself. Jourdan hastened to the threatened position; but the extent of his lin and the nature of the ground prevented the possibility, by a rapid movement, of transporting troops from his wings to the centre. The passage was forced, and after an honourable resistance, Jourdan found himself obliged to beat a retreat. He fell back between Singen and Tuttlingen.

* This declaration of war was made on the 22d Ventôse Year VII. (13th March 1799).

A check at the commencement of the campaign was unfortunate; it destroyed that prestige of heroism and invincibility which the French so much needed to obviate the disparity of numbers. Still the inferiority of force had rendered this reverse almost inevitable. Jourdan did not however relinquish the design of acting on the offensive. Aware that Massena was advancing beyond the Rhine, trusting to the co-operation of the army of the Danube, he considered himself bound to make a final effort to support his colleague and flank him in his progress to Lake Constance. He had another motive for moving forward again, namely, the desire to occupy the point of Stockach where the roads to Switzerland and Suabia cross, a point he had done wrong to abandon when retiring between Singen and Tuttlingen. He fixed his operation for the 3d Germinal (23d March).

The Archduke Charles was not yet assured of the direction he ought to give his movements. He was undetermined whether he ought to direct his march on Switzerland, so as to separate Jourdan from Massena, or towards the sources of the Danube, so as to separate him from his base on the Rhine. The direction on Switzerland seemed to him the most advantageous for both armies, since the French had as much interest in combining with the Helvetian army as the Austrians had in keeping them asunder. But he was ignorant of Jourdan's projects, and resolved to make a reconnaissance to satisfy himself. He had appointed the 3d Germinal (23 March) for this reconnaissance, the same day on which Jourdan proposed to attack him.

The nature of the country rendered the position of the two armies extremely complicated. The strategic point was Stockach, where the Suabian and Swiss roads cross. That was the position Jourdan aspired to recover, and the Archduke designed to preserve. The Stockach, a small river, flows with many sinuosities before the town of that name, and ends its devious course in Lake Constance. On this stream the Archduke had taken up his position. He had his left between Nenzingen and Wahlwies upon certain eminences, and behind one of the windings of the Stockach; his centre was stationed on an elevated plateau called the Nellemberg, and in front of the Stockach; and his right upon the continuation of this plateau along the road leading from Stockach to Liptingen. Like the centre the latter also was in front of the Stockach. The extremity of this wing was covered by thick woods stretching along the Liptingen road. There were serious defects in this position. If the left had the Stockach before it, the centre and right had it behind them, and might be driven into it by an effort of the enemy. Besides, all the positions of the army had but one issue to the town of Stockach, and in the event of a forced retreat, the left, the centre, and the right, would all be accumulated on a single way and might be thrown by the entanglement into disastrous confusion. But the Archduke, in determining to cover Stockach, could take up no other position, and necessity formed his excuse. He had to reproach himself with only two actual faults: one in not having reared some works to protect his centre and his right; another in having taken too many precautions on his left, which was sufficiently protected by the river. It was his extreme anxiety to preserve the important point of Stockach that led him thus to distribute his forces. He possessed, at the same time, the advantage of an immense numerical superiority.

Jourdan was partly ignorant of the Archduke's dispositions, for nothing is more difficult than reconnaissances, especially in a country so circumstanced as that in which the two armies were acting. He still occupied the apex of the angle formed by the Danube and Lake Constance, from Tuttlingen to Steusslingen. This was a line of considerable extent, and the nature of the country, which scarcely permitted a rapid concentration, rendered it an inconvenience of serious moment. He ordered General Ferino, who commanded his right at Steusslingen, to march on Wahlwies, and Souham, who commanded the centre at Eigeltingen, to move on Nenzingen. These two generals were to unite their efforts to dislodge the left and centre of the Archduke by passing the Stockach and scaling the Nellemberg. Jourdan then proposed to push his left, his vanguard and his reserve, on the point of Liptingen, with the view of penetrating through the woods which sheltered the right of the Archduke, and carrying its position. These combinations had the merit of centring the largest mass of troops against the right wing of the Archduke, which was the most exposed. Unfortunately the different columns of the army held points of departure too far asunder. To act upon Liptingen, the vanguard and reserve had to start from Emingen, and the left from Tuttlingen, at the distance of a day's march. This separation was the more dangerous, because the French army, about 36,000 men strong, was at least a third weaker than the Archduke's.

On the morning of the 5th Germinal (25th March), the two armies met. The French army was marching to a battle, the Austrian to a reconnaissance. The Austrians, having broken ground before the French, surprised their advanced guards, but were speedily repulsed on all points by the bulk of their divisions. Ferino on the right, and Souham in the centre, penetrated to Wahlwies, Orsingen, Nenzingen, to the margin of the Stockach, and to the foot of the Nellemberg, drove back the Austrians into the positions they occupied in the morning, and prepared to commence the serious attack on those positions. They had to breast the Stockach and storm the Nellemberg. A heavy cannonade thundered along the whole line.

On the French left, the success was still more prompt and complete. The vanguard, now commanded by General Soult, in consequence of a wound received by Lefebvre, repelled the Austrians who had advanced as far as Emingen, chased them through Liptingen, put them to rout in the plain, pursued them with unrelenting ardour, and hunted them through the woods. These woods were the same that covered the Austrian right; by following up their attack the French might have forced it into the ravine of the Stockach and occasioned it a terrible disaster. But it was clear that this wing would be reinforced at the expense of the centre and left, and that a large mass of troops must be brought to bear upon it. Therefore, the vanguard, reserve, and left should all, as in the original plan, have been made to converge on this one point. Unhappily, General Jourdan, inflated with the easy success he had gained, attempted to achieve too extensive an object, and instead of joining Saint-Cyr in the movement, he ordered that general to make a long circuit with the view of hemming-in the Austrians and cutting off their retreat. In this he showed himself too eager to reap the fruits of victory before the victory was won. Jourdan retained on the decisive point only the vanguard division and the reserve commanded by Hautpoult.

Meanwhile, the Austrian right, seeing the woods which covered it forced by the enemy, faced round and disputed with extreme tenacity the road from Liptingen to Stockach, which traverses those woods. The battle was raging with fury, when the Archduke came up in all haste. Discerning the danger with intuitive quickness, he withdrew the grenadiers and cuirassiers from the centre and left, and moved them rapidly to his right. He disregarded the manœuvre of Saint-Cyr on his rear, sensible that if he repulsed Jourdan, Saint-Cyr would only be the more compromised, and resolved to confine himself to a decisive effort upon the point actually menaced.

The possession of the woods was contested with extraordinary obstinacy. The French, greatly inferior in number, resisted with a courage which the Archduke calls admirable; but the prince at last charged in person with some battalions on the Liptingen road and forced the French to give way. They lost the woods, and ultimately found themselves on the uncovered plain of Liptingen, whence they had started. Jourdan had sent to crave succour from Saint-Cyr, but the opportunity had been forfeited. His reserve still remained, and he determined to risk a charge of cavalry to recover his lost advantages. He darted four regiments of cavalry in a simultaneous charge. Stopped by a counter-charge made opportunely at the same moment by the Archduke's cuirassiers, this attempt was not crowned with success. Frightful confusion ensued over the plain of Liptingen. After performing prodigies of valour, the French dispersed. General Jourdan made heroic exertions to arrest the fugitives; he was himself borne along. Nevertheless, the Austrians, exhausted by the prolonged struggle, ventured not to pursue them.

The day was over. Ferino and Souham had maintained themselves, but had forced neither the centre nor the left of the Austrians. Saint-Cyr was hovering on their rear. The battle cannot be said to have been lost: the French, inferior by a third, had everywhere kept the field and displayed transcendent courage; but with their numerical disparity, and the isolation of their different corps, not to have conquered was to be defeated. It became necessary immediately to recall Saint-Cyr, rally the discomfited vanguard and reserve, and draw in the centre and right. Jourdan issued orders in accordance, and especially urged Saint-Cyr to fall back with all possible promptitude. The situation of the latter was very perilous; but he effected his retreat with the decision which always distinguished him, and regained the Danube without accident. The loss was about equal on both sides, in killed, wounded, and prisoners. It amounted to from four to five thousand men.

After this calamitous event, the French could no longer keep the field, and they must of necessity seek shelter behind a strong barrier. Should they retire into Switzerland, or upon the Rhine? It was evident that by retiring into Switzerland they might join the army under Massena, and by such junction be enabled again to assume a formidable attitude. General Jourdan, unfortunately, deemed it incumbent to act otherwise; he trembled for the line of the Rhine, on which Bernadotte had not yet collected above seven or eight thousand men, and he determined to fall back to the entrance of the defiles of the Black Forest. He there took up a position which he considered a strong one, and, leaving the command to his chief of the staff, Ernoulf, departed for Paris to complain in person of the inferiority under which his army had laboured. The result spoke more loudly than all the complaints he could urge, and it had been better to have remained with his army than repair to Paris for such a purpose.

Most fortunately the Aulic Council commanded the Archduke to commit an egregious blunder, which partly retrieved the French disaster. If the Archduke, pushing his advantages, had pursued energetically the conquered army, he might have thrown it into complete disorder and perhaps destroyed it. He would have had afterwards sufficient time to return into Switzerland to attack Massena, deprived of all assistance, reduced to his 30,000 men, and involved in the highest valleys of the Alps. It would not have been impossible to cut him off from France altogether. But the Aulic Council prohibited the Archduke from proceeding towards the Rhine before Switzerland was evacuated: still engrossed by the fixed idea that the key to the theatre of war was in the mountains.

Whilst these events were passing in Suabia, the war was still actively prosecuted in the Upper Alps. Massena acting towards the sources of the Rhine, Lecourbe towards those of the Inn, and Dessoles towards those of the Adige, had encountered about equalized successes. Beyond the Rhine, a little above the point at which it flows into Lake Constance, lay a position of great importance to carry, namely that of Feldkirch. Massena strained all his energies to accomplish the object, but was foiled with the loss of more than 3,000 men. On the other hand, Lecourbe at Taufers, and Dessoles at Nauders, fought two brilliant engagements, which availed to each from three to four thousand prisoners, and amply compensated the check at Feldkirch. Thus the French, by their activity and hardihood, preserved the superiority in the Alps.

Operations commenced in Italy the very day succeeding the battle of Stockach. The French had received about 30,000 conscripts, which raised the gross amount of their forces in Italy to nearly 116,000 men. These were distributed in the following manner: 30,000 veteran troops under Macdonald guarded Rome and Naples. The 30,000 young soldiers garrisoned the fortresses. There remained 56,000 men under Scherer. Of these, 5,000 had been detached under General Gautier to occupy Tuscany, and 5,000 under General Dessoles to act in the Valteline. There were 46,000 men therefore left with Scherer to combat on the Adige, the grand and essential point, where the entire mass of the forces ought to have been agglomerated. Besides the evil of so small a force on this decisive point, there was another not less fatal to the French. The general inspired no confidence; he was too old, as we have said; he had moreover aroused an acrimonious feeling against him during his ministry. Of this he was himself sensible, and had accepted the command with reluctance. He crept stealthily at nights about the tents to listen to the discourses of the soldiers, and gather with his own ears the evidences of his unpopularity. These were circumstances of unfavourable augury at the opening of a great and difficult campaign.

Suwarrov and Melas were intended to command the Austrians. In the meantime they obeyed the Baron von Kray, one of the best of the imperial generals. Even before the arrival of the Russians they mustered 85,000 men in Upper-Italy. Nearly 60,000 were already on the Adige. To both armies orders had been given to assume the offensive. The Austrians were instructed to debouch from Verona, skirt the base of the mountains and advance beyond the river, masking all the fortresses. This movement was designed to support that of the army of the Tyrol in the mountains.

Scherer's injunctions were simply to pass the Adige. This was a difficult commission, for the Austrians possessed all the advantages of that line. It is sufficiently known from the campaign of 1796. Verona and Legnago, which command it, were held by the Austrians. To throw over a bridge on any given point was a very hazardous enterprise, since the Austrians, having Verona and Legnago, might debouch on the flank of the army engaged in attempting a passage. The safest plan, if express orders had not been given to take the offensive, would have been to let the enemy debouch beyond the river, await him on chosen ground, there join battle, and profit by the consequences of victory to cross the Adige in his wake.

Constrained to take the initiative, Scherer hesitated upon the best plan to adopt, and finally decided in favour of an attack on his left. The position of Rivoli, in the mountains, at the entrance of the Tyrol and considerably above Verona, is doubtless well remembered. The Austrians had intrenched all the approaches to it, and formed a camp at Pastrengo. Scherer resolved to dislodge them from this camp in the first instance, and drive them in that direction beyond the Adige. The three divisions of Serrurier, Delmas, and Grenier, were selected for this service. Moreau, become a simple general of division under Scherer, was appointed, with the two divisions of Hatry and Victor, to threaten Verona. General Montrichard, with a division, was detached to make a demonstration on Legnago. This distribution of forces betokened the uncertainty and obscure perception of the general-in-chief.

The attack was made on the 6th Germinal (29th March), the morrow of the battle of Stockach. The three divisions, charged to assail on divers points the camp of Pastrengo, stormed it with an intrepidity worthy of the old army of Italy, and captured Rivoli. They took 1,500 prisoners from the Austrians and several pieces of ordnance. The latter repassed the Adige in all haste over a bridge they had constructed at Polo, and which they had time to destroy. In the centre, under the walls of Verona, a sanguinary struggle occurred for the villages lying in front of that city. Kaim displayed a fruitless pertinacity in defending and retaking them. That of Massimo was taken and retaken no less than seven times. Moreau, not less determined than his adversary, allowed him to gain no advantage, and cooped him up in Verona. Montrichard in making a useless demonstration on Legnago incurred great danger. Kray, deceived by false intelligence, had imagined that the French proposed to direct their principal effort on the Lower-Adige: he had therefore moved a great part of his forces to that point, and by debouching from Legnago placed Montrichard in imminent peril. Happily, the latter was enabled to cover himself by the accidents of the ground, and prudently recoiled on Moreau.

The events of the day had been bloodily contested, but in the end terminated wholly to the advantage of the French on the left and in the centre. The loss of the French might be estimated, in killed, wounded, and prisoners, at 4,000, and that of the Austrians at 8,000 at least. Still, notwithstanding the advantages the French had obtained, the results they entailed were of inconsiderable value. At Verona they had merely compelled the Austrians to confine themselves within the walls; above Verona, it is true, they had driven them over the Adige and gained the means of passing it by restoring the bridge of Polo; but it was unfortunately of questionable utility to pass the Adige at that point. We recollect the road which skirts the farther bank of the river leads through Verona, and that there is no other outlet into the plain. Hence to cross the Adige at Polo was little better than fruitless, since Verona stood directly in the way after it was passed, and must, as in the position of Moreau in the centre, be first carried. If, indeed, on the very day, the disorder of the Austrians after losing the camp of Pastrengo had been profited by and the bridge of Polo rapidly re-established, perhaps the city might have been entered at the heels of the fugitives, especially under favour of the obstinate conflict maintained by Moreau, on the other side of the Adige, against the Imperial General Kaim.

Nothing of that kind however had been attempted. The omission might have been repaired by operating energetically on the following day and moving the mass of the army before Verona and above, by the bridge of Polo. But Scherer wavered for three successive days touching the course he ought to adopt. He sent in quest of a route beyond the Adige permitting the evasion of Verona. The army was indignant at this indecision, and loudly complained of the successes obtained in the engagements of the 6th (26th) being turned to no account. At last, on the 9th Germinal (29th March), a council of war was held, and Scherer made up his mind to act. He conceived the singular design of throwing Serrurier's division over the Adige by the bridge of Polo, and bearing the bulk of his army between Verona and Legnago, there to attempt the passage of the river. To effect this latter purpose, he draughted two divisions from his left to his right, ordering them round behind the centre, and exposing them to needless fatigues over broken roads utterly destroyed by the rains.

On the 10th Germinal (30th March), this new scheme was put in operation. Serrurier, with his division six thousand strong, crossed the Adige at Polo alone, whilst the bulk of the army diverged lower down between Verona and Legnago. The fate of Serrurier's division it was not difficult to foretell. Fixed, after passing the Adige, on a route blocked by Verona and forming thus a sort of cul-de-sac,* it was exposed to great hazards. Kray, noting well its situation, directed against it a body of troops triple in number, and vigorously repulsed it to the bridge of Polo. Confusion spread through its ranks, and the other side of the river was regained only in disorder. Some detachments were obliged to cut their way, and 1,500 remained prisoners. On being apprized of this reverse, which was inevitable, Scherer contented himself with rallying the discomfited division and drawing it near the Lower-Adige, where he had now concentrated the greatest part of his forces.

Several days again elapsed in mutual hesitation. Eventually Kray formed a determination, and resolved, whilst Scherer was planting himself on the Lower-Adige, to debouch in mass from Verona, bear down upon the flank of Scherer and inclose him between the Lower-Adige and the sea. The idea was good; but luckily an intercepted order disclosed to Moreau the plan of the Austrian general. He hastened to warn his commander of the danger, and urged him to wheel back his divisions and make front on the side of Verona, whence the enemy proposed to debouch.

It was in executing this movement that the two armies met on the 16th Germinal (5th April), in the vicinity of Magnano. The divisions of Victor and Grenier, forming the right towards the Adige, ascended the river by San-Giovanni and Tomba, with the intention of advancing to Verona. They overthrew Mercantin's division, which opposed their progress, and entirely cut to pieces Wartensleben's regiment. These two divisions accordingly arrived almost abreast of Verona, and were in a capacity to accomplish their object, which was to intercept from the city the forces Kray had sent out. Delmas' division, which was to act in the centre, towards Butta-Preda and Magnano, was too backward, and allowed the Austrian division under Kaim to advance to Butta-Preda, and thus to form a salient point in the middle of the French line. But Moreau, with the divisions of Serrurier, Hatry, and Montrichard, moved forward victoriously on the left. He ordered Montrichard's division to change front, and face round to Butta-Preda, the post at which the enemy had made a point, and marched with his two other divisions on Dazano. Delmas, having ultimately reached Butta-Preda, assisted to cover the French line, and at this moment victory seemed to declare for the French, since their right, completely victorious on the side of the Adige, threatened to cut off the retreat of the Austrians upon Verona.

Meanwhile Kray, judging that the essential point was on the French right, and that the chance of success on the other points must be relinquished to make sure of it there, turned in that direction the great bulk of his forces. He had an advantage over Scherer in the proximity of his divisions, which allowed him to displace them with facility. The French divisions, on the contrary, were far distant from each other, and engaged on a ground intersected by numerous enclosures. Kray fell suddenly with his whole reserve on Grenier's division. Victor would have flown to its succour, but he was himself charged by the regiments of Nadasty and Reisky. Kray was not satisfied with his great superiority. He had caused Mercantin's division, beaten in the morning, to be rallied in the rear; he darted it afresh on the two divisions of Grenier and Victor, and thus decided their defeat. Despite a vigorous resistance they were obliged to abandon the field of battle. The right being routed, the French centre became menaced. Kray failed not to move upon it; but Moreau was there for its protection, and prevented him from pursuing his advantage.

* [Literally, a blind alley.]

The battle was evidently lost and a retreat necessary. The loss had been considerable on both sides. The Austrians had 3,000 killed or wounded, and 2,000 prisoners. The French had an equal number of killed and wounded, but they had lost 4,000 prisoners. General Pigeon, who during the first Italian campaign had displayed in the vanguards so much talent and intrepidity, was upon this occasion mortally wounded.

Moreau proposed to sleep on the field of battle in order to avoid the confusion of a nocturnal retreat, but Scherer resolved to fall back the same evening. On the morrow he retired behind the Molinella, and on the following day, the 18th Germinal (7th April), on the Mincio. Resting on Peschiera on one side and Mantua on the other, he might have offered a vigorous resistance, recalled Macdonald from the Peninsula, and, by this concentration of forces, regained the superiority forfeited on the field of Magnano. But the unfortunate Scherer had entirely lost his head. His soldiers were worse disposed towards him than ever. Masters for three years of Italy, they were exasperated at beholding it wrested from their possession, and they ascribed their reverses solely to the incapacity of the general who commanded them. It is certain that, on their part, they had fought as well as in the brightest days of their glory. The reproaches of his army tended to disconcert Scherer as much as his defeat. Despairing of maintaining himself on the Mincio, he retired upon the Oglio, and thence upon the Adda, where he arrived on the 12th April. It seemed uncertain where his retrograde movement would stop.

Six weeks had scarcely elapsed since the campaign was opened, and already the French were in retreat on all points. Ernouff, whom Jourdan had left in command of the army of the Danube at the mouth of the defiles of the Black Forest, had taken alarm on hearing of some light troops hovering upon one of his wings, and retired in disorder upon the Rhine. Thus, in Germany as in Italy, the French armies, though brave as ever, lost nevertheless all their advantages, and returned defeated to the frontiers. It was only in Switzerland they had preserved their fame. There, Massena maintained himself with all the pertinacity of his character, and, save the abortive attempt on Feldkirch, had been invariably successful. But, established on the salient angle formed by Switzerland between Germany and Italy, he was placed between two victorious armies, and it became incumbent on him to retire. He had, in fact, given Lecourbe instructions to that effect, and he fell back into the interior of Switzerland, but with order, and preserving an imposing attitude.

The French arms were humbled, and certain of their ministers abroad were made the victims of a most detestable and atrocious outrage. War being declared against the Emperor, but not against the German Empire, the Congress of Rastadt had continued its session. It was on the point of settling the final subject in dispute, that concerning the debts; but two-thirds of the states had recalled their deputies. This was a consequence of the influence of Austria, who was naturally averse to the conclusion of peace. There remained at the Congress, therefore, only a few deputies from Germany, and the retreat of the army of the Danube having laid open the country, the deliberations were carried on amidst the Austrian troops. Hereupon the Austrian cabinet formed a villanous project, which long reflected deep disgrace upon its policy. It had reason to complain of the haughtiness and vigour displayed by the French ministers at Rastadt. It also imputed to them a revelation which had singularly compromised it in the eyes of the Germanic confederation; to wit, that of the secret articles arranged with Bonaparte for the occupation of Mayence. Those secret articles proved that, in order to gain Palma-Nuova in Friuli, the Austrian cabinet had surrendered Mayence, and betrayed, in a shameful manner, the interests of the Empire. Hence, it became highly incensed, and vowed vengeance against the French ministers. It had a further motive for seizing their papers; namely, to ascertain which of the German princes were then treating individually with the French republic. Thus it came to pass that it conceived the design of causing the French ministers to be arrested on their return to France, plundered, maltreated, and perhaps even assassinated. It has never been known, indeed, whether orders to assassinate them were positively given.

The French ministers already entertained some distrust, and, without apprehending an attempt against their persons, they were in dread concerning their correspondence. In fact, it was interrupted on the 30th Germinal (19th April), by the removal of the ferrymen who served to convey it. The French ministers reclaimed against this violence; the deputation of the Empire protested likewise, and inquired whether the Congress might deem itself in security. The Austrian officer to whom application was made returned an unsatisfactory answer. Thereupon the French ministers declared they would depart within three days, namely, on the 9th Floreal (28th April), for Strasburg; and added, they would remain in that city ready to renew the negotiations whenever the desire was testified. On the 7th Floreal a courier of the legation was stopped. Fresh reclamations were urged by the whole Congress, and it was expressly demanded whether the safety of the French ministers was considered inviolate. The Austrian colonel who commanded the Pandour hussars cantoned near Rastadt, replied by an order for the French ministers to depart within twenty-four hours. He was asked for an escort to accompany them, but he refused it, giving assurance that their persons would be respected. The three ministers, Jean Debry, Bonnier, and Roberjot, set out on the 9th Floreal (28th April), at nine o'clock in the evening. They occupied three carriages with their families. After them followed the Ligurian embassy, and the secretaries of legation. At first, difficulties were opposed to their leaving Rastadt, but eventually all obstacles were removed and they started. The night was dark and dismal. They had scarcely proceeded fifty paces from Rastadt ere a troop of Pandour hussars charged on them sword in hand, and arrested the carriages. That containing Jean Debry led the way. The hussars violently tore open the door, and inquired in a semi-barbarous jargon if he were Jean Debry. Upon his answering in the affirmative, they seized him by the throat, dragged him from the carriage, and, before the eyes of his wife and children, run him through with swords. Believing him dead, they passed to the other carriages, and slaughtered Bonnier and Roberjot in the arms of their families. The members of the Ligurian embassy and the secretaries of legation had time to save themselves. The brigands commissioned to perpetrate this outrage afterwards rifled the carriages, and carried off all the papers they contained.

Jean Debry had not been mortally wounded. The freshness of the night restored him to the use of his senses, and he trailed himself all bleeding to Rastadt. When this occurrence was known, it aroused the indignation of the inhabitants and the members of the Congress. German fidelity was horrified by a violation of the rights of nations unheard of amongst civilized communities, and which was conceivable only of a semi-barbarous court. The members of the deputation who remained at the Congress lavished on Jean Debry, and the families of the assassinated ministers, the most assiduous attentions. They subsequently assembled and drew up a declaration, in which they denounced the atrocity that had been committed, and repelled all suspicion of complicity with Austria. Intelligence of the crime being quickly circulated through Europe, it excited universal abhorrence. The Archduke Charles wrote a letter to Massena, announcing that he would cause the colonel of the hussars to be prosecuted; but this cold and formal epistle, which proved the embarrassment of the prince, was wholly unworthy of him and his character. Austria neither could nor attempted to answer the accusations directed against her.

Thus implacable was the war between the two systems which divided the world. The republican ministers, first unfavourably received, next insulted during a whole year of peace, came at last to be infamously assassinated, and with the ferocity hitherto esteemed characteristic only of barbarous tribes. The rights of nations, observed amongst the most bitter foes, were violated only with regard to them.

The unexpected reverses which marked the opening of the campaign, combined with the outrage at Rastadt, produced an impression extremely detrimental to the Directory. From the first moment of the declaration of war, the oppositions began to lose moderation; but they wholly discarded it when they beheld their armies defeated and their ministers murdered. The patriots, incensed by the system of secessions, the military dissatisfied at the curb placed upon their licentiousness, the royalists, concealing themselves behind malcontents of every quality,—all discontented partisans seized, by one consent, upon the late events to denounce the Directory. The armies, they said, had been entirely abandoned. The Directory had allowed their ranks to be thinned by desertion, and had used no activity to replenish them by means of the new conscription. It had retained in the interior a great number of veteran battalions, which, instead of being sent upon the frontier, were employed to control the freedom of elections; and to those armies, thus reduced to so disproportionate a strength compared with that of the enemy's, the Directory had furnished neither magazines nor provisions, nor accoutrements, nor means of transport, nor surplus horses. It had wickedly surrendered them to the rapacity of the administrations, who had fruitlessly consumed a revenue of six hundred millions. Moreover, it had made the worst selections of generals to command them. Championnet, the conqueror of Naples, was in duress for attempting to check the cupidity of the agents of the government. Moreau was degraded to the post of a mere general of division. Joubert, the victor of the Tyrol, and Augereau, one of the heroes of Italy, were without employment. Scherer, on the contrary, who had prepared the way for all these defeats by his administration, had the command of the army of Italy because he was the countryman and friend of Rewbell. Nor did they confine themselves within these bounds. Other names, too, were recalled with bitterness to the prejudice of the Directory. The illustrious Bonaparte, the brilliant Kleber and Desaix, his lieutenants, with their forty thousand companions in arms, the vanquishers of Austria, where were they? In Egypt, in a distant land, whither they had been sent to perish through the imprudence of the government, if not through its villany. For of this enterprise originally so extolled, it now began to be bruited that it was an evil device of the Directory to get rid of a celebrated warrior who caused it umbrage.

The arraigners of the government ascended yet higher; they upbraided it with the war itself; they accused it of having provoked hostilities by indiscretions towards the European powers. It had invaded Switzerland and overthrown the Pope and the court of Naples, thus rousing Austria to vindication, and all without being prepared to enter upon a struggle. By invading Egypt, it had driven the Porte to a rupture. By quarrelling with the Porte, it had delivered Russia from all fear of a diversion, and permitted her to send sixty thousand men into Germany. In short, fury reached such a pitch that the Directory was even charged with being the secret author of the assassination of Rastadt. It was a scheme planned, its accusers alleged, to stimulate opinion against the enemies of the country, and to obtain fresh grants from the legislative body,

These reproaches were repeated everywhere, from the tribune, in the journals, and in places of public resort. Jourdan had repaired in person to Paris to complain of the government and throw upon it the blame of all his disasters. Others of the generals who remained with their armies, had written to expose their grievances. There was an universal clamour and virulence, which might seem incomprehensible if the fury, and, above all, the inconsistency of parties were not well accredited.

By a very slight reference to facts, these accusations might be shown to be groundless. The Directory had not wilfully permitted the ranks of the armies to be thinned, for it had granted only twelve thousand furloughs: but it had been unable to prevent desertions in time of peace. No government in the world had yet succeeded in wholly preventing them. The Directory had even been accused of tyranny in attempting to oblige soldiers to rejoin their colours. It appeared harsh, in fact, to drag again from their homes men who had performed an arduous service of six years for the benefit of their country. The conscription had only been in existence five months, and there had been no opportunity, in so brief a period, of organizing that system of recruiting, and particularly no means of equipping and training the conscripts, of forming them into field-battalions, and of moving them in time into Holland, Germany, Switzerland, and Italy. A few veteran battalions had been retained in the country because they were indispensable to maintain tranquillity during the elections, and because that task could not be confided to young soldiers, whose spirit was not formed, nor their attachment to the republic sufficiently tested. A yet more important reason justified this precaution; namely, the state of La Vendée, still agitated by foreign emissaries, and the danger of Holland, menaced by an Anglo-Russian fleet.

Touching abuses in the administration, the offences of the Directory were not more real. There had been malversations, doubtless, but almost all to the advantage of those who now complained of them, and despite the strenuous exertions of the Directory. Malversation had prevailed in three forms: pillaging conquered countries, charging the state with the pay of soldiers who had deserted, and making disadvantageous contracts with the companies. Now all these were acts of peculation which the generals and staffs had committed, and by which they principally had profited. They had plundered conquered countries, appropriated a dishonest surplus upon the pay, and partaken the profits of the companies. We have seen that these latter sometimes allowed even forty per cent. upon their gains to obtain the protection of the staffs. Scherer, towards the close of his ministry, had quarrelled with his old comrades from the mere attempt to repress these spoliations. The Directory had been compelled, in the hope of putting an end to them, to appoint commissions independent of the staffs, and we have witnessed the reception given them by Championnet at Naples. Another cause existed for the onerous contracts made with the companies, arising from the situation of the finances. Promises only were given to the contractors, and they sought to indemnify themselves, through the price, for the uncertainty of the payment. The credits opened this year amounted to 600 millions of ordinary and 125 millions of extraordinary expenditure. Out of these sums the minister had already disbursed 400 millions for expenses incurred. Only 210 millions of these had as yet been received, so 190 had been provided by anticipations.

Hence there was no blame imputable to the Directory on account of the malversations. The selection of generals, excepting of one only, could not be made a legitimate ground of censure. After his conduct towards the commissioners sent to Naples, it was impossible to retain Championnet in his command. Besides Macdonald was quite equal to him as a general, and enjoyed a reputation for severe probity. Joubert and Bernadotte had both declined the command of the army of Italy, and had both joined in recommending Scherer. It was Barras who had repudiated Moreau, and it was he also who had alone urged the nomination of Scherer. With regard to Augereau, his demagogical turbulence was an adequate reason for refusing him a command, and, moreover, notwithstanding his incontestable qualities, he was not competent for a command-in-chief. Upon the charge respecting the expedition to Egypt we have seen how far the Directory was really guilty of it, and whether it had formed any design of exiling Bonaparte, Kleber, Desaix, and their forty thousand companions in arms. Larévellière-Lépeaux, we remember, had almost come to an open rupture with Bonaparte through his firmness in opposing the expedition.

The provocation to war was no more the act of the Directory than any other of the misfortunes. It has appeared sufficiently manifest that the war was solely owing to the incompatibility of the political passions which convulsed Europe. No person could be particularly charged with evoking it; but, at all events, the patriots and the military were the last parties to impeach the conduct of the Directory on the subject. What would the patriots have said if the Vaudois had not been supported, the Papal government chastised, the king of Naples overthrown, the king of Piedmont forced to abdicate? And had not the military in the army of Italy been continually urgent with the government for the occupation of additional countries? Had not tidings of the declaration of war filled them all with gladness? Moreover, were not Bernadotte at Vienna, and a brother of Bonaparte at Rome, the parties who had been guilty of indiscretions, if any such had been committed? The hostile determination of the Ottoman Porte had not influenced the conduct of Russia; but even if it had, the author of the Egyptian expedition alone deserved to be upbraided therewith.

The bulk of the accusations accumulated against the Directory was therefore altogether unjust and absurd. One reproach it undoubtedly merited, and that was the excessive confidence it reposed, in common with the patriots and military, in the power of the republic. Fired with revolutionary passions it had blindly yielded to their impulse. To commence the war it conceived 170,000 men would suffice, and relied implicitly on the decisive effect of the aggressive. Its plans were certainly bad, but not worse than those of Carnot in 1796, not worse than those of the Aulic Council, and were moreover partly based on a project of General Jourdan. One man only could have formed better, as we have already said, and it was not the fault of the Directory that that man had departed from Europe.

Still, although the spirit of equity enjoins the historian to expose the injustice of these reproaches, it is an evil day for a government when everything is imputed to it as a crime. One of the essential properties of a government is to possess a character sufficient to repel injustice. When it loses this, and the wrongs of others, and those even of fortune, are ascribed to it, it no longer enjoys the faculty of governing, and this impotency forebodes its dissolution. How many governments had been paralyzed since the commencement of the revolution! The action of France against Europe was so violent that the springs of government became necessarily weakened and successively broken. The Directory was effete, as had been the committee of public welfare, as was Napoleon himself at a later date. The accusations levelled against the Directory betokened, not its errors, but its decay.

At the same time, it is not surprising that five civil magistrates, raised to power, not on account of their hereditary rank or their personal greatness, but from a slight superiority of estimation over their fellow-citizens, magistrates armed only with the authority of the laws to contend against infuriated factions, to retain in subjection numerous armies and generals covered with glory and full of pretensions, to administer, in fine, the government of one-half of Europe, should appear inadequate to the crisis, amidst the terrible struggle now again to be sustained. The occurrence of a disaster only was needed to bring out this prostration in more full relief. The factions alternately defeated, and the military curbed in their licentiousness, called them contemptuously the lawyers, and asserted with one accord that France could not be governed by them.

By a singular obliquity, witnessed nevertheless occasionally in the conflict of revolutions, opinion was indulgent only towards one of the directors who had least deserved it. Barras, without question, solely merited the imputations against the Directory. In the first place he had taken no part in business, but had left the whole burden of affairs to his colleagues. Except in decisive moments, when he raised his voice, more vigorous than his courage, he absolutely did nothing. At all events he interfered merely in appointments, which best suited his intriguing disposition. He had participated in all the profits of the companies, and alone justified the reproach of malversation. He had always been the defender of the turbulent and of knaves; it was he who had supported Brune and commissioned Fouché in Italy. He was the cause of the unfortunate selection of generals, for he had opposed the nomination of Moreau, and strongly urged that of Scherer. Yet, notwithstanding all his grievous delinquencies, he affected to hold himself apart. He did not, like his four colleagues, come under the category of a lawyer; for his indolence, his dissolute habits, his military propensities, his relations with the Jacobins, the recollection of the 18th Fructidor, which was exclusively attributed to him, constituted him in appearance a man of execution, more capable of governing than his colleagues. The patriots found in him many points of resemblance with themselves, and believed he was in heart devoted to them. The royalists were cajoled by his secret promises. The staffs, whom he flattered and protected against the just severity of his colleagues, held him in considerable favour. The contractors applauded him too, and in this manner he contrived to escape the general odium. He even acted perfidiously towards his colleagues, for all the opprobrium he himself merited, he had the address to fix upon them alone. Such a part cannot be long successful, but it may for a time: it succeeded on this occasion.

The animosity of Barras against Rewbell has been mentioned. The latter, a truly able administrator, had offended, by his surliness and pride, all who came in contact with him. He had evinced a repulsive sternness towards men of business, towards all the creatures of Barras, and particularly towards the military, and had thus earned very general detestation. He was upright, albeit somewhat penurious. Barras had the cunning, in his own society, which was very numerous, to direct hateful suspicions against him. An unfortunate accident contributed to accredit them. The agent of the Directory in Switzerland, Rapinat, chanced to be the brother-in-law of Rewbell. In Switzerland exactions had been practised as in all the other conquered countries, but to a far less extent than elsewhere. Yet the vociferous complaints of its parsimonious population had occasioned much scandal. Rapinat had executed the invidious commission of placing seals upon the coffers and exchequer of Berne; he had likewise treated with superciliousness the Helvetian government. These circumstances, and his peculiar name, which was unhappy, conduced to brand him as the Verres of Switzerland, and as the author of peculations in which he had no concern; for he had in fact quitted Switzerland before the work of spoliation had grown to a height. But in the society of Barras poor and malicious puns were fabricated on his name, all which passed current, and recoiled on Rewbell, whose brother-in-law he was. Thus the probity of Rewbell himself became obnoxious to calumny.

Larévellière, from his inflexible severity, and the influence he had exercised over the affairs of Italy, had rendered himself equally distasteful with Rewbell. His mode of life, however, was so simple and modest that it was impossible to cast suspicion upon his honesty. The society of Barras, therefore, assailed him with ridicule. His personal peculiarities were mocked, and his pretensions to a new papacy jeered. He was taunted with a scheme to found the religion of Theophilanthropy, of which he was in truth not the author. Merlin and Treilhard, though less old in the possession of power, and less in view than Rewbell and Larévellière, were, nevertheless, involved in the same unpopularity.

Such was the inclination of public feeling when the elections of the year VII. occurred, which proved to be the last. The patriots, fermenting with wrath, were determined not to be excluded from the legislative body this year as in the preceding. They vehemently protested against the system of secessions, and strove to anathematize it in advance. They were so far successful that it was not again attempted to be put in practice. In that state of excitement when adversaries are suspected of entertaining every design that is dreaded, they asserted that the Directory, using as on the 18th Fructidor extraordinary means, intended to prolong for five years the powers of the actual deputies, and to suspend, during the whole of that interval, the exercise of electoral rights. They alleged, moreover, that Swiss were to be brought into Paris, the ground of the accusation being that the organization of the Helvetian contingent was commenced. They raised also a loud clamour touching a circular to the electors issued by the commissary of the government (the prefect) in the department of the Sarthe. This was not such a circular as we have witnessed since, but simply an exhortation. The Directory was constrained to disavow it by a message. The elections, made in these dispositions, elevated to the legislative body a considerable number of patriots. No endeavour was hazarded this year to exclude them, and their return was confirmed. General Jourdan, who had good reason to ascribe his reverses to the numerical inferiority of his army, but none to charge the government, as he was weak enough to do, with a desire to ruin him, was again chosen to the legislative body, and took his seat animated with the bitterest resentment against the Directory. Augereau was likewise returned, with an increased growth of bile and truculence.

According to the constitution a new director also was to be chosen. On this occasion fortune declared against the republic, for, instead of Barras, Rewbell, the most efficient of the five directors, drew the lot to retire. His mischance afforded, however, the utmost satisfaction to all his enemies, and supplied a fresh opportunity of reviling him with greater impunity. But, as he had been elected to the Council of Ancients, he seized an occasion of replying to his detractors, and did so in the most triumphant manner.

The retreat of Rewbell was signalized by the only breach of the rigorous laws of probity with which the Directory could be reproached. The first five directors, nominated at the institution of the Directory, had made an agreement amongst themselves to deduct from their salaries each 10,000 francs as a contribution for the benefit of the retiring member. The object of that noble sacrifice was to soothe the transition from supreme power to private life, especially to such of the Directory as were destitute of fortune. There was also a motive of dignity if not of policy in thus acting, for it was apt to endanger the consideration of government the spectacle of a man reduced to indigence who a day or two ago had wielded the supreme executive. This very reason now induced the directors to provide in a yet more substantial manner for their seceding colleagues. Their salaries were so moderate that a deduction of 10,000 francs appeared excessive. They resolved therefore to allocate a sum of 100,000 francs to each retiring director. This involved an extra charge upon the state of one hundred thousand francs per annum. This sum was to be drawn from the minister of finance, who might provide it from one of the numberless surplusses so easily eked out in budgets of six or eight hundred millions. It was decided, moreover, that each director should take with him his carriage and horses. As the legislative body allowed every year a sum for travelling expenses, this was a charge to be avowed and so rendered legitimate. The directors also resolved that what was saved out of the allowance for travelling expenses should be divided amongst them. This assuredly was but a small inroad upon the public fortune, if it were one at all; and whilst generals and companies made such enormous profits, 100,000 francs per annum, devoted to the sustenance of men so recently clothed with the high functions of government, were far from constituting a serious robbery. The motives and the form of the measure, it must be allowed, excused it in some sort. Larévellière, when it was communicated to him, refused to consent to it. He declared to his colleagues he would never accept his portion. Rewbell received his however. The 100,000 francs that were paid him were taken from the two millions of secret service-money, of the appropriation whereof the Directory was not bound to give any account. Such is the solitary offence with which the Directory can be upbraided collectively. One of its members, out of the twelve who succeeded each other, was accused of engrossing illegitimate profits. Where is the government in the wide world of which the same thing may not be predicated?

A successor was to be found in place of Rewbell. It was desirable to select a person of high reputation to give some consideration to the Directory, and attention was turned to Sieyes, whose name, after that of Bonaparte, was the most important of the epoch. His embassy to Prussia had added to his renown. He had already been considered, and very justly, as a man of profound understanding; but since his mission to Berlin, he was esteemed the preserver of the Prussian neutrality, which, sooth to say, was less due to his intervention than to the situation of that power. Thus he had come to be regarded as a man equally capable of directing a government as of devising a constitution. He was accordingly elected to the vacant directorship. Many individuals viewed this choice as a confirmation of the rumour generally circulated of intended modifications in the constitution. These contended that Sieyes was called to the Directory merely for the purpose of aiding in the concoction of these modifications. So little trust was placed in the stability of the existing state of things that certain indications of change were detected in every occurrence.

CHAPTER LX.

CONTINUATION OF THE CAMPAIGN OF 1799; MASSENA COMBINES THE COMMAND OF THE ARMIES OF HELVETIA AND THE DANUBE, AND OCCUPIES THE LINE OF THE LIMMAT.—ARRIVAL OF SUWARROV IN ITALY.—SCHERER TRANSFERS THE COMMAND TO MOREAU.—BATTLE OF CASSANO.—RETREAT OF MOREAU.—ATTEMPT TO JOIN THE ARMY OF NAPLES; BATTLE OF THE TREBBIA.—COALITION OF ALL PARTIES AGAINST THE DIRECTORY.—REVOLUTION OF THE 30TH PRAIRIAL.

AMID the turmoil of the domestic events last narrated, the Directory had not intermitted its efforts to retrieve the disasters which had darkened the opening of the campaign. Jourdan had forfeited the command of the army of the Danube, and Massena had received the command-in-chief of all the troops stationed from Düsseldorf to Mount Saint-Gothard. This fortunate appointment was destined to save France. Scherer, anxious to quit an army whose confidence he had lost, had obtained permission to transfer the command to Moreau. To Macdonald pressing orders had been sent to evacuate the kingdom of Naples and the Roman States, and to effect a junction with the army of Upper-Italy. All the veteran battalions hitherto retained in the interior were marched to the frontiers; the equipment and organization of the conscripts were accelerated, and reinforcements forwarded to all points.

The moment Massena was nominated commander-in-chief of the armies of the Rhine and Switzerland, he took steps to dispose advantageously the troops confided to him. He could not have assumed the command at a more critical conjuncture. He had at the utmost 30,000 men, scattered over Switzerland from the valley of the Inn to Basle; opposed to him were 30,000 men under Bellegarde in the Tyrol, 28,000 under Hotze in the Voralberg, and 40,000 under the Archduke between Lake Constance and the Danube. This mass of nearly one hundred thousand men might, it seemed, at any time, envelope and annihilate him. If the Archduke had not been thwarted by the Aulic Council or retained by illness, and had crossed the Rhine between Lake Constance and the Aar, he might have intercepted Massena from France, surrounded and destroyed him. Fortunately he was not unshackled in his movements; fortunately also Bellegarde and Hotze had not been placed immediately under his orders. A continual estrangement prevailed amongst the three generals, which prevented them acting in concert for a decisive operation.

These circumstances favoured Massena, and permitted him to take up a solid position and to distribute appropriately the forces placed at his disposal. All indications tended to prove that the Archduke proposed merely to observe the line of the Rhine on the side of Alsace, and to operate in Switzerland between Schaffhausen and the Aar. In consequence, Massena moved the greatest part of the army of the Danube into Switzerland, and assigned to it positions it ought to have taken at first, that is to say, immediately after the battle of Stockach. He had committed the error of leaving Lecourbe too long engaged in the Engadine. That general had been obliged to retreat, after sustaining sundry brilliant encounters, in which he manifested an admirable intrepidity and presence of mind. The Grisons were evacuated. Thereupon Massena disposed his army between the great chain of the Alps and the confluence of the Aar with the Rhine, choosing the line which seemed to him the best.

Switzerland presents several lines of water, which, starting from the Great Alps, traverse it throughout and end eventually on the Rhine. The largest and most distended is that of the Rhine itself, which, taking its source not far from Saint-Gothard, flows at first to the north, then expands into a vast lake,* from which it issues near to Stein, and turns west to Basle, where it recommences to run north, forming the frontier of Alsace. This line is the most extensive and embraces all Switzerland. There is a second, that of Zurich, included within the first; it is formed by the Lint, which, taking its rise in the small cantons, stops to form the lake of Zurich, leaves it under the name of the Limmat, and finishes its course in the Aar, not far from the embouchure of this latter river in the Rhine. This line, which embraces only a portion of Switzerland, is much more contracted than that of the Rhine. There is yet a third, that of the Reuss, contained still within the second, which, from the bed of the Reuss, passes into Lake Lucerne, whence it proceeds into the Aar, in close proximity to the point where the Limmat joins that river. These lines, commencing on the right at the base of enormous mountains, and terminating on the left in large rivers, consisting now in streams, now in lakes, offer numerous advantages for acting on the defensive. Massena could not hope to defend the most extensive, that of the Rhine, and stretch from Saint-Gothard to the mouth of the Aar. He was obliged to recoil on that of the Limmat, where he consolidated himself in massive form. He planted his right wing, composed of the three divisions of Lecourbe, Menard, and Lorge, between the Alps and the lake of Zurich, under the orders of Ferino. He fixed his centre on the Limmat, and constituted it with the four divisions of Oudinot, Vandamme, Thureau, and Soult. His left guarded the Rhine, towards Basle and Strasburg.

Before intrenching himself in this position, Massena attempted by a battle to prevent the junction of the Archduke with Hotze. Those two generals, both stationed on the Rhine, the one above the entrance of the river into Lake Constance, the other below its issue therefrom, were separated by the whole extent of the lake. In leaving this line to establish themselves before that of Zurich and the Limmat, where Massena was placed, they must start from the two extremities of the lake to effect their junction beyond it. Massena might seize the moment when Hotze had not yet advanced to fall upon the Archduke, drive him over the Rhine, afterwards wheel back on Hotze and repulse him in his turn. It is calculated he would have had time to execute this double movement, and to defeat separately the two Austrian commanders. Unhappily, he did not think of attacking them until they were almost in a position to support each other. He engaged them on several points on the 5th Prairial (24th May), at Aldenfingen and at Frauenfeld, and although he had everywhere the advantage, from the vigour he always displayed in action, he could not prevent the junction, and he was constrained to fall back on the line of the Limmat and Zurich, where he prepared to give the Archduke a spirited reception, in case that prince decided to attack him.

* The lake of Constance.

Events wore a far more sinister complexion in Italy. There disaster took no pause.

Suwarrov had joined the Austrian army with a corps of twenty-eight or thirty thousand Russians. Melas had assumed the command of the Austrian army. Suwarrov commanded in chief the two armies amounting at least to 90,000 men. He was designated the Invincible. He was renowned for his campaigns against the Turks, and his cruelties in Poland. He possessed a remarkable strength of character, and an affected eccentricity pushed to the verge of insanity, but no capacity for combination. He was a true barbarian, luckily incompetent to discern the proper employment of his forces, for otherwise the republic might perhaps have fallen. His army was the counterpart of himself. Singularly brave, tinged with fanaticism, but devoid of instruction. Artillery, cavalry, engineers, were reduced to an absolute nullity. The bayonet alone was used by it, used as the French had employed it during the revolution. Suwarrov was overbearing towards his allies, and gave the Austrians Russian officers to teach them to handle the bayonet. He held very insulting language respecting them, saying that women, fops, and idlers might quit the army, that tattlers, presuming to criticise the sovereign service should be deemed egotists and lose their grades, and that everybody must be prepared to sacrifice himself to rid Italy of the French and the atheists. Such was the style of his discourses. Fortunately, after inflicting upon the French infinite mischief, this brutal energy was doomed to encounter an artistic and considerate energy, and to be crushed before it.

Scherer, having entirely lost the use of his faculties, had retired precipitately upon the Adda amidst the indignant exclamations of his soldiers. Of his army of 46,000 men, he had lost 10,000 in killed and prisoners. He was obliged to leave 8,000 more at Peschiera and Mantua, and thus only 28,000 finally remained with him. Still, even with this handful of men, if he had known how to manœuvre skilfully, he might have gained time for Macdonald to join him and obviated many calamities. But he planted himself on the Adda in the most unfavourable manner. He divided his army into three divisions. The division of Serrurier was at Lecco, at the issue of the Adda from the Lake of Lecco. Grenier's division was at Cassano, Victor's at Lodi. Montrichard was stationed with some light corps towards the Modenese and the mountains of Genoa, to maintain the communications with Tuscany, by which Macdonald was to arrive. His 28,000 men, thus dispersed over a line twenty-four leagues in extent, could offer no substantial resistance on any point and must be routed wherever the enemy should attack in force.

On the evening of the 8th Floreal (27th April), at the very moment the line of the Adda was forced, Scherer resigned to Moreau the command of the army. That excellent general had good reason to refuse it. He had been degraded to the rank of a simple divisionary, and now that the campaign was lost, that there was nothing but disasters to sustain, the command-in-chief was given to him. However, with a patriotic devotedness which history cannot too highly extol, he accepted discomfiture by accepting the command on the very evening the Adda was forced. Here commences the least eulogized but fairest portion of his life.

Suwarrov had approached the Adda upon several points. When the first Russian regiment appeared in sight of the bridge of Lecco, the carabineers of the brave 18th light infantry sallied from the intrenchments, and intrepidly confronted the soldiers who were described as such awful and invincible giants. They charged upon them with fixed bayonets and executed a prodigious slaughter. The Russians were repulsed. This success fired the French troops with exalted courage; they vowed to make the insolent barbarians, who had come so far to interfere in a quarrel wholly foreign to them, bitterly repent their journey. The nomination of Moreau also tended to exhilarate all hearts and inspire the army with confidence. Unfortunately, the position was no longer tenable. Suwarrov, repulsed at Lecco, succeeded in passing the Adda upon two points, at Brivio and Trezzo, above and below Serrurier's division, which formed the left. That division was thus cut off from the rest of the army. Moreau with Grenier's division, commenced a furious combat at Trezzo, to repel the enemy beyond the Adda, and recover his communication with Serrurier. He engaged with eight or nine thousand men a body of more then twenty thousand. His soldiers, animated by his presence, performed prodigies of valour, but were unable to drive the enemy over the Adda. Unluckily, Serrurier, to whom it was impossible to send orders, had not the wit to move upon this identical point of Trezzo, where Moreau so obstinately contended to restore the communication with him. It was eventually found necessary to forego the endeavour and abandon Serrurier's division to its fate. It was surrounded by the whole hostile army, but fought with the tenacity of despair. Hemmed in at length on all sides, it was obliged to lay down its arms. Part of the division, through the hardihood and presence of mind of an officer, contrived to escape by the mountains into Piedmont. During this terrible conflict, Victor had fortunately retired to the rear with his division intact. Such was the fatal encounter called the battle of Cassano, fought on the 9th Floreal (28th April), which diminished the army to about 20,000 men.

It was with this diminutive force Moreau undertook to execute a retreat. This admirable commander lost not for an instant that calmness of mind with which nature had endowed him. Reduced to 20,000 soldiers, in presence of an army which might have been raised to 90,000, if its leaders had understood how to march in mass, he preserved his serenity unbroken. This composure was more commendable than that he displayed when he returned from Germany with a victorious army of 60,000 men; and yet it has been much less celebrated, so greatly do the accidents of passion influence the judgment of contemporaries.

His primary care was to cover Milan, in order to afford opportunity for removing the magazines and baggage, and also to give time to the members of the Cisalpine government and all the compromised Milanese to withdraw. Nothing is more dangerous for an army than fugitive families whom it is obliged to receive into its ranks. They embarrass its march, impede its movements, and may sometimes even endanger its safety. After passing two days at Milan, Moreau resumed his march to cross the Po. From the conduct pursued by Suwarrov, he might judge he would have leisure to take up a solid position. He had a twofold object to attain, namely, to cover his communications both with France and Tuscany, by which latter the army of Naples was advancing. To secure this important object, it appeared to him advisable to occupy the slope of the Genoese mountains, being the most favourable point. He marched in two columns: the one, escorting the magazines, the baggage, all the paraphernalia of the army, followed the high road from Milan to Turin; the other diverged upon Alessandria to occupy the routes to the riviera of Genoa. He executed this march without being much incommoded by the enemy. Instead of falling with his victorious troops upon the enfeebled army of the French, and completely destroying it, Suwarrov stopped at Milan to have the honours of a triumph awarded him, by the priests, monks, nobles, and other creatures of Austria, who flocked in the wake of the allied army.

Moreau had ample time allowed him to arrive at Turin and send forward all his heavy baggage towards France. He manned the citadel, strove to stimulate the zeal of the partisans of the republic, and eventually moved to rejoin the column he had directed upon Alessandria. He there chose a position which evinced the perspicuity of his judgment. The Tanaro, falling from the Apennines, flows into the Po below Alessandria. Moreau planted himself at the conflux of these two rivers. Protected at once by both, he had not much to fear from a direct attack; and guarding at the same time all the routes to Genoa, he might here await the arrival of Macdonald. His position could not have been more happily selected. He occupied Casale, Valenza, and Alessandria; he had a chain of posts on the Po and the Tanaro, and his masses were disposed in such a manner that he might reach in a few hours the first point assailed. Here he consolidated himself then with 20,000 men, and awaited with imperturbable tranquillity the movements of his formidable enemy.

Suwarrov had most auspiciously for the French, consumed much time in advancing. He had demanded from the Aulic Council that the Austrian corps of Bellegarde, acting in the Tyrol, should be placed at his disposition. This corps had accordingly descended into Italy, and augmented the combined army to upwards of 100,000 men. But Suwarrov, having undertaken to besiege simultaneously Peschiera, Mantua, and Pizzighitone, desiring at the same time to cover himself on the side of Switzerland, and ignorant moreover of the art of distributing masses, was unable to muster more than 40,000 under his immediate command, a force certainly quite sufficient wherewith to overwhelm Moreau, if he had only known how to manage it properly.

He appeared at length along the banks of the Po and the Tanaro, directly in front of Moreau. He established himself at Tortona, and there fixed his head-quarters. After some days' inaction, he finally resolved to make an attempt on Moreau's left wing; that is to say, on the side of the Po. A little above the confluence of the Po and the Tanaro, opposite Mugarone, occur some woody islands, under favour of which the Russians determined to attempt a passage. During the night of the 22d, 23d, Floreal (11th, 12th, May), they crossed to the number of nearly 2,000 into one of these islands, and thus found themselves over the principal stream. The branch which remained for them to clear was inconsiderable, and might be easily swam across. They boldly traversed it, and attained the right bank of the Po. The French, warned of the danger, hastened to the threatened post. Moreau, who was apprized of other demonstrations on the side of the Tanaro, paused until the real point of danger was clearly ascertained: when it was made certain he marched thither with his reserve, cut down and drove into the river all the Russians who had had the temerity to cross it. There were 2,500 of them killed, drowned, or captured.

This vigorous blow effectually assured the position of Moreau in the singular triangle he had shut himself within. But the inaction of the enemy disquieted him; he feared lest Suwarrov had merely left before Alessandria a simple detachment, and with the bulk of his forces had ascended the Po, in the view of moving upon Turin, and taking the position of the French in the rear, or otherwise had marched to meet Macdonald. In the uncertainty induced by Suwarrov's inertness, he resolved to act himself in order to ascertain the actual state of things. He proposed to debouch beyond Alessandria, and make a powerful reconnaissance. If it should turn out that the enemy had left before him only a detached corps, Moreau's design was to convert this reconnaissance into a serious attack, cut to pieces this detached corps, and then leisurely retire by the great road of La Bochetta, towards the mountains of Genoa, there to await Macdonald. If, on the contrary, he found the main body of the enemy, he purposed to fall back without delay, and regain in all haste the riviera of Genoa, by all the accessory communications remaining to him. One reason which above all decided him to adopt this step, was the insurrection of Piedmont on his rear. It behoved him to approximate towards his base with all possible speed.

Whilst Moreau was forming this very wise resolution, Suwarrov conceived one also wholly destitute of rationality. His position at Tortona was certainly the best he could hold, because it placed him between the two French armies, that of the Cisalpine and that of Naples. It was incumbent on him not to quit it on any account. Nevertheless he proposed to push part of his forces beyond the Po, ascend the river to Turin, seize that capital, organize the Piedmontese royalists, and force Moreau from his position. Nothing could be worse calculated than such a manœuvre; since, if he wished to force Moreau from his position he might have attempted a direct and vigorous attack, but never for any purpose whatsoever ought he to have abandoned the intermediate position between the two armies striving to effect a junction.

Consequently, whilst Suwarrov, dividing his forces, left a part in the vicinity of Tortona, along the Tanaro, and moved the remainder beyond the Po to march on Turin, Moreau executed the reconnaissance he had projected. He sent Victor's division in advance to attack the Russian corps in front of him. He held himself a little in the rear with all his reserve, ready to change his reconnaissance into a serious attack if he judged that the Russian corps might be overwhelmed. After a smart engagement, in which Victor's troops displayed a rare gallantry, Moreau concluded that the whole Russian army was before him; hence, he durst not attack at large for fear of drawing upon him an enemy too superior in force. In consequence, of the two plans he had intended to follow, he preferred the second as the safest. He, therefore, resolved to retire towards the mountains of Genoa. His position was very critical. All Piedmont was in revolt on his rear. A body of insurgents had taken possession of Ceva, which commanded the principal route, the only one accessible to artillery. The great convoy of objects of art collected in Italy was threatened with capture. These circumstances were singularly unfortunate. By taking the routes situated more backward, and which led to the riviera of Ponent, Moreau was afraid of removing too far from the communications with Tuscany, and leaving them exposed to the enemy, whom he supposed collected in mass around Tortona. In this perplexity he forthwith took his resolution and made the following dispositions. He detached Victor's division, without artillery or baggage, to proceed by paths practicable to infantry only to the mountains of Genoa. It was to hurry forward to occupy all the passages of the Apennines, with the view of joining the army coming from Naples, and reinforcing it in case it should be attacked by Suwarrov. Moreau, retaining only 8,000 men at the most, set out with his artillery, his cavalry, and all that could not pursue the paths through the mountains, to gain one of the carriage roads which are found behind Ceva, and which lead into the riviera of Ponent. In determining upon this concentric retreat he had another calculation in view; namely, that he would draw upon himself the hostile army, and divert it from pursuing Victor, and falling foul of Macdonald.

Victor retired without accident by Acqui, Spigno, and Dego, and occupied the crests of the Apennines. Moreau, on his part, retreated with extraordinary celerity on Asti. The capture of Ceva, which formed his principal communication, placed him in extreme embarrassment. He forwarded the greatest part of his magazines by the pass of Fenestrella, preserved only the field artillery which was indispensable to him, and resolved to open a route through the Apennines by making his own soldiers construct one. After four days of incredible exertion, the road was rendered practicable for artillery, and Moreau passed into the riviera of Genoa, without having retrograded to the pass of Tende, which would have carried him too far from the troops of Victor detached towards Genoa.

Suwarrov, on learning the retreat of Moreau, caused him in all haste to be pursued; but he was unable either to divine or to prevent his refined combinations. Thus, through his consummate coolness and address, Moreau redeemed his 20,000 men without permitting them to be once entangled, but on the contrary checking the Russians wherever he encountered them. He had left a garrison of 3,000 men in Alessandria, and was now with nearly 18,000 in the environs of Genoa. He was seated on the crest of the Apennines awaiting the arrival of Macdonald. He had directed the division of Lapoype, the light infantry of Montrichard, and Victor's division, upon the Upper-Trebbia to be ready to join Macdonald. He himself remained in the vicinity of Novi with the residue of his mainbody. His plans for a junction were profoundly meditated. He might either draw the army of Naples to him by the shore of the Mediterranean, combine with it at Genoa, and debouch in company from La Bochetta, or otherwise cause it to debouch from Tuscany into the plains of Placenza, and on the banks of the Po. The first plan insured the junction, since it would be made under shelter of the Apennines, but then the Apennines must be again passed, and the enemy confronted to carry the plain. On the other hand, by debouching in front of Placenza, he became master of the plain up to the Po, could choose his field of battle on the very banks of that river, and, in the event of victory, drive the enemy into it. At the same time Moreau intended that Macdonald should keep his left closely abutting upon the mountains in order to link himself with Victor who was at Bobbio. For his own part he held Suwarrov in observation, ready to fall upon his flanks should he attempt to march against Macdonald. In this situation the junction appeared equally sure as behind the Apennines, and effected on far preferable ground.

At this precise period, it chanced that the Directory had succeeded in collecting a considerable naval force in the Mediterranean. Bruix, minister of the marine, had taken the command of the Brest fleet, raised the blockade of the Spanish squadron, and entered the Mediterranean with fifty sail of ships, in the hope of delivering it from the English, and restoring the communication with the army in Egypt. This long desired junction was, therefore, at length accomplished, and might become the means of re-establishing the French preponderance in the waters of the Levant. Bruix was at this moment before Genoa. His presence had the effect of operating beneficially on the spirit of the army. It was bruited that he brought supplies, munitions, and reinforcements. It was not so; but Moreau took advantage of the belief, and strove to give it credence. He encouraged the circulation of a rumour that the fleet had disembarked 20,000 men and considerable stores. This report emboldened the army and greatly abated the confidence of the enemy.

It was now the middle of Prairial (beginning of June). A fresh event had just occurred in Switzerland. We have seen that Massena occupied the line of the Limmat or of Zurich, and that the Archduke, debouching from the two extremities of Lake Constance, had approached to confront that line along its whole extent. He resolved to attack it between Zurich and Bruk; that is to say, between the lake of Zurich and the Aar, the entire length of the Limmat. Massena had taken position, not on the Limmat itself, but on a series of heights which rise in front of the Limmat, and cover at once both lake and river. He had intrenched these heights in the most formidable manner, and rendered them almost impregnable. Although this part of his line was the strongest, the Archduke had determined to assail it, because a long detour, to attempt an assault above the lake upon the line of the Lint, would have been attended with great danger. Massena might have profited by the opportunity to overwhelm the corps left before him, and thus obtain a decisive advantage.

The projected attack was executed on the 16th Prairial (4th June). It took place over the whole extent of the Limmat, and was everywhere victoriously repelled, despite the stubborn perseverance of the Austrians. But the Archduke, conceiving that such enterprises ought to be followed up, that there might be no fruitless sacrifices, recommenced the attack on the following day with similar pertinacity. Thereupon, Massena, reflecting that he might be forced, that in such case his retreat would become difficult, and that the line which he relinquished was immediately succeeded by one stronger, the chain of the Albis, which skirts on the farther margin the Limmat and the lake of Zurich, resolved to retire voluntarily. By this retreat he lost merely the town of Zurich, which he regarded as of little importance. The mountain-chain of the Albis, skirting the lake of Zurich and the Limmat to the Aar, and presenting moreover a continuous steep acclivity, was almost unassailable. In occupying it, the French made but a slight concession of ground, for they recoiled only the breadth of the lake and the river. Accordingly, Massena retired thither of his own accord, and without loss, and there established himself in a manner which stifled the lust of the Archduke to attack him.

The position of the French, therefore, was still almost the same in Switzerland. The Aar, the Limmat, the lake of Zurich, the Lint, and the Reuss, to the base of Mount St. Gothard, constituted their defensive line against the Austrians.

In Italy, Macdonald had at length emerged through Tuscany. He had left garrisons in Fort St. Elmo, in Capua, and in Gaeta, conformably to his instructions. It was a needless abandonment of troops incapable of sustaining the republican party, and whose loss weakened the active army. On retiring, the French left the city of Naples a prey to a royalist reaction, which rivalled in atrocity the most deplorable scenes of the French revolution. At Rome, Macdonald had picked up Garnier's division, comprising a few thousand men; in Tuscany he collected Gauthier's division, and in the Modenese the light corps under Montrichard. He had thus formed a mainbody of 28,000 men. He reached Florence on the 6th Prairial (25th May). So far his retreat had been effected with great rapidity and remarkable order. He unfortunately lost a good deal of time in Tuscany, and debouched beyond the Apennines, into the plains of Placenza, only towards the end of Prairial (the middle of June).

If he had debouched earlier he would have surprised the allies in such a state of dispersion that he might have successively overthrown them, and driven them beyond the Po. Suwarrov was at Turin, of which he had recently taken possession, and where he had seized immense supplies of military stores. Bellegarde was observing the approaches from Genoa, and Kray beleaguering Mantua, the citadel of Milan, and the other fortresses. On no point were 30,000 Austrians or Russians concentrated. Macdonald and Moreau, debouching together with 50,000 men, might have reversed the fortune of the campaign. But Macdonald deemed it expedient to devote an interval of some days to the repose of his troops, and to the reorganization of the divisions he had gathered to his army. He thus permitted an inestimable opportunity to pass away, and gave Suwarrov time to retrieve his blunders. On learning Macdonald's approach, that Russian general hastily quitted Turin and marched with a reinforcement of 20,000 men, to plant himself between the two French generals and resume the position he ought never to have left. He ordered General Ott, who was in observation on the Trebbia in the vicinity of Placenza, to retire on him if he were attacked; he directed Kray to send him from Mantua all the troops he could spare; and, leaving to Bellegarde the task of observing Novi, whence Moreau was expected to debouch, he prepared to march in person into the plains of Placenza to meet Macdonald.

These are the only dispositions which, during the whole of this campaign, have gained Suwarrov the unqualified approbation of military men. The two French generals occupied the positions we have indicated. Both placed on the Apennines, they must descend from them to unite in the plains of Placenza: Moreau from Novi, Macdonald from Pontremoli. Moreau had dispatched Victor's division to reinforce Macdonald, and had stationed General Lapoype with a few battalions at Bobbio, on the slope of the mountains, to favour the junction. His purpose was to seize the moment when Suwarrov advanced against Macdonald to charge into his flank. But to that end it was necessary Macdonald should keep himself flanked by the mountains, and not give battle too far in the plain.

Macdonald broke ground about the end of Prairial (middle of June). Hohenzollern's corps, located in the vicinity of Modena, guarded the Lower-Po. He was overwhelmed by superior forces, lost 1,500 men, and narrowly escaped utter destruction. This first success encouraged Macdonald and induced him to hasten his march. Victor's division, which had now joined him, and increased his army to nearly 32,000 men, formed his vanguard. The Polish division of Dombrowski marched on the left of Victor's, Rusca's division flanking both. Although the bulk of the army, composed of the divisions under Montrichard, Olivier, and Watrin, was still in the rear, Macdonald, elated with the success he had obtained over Hohenzollern, resolved to crush Ott, who was in observation on the Tidona, and ordered Victor, Dombrowski, and Rusca to march against him without a moment's delay.

Three streams, flowing in parallel lines from the Apennines into the Po, formed the field of battle: these were the Nura, the Trebbia, and the Tidona. The main body of the French army was still on the Nura; the divisions of Victor, Drombrowski, and Rusca were advanced on the Trebbia, having orders to pass it and move on the Tidona, in order to overwhelm Ott, whom Macdonald believed without support. They marched on the 29th Prairial (17th June). At first they repulsed General Ott's vanguard from the banks of the Tidona, and obliged it to take up a position behind the river at the village of Sermetto. Ott was on the point of being overthrown, when Suwarrov arrived to his assistance with all his forces. He opposed General Bagration to Victor who was moving along the Po, pushed Ott on the centre against Dombrowski, and directed Melas to the right against Rusca. Bagration was not successful against Victor and was forced to retrograde; but in the centre, Suwarrov charged Dombrowski's division with the Russian infantry, poured upon its flank two regiments of cavalry, and broke it. Upon this event, Victor, who had advanced on the Po, found himself outflanked and compromised. Bagration, reinforced by grenadiers, resumed the offensive. The Russian cavalry, which had broken the Poles in the centre and thus outflanked Victor, charged him in flank and compelled him to retire. Rusca, on the right, was then constrained to yield the ground to Melas.

The three French divisions repassed the Tidona and retrograded on the Trebbia.

This first encounter, in which scarcely a third of the French army had been engaged against the whole army of the enemy, thus proved unfortunate. Macdonald, ignorant of Suwarrov's arrival, had been too hasty. He now resolved to establish himself behind the Trebbia, there unite all his divisions, and signally avenge the check he had sustained. Unhappily, the divisions of Olivier, Montrichard, and Watrin were still in the rear on the Nura, and he proposed to wait until the second day, namely, until the 1st Messidor (19th June), to renew the battle.

But Suwarrov left him no time to combine his forces, and prepared to attack the very day after, to wit, the 30th Prairial (18th June). The two armies were moving along the Trebbia, resting their wings on the Po and the Apennines. Suwarrov, judging correctly that the essential point was in the mountains, by which the two French armies were enabled to communicate, directed to that side his best infantry and cavalry. He turned Bagration's division, which was originally on his left along the Po, to his right against the mountains. He placed it with Schweikofsky's division under the command of Rosemberg, and ordered them both to cross the Trebbia at Rivalta, in the upper part of its course, with the view of detaching the French from the mountains. The divisions of Dombrowski, Rusca, and Victor were placed towards that point, on the left of the French line. Olivier and Montrichard's divisions were intended to be stationed in the centre, along the stream of the Trebbia. Watrin's division was designed for the right, towards the Po and Placenza.

On the morning of the 30th Prairial (18th June), the Russian outposts attacked the French outposts, which were beyond the Trebbia, at Casaliggio and Grignano, and drove them in. Macdonald, who had no expectation of being attacked, was engaged in bringing up into line his divisions of the centre. Victor, who commanded on the left, immediately transported all the French infantry over the Trebbia, and for a moment placed Suwarrov in great jeopardy. But Rosemberg, pushing forward with the division of Schweikofsky, recovered the advantage, and, after a furious combat, in which the slaughter was terrific on both sides, obliged the French to retire behind the Trebbia. In the meantime, Olivier and Montrichard's divisions arrived in the centre and Watrin's on the right, and a cannonade commenced along the whole line. After an exchange of a few shots, both sides desisted, reposing on the opposite banks of the Trebbia, which flowed between and separated the two armies.

Such was the second encounter. It had consisted in a mere conflict on the French left, a very terrible conflict indeed, but without result. Macdonald, now operating with his entire force, proposed to render the third encounter decisive. His plan was to pass the Trebbia on all points and outflank the two wings of the enemy. With this intention, Dombrowski's division was appointed to ascend the river as far as Rivalta and cross it above the Russians. Watrin's division was at the same time to clear it near its embouchure in the Po, and so gain the extreme left of the Russians. He reckoned likewise that Moreau, whose co-operation he had expected during the two previous days, would certainly enter on action this day at the latest. Such was the plan of Macdonald for the encounter of the 1st Messidor (19th June). But a horrible engagement took place during the night. A French detachment having traversed the bed of the Trebbia to take position, the Russians imagined themselves attacked and flew to arms. The French, in similar alarm, followed their example. The two armies became involved in a night-struggle, where, intermingled and in dire confusion, an indiscriminate slaughter was waged, without distinction of friends or foes. After a useless carnage, the generals succeeded in drawing off their soldiers into bivouack. On the morrow, both armies were so fatigued by three days' fighting and the disturbance of the night, that they did not enter on action until towards ten in the morning.

The battle commenced on the French right, upon the Upper-Trebbia. Dombrowski cleared the Trebbia and Rivalta in spite of the efforts of the Russians. Suwarrov detached Prince Bagration against him. This movement left Rosemberg's flanks uncovered. Victor and Rusca instantly profited by it to fall impetuously on him, pushing across the Trebbia. They advanced with success, and surrounded on all sides Schweikofsky's division, in which stood Suwarrov in person. They placed it in imminent danger; but it faced round in every direction and made a valiant defence. Bagration, spying its perilous condition, turned promptly back to the menaced point and compelled Victor and Rusca to give way. If Dombrowski, also seizing the occasion, had in his turn defiled on Bagration, the advantage would have continued with the French on that point, which was the most important of all, since it abutted on the mountains. Unfortunately he remained inactive, and Victor and Rusca were obliged to repass the Trebbia. In the centre, Montrichard had crossed the Trebbia at Grignano, Olivier at San-Nicolo. Montrichard marched against the corps under Forster, when the Austrian reserves, which Suwarrov had requested from Melas and which were then in the act of defiling on the rear of the field of battle, suddenly charged into the flanks of his division. It was taken by surprise, and the 5th Light, which had performed prodigies in a hundred fights, fled in disorder. Thus Montrichard likewise found himself obliged to repass the Trebbia. Olivier, who had met with success at San-Nicolo and had vigorously repulsed Ott and Melas, became uncovered by Montrichard's retreat. Thereupon Melas, countermanding the Austrian reserves, whose appearance had already thrown Montrichard's division into confusion, directed them on Olivier's division, which was forced in its turn to repass the Trebbia. In the meantime, Watrin's division, fruitlessly detached to the extreme right, where it found nothing to do, wound along the Po without being of any use in the battle. It was in like manner obliged to repass the Trebbia, following the general movement of retreat. Suwarrov, in constant dread of Moreau debouching on his rear, made great efforts during the rest of the day to force a passage over the Trebbia, but he was unable to succeed. The French opposed him along its entire course with invincible firmness, and this mountain-stream, the unconscious witness of so determined a struggle, again separated for the third time the two hostile armies.

Such was the third encounter or act of this sanguinary drama. Both armies were disorganized. They had each lost about 12,000 men. The majority of the generals were wounded. Whole regiments had been cut to pieces. But their respective situations were very different. Suwarrov was receiving reinforcements every day, and he had only to gain by the prolongation of the fight. Macdonald, on the contrary, had exhausted all his resources, and by persisting in the contest might be driven back in disorder into Tuscany. He preferred therefore to retire on the Nura, with the view of gaining Genoa behind the Apennines. He quitted the Trebbia on the 2d Messidor (20th June) at dawn. A despatch, in which he described to Moreau his desparate condition, having fallen into the hands of Suwarrov, the latter was transported with joy and hastened to pursue him to the death. Nevertheless, the retreat was executed with comparative order on the banks of the Nura. Unluckily, Victor's division, which had been constantly engaged in combat for four days, was at last broken and lost a number of prisoners. Macdonald had however time to gather his army beyond the Apennines, after sustaining a loss of fourteen or fifteen thousand men, in killed, wounded, and prisoners.

By good-fortune, Suwarrov, hearing the cannon of Moreau on his rear, was diverted from the pursuit of Macdonald. Moreau, whom insurmountable obstacles had prevented from putting himself in motion before the 30th Prairial (18th June), had eventually debouched from Novi, attacked Bellegarde, put him to rout, and took from him nearly 3,000 prisoners. But this tardy success was now, so to speak, abortive, having no other result than that of recalling Suwarrov and preventing him from satiating his ferocity on Macdonald.

The junction, then, from which such great results were expected, had led only to a bloody defeat, and occasioned between the two French generals recriminations which have never been fully brought to issue. Military men have reproached Macdonald with remaining too long in Tuscany, and moving his divisions too far from each other, insomuch that the divisions of Victor, Rusca, and Dombrowski were beaten two days in succession before the divisions under Montrichard, Olivier, and Watrin were in line; with attempting, on the day of battle, to outflank the two wings of the enemy, instead of directing his principal effort on his left towards the Upper-Trebbia; with keeping too far distant from the mountains, so as not to permit Lapoype, who was at Bobbio, to come to his assistance; lastly, and chiefly, with having been in too great a hurry to give battle, as if he desired to monopolize all the honour of the victory. On the other hand, military men, approving the plan artistically combined by Moreau, have urged against him but one reproach, namely, that of not having cast aside all complaisance towards an old comrade, taken the direct command of the two armies, and more especially commanded in person at the Trebbia. Whatever justice there may be in these allegations, it is certain that Moreau's plan, if executed as conceived, would have saved Italy. It was utterly foiled by the battle of the Trebbia. Fortunately, Moreau was still there to collect the remains of the French, and prevent Suwarrov from profiting by his great superiority. The campaign had been opened but three months, and, excepting in Switzerland, the French had experienced an unbroken series of reverses. The battle of Stockach had caused them to lose Germany; the battles of Magnano and the Trebbia robbed them of Italy. Massena alone, firm as a rock, still occupied Switzerland along the chain of the Albis. It is not to be forgotten however, amidst these cruel visitations, that the courage of the French soldiers had been as indomitable and brilliant as in the most auspicious days of victory; and that Moreau had approved himself a true patriot and a great captain, and had heroically interposed to save the armies of Italy from annihilation by Suwarrov at a single blow.

These last disasters supplied fresh weapons of accusation to the enemies of the Directory, and aroused against it a redoubled storm of invective. The fear of an invasion began to haunt imagination. The southern and alpine departments, lying first exposed to the inroad of the Austro-Russians, were in a state of great excitement. The towns of Grenoble, Chambery, and Orange sent addresses to the legislative body, which caused an extraordinary sensation. Yet they merely embodied the groundless aspersions which for two months had circulated in all quarters; they recurred to the pillage of the conquered countries, the peculations of the companies, the privations of the armies, the ministry of Scherer, his generalship, the injustice manifested towards Moreau, the arrest of Championnet, &c. "Why," they asked, "have honest conscripts been obliged to return to their homes on account of the destitution in which they were left? Why have all the malversations remained unpunished? Why was the incapable Scherer, proclaimed as a traitor by Hoche, retained so long in the ministry at war? Why was he enabled to consummate as general the evils he had prepared as minister? Why are names dear to victory superseded by names unknown? Why is the conqueror of Rome and Naples under impeachment?"

The real value of such reproaches we have already learnt to appreciate. But the addresses which contained them were awarded the honour of being printed, specially noticed commendably, and referred to the consideration of the Directory. This manner of receiving them sufficiently demonstrated the dispositions of the two Councils. They could not, in truth, be more hostile. The constitutional opposition had coalesced with the patriot opposition. The first was composed of the personally ambitious who aspired to form a new government, and of the officious and importunate who were incensed that their counsels or recommendations had not been heeded; the latter comprised the patriots excluded by the secessions from the legislative body or reduced to silence by the law of the 19th Fructidor, all equally desiring the ruin of the existing government. These affirmed that the Directory had at once misgoverned and misdefended France, and had violated the freedom of elections, the liberty of the press, and the independence of popular societies. They denounced it as both weak and violent, and even recurred to the 18th Fructidor; saying that, having paid no respect to the laws on that day, it could not now invoke them in its favour.

The nomination of Sieyes to the Directory had been a chief incitement to these dispositions. The elevation to the Directory of a man who had never ceased to regard the directorial constitution as vicious, and who had for that very reason previously refused to be a director, indicated a certain consciousness that some change was desirable. The acceptance of Sieyes, which was doubted on account of his former refusal, only tended to confirm this impression.

The malcontents of every hue, who fostered notions of change, gathered around Sieyes. He, Sieyes, was far from an able party-leader; he had neither the fitting character at once designing, supple, and daring, nor in sooth the ambition; but through his fame numbers flocked as it were to his standard. It was notorious that he viewed with a censorious eye both the constitution and the government; and he seemed thus courted to encourage him to subvert the system. Barras, who had the art to get his long continuance in the Directory overlooked, through his relations and intrigues with all parties, cultivated the good graces of Sieyes, and succeeded in forming an alliance with him by a base desertion of his colleagues. Around these two directors therefore rallied all the enemies of the Directory. The party was anxious to obtain the support of some young general of high reputation, who enjoyed, like many others, the credit of being a victim of the government. The position of Joubert, on whom great expectations were founded, and who was without employment since his supercession, fixed attention upon him. He was about to ally himself with M. de Sémonville by marrying a certain demoiselle de Montholon. He was brought into communion with Sieyes; the appointment of general of the 17th military division was conferred upon him, and every effort used to constitute him the chief of the new coalition.

Fundamental changes were not as yet contemplated; it was merely intended at first to gain possession of the government, and save France from the danger of an invasion, postponing constitutional projects to a period when all perils should be passed. The primary object to compass was the removal of the older members of the Directory. Sieyes' nomination was but a fortnight old; he had only succeeded Rewbell on the 1st Prairial. Barras had timeously crouched to the storm as we know. Hence animosity was concentrated on Larévellière, Merlin, and Treilhard, all three wholly guiltless of the delinquencies charged against the government.

They possessed the majority, however, being three in a body of five, but it was proposed to render their exercise of authority impracticable. On their part, these three directors had resolved to evince the greatest consideration for Sieyes, and even to treat his testiness with forbearance, to avoid aggravating the difficulties of the position by those which personal contests might create. But Sieyes proved intractable; he found everything wrong, and doubtless in perfect good-faith; but he expressed himself in a manner to show he would not concert with his colleagues to amend any evil. Somewhat infatuated with what he had witnessed in the country he had lately visited, he repeated pretty constantly to them: "It is not so things are managed in Prussia." "Pray teach us then," observed his colleagues in reply, "how things are managed in Prussia; enlighten us with your counsel, assist us to act for the best." "You would not understand me," Sieyes retorted; "it is useless my exhorting you; proceed as you have been accustomed to do."

Whilst internal dissension thus took root within the Directory itself, vehement attacks were made upon it from without on the part of the two Councils. On the subject of the finances an open rupture occurred. A deficiency had arisen, as we have stated, from two causes, the tardiness of payments, and the unproductiveness of assumed sources. Out of 400 millions already dispensed in charges incurred, only 216 millions had been actually received. The decrease upon the estimate of products amounted, according to Ramel, to 67 and even to 75 millions. As the aggregate of this deficit was still contested, he published in the Moniteur an explict denial to the statements of the deputy Génissieux, and proved his own to be correct. But what avail proofs at certain moments? The minister and the government were not the less assailed with invectives; it was not the less repeated that they were ruining the state and only demanding fresh funds to supply the means of fresh malversations. However, the force of evidence compelled a supplementary grant. A duty upon salt had been refused; to supply its place, an additional ten per cent. was laid upon all the taxes, whilst that upon doors and windows was again doubled. But t was of little use to impose taxes; the more essential point was to insure their receipt by appropriate laws for their assessment and collection. These laws were suffered to remain unpassed. In vain the minister urged their discussion; they were constantly postponed, and his pressing instances answered by cries of treachery, robbery, and so forth.

Besides the dispute upon the finances, another was originated upon a different subject. Earlier, reclamations had arisen touching certain articles of the law of the 19th Fructidor, which invested the Directory with power to close clubs and suppress journals by a simple ordinance. A project of law had been then ordered upon the press and popular societies, framed to modify the law of the 19th Fructidor, and to deprive the Directory of the arbitrary authority with which it was clothed. Complaints were likewise enforced against the faculty that law conferred upon the Directory to banish at pleasure suspected priests and erase emigrants from the list. The patriots themselves manifested a disposition to abolish this dictatorship, hurtful only as it was to their adversaries. The discussion upon the press and popular societies was first commenced. The project introduced was the work of Berlier. The debate opened in the beginning of Prairial (middle of June). The advocates of the Directory, amongst whom were distinguished Chénier, Bailleul, Creuzé-Latouche, and Lecointe-Puyraveau, argued that the dictatorship granted to the Directory by the law of the 19th Fructidor, although formidable in ordinary times, was of indispensable necessity under actual circumstances. It was not, they contended, in a moment of extreme peril that the prerogatives of the government should be curtailed. The dictatorship bestowed upon it on the morrow of the 18th Fructidor was become essential to it, not against the royalist faction, but against the anarchical faction, equally to be dreaded with the former and secretly allied with it. The disciples of Babœuf, they added, were reappearing on all sides, and menacing the republic with a fresh envelopment.

The patriots, who abounded in the Council of Five-Hundred, replied with their wonted vehemence to the arguments of the directorial partisans.—It was necessary, they asserted, to give an impulse to France, to restore to it the energy of 1793, which the Directory had completely stifled by fastening upon it an oppressive yoke. All patriotism would be extinguished unless clubs were opened, and freedom restored to the patriotic journals. "It is in vain," they added, "you accuse the patriots, in vain you affect to dread an insurrection on their part. What have these much traduced patriots done? For three years they have been murdered, proscribed, without a country, in the republic they have powerfully contributed to found, and which they have mainly defended. What crimes have you to upbraid them with? Have they reacted against the reacters? No. They are exaggerated, turbulent; be it so. But are these crimes? They talk, they clamour even, if you wish it; but they do not assassinate, and every day they are assassinated."—Such was the language of Briot du Doubs, of the Corsican Arena, and of numerous others.

The members of the constitutional opposition expressed themselves differently. They were naturally more moderate. They adopted the measured deliberative tone, but withal the caustic and dogmatic. It was expedient, in their view, to recur to principles too much neglected, and to restore liberty to the press and popular societies. The dangers of Fructidor had perhaps justified a momentary dictatorship in the Directory, but this dictatorship confided in trust, how had it been used? It was only necessary to ask parties, said Boulay de la Meurthe. Although all entertaining discordant views, royalists, patriots, constitutionalists were agreed in declaring that the Directory had misused omnipotence. Such concord, amongst men so opposed in principles and views, could leave no doubt, and the Directory stood unequivocally condemned. So spoke the constitutionalists.

Thus the incensed patriots bewailed oppression; the constitutionalists, in the fulness of their pretensions, denounced misgovernment. All coalesced, however, and the articles of the law of the 19th Fructidor relative to journals and popular societies were rescinded. This was an important victory over the Directory, which was sure to lead to a furious inundation of periodical prints and revived associations of Jacobins

The excitement continued to increase during the progress of Prairial. The most sinister rumours circulated in all quarters. The new coalition, meanwhile, had resolved to employ those identical tactics in vogue with oppositions under representative governments to compel a ministry to resign. Embarrassing and accumulated questions, threats of impeachment, all were put in requisition. These means are so natural, that, even without practice in the ways of representative government, the native instinct of party infallibly prompts to their adoption.

The committees of expenditure, of funds, and of war, appointed by the Five-Hundred to inquire into those various matters, combined and voted a message to the Directory. Boulay de la Meurthe was charged with the report, and presented it on the 15th Prairial On his motion, the Council of Five-Hundred addressed to the Directory a message in which it requested to be informed of the causes of the internal and external dangers which threatened the republic, and of the means which existed for meeting them. Demands of this nature have usually no other effect than to extort avowals of weakness, and to compromise still more the government from which they are wrung. A government, we repeat, must succeed; to oblige it to acknowledge that it has not succeeded is to force from it the most fatal of all confessions. To this message were added numberless motions of order, all having an analogous aim. They had reference to the right of forming popular societies, to individual liberty, to the responsibility of ministers, to the duplication of accounts, &c. &c.

On receiving the message in question, the Directory determined to return a circumstantial answer, tracing the course of events, and explaining the means it had taken, and those it still proposed to take, in order to rescue France from the crisis in which it was involved. A reply of this nature required the co-operation of all the ministers, so that each might furnish his particular report. Several days at least were requisite to digest it; but this was far from agreeable to the leaders of the Councils. They had no desire for an exact and faithful account of the state of France; what they wanted were prompt and embarrassing avowals. Accordingly, after waiting for a few days, the three committees which had suggested the message submitted to the Five-Hundred a new proposition through the medium of the deputy Poulain-Grand-Pré. He presented his report on the 28th Prairial (16th June). It recommended the Five-Hundred to declare themselves permanent until the Directory had replied to the message of the 15th. The proposal was adopted. This step was tantamount to a proclamation of danger, and announced some near catastrophe. The Five-Hundred communicated their resolution to the Ancients, with a solicitation to do likewise. The Ancients in truth imitated the example, and also constituted themselves permanent. The three committees of expenditure, funds, and war, being too numerous, were condensed into a single committee, composed of eleven members, and delegated to frame measures suited to the emergency.

The Directory intimated, on its part, that it would likewise remain in permanent diet to accelerate the report demanded from it. We may conceive the agitation that must necessarily result from these determinations. Rumours of the most alarming character were as usual widely disseminated. The opponents of the Directory proclaimed that it meditated a new coup d'etat, and intended to dissolve the Councils. Its partisans asserted, on the other hand, that there was a coalition formed by the different parties to overthrow by violence the constitution. On neither side were any such schemes contemplated. The coalition of the two oppositions was cemented solely by the common desire to supplant the three obnoxious directors. A preliminary measure was adopted to accomplish this object. The constitution prescribed that a director entering on office should have quitted the legislature a whole year previously. It was now remembered that Treilhard, who had sat thirteen months in the Directory, had left the legislature on the 30th Floreal year V., and been elected to the Directory on the 26th Floreal year VI. Four days, therefore, were wanting to the required period. The objection was truly flimsy and frivolous, for the irregularity was covered by the silence observed respecting it during two sessions, and besides, Sieyes himself was in the same predicament. Nevertheless, the committee of eleven instantly proposed to annul Treilhard's nomination. The decree of abrogation was passed on the same day, the 28th and signified to the Directory.

Treilhard was rough and abrupt in manners, but totally destitute of corresponding firmness. He was disposed to yield. Larévellière-Lepeaux was in a very different frame of mind. That upright and disinterested man, to whom his functions were a burden, who had accepted them only from a sense of duty, and who offered vows every year that fortune would restore him to privacy, was resolute to retain office as soon as the allied factions seemed inclined to exact its surrender. He considered that they could wish to expel the old directors only for the purpose of abolishing the constitution of the year III.; and that Sieyes, Barras, and the Bonaparte family, concurred in one aim with wholly discordant views, but all equally detrimental to the republic. In this persuasion he was unwilling that the old directors should abandon their post. Consequently he hastened to Treilhard and urged him to resist. "With Merlin and me," he said, "you will form the majority, and we will refuse to execute this resolution of the legislative body, as illegal, seditious, and extorted by a faction." Treilhard, however, had not courage to follow this advice, but forthwith sent his resignation to the Council of Five-Hundred.

Although the majority was thus lost, Larévellière determined nevertheless to refuse his abdication if it were demanded. The leaders of the Five-Hundred first took the precaution of supplying a successor to Treilhard. Sieyes would have had a person named devoted to him; but his influence on this occasion was disregarded. The election fell on an ex-advocate of Rennes, actual president of the tribunal of Cassation, and known to adhere rather to the patriot than to the constitutional opposition. This was Gohier, an honest citizen and earnest republican, but of slender abilities and profoundly ignorant of men and things. He was nominated on the 29th Prairial, and appointed to be installed on the following day.

The exclusion of Trielhard merely tended to whet the desire of tearing Larévellière and Merlin from the Directory. The patriots especially were furious against Larévellière; in their wrath they called to mind that, although stern and rigid, he had never been a mountaineer, that he had often since the 9th Thermidor contended against their party, and that in the previous year he had encouraged the system of secessions. They threatened accordingly to put him under impeachment, both him and Merlin, if they delayed to abdicate their functions. Sieyes was deputed to make a preliminary overture, with the view of inducing them to succumb voluntarily to the storm.

On the evening of the 29th, the day of Treilhard's retirement, Sieyes proposed a private meeting of the four directors in Merlin's apartments. They assembled there at the appointed hour. Barras, as if he anticipated danger, came with his sword by his side and retained an unbroken silence. Sieyes opened the conference in evident perplexity, preluding with a lengthy exordium touching the faults and blunders of the government, and fencing obscurely with the real object of the meeting. At length Larévellière calmly besought him to explain himself with clearness.—"Your friends," replied Sieyes, "and those of Merlin, recommend you both to tender your resignations." Larévellière inquired who those considerate friends were. Sieyes was unable to name one entitled to the least respect or confidence. Larévellière thereupon addressed him in the language of a man indignant at finding the Directory betrayed by its own members, and abandoned by them to the plots of the factious. He showed that his conduct and that of his colleagues had been irreproachable, and that the delinquencies ascribed to them were a mere tissue of calumnies; he then directly attacked Sieyes on his secret schemes, and covered him with confusion by his forcible apostrophes. Barras, during the whole of the time, observed a gloomy silence. His position was embarrassing, for he alone had merited the imputations so profusely charged upon his colleagues. To urge their resignation for faults they had not committed, and of which he was solely guilty, would have been too grotesque. He therefore was silent. The interview terminated without result. Merlin, who lacked decision to act for himself, declared he would follow the example of Larévellière.

Barras imagined the device of employing an intermediary to obtain the abdication of his colleagues. He applied with this view to an old Girondist, Bergoeng, whom a taste for pleasures brought into his society. He charged him to wait on Larévellière and beseech him to divest himself of the obnoxious dignity. Bergoeng, accepting the mission, came to Larévellière in the gloom of night, appealed to the long friendship which united them, and inculcated every argument to shake his resolution. He assured him that Barras loved and honoured him, and regarded his removal as iniquitous, but that he conjured him to yield in order to escape an inevitable outrage. Larévellière remained inflexible. He replied that Barras was the dupe of Sieyes, Sieyes of Barras, and that both were duped by the Bonapartes; adding that the ruin of the republic was designed, but that he would resist to his last gasp.

On the morrow, the 30th, Gohier was to be installed. The four directors were assembled; all the ministers were present. When the installation was completed, and the orations of the president and the new director were duly delivered, the subject of the eve was revived. Barras requested to speak in private with Larévellière; they retired into an adjoining chamber. Barras renewed towards his colleague the same instances, the same caressing flatteries, but found him equally partinacious. He returned sufficiently disconcerted with his failure, and keenly apprehensive of any discussion regarding the acts of the Directory, which could by no means redound to his credit or advantage. He rose to speak, and not venturing to assail Larévellière, he declaimed against Merlin, whom he heartily detested, drew a description of him the most ludicrous and false, and depicted him as a braggart bully, planning, with a gang of scape grace cut-throats, to execute a coup d'etat against his colleagues and the Councils. Larévellière, rushing to the rescue of Merlin, immediately replied and exposed the gross absurdity of such charges. Nothing assuredly could be more dissimilar than this portrait of the meek jurisconsult Merlin. Larévellière proceeded to unfold the history of the whole directorial administration, dwelling upon it in detail to enlighten the ministers and the entering director. Barras sat during this recital in painful confusion; he at length started to his feet, exclaiming: "So be it! it is done; swords are drawn!"—"Wretch!" Larévellière retorted with sternness, "what dost thou say of swords? There are but knives here, and they are directed against blameless men, whose throats you would cut, since you cannot induce them to commit a weakness!"

Gohier then attempted to interpose as mediator, but was unable to succeed. At this moment, several members of the Ancients and of the Five-Hundred having taken concert together, appeared to entreat the two directors to yield, promising that no act of impeachment should be exhibited against them. Larévellière answered proudly that he asked no favour, that they might impeach him and he would defend himself. The deputies, who had volunteered this mission, then returned to the two Councils and occasioned an egregious ferment by a narrative of what had occurred. Boulay de la Meurthe rose to denounce Larévellière, acknowledging his probity, but reviling him for projects of a new religion and inveighing bitterly against his waywardness, which, he said, threatened to ruin the republic. The patriots gave vent to most intemperate exclamations, and vociferated that since they persisted, no mercy should be shown to the two recusant directors.

The excitement grew to a fearful height, and the struggle being once fairly commenced, it was impossible to determine to what extremities it might lead. In this conjuncture sundry moderate men of the two Councils entered into consultation, and agreed that, in order to avoid some pitiable catastrophe, it was absolutely essential to prevail on Larévellière to succumb. They repaired to his residence during the evening of the 30th, and besought him, in the name of the dangers which beset the republic, to resign his office. They assured him they were all exposed to the utmost peril, and that if he persevered in his resistance they knew not to what extravagance the fury of the parties might be goaded.—"But do you not perceive," Larévellière replied to them, "the greater peril the republic incurs? Do you not see that it is not against you intentions are harboured, but against the Constitution? that in yielding to-day, it becomes incumbent to yield to-morrow, continually, and that the republic will be lost through our weakness?—My functions," he added, "are burdensome to me; and if I am obstinate in now retaining them, it is because I deem it a duty to oppose an insurmountable barrier to the plots of the factious. However, if you all believe that my resistance will expose you to danger, I will surrender; but, I forewarn you, the republic is lost. A single individual cannot save it; I yield therefore, since I remain alone, and I give you my resignation."

He framed it in the course of the night. He accompanied it with a letter, simple and dignified in style, expressive of his motives. Merlin solicited permission to copy it, and the two resignations were forwarded together. Thus was the old Directory dissolved. All the factions it had successively laboured to repress ultimately combined to overpower it, their resentment concentrated on a common object. It was guilty only of one fault, that of being weaker than its enemies; a signal fault, it is true, and one which necessitates the fall of a government.

Notwithstanding the general exasperation, Larévellière carried with him the esteem of all enlightened citizens. On quitting the Directory he declined to receive the hundred thousand francs which his colleagues had agreed to give retiring members; he even rejected the portion to which he was entitled of savings upon their appointments, and left behind him the carriage it was usual for an ex-director to take with him. He withdrew to Andilly, to a small mansion he possessed at that place, where he received the visits of all the eminent men whom the wrath of parties failed to intimidate. The minister Talleyrand was in the number of those who visited the fallen director in his retreat.

CHAPTER LXI.

FORMATION OF THE NEW DIRECTORY.—MOULINS AND ROGER-DUCOS SUCCEED LAREVELLIERE AND MERLIN.—LEVY OF ALL THE CLASSES OF CONSCRIPTS.—FORCED LOAN OF ONE HUNDRED MILLIONS.—FRESH MILITARY PLANS.—RESUMPTION OF OPERATIONS IN ITALY.—JOUBERT GENERAL-IN-CHIEF.—BATTLE OF NOVI AND DEATH OF JOUBERT.—DEBARKATION OF THE ANGLO-RUSSIANS IN HOLLAND.—NEW TROUBLES IN THE INTERIOR; ARREST OF ELEVEN JOURNALISTS; MOTION TO DECLARE THE COUNTRY IN DANGER.

Years assuage party-spirit, but many are needed to extingush it. Passions expire only with the hearts in which they blazed. An entire generation must disappear ere the assumptions of parties subside into legitimate claims, and time can operate between them a fair and reasonable compromise. But before that period arrives, parties are ungovernable by the sole influence of reason. The government which would address them in the language of justice and the laws soon becomes insupportable to them, and the more moderate it is, the more they despise it as weak and impotent. Should it, finding faction deaf to its voice, seek to employ force, it is pronounced tyrannical, reviled as adding iniquity to weakness. Apart from the effects of time, a strong despotism alone can curb exasperated factions. The Directory was that legal and moderate government which endeavoured to impose the restraint of laws upon the parties the revolution had produced, and which so many years had not yet tamed. They all coalesced, as we have just witnessed, on the 30th Prairial, to effect its downfall. The common enemy overthrown, they stood in presence of each other without any rein to guide them. We shall see how they used their license.

The constitution, although no longer but a phantom, was not abolished, and it was requisite to replace, by some shadow of an executive, the dissolved Directory. Gohier had superseded Treilhard; successors were to be found to Larévellière and Merlin. Roger-Ducos and Moulins were chosen. Roger-Ducos was an old Girondist, of upright character, but very moderate capacity, and wholly devoted to Sieyes. He owed his nomination, indeed, to the influence of Sieyes in the Council of Ancients. Moulins was an obscure general, formerly engaged in La Vendée, a zealous and virtuous republican, elected, like Gohier, through the sway of the patriot party. Other men of note, both civil and military, had been put in nomination but rejected. From such selections it was evident the parties were not disposed to give themselves masters. They had raised to the Directory only those mediocre personages usually charged with interim governments.

The new Directory, composed like the Councils of opposite parties, was necessarily weaker and less homogeneous than the preceding. Sieyes, the only superior man among the five directors, dreamed, as we know, of a reformed political organization. He was the chief of the party which designated itself the moderate or constitutional, all the members whereof nevertheless upheld the necessity of a new constitution. He had no attached colleague but Roger-Ducos. Moulins and Gohier, both warm patriots, and incompetent to conceive anything but what existed, supported the actual constitution, but desired to execute and interpret it in the sense of the patriots. As to Barras, naturally occupying the position of arbiter between them, who could rely on him? The chaos of conflicting vices, passions, interests, and ideas which the expiring republic presented, found in him alone a living emblem.

The majority, depending on his vote, was therefore committed to hazard.

Sieyes told his new colleagues pretty roundly that they assumed the direction of a government threatened with a speedy fall, but that the republic must be saved if the constitution could not. This language highly displeased Gohier and Moulins, and was received by them in dudgeon. So, from the first day, opinions seemed in little unison. Sieyes held the same language to Joubert, the general sought to be entrapped in the re-organizing party. But Joubert, a veteran of the army of Italy, partook its political sentiments; he was a stanch patriot, and the views of Sieyes appeared to him suspicious. He opened himself in secret to Gohier and Moulins, and thenceforth manifestly sided with them. But, in truth, these were questions which could only come hereafter under discussion. The urgent and immediate point was to administer and defend the menaced republic. Intelligence of the battle of the Trebbia, universally diffused, had thrown all men into alarm. Decisive measures for the public safety were becom indispensable.

The first care of a government is to do precisely the reverse of its predecessor, were it merely in deference to the passions which have insured its triumph. Championnet, the much-vaunted hero of Naples, Joubert, and Bernadotte, were now destined to emerge from prison or disgrace to fill the highest employments. Championnet was immediately set at liberty, and named general of a new army proposed to be formed along the Great-Alps. Bernadotte was intrusted with the portfolio of the minister of war. Joubert was deputed to command the army of Italy. His achievements in the Tyrol, his youth, and his heroic character, all tended to inspire the most exalted hopes. The re-organizers wished him sufficient success and glory to enable him to promote their schemes. The selection of Joubert was very good doubtless, but it was a fresh injustice to Moreau, who had so generously accepted the command of a defeated army, and saved it with such consummate ability. But Moreau was distasteful to the zealous patriots, who predominated at the moment. He was assigned the command of a pretended army of the Rhine which had no existence.

There were, moreover, sundry changes in the ministry. Ramel, the minister of finance, who had rendered eminent services since the installation of the Directory, and who had officiated during the difficult transition from paper-money to specie, was involved in the odium attached to the old Directory. He was so virulently assailed that, despite the esteem they entertained for him, the new directors were constrained to accept his resignation. They appointed as his successor a man dear to the patriots, and respectable with all parties: Robert Lindet, formerly member of the committee of public welfare, so indecently attacked during the reaction. He strenuously opposed the offer of a portfolio: the experience he had learnt of the injustice of parties was little calculated to induce his resumption of public life. He eventually consented, however, from a spirit of devotion to the republic.

The diplomacy of the Directory had been equally censured with its financial administration. It was accused of having replunged the republic in war with all Europe; most wrongly so, especially if we consider who were the accusers. They were, in fact, the patriots themselves, whose own passions had mainly contributed to stir afresh the embers of war. They reproached the Directory more particularly with the expedition to Egypt, primarily so extolled, and contended that this expedition had provoked the rupture with the Porte and Russia. The minister Talleyrand, already disagreeable to the patriots as an ex-emigrant, had incurred all the responsibility of this diplomacy, and was so hotly denounced hat it became necessary to act with him as with Ramel, and accept his resignation. The successor assigned him was a Wurtemberger, who, under the cloak of German hilarity, concealed a remarkable acumen, and whom M. de Talleyrand himself recommended as the man most capable of taking his place. This was M. Reinhard. It has been said that this appointment was only provisional, and that M. Reinhard held it merely until M. de Talleyrand could be reinstated. The ministry of justice was taken from Lambrechts on account of his health, and conferred on Cambaceres. In the ministry of police was installed Bourguignon, an ex-magistrate, a sincere and honest patriot. Fouché, the ex-jacobin, so supple, so insinuating, whom Barras had interested in the traffic of the companies, and afterwards provided with the embassy to Milan, Fouché, cashiered on account of his conduct in Italy, also passed for a victim of the late Directory. He must, therefore, participate in the triumph awarded to all the victims, real or pretended; he was delegated to the Hague.

Such were the principal changes made in the departments of government and in the armies. The mere change of men availed little; the more essential point was to furnish them with additional capabilities of accomplishing the task, under the weight of which their predecessors had succumbed. The patriots, intent, as usual with them, on revolutionary expedients, maintained that great evils must be met by great remedies. They recurred to the urgent measures of 1793. After having refused all aid to the late Directory, they were content to lavish every resource on the present; they proposed to place in its hands extraordinary means, and compel it to use them too. The committee of eleven, formed from the three committees of expenditure, funds, and war, and charged, during the crisis of Prairial, to devise the means of saving the republic, conferred with the members of the Directory, and digested with them different measures conformable to the dispositions of the moment. Instead of 200,000 men, drawn from the five classes of conscripts, the Directory was empowered to call out the whole of the classes. Instead of the taxes propounded by the late Directory and repudiated with such asperity, a forced loan was again resorted to. Agreeably to the system of the patriots it was to be made progressive, that is to say, in lieu of making each person contribute according to the amount of his direct taxes, which would have at once constituted the lists of property and personal contributions the basis of assessment, each would be obliged to contribute according to his fortune. In that case a taxing jury was requisite, or, in other words, an ambulatory commission to assess wealth. The middle party opposed this project, alleging it to be a revival of the system of terror, and foreboding that the difficulty of assessment would render the measure inefficacious and null, as in the instance of the old forced loans. The patriots replied that the expenses of the war must be thrown, not upon all classes, but upon the rich alone. The same passions, we see, always employ the same reasons. The forced and progressive loan was decreed; it was fixed at one hundred millions, and declared redeemable in national domains.

Besides these measures for recruiting the armies and the finances, the adoption of some police regulation had become indispensable for the suppression of chouannerie in the South, and in the departments of the West, the former theatres of civil war. Fresh depredations and atrocities had been commenced in those quarters; the purchasers of national property, reputed patriots, and public functionaries, were assassinated, and the diligences were stopped and plundered. Among the perpetrators of these enormities were several Vendeans and Chouans, many members of the famous companies of the Sun, and also numerous refractory conscripts. Although these brigands whose presence announced a species of social dissolution, had pillage for their real object, yet it was clear, from the selection of their victims, that they had a political origin or bias. A committee was named to concoct a system of repression. It produced a law, which was called the law of hostages, and has remained celebrated under that name. As the greater part of these crimes was attributed to the relatives of emigrants or ex-nobles, it was in consequence proposed to oblige them to give hostages. Whenever a commune was certified to be in a notorious state of disorder, the relations or connections of emigrants, the ex-nobles, the parents and ascendants of individuals known to form part of the gangs, were considered as hostages, and as civilly and personally responsible for the offences committed. The central administrations were to designate the individuals marked as hostages, and cause them to be incarcerated in houses selected for the purpose. There they were to live at their own expense, and as it behoved them, remaining shut up during the continuance of the disorder. When the delinquencies reached the height of murder, four hostages were to be banished for every assassination. All that might be urged for or against such a law is easily conceived. It afforded, argued its partisans, the only mode of reaching the authors of the disorders, and this mode was mild and humane. It constituted, retorted its adversaries, a new law of the suspected, a revolutionary law, which, in the incapacity to reach the true culprits, smote indiscriminately, and inflicted all the injustices attendant upon laws of that nature. In a word, pro and con the same arguments were repeated which we have so often had occasion to quote in the course of this history touching revolutionary laws. But an insuperable objection existed against this measure beyond all others. These brigands springing solely from an actual social dissolution, the only fitting remedy lay in a vigorous reorganization of the state, and not in measures utterly discredited, and which were incapable of imparting any force to the springs of government.

The law was passed after a warm discussion, during which the parties that had for a moment combined to supplant the old Directory, separated amid a blaze of invective. To these important measures, designed to arm the government with revolutionary powers, others were added tending, in different respects, to curtail its prerogative. These accessory measures were a consequence of the reproaches levelled against the late Directory. To prevent secessions for the future, it was decreed that the return of every electoral fraction should be void; that every agent of the government seeking to influence elections should be punished as for a crime against the sovereignty of the people; that the Directory should not bring troops within the constitutional radius without an express authority; that no military officer could be deprived of his grade without the decision of a court-martial; that the privilege granted to the Directory of issuing warrants of arrest could no longer be delegated to agents; that no person in government employment, or any functionary whatsoever, could be either a contractor or even interested in the bargains of contractors; and that a club could not be formed without the sanction of the municipal and central administrations. With regard to the press, it was found impossible to agree upon a law for its regulation; but the article in the law of the 19th Fructidor, which conferred on the Directory the power of suppressing journals, continued nevertheless repealed; therefore, pending a new enactment, the press remained indefinitely free.

Such were the acts adopted consequent upon the 30th Prairial, both to reform alleged abuses, and to restore to the government the energy it needed. But measures taken in moments of crisis, in the sequel of a change of system, and intended to save a state, rarely achieve the object in view, for all is often decided before they can be brought into effectual action. They provide for the most part only resources for the future. The loan of a hundred millions, and the new levies, could not be raised for some months. Nevertheless, the effect of a crisis is to give an impetus to the motions of government, and inspire it with vigour. Bernadotte hastened to send into all quarters pressing circulars, and thus succeeded in accelerating the organization already commenced of the battalions of conscripts. Robert Lindet, to whom the loan of a hundred millions presented no immediate resource, assembled the principal bankers and merchants of the metropolis, and urged them to lend their credit to the state. They consented, and gave their signatures to the minister of finance. They formed themselves into a syndicate, and pending the receipt of the taxes, signed bills which they were to be reimbursed as products were realized. This constituted a sort of temporary bank established for the exigencies of the moment.

New plans of campaign were likewise deemed necessary, and Bernadotte was asked for a scheme. He speedily produced one of a singular character, which was fortunately not put in execution. A field of battle so vast as that over which operations extended was of course susceptible of numerous combinations. Every one studying it might entertain a different idea; and if each were allowed to submit his individual impressions, and have them adopted, there might be a change of project every instant. If in discussion a variety of counsel is advantageous, in execution it is deplorable. In the outset, it had been determined to act simultaneously on the Danube and in Switzerland. After the battle of Stockach, it was resolved to operate only in Switzerland, and the army of the Danube was suppressed. At present, Bernadotte was of a different persuasion; he imagined that the cause of the success of the allies lay in the facility with which they were enabled to communicate, over the Alps, from Germany into Italy. To debar them from these means of communication, he suggested that Saint-Gothard and the Grisons on the right wing of the army of Switzerland should be wrested from them, and that an army of the Danube should be formed to re-carry the war into the heart of Germany. To compose this army of the Danube, he proposed to promptly organize the army of the Rhine, and to reinforce it with 20,000 men abstracted from Massena. This was effectually to compromise the latter, who had before him all the forces of the Archduke, and might readily be overwhelmed under the effect of this displacement. True; it would have been advisable to carry back the war to the Danube, but it was sufficient to give Massena the means of assuming the offensive, in order that his army might itself become this identical army of the Danube. Hence, his hands were to be strengthened rather than weakened. According to Bernadotte's plan, an army was to be assembled on the Great-Alps, in order to cover the frontier against the Austro-Russians on the side of Piedmont. And Joubert, collecting the remains of all the armies in Italy, and reinforced by disposable troops from the interior, was to debouch from the Apennines and fall upon Suwarrov with irresistible force.

This plan, highly approved by Moulins, was forwarded to the generals. Massena, weary of these fickle and extravagant projects, tendered his resignation. It was not accepted, nor the plan put in execution. Massena retained the command of all the troops from Basle to Saint-Gothard. The scheme of mustering an army on the Rhine to protect that line was however persisted in. An army-nucleus was formed on the Alps, under the orders of Championnet. This nucleus was nearly 15,000 men strong.

All the reinforcements disposable were sent to the army under Joubert, who it was intended should debouch from the Apennines. It was now the very middle of the season, Messidor (July). The reinforcements began to reach his camp. A certain number of veteran battalions, hitherto detained in the interior, were moved to the frontier. The conscripts were organizing, and destined to replace the veteran troops in the garrisons. Lastly, as the depôts were insufficient for the great number of conscripts, the device of augmenting the number of battalions in the demi-brigades or regiments was hit upon, which permitted the incorporation of the new levies in the old corps.

A reinforcement of 30,000 Russians was known to be advancing through Germany, under the orders of General Korsakof. Consequently, Massena was urged to move from his positions and attack those of the Archduke, in order to defeat him if possible before his junction with the Russians. In this respect the government doubtless judged correctly, since it was of importance to make an attempt before so imposing a mass of troops was concentrated. However, Massena refused to act upon the offensive, either that he lacked in this instance his wonted daring, or that he awaited the resumption of hostilities in Italy. Military authorities have all condemned his inaction, which, in truth, proved eventually fortunate through the blunders of the enemy, and was at all events redeemed by illustrious exploits. Still, in obedience to the instances of the government, and in partial execution of Bernadotte's plan, the grand feature of which was to prevent the Austro-Russians from communicating between Germany and Italy, Massena ordered Lecourbe to prolong his right as far as Saint-Gothard, seize upon that important point, and retake the Grisons. By this operation the Great-Alps reverted under the command of the French, and the hostile armies engaged in Germany were cut off from communication with those acting in Italy. Lecourbe performed the enterprise with the intrepidity and hardihood which distinguished him in mountain warfare, and once more rendered himself master of Saint-Gothard.

Meanwhile, fresh events were pending in Italy. Suwarrov, explicitly enjoined by the court of Vienna to reduce all the fortresses before pushing his advantages, had not profited in the slightest degree by his victory on the Trebbia. He might, indeed, even whilst conforming with his instructions, have reserved a mass sufficient to scatter to the winds the broken remnants of the French; but his genius was inadequate to military combinations of that description. He consumed his time, therefore, in prosecuting sieges. Peschiera, Pizzighitone, and the citadel of Milan, had fallen. The citadel of Turin had undergone the like fate. The two celebrated strongholds of Mantua and Alessandria still held out and gave promise of a long resistance. Kray beleaguered Mantua, and Bellegarde Alessandria. Unfortunately all the places had been intrusted to commanders destitute either of energy or education. The artillery was inefficiently served, since none but shattered corps had been thrown into them; whilst the distance of the active armies, driven back on the Apennines, singularly depressed the courage of their defenders. Mantua, the principal of these fortresses, was far from deserving the reputation Bonaparte's siege had conferred upon it. Not its strength, but the concatenation of circumstances had then protracted its defence. Bonaparte, in fact, with 10,000 men had shut up within its walls 14,000 to perish of fever and famine. At present General Latour-Foissac was the governor of Mantua. He was an experienced officer of engineers, but deficient in the vigour requisite for the particular nature of the service required. Discouraged by the irregularity of the place, and the defective state of the fortifications, he had no idea of supplying the want of walls by activity and boldness. Moreover, his garrison was insufficient, and, after the first assaults, he appeared disposed to surrender. General Gardanne commanded at Alessandria. He was a man of determination, but not adequately instructed. He vigorously repulsed a first assault; nevertheless, he was incompetent to discern in the place the resources it still presented.

More than a month had elapsed since the revolution of the 30th Prairial and the nomination of Joubert. Moreau was sensible of the importance of assuming the aggressive before the fall of all the fortresses, and of debouching, with the army reorganized and reinforced, upon the dispersed Austro-Russians. Unhappily he was fettered by directions from the government enjoining him to await the arrival of Joubert. Thus, in this calamitous campaign, a series of untimely incongruous orders had always been the cause of the reverses. Instability of ideas and plans in matters of execution, more particularly in war, is invariably prejudicial. If Moreau, to whom the command ought to have been given at first, had held it even since the battle of Cassano without participation, all would have been well; but associated now with Macdonald, now with Joubert, he was prevented for the second and third time from retrieving the disasters and vindicating the honour of the French arms.

Joubert, whom it was sought to attach, by a marriage and flattering attentions, to the party contemplating a reorganization, wasted a whole month, that of Messidor (June and July), in celebrating his nuptials, and thus lost a decisive opportunity. He was not actually gained to the party so desirous of his support, for he remained devoted to the patriots, and the precious interval was in that respect fruitlessly consumed. He at length departed, saying to his young spouse: "Thou wilt see me again dead or victorious." He bore with him, in truth, the heroic determination to conquer or to die. Upon reaching the army in the middle of Thermidor (beginning of August), this ingenuous young general testified the utmost deference towards the consummate master he was appointed to supersede. He besought him to remain with him to assist him with his counsels. Moreau, equally generous with the young soldier, consented to be present at his first battle and give him the benefit of his experience. Noble and touching brotherhood, which reflects high honour on the virtues of the republican generals, and belongs to a time when patriotic zeal still overcame ambition in the hearts of French warriors!

The French army, composed of the relics of the armies of Upper-Italy and Naples and of reinforcements from the interior, amounted to 40,000 men, perfectly reorganized and burning with desire to measure swords again with the enemy. Nothing could excel the patriotic ardour of these soldiers, who, though constantly defeated, had never been discouraged, but still demanded to be led against their insolent foes. No republican army ever deserved better of France, for none more fully repelled the unjust reproach attached to the French of being unable to support reverses. Unquestionably, its firmness was partly owing to the brave and unassuming general in whom it had placed all its confidence, and who was taken from it always at the moment he was about to conduct it again to victory.

These 40,000 men were independent of the 15,000 intended to serve, under Championnet, as the nucleus of the army of the Great-Alps. They had debouched by the Bormida on Acqui, by the Bochetta on Gavi, and taken position in front of Novi. An army of such force might, by debouching in time, before the junction of the different corps engaged in sieges, have gained decisive advantages. But Alessandria had recently opened its gates, on the 4th Thermidor (22d July). A vague rumour also prevailed that Mantua had likewise surrendered. Thi and report was soon confirmed, and tidings arrive that the capitulation had been signed on the 12th Thermidor (30th July). Kray had just joined Suwarrov with 20,000 men, and the operative mass o the Austrio-Russians was now augmented to sixty and some thousand men. Hence it was no longer possible for Joubert to contend on equal terms with an enemy so superior. He held a council of war, which the general opinion was in favour of retreating into the Apennines and acting on the defensive in expectation of additional forces.

Joubert was about to execute this resolution when he was anticipated by Suwarrov and obliged to accept battle. The French army was ranged in a semicircle on the slopes of the Monte-Rotondo, commanding the whole plain of Novi. The left, formed of the divisions under Grouchy and Lemoine, extended circularly in front of Pasturana. It had behind the ravine of Riasco, which rendered its rear accessible to an enemy sufficiently daring to entangle himself in the ravine. The reserve of cavalry, commanded by Richepanse, was in the rear of this wing. In the centre, the division of Laboissière covered the heights to the right and left of the town of Novi. Watrin's division, on the right wing, defended the approaches of the Monte-Rotondo, on the side of the Tortona road. Dombrowski with a division blocked Seravalla. General Perignon commanded the French left, and Saint-Cyr the centre and right. The position was strong, advantageously occupied on all points, and assuredly difficult to force. Still forty thousand men against upwards of sixty thousand laboured under an immense disadvantage. Suwarrov resolved to attack the position with his accustomed violence. He directed Kray on the French left with the divisions of Ott and Bellegarde. The Russian corps under Derfelden, having in front the vanguard led by Bagration, was appointed to attack their centre at Novi. Melas, remaining a little in the rear with the rest of the army, was to assail their right. By a singular combination, or rather through a want of combination, the attacks were to be successive and not simultaneous.

At five in the morning of the 28th Thermidor (15th August), Kray commenced the attack. Bellegarde selected the division under Grouchy on the extreme left and Ott the division under Lemoine. These two divisions being yet unformed were nearly surprised and broken. The obstinate resistance of one of the demi-brigades obliged Kray to throw himself upon the 20th Light, which he routed, concentrating upon it his principal effort. His troops were already gaining ground on the plateau, when Joubert galloped in all haste to the point of danger. There was no longer time to think of a retreat, and every hazard must be encountered to repel the enemy to the foot of the plateau. Advancing amidst the tirailleurs to encourage them, Joubert received a bullet which struck him near the heart and stretched him on the ground. On the point of expiring, the young hero still cried to his soldiers: "Forward, my Friends, forward." This untoward event was calculated to throw the army into disorder; but fortunately Moreau had accompanied Joubert to the spot. He immediately took the command, which was resigned to him by the general confidence, rallied the troops, inflamed with resentment, and led them on the Austrians. The grenadiers of the 34th chased them at the point of the bayonet and hurled them to the foot of the hill. It was to be regretted the French had not yet their artillery in battery, whilst the Austrians, on the contrary, ploughed their ranks with a storm of shells and balls. During this action, Bellegarde attempted to turn the extreme right by the ravine of Riasco, which has been already mentioned as giving access to the French rear. He had advanced a considerable distance, when Perignon, confronting him opportunely with the reserve commanded by General Clausel, arrested his march. Perignon succeeded in driving him back into the plain, charging upon him the grenadiers of Partouneaux and the cavalry under Richepanse. This vigorous exploit disembarrassed the left wing.

Under favour of the peculiar combination planned by Suwarrov, who designed to render his attacks successive, the French centre had not yet been attacked. Saint-Cyr had gained time to make his dispositions and draw towards Novi Watrin's division, forming his extreme right. At the instance of Kray, who begged to be supported by an attack in the centre, Bagration finally determined to assault him with his vanguard. Laboissière's division, which stood to the left of Novi, allowing Bagration's Russians to approach within half-musket-shot, suddenly overwhelmed them with a terrible discharge of musketry and grape and strewed the field with dead. Without giving ground, Bagration detached some battalions to turn Novi on the right; but, encountered by the division of Watrin, which was approximating Novi, they were repulsed into the plain.

Thus the middle of the day arrived without the French line being impinged. Suwarrov had just come up with the Russian corps under Derfelden. He immediately commanded a general attack along the whole line. Kray was again to assail the left, Derfelden and Bagration the centre; whilst Melas was enjoined to accelerate his pace and fall upon the right of the French. All being ready, the Austro-Russians advanced upon the entire line. Kray, charging furiously on the left, again sought to break it in front; but the reserve under Clausel worsted the troops of Bellegarde, and Lemoine's division routed Ott upon the slopes of the hills. In the centre, Suwarrov opened a tremendous assault both right and left of Novi. A fresh attempt to turn the town was foiled, as in the morning, by Watrin's division. The French soldiers, unfortunately, impelled by their ardour, abandoned themselves too hotly to the pursuit of the enemy, adventured into the plain, and were with difficulty rallied into position. At one o'clock, the action slackened from mutual fatigue; but it speedily recommenced with violence, and during four successive hours the French, firm as a wall of rock, resisted with admirable coolness the furious onslaughts of the Russians. They had as yet suffered an inconsiderable loss. The Austro-Russians on the contrary had been horribly butchered. The plain was choked with their slain and dying. At this moment, the rest of the Austro-Russian army arrived from Rivalta under the orders of Melas. This new irruption was intended for the French right. Saint-Cyr, descrying its approach, recalled Watrin's division, which had advanced too far on the plain, and directed it on a plateau to the right of Novi. But whilst operating this movement, it found itself already enveloped on all sides by the numerous corps of Melas. This discovery bewildered it; it instantly broke and gained the plateau in disorder. It was rallied however a little in the rear. In the meantime, Suwarrov, redoubling his efforts on the centre at Novi, finally drove the French into the town, and stormed the heights which commanded it both right and left. From that moment, Moreau, deeming a retreat unavoidable, ordered it before the further progress of the enemy barred the communications on Gavi. On the right, Watrin's division was obliged to cut its way to gain the Gavi road which was already blocked. Laboissière's division retired from Novi; while Lemoine's and Grouchy's divisions recoiled on Pasturana, sustaining the furious charges of Kray. A hostile battalion unluckily penetrated through the ravine of Riasco, which extends beyond Pasturana.

Its fire threw the French columns into dismal confusion; infantry, artillery, cavalry, all were confounded. Lemoine's division, pressed by the enemy, disbanded and poured into the ravine. The French soldiers were swept away like chaff before the wind. Perignon and Grouchy rallied a few brave men to arrest the enemy and save the artillery; but they were cut down and made prisoners. Perignon had received seven wounds, Grouchy six, all sabre-cuts. The gallant Colli, the Piedmontese General who had so highly distinguished himself in the early campaigns against the French, and had afterwards taken service in their armies, formed in square with some battalions, resisted until broken and forced, and fell all-mutilated into the hands of the Russians.

After this first moment of confusion, the French army rallied in advance of Gavi. The Austro-Russians were too exhausted to follow in pursuit. It was enabled to re-form in marching order without being incommoded. The loss on both sides was equal; it amounted to about ten thousand men in each army. But the killed and wounded were far the most numerous on the part of the Austro-Russians. The French had lost more prisoners. They had likewise lost their general-in-chief, four generals of division, thirty-seven pieces of ordnance and four colours. Never had they displayed more cool or pertinacious valour. They were inferior to the enemy by at least a third. The Russians had manifested their fanatical bravery, but owed their advantage solely to the superiority of numbers, and certainly not to the combinations of their general, who had exhibited the profoundest ignorance. He had in fact exposed his columns to be mowed down one after the other, and had failed to point his efforts sufficiently against the French left, which was the position it behoved him especially to carry. This deplorable battle definitively shut out the French from Italy, and permitted them no longer to keep the field. They were compelled to remain close within the Apennines, happy to be enabled to retain them. The loss of the battle could not be imputed to Moreau, but to the lamentable circumstance of the junction between Kray and Suwarrov. Joubert's procrastination, in truth, had alone occasioned this last disaster.

The French misfortunes were not limited to the battle of Novi. The expedition against Holland, previously intimated, was at length undertaken by the combined British and Russians. Paul had concluded a treaty with Pitt, by which he bound himself to furnish 17,000 Russians, to be in the pay of England and to act in Holland. After many difficulties had been encountered and overcome, the expedition had been prepared towards the end of August (beginning of Fructidor): 30,000 English were intended to join the 17,000 Russians, and if the debarkation were effected without obstacle, confident hopes were entertained of wresting Holland from the hands of the French. It was a subject of the deepest concern to England; and did she succeed merely in destroying the fleets and arsenals of Holland, she would be sufficiently remunerated for the expenses of the expedition. A powerful squadron sailed in the direction of the Sound in quest of the Russians. A first detachment embarked under the orders of General Abercrombie to attempt a landing. All the troops of the expedition when once collected were to be under the supreme command of the Duke of York.

The most advantageous point to land in Holland was the embouchure of the Meuse. There the French line of retreat was menaced, and the Hague, where the Stadtholder had most partisans, was close at hand. The convenience of the coast caused North Holland to be preferred. Abercrombie proceeded towards the Helder, where he arrived about the end of August. After sundry obstacles, he disembarked near the Helder, in the environs of Groot-Keeten, on the 10th Fructidor (27th August). The immense preparations the expedition had required, and the presence of all the English fleets on the coasts, had sufficiently warned the French to be upon their guard. Brune commanded both the French and Batavian armies. He had scarcely under his orders above 7,000 French and 10,000 Dutch commanded by Daendels. He had directed the Batavian division to the vicinity of the Helder, and disposed the French division in the neighbourhood of Haerlem. On disembarking, Abercrombie encountered the Dutch at Groot-Keeten, worsted them, and thus succeeded in safely landing his troops. The Dutch, on this occasion, showed themselves not deficient in bravery, but they were not commanded with competent ability by General Daendels and were compelled to retreat. Brune rallied them, and made his dispositions to attack with promptitude the disembarked troops, before they had firmly established themselves, or been reinforced by the English and Russian divisions on their way to join them.

The Dutch evinced very favourable dispositions. The national guards offered to garrison the fortresses, which allowed Brune to draw additional troops into the field. He had summoned to his aid the division of Dumonceau, 6,000 men strong, and he resolved to attack, at the commencement of September, the camp in which the English had planted themselves. This camp was formidably situated on the Zip, formerly a marsh but drained by Dutch industry, and now an extensive plain intersected by canals, thickly strewed with dykes, and studded with habitations: 17,000 English occupied it, with the best possible defensive dispositions. Brune could muster but 20,000 men at the utmost to execute the assault, which was an insufficient force considering the nature of the ground. He attacked this camp on the 22d Fructidor (8th September), and, after a desperate conflict, was obliged to beat a retreat and fall back on Amsterdam. Thenceforth, he was no longer in a position to prevent the junction of the Anglo-Russian forces, and must await the formation of a French army to oppose them. This establishment of the English in Nord-Holland occasioned an event which was chiefly to be dreaded, the defection of the Dutch fleet. No pains had been taken to close the Texel, and the English Admiral Mitchell was enabled to enter it with all his squadron. For some time past the Dutch sailors had been tampered with by emissaries of the Prince of Orange; accordingly, at the first summons of Admiral Mitchell, they mutinied and compelled Storey, their admiral, to strike. The whole Dutch navy thus fell into the power of the English, in itself an advantage of inestimable price.

As tidings of these events successively reached Paris, they produced the effect naturally to be anticipated. They increased the excitement of all parties but especially of the patriots, who clamoured, with greater vehemence than ever, for the employment of revolutionary expedients. The license restored to journals and clubs had called a great number of both into existence. The remains of the Jacobin party had collected in the old hall of the Manege, where the first assemblies had sat. Although the law prohibited popular societies from assuming the form of deliberative assemblies, the society of the Manege had notwithstanding given itself, under different titles, a president, secretaries, and other officers. It was frequented by the ex-minister Bouchotte, Drouet, Felix Lepelletier, and Arena, all disciples or accomplices of Babœuf. Here they invoked the shades of Goujon, Soubrany, and the victims of Grenelle. And here were demanded, in the style of 1793, the punishment of the blood-suckers of the people, the disarming of royalists, the levy en masse, the establishment of manufactures of arms in the public places, the restitution of cannons and pikes to the national guards, &c. The impeachment of the late directors was particularly insisted upon, since to them the recent disasters were unhesitatingly ascribed, as falling within the results of their administration. When intelligence of the battle of Novi and of the events in Holland arrived, the ferment exceeded all bounds. Direful imprecations were lavished upon the generals. Moreau was reviled as a fumbler; Joubert himself, despite his heroic death, was accused of having destroyed the army by his delay in joining it. His young wife, with Messieurs de Semonville, Sainte-Foy and Talleyrand, to whom his marriage was attributed, were loaded with the vilest abuse. The Dutch government was denounced as guilty of treachery; it was alleged to be composed of aristocrats, of stadtholderians, all enemies of France and liberty. The Journal of Free Men, the organ of the party congregating in the hall of the Manege, continually declaimed in this rabid style, and aggravated the abomination of its matter by accessary incentives in its publication.

These manifestations awakened in many breasts a sensation of terror. A fresh representation of the scenes of 93 was apprehended. Those who designated themselves moderates, or politicians, and who, treading in the path of Sieyes, harboured the laudable desire but presumptuous conceit of saving France from the fury of parties by re-constituting it, were much incensed by the outbreak of these revived Jacobins. Sieyes especially, who held them in habitual fear, declared against them with all the force of his acerbity. And doubtless they wore a formidable aspect, for independently of the bawlers and fire-eaters, who paraded their patriotic energy in clubs and journals, they counted partisans of a graver complexion, more powerful, and consequently more dangerous, ay in the government itself. In the Councils, the patriots, once excluded by the device of secessions, and forcibly returned in the elections of this year, repeated, with variations of a more moderate character, nearly the language used in the society of the Manege. They were men who demurred to risk the chances of a new constitution, and regarded with suspicion those who professed to desire one, dreading, above all, lest they should seek for aid amongst the generals. They upheld, moreover, that, to extricate France from her dangers, measures similar to those employed by the committee of public welfare were necessary. The Ancients, more temperate and discreet from their position, were but slightly imbued with this opinion; yet it was a doctrine hotly supported by upwards of two hundred members in the Five-Hundred. In this number were not merely such obstreperous personages as Augereau, but prudent and enlightened men like Jourdan. These two generals served to give the patriot party a great ascendency in the Five-Hundred. In the Directory, this party had two votes, those of Gohier and Moulins. Barras remained undecided; on one hand he distrusted Sieyes, who testified an aversion towards him and shunned him as one tainted; on the other, he dreaded the patriots and their extravagances. Thus he hesitated to declare himself. In the ministry, the patriots had unexpectedly gained an adherent in Bernadotte. This general was not nearly so emphatic in his principles as the majority of the generals who had served in Italy, and it may be remembered that his division on arriving upon the Tagliamento, became involved in a quarrel with that of Augereau on the subject of the word monsieur, which it had already substituted for citizen. But Bernadotte was of a fretful ambition; he had viewed with sullen anger the confidence reposed in Joubert by the reorganizing party, and believed Moreau now the object of attention since the death of Joubert; which circumstance, inciting him against the projects of reorganization, attached him irresistibly to the patriots. General Marbot, commander of the garrison of Paris, a violent republican, was of the same disposition as Bernadotte.

Thus, two hundred deputies avowed partisans in the Five-Hundred, at whose head were two celebrated generals, the minister at war, the governor of Paris, two directors, numerous journals and clubs, and a large residuum of men compromised and fit for any enterprise, might reasonably cause some alarm; and, though the party of the Mountain might not be resuscitated, yet it is easy to conceive the terrors which even its shadow would inspire in the breasts of men who shuddered at the recollection of 1793.

At this time it happened that Bourguignon gave cause of dissatisfaction in his exercise of the functions of the police. He was an honest citizen, but too inconsiderate. Barras suggested to Sieyes a substitute in the person of his creature, for whom he had recently procured the embassy to Holland, the wily and astute Fouché. An old associate of the Jacobins, perfectly initiated in their spirit and mysteries, wholly indifferent to their cause, and intent only amid the shipwreck of parties on his own fortune, Fouché was eminently adapted to keep watch over his former friends, and shield the Directory from their designs. He was accepted by Sieyes and Roger-Ducos, and obtained the ministry of police. Under the circumstances he was an invaluable acquisition. He fortified Barras in the tendency to side rather with the reorganizing than with the patriot party, because the latter had no future in perspective, or such as it had might be carried to a dangerous excess.

This precaution taken, war against the patriots commenced. Sieyes, who had great influence over the Ancients, inasmuch as that Council was almost wholly composed of moderates and politicians, now exercised it to have the new society of Jacobins suppressed. The hall of the Manege, being contiguous to the Tuileries, was comprised within the precincts of the palace of the Ancients. Each Council having the police of its own precincts, the Ancients were entitled to close the hall of the Manege. Accordingly, the committee of inspectors issued an order prohibiting any future assemblage in that hall. A simple sentinel placed at the door sufficed to prevent the meeting of the new Jacobins. This was a proof that, if the declamation were the same, their strength at least was very different. The order in question was vindicated before the Council of Ancients by a report of the deputy Cornet. Courtois, he who had framed the report on the 9th Thermidor, seized this occasion to make a fresh denunciation of the plots of the Jacobins. His oration was followed by a debate resulting in an order for a report upon the subject.

The patriots, driven from the hall of the Manege, retired to a spacious building situated in the rue du Bac, where they resumed their accustomed vociferations. Their organization as a deliberative assembly remaining as before, the constitution gave the executive power the right of dissolving their society. Sieyes, Roger-Ducos, and Barras, at the instance of Fouché, determined to close it. Gohier and Moulins dissented from this course, contending that, in the present danger, it was necessary to quicken public spirit by means of clubs; and that if the new society of Jacobins contained turbulent characters, it boasted no formidable supporters, since it had succumbed before a single sentinel when the hall of the Manege was shut. Their opposition was not heeded, and the determination to stifle the society carried. The execution was deferred till after the celebration of the anniversary of the 10th August, which was to be held on the 23d Thermidor. Sieyes being president of the Directory, in that capacity it was his province to deliver a discourse during the solemnity. He took occasion to pronounce a remarkable harangue, in which he strove forcibly to illustrate the perils in which the new anarchists threatened to involve the republic, and denounced them as dangerous conspirators, contemplating a fresh revolutionary dictatorship. The patriots present at the ceremony received this oration with stormy disapprobation, and uttered sundry derisive exclamations. Amidst the salvos of the artillery, Sieyes and Barras were startled by the belief they heard bullets whistling past their ears, and retreated to the Directory inflamed with indignation. Distrusting the authorities of Paris, they resolved to take the command of the garrison from General Marbot, who was accused of being an unscrupulous patriot, and implicated in the alleged plots of the Jacobins. Fouché recommended in his stead Lefebvre, a brave general, acquainted only with military routine, and a total stranger to the intrigues of parties. Marbot was therefore dismissed, and, on the second day thereafter, the ordinance commanding the suppression of the society of the rue du Bac was published.

The patriots offered no greater resistance in the rue du Bac than at the Manege. They withdrew, and remained definitively separated. But the press continued open to them, and they turned it to formidable account. The paper called the Journal of Free Men vituperated, in terms of extreme virulence, the members of the Directory known to have sanctioned the ordinance. Sieyes was remorselessly assailed.—"This perfidious priest," said the patriot journals, "has sold the republic to Prussia. It is arranged with that power to restore monarchy in France, and give the crown to Brunswick."—Such assertions had no better foundations than the well-known opinion of Sieyes on the constitution, and his residence in Prussia. He was wont to repeat, in fact, almost daily, that blustering demagogues rendered all government impossible; that authority must be concentrated; that liberty was compatible even with monarchy, as England testified; but that it was incompatible with this successive domination of various parties. Another saying was attributed to him, that the north of Europe was full of wise and moderate princes, who might, with a vigorous constitution, secure the happiness of France. These opinions, whether true or false, sufficed to cast on him imputations of schemes which existed only in the imagination of his enemies. Barras was not more leniently treated than Sieyes. The forbearance the patriots had long exhibited towards him, because he had always flattered them with his support, was now at an end. They proclaimed him a traitor, a rotten corruptionist, one who was of no use to any party. Fouché, his adviser, an apostate like himself, was covered with similar opprobrium. Roger-Ducos was, according to them, a mere imbecile, blindly subservient to the dictation of two traitors.

The liberty of the press was unlimited. The law proposed by Berlier having been allowed to drop, there existed but one mode of silencing writers, which was to revive a law of the convention against those who, by word or deed, tended to subvert the republic. It was necessary that this intention should be demonstrated to render the law applicable, and then the penalty of death was awarded. Hence, no available use could be made of such a provision. A new law had been demanded from the legislative body, and a resolution passed to take the subject into immediate consideration. But, in the meanwhile, the attacks continued with unabated violence; and the three directors composing the majority declared that it was impossible to govern. In this extremity they conceived the idea of applying the 144th article of the constitution, which gave to the Directory the power of issuing warrants of arrest against the authors or accomplices of plots hatched against the republic. The article assuredly required to be [illegible]rly strained to reach the case of the journalist[illegible]evertheless, as it afforded a means of stifling the abuse of their pens, by apprehending their persons and seizing their presses, the directorial majority, on the advice of Fouché, issued warrants of arrest against the editors of eleven journals, and caused seals to be affixed on their presses. The ordinance was signified on the 17th Fructidor (5th September) to the legislative body, and produced an explosion on the part of the patriots. They railed, as the occasion warranted, against a stretch of authority, a transgression of the law, a dictatorship, &c. &c.

Such was the situation of affairs. In the Directory, in the Councils, everywhere in fact, the moderates, the politicians, contended against the patriots. The former had a majority in the Directory as likewise in the Councils. The patriots were in a minority, but they were sufficiently ardent and boisterous to alarm their adversaries. Fortunately, means of aggression were worn threadbare as the parties themselves, and they could cause each other little injury beyond mutual dread. The Directory had twice closed the new society of Jacobins, and suppressed their journals. The patriots exclaimed and threatened, but had no longer sufficient audacity or sufficient partisans to venture an open attack upon the government. In this condition of things, which had lasted since the 30th Prairial, that is to say, for nearly three months, a suggestion was started, very common on the eve of decisive events, for a reconciliation. Several deputies on both sides proposed an interview with the members of the Directory, in order to explain and remove their respective causes of complaint.—"We all cherish liberty," they said, "we all aspire to save it from the perils to which it is exposed by the defeat of our armies; let us endeavour then to agree upon the choice of expedients, since that choice is the sole occasion of our disunion."—The interview was held at the residence of Barras. There never was nor can be a reconciliation between parties, for it requires a renunciation of their several aims, which it were hopeless to expect from a conference. The patriot deputies complained that plots were constantly spoken of, and that the president of the Directory had himself alluded to a class of dangerous men who meditated the ruin of the republic. They demanded that these men should be specified, so that they might not be confounded with the patriots. Sieyes, to whom this interpellation was addressed, replied by reviewing the conduct of the popular societies and the journals, and descanting on the dangers of a fresh anarchy. He was again requested to designate the real anarchists that they might be combined against and opposed.—"And how combine against them," exclaimed Sieyes, "when every day members of the legislative body ascend the tribune to abet them?"—"It is then we you attack?" retorted the deputies to whom Sieyes had made this observation. "When we desire to make peace with you, you abuse and repel us!"—Anger supervening, the meeting immediately separated, words of defiance rather than of conciliation falling from the lips of all as they departed.

Immediately after this interview, Jourdan formed the resolution of mooting an important proposition, to wit, a declaration of the country being in danger. Such a motion if carried, involved the levy in mass and several great revolutionary measures. It was submitted to the Five-Hundred on the 25th Fructidor (13th September). The moderate party strenuously opposed it, alleging that such an announcement, far from adding to the strength of the government, would only tend to diminish it, by exciting exaggerated fears and dangerous agitation. The patriots, on the other hand, maintained that it was necessary to use a powerful lever to raise public spirit and save the revolution. The expedient, however efficacious in 1793, could not succeed at the present moment, and was but an erroneous application of the past. Lucien Bonaparte, Boulay de la Meurthe, and Chenier spoke energetically against its adoption, and carried an adjournment of the debate until the following day. Meanwhile, the patriots of the clubs had tumultuously surrounded the palace of the Five-Hundred, and insulted several deputies. A rumour began to spread that Bernadotte, upon their eager solicitations, was about to take horse, place himself at their head, and provoke a catastrophe. It was certain that several of the more headstrong of the party had vehemently urged him to do so. That he would allow himself to be persuaded by them was at least a matter of apprehension. Barras and Fouché consequently hastened to visit him, and endeavour to ascertain his intentions. They found him full of resentment against the projects which he asserted to have been planned with Joubert. Barras and Fouché assured him he was deceived, and besought him to remain tranquil.

They returned to Sieyes, when it was agreed to extort from Bernadotte his resignation, without appearing to dismiss him. So Sieyes, entering into conversation with Bernadotte the same day, adroitly led him to confess that he desired soon to resume active service, and that he would regard the command of an army as the most agreeable reward of his ministry. Forthwith, interpreting this avowal as a request to be relieved from office, Sieyes, Barras, and Roger-Ducos resolved to write to Bernadotte, notifying that his resignation was accepted. They embraced the opportunity when Gohier and Moulins were absent to take this determination. On the morrow the letter itself was written to Bernadotte. On receiving it he was struck with amazement, and returned to the Directory a very sour rejoinder, in which he stated that a resignation had been accepted which was never given, and demanded his retiring allowance. Intelligence of this disguised dismissal was announced in the Council of Five-Hundred, at the very moment it was about to divide on the motion of the country being in danger. It occasioned a considerable uproar. "They are preparing coups d'etat!" exclaimed the patriots.—"Let us swear to die on our curule chairs!" cried Jourdan emphatically.—"My head shall fall," vociferated the impetuous Augereau, "before any outrage shall be committed upon the national representation!" At last, after a prodigious tumult, the vote was taken. By a majority of two hundred and forty-five against one hundred and seventy-one voices, the proposition of Jourdan was negatived and the country not declared in danger.

When the two directors Gohier and Moulins learnt the deprivation of Bernadotte, adopted without their participation, they complained to their colleagues, saying that such a step ought not to have been taken without the co-operation of all the five directors.—"We formed the majority," Sieyes replied to them, "and we had a right to do what we have done." Gohier and Moulins immediately proceeded to pay Bernadotte an official visit, which they took pains to make with the greatest parade and publicity.

Dubois de Crancé succeeded Bernadotte in the ministry at war. The administration of the department of the Seine having also inspired some distrust in the directorial majority, it was likewise abruptly changed.

Thus the disorganization was complete in all respects; defeated without by the coalition, convulsed within by parties, the republic seemed tottering to its fall. A power from some source was needed sufficient to curb domestic factions and resist foreign enemies. This power could be no longer derived from a party, for all were equally enfeebled and discredited; it could spring only from the bosom of the armies, where force resides, that silent, regular, and imposing force which suited a nation exhausted by the turmoil of dissension and the conflict of systems.

Amidst this utter prostration, men cast their eyes on the individuals distinguished during the revolution as in quest of a chief fitted for the exigency. "We want no more bawlers," Sieyes had said, "we want a head and a sword." The head was found, for it was already in the Directory. A sword was to be sought. Hoche was dead; Joubert, whom his youth, his virtues, his heroism, endeared to all the friends of the republic, had just breathed his last at Novi. Moreau, deemed the greatest master of the art of war amongst the generals left in Europe, gave an unfavourable impression of coldness, indecision, caution, and aversion to incur great responsibilities. Massena, one of the most eminent generals of the republic, had not yet gained the glory of saving France. Besides, he betokened no qualities beyond those of the soldier. Jourdan had but lately been vanquished. Augereau was of a rough and turbulent, Bernadotte of a discontented temperament, and neither possessed an adequate measure of renown. There remained one effulgent personage, who united all glories, who to a hundred victories had added a brilliant peace, who had raised France to the pinnacle of greatness at Campo-Formio, and who seemed in departing to have borne away her fortune,—Bonaparte; but he was in a far distant land; he filled with his name the echoes of the East. He alone had continued victorious, and made resound on the banks of the Nile and the Jordan the thunders with which he had startled Europe on the Adige. Nor was it enough that glory shed its rays around him; feeling invested him with even a deeper interest; he was believed to be basely exiled by a suspicious and jealous government. Whilst he had set forth like some champion of old in search of a career vast as his imagination, his countrymen pictured him as an obedient citizen repaying by victories the unworthy banishment imposed upon him. "Where is Bonaparte?" asked every one. "His health already shattered will be destroyed under that broiling sun. Ah! if he were among us, the republic would not be threatened with destruction. Europe and the factions would equally respect him!" Vague rumours, meanwhile, circulated respecting him. Sometimes it was said that victory, treacherous to all the French generals, had forsaken him too in his turn and left him stranded on a distant shore. But such reports were rejected; "he is invincible," was soon the exulting cry; "far from encountering reverses, he marches to the conquest of the entire East." Gigantic enterprises were ascribed to him. Some even scanned the probability of his having traversed Syria, and crossed the Euphrates and the Indus; others were content to maintain that he had marched on Constantinople, and that, after having subverted the Ottoman empire, he would bestride Europe from its opposite boundary. The journals were full of these speculations, proving how imagination waited on the footsteps of a man, so young, and yet so paramount in fame.

The Directory had sent him an order to return, and collected in the Mediterranean an immense fleet, composed of the French and Spanish navies, to bring back the army.* The brothers of the general, remaining at Paris, and commissioned to inform him of the shifting condition of affairs, had forwarded to him dispatch upon dispatch to acquaint him with the state of confusion into which the republic had fallen and to urge his speedy return. But these advices had to traverse the seas and the English squadrons, and none could tell whether the hero would be apprized in time and arrive before the ruin of the republic was consummated.

* It is proper to state that this order is disputed. We know there exists an ordinance of the Directory, signed by Treilhard, Barras, and Larevelliere, and bearing the date of the 7th Prairial which recals Bonaparte from Italy. Larévelliere, in his Memoirs, declares he has no recollection of having signed such a document, and treats the ordinance as supposititious. But in this case the naval expedition of Bruix would remain without an object. At all events, it is certain that the Directory desired the presence of Bonaparte at this juncture, and that it assuredly stood in less terror of his ambition than of Suwarrov's ferocity. If the order be not authentic, it has probability on its side; at the same time the question is of very slight importance, as Bonaparte was authorized to return whenever he judged it advisable.

CHAPTER LXII.

CONTINUATION OF BONAPARTE'S OPERATIONS IN EGYPT.—CONQUEST OF UPPER-EGYPT BY DESAIX—EXPEDITION TO SYRIA; BATTLE OF MOUNT TABOR AND SIEGE OF ST. JEAN D'ACRE.—RETURN TO EGYPT; BATTLE OF ABOUKIR.—DEPARTURE OF BONAPARTE FOR FRANCE.—MARCH OF THE ARCHDUKE CHARLES ON THE RHINE AND OF SUWARROV INTO SWITZERLAND.—VICTORY OF ZURICH; RETREAT OF SUWARROV.—EVENTS IN HOLLAND; DEFEAT AND CAPITULATION OF THE ANGLO-RUSSIANS.—CLOSE OF THE CAMPAIGN OF 1799.

After the battle of the Pyramids, Bonaparte had found himself undisputed master of the greatest part of Egypt. He had subsequently taken pains to consolidate his power, and distributed his generals through the provinces to complete their subjugation. Desaix, planted at the entrance of Upper-Egypt, with a division of about 3,000 men, held the charge of reducing that province against the remnants of Mourad-Bey's defeated Mamelukes. Desaix commenced his expedition in Vendemiaire and Brumaire of the preceding year (October 1798), at the period the inundation subsided. The enemy retreated before him, awaiting him eventually at Sediman, where Desaix, on the 16th Vendemiaire year VII. (7th October 1798), sustained a terrible encounter against the desperate remains of Mourad-Bey. None of the conflicts of the French in Egypt was attended with such loss of blood. Two thousand French had to contend against four thousand Mamelukes and eight thousand fellahs intrenched in the village of Sediman. The battle was fought after the manner of that of the Pyramids and similarly to all the engagements in Egypt. The fellahs were stationed behind the walls of the village and the horsemen in the plain. Desaix formed in two squares, and placed on his wings two other smaller squares to deaden the shock of the Mameluke cavalry. For the first time the French infantry was broken and one of the small squares forced. But, with quick and happy thought, the soldiers instantly crouched to the ground, so that the great squares were enabled to fire above their heads. The Mamelukes, riding over them, charged the great squares with furious impetuosity for several hours without intermission, and plunged at length maddened with desperation on the very points of the bayonets. As usual, the squares afterwards broke ground to attack the intrenchments and speedily stormed them. During this operation, the Mamelukes, wheeling on a semicircle to the rear, began to butcher the wounded; but the French quickly chased them from their work of carnage, and the incensed soldiers sacrificed a considerable number of them in their wrath. Comparatively, never had more dead strewed a field of battle. The French lost three hundred men. Desaix continued his march throughout the winter, and after a succession of smart combats became master of all Upper-Egypt even to the Cataracts, spreading the fame of his clemency equally with the terror of his arms. At Cairo, Bonaparte had been denominated Sultan Kebir, the King of Fire; but in Upper-Egypt Desaix was known as Sultan Al Rashid, or the Just.

Bonaparte, meanwhile, had executed a march upon Balbeis to drive Ibrahim-Bey into Syria, and gathered on his route the wrecks of the caravan of Mecca, pillaged by the Arabs. Returning to Cairo, he there continued to organize an administration upon French principles. A revolt, excited by the emissaries of Mourad-Bey, was rigorously stifled, to the utter discouragement of the enemies of the French.† The winter of 1798–9 thus passed over in expectation of events. In this interval, Bonaparte learnt the declaration of war issued by the Porte and the preparations it was making with the aid of the English. It was forming two armies, the one at Rhodes, the other in Syria. These armies were intended to act simultaneously in the spring of 1799, the one to land at Aboukir near Alexandria, the other to cross the desert which divides Syria from Egypt. Bonaparte instantly felt his position, and resolved, as was his wont, to disconcert his foe by anticipating him with an unexpected onslaught. He could not cross the desert between Egypt and Syria in the hot season, and therefore he determined to take advantage of the winter to proceed and disperse the forces assembling at Acre, Damascus, and the principal cities. The celebrated Pacha of Acre, Djezzar, was appointed Seraskier of the army collected in Syria. Abdallah, pacha of Damascus, commanded his vanguard, and had already advanced to Fort El-Arisch, the key to Egypt on the Syrian side. Bonaparte made his dispositions to act with promptitude. He had opened an intelligence with the populations of Mount Lebanon. The Druzes, Christian tribes, and the Metualis, schismatic Mahometans, offered him their aid and invoked him with constant prayers. By sudden assaults on Jaffa, Acre, and other ill-fortified places, he might in a short period overrun Syria, add its conquest to the Egyptian, become master of the Euphrates as he was already of the Nile, and thus occupy all the communications with India. His ardent imagination stretched still farther, and dwelt on some of those grand projects imputed to him by his admirers in Europe. It was not impossible that by raising the populations of Lebanon he might muster sixty or eighty thousand auxiliaries, and with these, supported by twenty-five thousand of the bravest soldiers in the universe, march on Constantinople and seat himself in that famous metropolis. Whether so stupendous a design were feasible or not, it is sure he contemplated the possibility of the enterprise; and when we remember the feats he performed under the ægis of fortune, who shall presume to deride as insane any of his projects?

Bonaparte commenced his march in Pluviose (beginning of February), at the head of the divisions under Kleber, Regnier, Lannes, Bon, and Murat, comprising a force of about 13,000 men. Murat's division was composed of cavalry. Bonaparte had instituted a regiment of an entirely novel arm, to wit of dromedaries. Two men, placed back to back, were mounted on a dromedary, and could, through the strength and celerity of that animal, cover twenty-five or thirty leagues without halting. Bonaparte had formed this regiment to give chase to the Arabs who infested the regions round Egypt. It followed in the track of the main army. He had ordered Rear-Admiral Perrée to weigh from Alexandria with three frigates, and steer for the coast of Syria with the siege-artillery and munitions. On the 29th Pluviose (17th February), he arrived before the fort of El-Arisch. After a slight resistance, the garrison surrendered to the number of 1,300 men. Considerable magazines were found in the fort. Ibrahim-Bey, having attempted to succour it, was put to flight, his camp falling into the power of the French, who reaped an immense booty. The soldiers suffered many hardships in traversing the desert; but they saw their general toiling at their side, supporting with debilitated health the same privations and the same fatigues, and dared not murmur. Soon they arrived at Gaza, which town they took in sight of Djezzar-Pacha, and found within it, as in the fort of El-Arisch, large stores of munitions and provisions. From Gaza the army moved on Jaffa, the ancient Joppa. It arrived before it on the 13th Ventose (3d March). This town was surrounded by a high wall flanked with towers. It contained a garrison of 4,000 men. Bonaparte caused it to be battered in breach, and then sent a summons to the commander, who answered it by cutting off the herald's head. The assault was given, the place stormed with incredible hardihood, and abandoned to thirty hours of pillage and massacre. A considerable quantity of artillery and provisions of all sorts here likewise fell into the hands of the captors. Several hundreds of prisoners remained on hand, who could not be sent into Egypt as there were no means of escorting them, and whom it was impolitic to set at large to swell the ranks of the enemy. Bonaparte was induced, in solution of the difficulty, to adopt a terrible expedient; which constitutes the only atrocity of his life. Transported into a barbarous country, he had involuntarily imbibed its spirit: he put to the edge of the sword the prisoners who incommoded him. The army performed, with obedience, but with a sensation of horror, the execution committed to it. During their stay at Jaffa, the French soldiers caught the germs of the plague.

† This occurrence took place on the 30th Vendemiaire year II. (21st October 1798).

Bonaparte now advanced upon St. Jean-d'Acre, the ancient Ptolemais, situated at the foot of Mount Carmel. This was the only place that could again stop him. Syria was his if he succeeded in taking it. Djezzar had shut himself behind its walls with all his treasures and a strong garrison. He relied on the support of Sidney Smith, who was hovering on the coast, and who had furnished him with engineers, artillerymen, and munitions. He expected, moreover, to be speedily succoured by the Turkish army collected in Syria, which had left Damascus to cross the Jordan. Bonaparte hastened to attack the fortress in the hope of carrying it, like that of Jaffa, before it was strengthened by fresh troops, or the English had time to perfect its defences. The trenches were forthwith opened. Unfortunately the siege-artillery, which was to be transported by sea from Alexandria, had been captured by Sidney Smith. The whole force of siege and field artillery possessed by the French consisted of a thirty-two caronade, four twelve-pounders, eight howitzers, and thirty four-pounders. They were also deficient in balls, but a plan was devised for procuring a supply. A few cavalry were sent to manœuvre on the plain, seeing whom Sidney Smith opened a rolling fire from all his batteries; whereupon the French soldiers, to whom five sous for each ball were promised, ran to pick them up amidst the thunders of the cannonade and peals of laughter.

The trenches had been opened on the 30th Ventose (20th March). The general of the engineers, Sanson, thinking he had reached, during a nocturnal reconnaisance, the foot of the rampart, declared there was neither counterscarp nor moat. Hence, Bonaparte concluded he had merely to effect a breach, and then mount to the assault. On the 5th Germinal (25th March), a practicable breach was wrought, but when the assault was attempted, the French were arrested by a counterscarp and moat. They had, therefore, immediate recourse to mines. The operation was carried on under the fire of all the batteries, and especially of the admirable artillery Smith had taken from the French. Djezzar had been supplied by him with excellent English gunners, and an engineer-officer of great merit, a French emigrant, Phélippeaux by name. The mine was sprung on the 8th Germinal (28th March), and blew up only a part of the counterscarp. Twenty-five grenadiers, headed by young Mailly, mounted to the assault. On seeing that gallant officer plant a ladder, the Turks were appalled, but Mailly fell dead. The grenadiers were, thereupon, discouraged, and the Turks returned to the defence. Two battalions which followed were received with a terrific fire; their leader Laugier was killed, and the assault again failed.

Unhappily, the fortress had been recently strengthened by a reinforcement of some thousands of men, a great number of cannoniers exercised in the most approved European gunnery, and vast stores of munitions. To lay siege to such a place with 13,000 men, and almost without artillery, was assuredly a bold enterprise. A fresh mine was requisite to blow up the whole counterscarp, and another covered way was to be commenced. More than ten days had already been consumed, and the near approach of the grand Turkish army was announced; thus it became necessary to carry on the works and cover the siege, with the mere expeditionary army to accomplish all. Bonaparte gave orders to labour uninterruptedly at the fresh mine, and detached Kleber to the Jordan to dispute the passage with the Turkish army advancing from Damascus.

This army, swelled by the mountain tribes of Naplouse, amounted to about 25,000 men. Upwards of 12,000 cavalry constituted its chief strength. It was incumbered by an immense train of baggage. Abdallah, pacha of Damascus, held command over it. On the 15th Germinal (4th April), it passed the Jordan by the bridge of Jacob. Junot with Kleber's vanguard, 500 men strong, encountered the Turkish vanguard on the road to Nazareth on the 19th (8th April). Far from recoiling, he bravely defied the enemy, and, forming in square, covered the ground with dead, and captured five banners. But, compelled to yield to numbers, he subsequently fell back on Kleber. The latter was himself advancing and hastening his march to join Junot. Bonaparte, apprized of the force of the enemy, prepared to set out with Bon's division to support Kleber, and bring on a decisive engagement. Djezzar, who was in communication with the army coming to relieve him, attempted a sally; but, mercilessly raked, he left the French works choked with his dead. Bonaparte forthwith began his march.

Kleber had debouched with his division into the plains which extend to the base of Mount Tabor, not far from the village of Fouli. He had entertained the idea of surprising the Turkish camp during the night, but he arrived too late to execute his design. On the morning of the 27th Germinal (16th April), he found the whole Turkish army drawn up in battle array: 15,000 infantry occupyed the village of Fouli, upwards of 12,000 cavalry were deployed on the plain. Kleber had scarcely 3,000 infantry in square. This vast mass of cavalry moved forward and fell on the French squares. Never had it been the fortune of the French to witness such a swarm of horsemen galloping madly, raging to and fro, and charging on every side. They preserved their accustomed coolness, and receiving the Turks with a continuous fire at musket-range, laid low a considerable number at every onslaught. Speedily they formed around them a rampart of dead bodies, both of men and horses, and under shelter of this horrible barricade were enabled to resist for six successive hours the incessant assaults of the foe. At length Bonaparte debouched from Mount Tabor with Bon's division. He perceived the plain enveloped in fire and smoke, and the compact division of Kleber contending against a host of enemies from behind a bulwark of carcasses. Without loss of time he partitioned the division he led into two squares; which squares advanced so as to form an equilateral triangle with Kleber's division, and thus placed the enemy between them. They marched in silence, and without giving any signal of their approach till within a certain distance; then Bonaparte suddenly caused a cannon to be discharged, and appeared on the field of battle. A murderous fire instantly opened from the three extremities of the triangle, swept as with a whirlwind the Turks who were in the midst, drove them pell-mell upon each other, and put them to flight in all directions. Kleber's division, inflamed with redoubled ardour at this spectacle, rushed upon the village of Fouli, carried it at the point of the bayonet, and executed a prodigious carnage of the enemy. In an instant the multitude of adversaries dispersed and vanished, and the plain was bared save of mangled corpses. The Turkish camp, the Pacha's three tails, four hundred camels, and an enormous booty, became the prey of the French. Murat, planted on the banks of the Jordan, intercepted and slaughtered numbers of the fugitives. Bonaparte caused all the villages of the Naplousians to be delivered to the flames. Six thousand French had sufficed to destroy this army which the natives called innumerable as the stars of the firmament and the sands of the sea.

During this interval the operations of mining and countermining had continued without intermission around the walls of St. Jean-d'Acre. A space torn up and convulsed by all the artifices of sieges was disputed with the fiercest pertinacity. The French had been now six weeks before the place, had made in that time numerous assaults, repulsed sundry sallies, and killed a great many of the enemy; but, despite their continual advantages, they suffered irreparable losses of time and men. On the 18th Floreal (7th May), a reinforcement of 12,000 men arrived in the port of Acre. Bonaparte, calculating that they could not be landed in less than six hours, immediately brought a twenty-four pounder to play on a piece of wall to the right of the point on which his efforts had been for some time directed. On the approach of night the French mounted to the breach, stormed the works of the enemy, threw them down, spiked the guns, put all to the sword, and were at last masters of the fortification, when the troops which had disembarked advanced in form of battle and presented an overwhelming mass. Rambaut, who commanded the first grenadiers that had marched to the assault, was slain. Lannes was wounded. At this moment the enemy made a sally, took the breach in reverse, and cut off the retreat of the brave men who had penetrated into the town. Some contrived to force their way out, others, under the impulse of desperation, fled into a mosque, there intrenched themselves, fought until their last cartridges were consumed, and then prepared to sell their lives as dearly as they might, when Sidney Smith, touched with their heroic gallantry, granted them a capitulation. Meanwhile the besiegers, marching upon the enemy, drove him back into the fortress with prodigious havoc, and a loss of 800 prisoners. Bonaparte, obstinate to the point of fury, gave his troops two days' repose, and on the 21st (10th May) ordered a fresh assault. They mounted with the same intrepidity, and scaled the breach, but were unable to pass beyond it. A whole army was arrayed in defence of the place, and guarding all the avenues. It was necessary to forego the attempt.

Two months thus elapsed in the siege of Acre, during which the French had sustained grievous losses, and prudence forbid the hazard of more. The plague prevailed in the town, and the army had imbibed the germs of it at Jaffa. The season for debarkation approached, and the arrival of a Turkish army at the mouth of the Nile was announced. By persisting longer, Bonaparte incurred the risk of weakening himself so far as to be unable to repulse fresh adversaries. The main design of his enterprise was accomplished, since he had destroyed the Turkish army assembled in Syria, and on that side rendered the enemy impotent to act. As to the more dazzling of his projects, those vague and magnificent dreams of conquest in the East, they were to be relinquished. He determined at last to raise the siege. But his regret was such that, notwithstanding his great career, he was often heard to repeat, with reference to Sidney Smith: "That man marred my fortune." The Druzes, who during the siege had supplied the army with provisions, and all the populations hostile to the Porte, learnt the intention to retreat with feelings of despair.

The French had commenced the siege on the 30th Ventose (20th March), and now raised it on the 1st Prairial (20th May): an interval of two months. Before finally quitting the walls of St. Jean-d'Acre, Bonaparte resolved to leave a memorial of his presence: he discharged upon it the full venom of his wrath by a furious cannonade, and reduced it almost to a heap of ashes. He resumed the route of the desert. He had lost in combat, or through fatigues and sickness, nearly a third of his expeditionary army, that is to say, about four thousand men. He carried with him twelve hundred wounded. On his route he ravaged the whole country, and impressed it with a wholesome terror. On his arrival at Jaffa he blew the fortifications into the air. An hospital had been established in that place for the plague patients. To remove them was impossible; to leave them was to abandon them to inevitable death, either from the malady, from hunger, or from the cruelty of the enemy. Accordingly, Bonaparte suggested to the physician, Desgenettes, that it would be more humane to administer opium to them than leave them alive; to which the physician replied in a retort much celebrated: "My vocation is to cure and not to kill." Opium was not administered, but the incident served to propagate an infamous calumny, now exploded.

Bonaparte eventually re-entered Egypt after an absence of nearly three months. His arrival was sufficiently opportune. A spirit of revolt had spread throughout the Delta. An impostor, calling himself the angel El-Mohdhy, who announced himself as invulnerable, and professed to destroy the French by scattering dust, had collected several thousand fanatics. The emissaries of the Mamelukes assisted him with their aid; he had seized Damanhour, and put the garrison to the sword. Bonaparte forthwith detached a body of troops which dispersed the rebels and killed the invulnerable angel. The disturbance had extended to the different provinces of the Delta; his presence sufficed to restore tranquillity and obedience. He instituted at Cairo magnificent fêtes, to celebrate his triumphs in Syria. He made no reference to the defeated portion of his enterprise, but extolled the numerous engagements fought in Syria, the brilliant victory of Mount Tabor, and the exemplary vengeance wreaked on Djezzar. He disseminated fresh publications amongst the inhabitants, in which he warned them he was in the secret of their most inward thoughts, and divined their projects at the very instant of conception. They gave implicit credence to this singular pretension of Sultan Kebir, and believed him present at all their cogitations. Yet Bonaparte had not merely to overawe the inhabitants, but also to keep his own generals and army in subjection. A sullen discontent reigned amongst the French, not the result of fatigues or of dangers, still less of privations, for they were abundantly supplied with all necessaries, but of that love of country which haunts the Frenchman in every clime. They had been a whole year in Egypt, and for nearly six months had received no intelligence from France. Not a vessel had been able to pass: a sombre melancholy oppressed all hearts. Almost daily officers and generals solicited furloughs to revisit Europe. Bonaparte granted very few, or rather dropped such words as scared applicants with the dread of dishonour. Berthier himself, his faithful Berthier, pursued by an absorbing passion, craved permission to depart for Italy. For the second time he was ashamed of his weakness, and renounced the design. On one occasion the army had formed a resolution to bear its colours from Cairo and march on Alexandria with a view to embark. But it was little more than a fleeting thought, and gave way to the apprehension of rousing the indignation of Bonaparte. The generals of division, who all afforded examples of murmuring, were also subdued into silence before him, and cowed beneath his ascendency. He had more than one dispute with Kleber, however. The irritability of the latter did not spring from despondency, but from habitual indocility. They soon became reconciled again, for Bonaparte admired the lofty soul of Kleber, and Kleber was fascinated by the genius of Bonaparte.

The month of Prairial wore away, and still the ignorance of events in Europe, and of the disasters sustained by France, continued. It was merely known that great excitement prevailed throughout the Continent, and that war seemed inevitable. Bonaparte impatiently awaited further information to determine his own course, content, if exigency demanded, to return to the first theatre of his fame. But, previously, he was desirous of extirpating the second Turkish army, mustered at Rhodes, of which the speedy debarkation was rumoured.

This army, shipped on board numerous transports, and escorted by the naval detachment of Sidney Smith, hove in sight of Alexandria on the 23d Messidor (11th July), and proceeded to cast anchor in the roadstead of Aboukir, the same in which the French fleet had been annihilated. The place of debarkation chosen by the English was the promontory which forms this bay and which bears the same name. It is a narrow strip extending between the sea and Lake Maadieh, and terminated by a fort. Bonaparte had ordered Marmont, who commanded at Alexandria, to complete the defences of this fort, and destroy the village of Aboukir clustered around it. But instead of destroying the village, it was preserved to lodge the soldiers, and had been simply surrounded by a redoubt, to protect it on the side of the land. But the redoubt, not joining the two margins of the water, was not a closed barricade, and rendered the fort little better than a mere field-work. The Turks, in fact, landed with great boldness, gallantly assailed the intrenchments, carried them sword in hand, and effected a lodgment in the village of Aboukir, putting to death the unfortunate garrison. The village being taken, the fort could no longer hold out, and it was obliged to surrender. Marmont had hastened from Alexandria with 1,200 men to succour the troops in Aboukir. But learning that the Turks had disembarked in considerable force, he shrank from attempting to drive them into the sea by a vigorous attack. He accordingly returned into Alexandria, and left them to establish themselves in tranquillity on the peninsula of Aboukir.

The Turks amounted to nearly 18,000 foot. They were not the miserable fellahs who composed the infantry of the Mamelukes, but brave Janissaries, carrying muskets without bayonets, slinging them behind upon their shoulder-belts after firing, and then charging the enemy with swords and pistols. Their army was not only numerous but well-appointed and directed by English officers. They were deficient in cavalry, for they had brought only three hundred horses; but they expected the arrival of Mourad-Bey, who was to leave Upper-Egypt, skirting the desert and crossing the oases, and bring to Aboukir two or three thousand Mamelukes.

When Bonaparte received intelligence of the debarkation, he instantly quitted Cairo, and executed one of those extraordinary marches, from Cairo to Alexandria, of which he had given so many examples in Italy. He took with him the divisions of Lannes, Bon, and Murat. He ordered Desaix to evacuate Upper-Egypt, and Kleber and Regnier, who were in the Delta, to draw near Aboukir. He appointed Birket, a place lying between Alexandria and Aboukir, for the concentration of his forces, intending thence to manœuvre according to circumstances. The chief object of his apprehension was lest an English army should disembark in concert with the Turkish.

Mourad-Bey, agreeably to the plan arranged with Mustapha-Pacha, had attempted to descend into Lower-Egypt; but, encountered and defeated by Murat, he had been driven to regain the desert. Consequently the Turkish army alone remained to fight, destitute of cavalry, but encamped behind intrenchments, and disposed to resist with characteristic obstinacy. After inspecting the condition of Alexandria and particularly the admirable works erected by Colonel Cretin, and administering a reprimand to his lieutenant Marmont, who had not ventured to attack the Turks during their debarkation, Bonaparte quitted Alexandria on the 6th Thermidor (23d July). On the morrow, the 7th, he was at the mouth of the peninsula. His first idea was to hem-in the Turkish army by intrenchments and await, ere attacking them, the arrival of all his divisions, for he had under his immediate charge merely the divisions of Lannes, Bon, and Murat, composing about 6,000 men. But upon viewing the dispositions made by the Turks, he changed his opinion and resolved to attack them immediately, hoping to coop them up in the village of Aboukir and blow them to atoms with shells and bombs.

The Turks occupied the extremity of the peninsula which is very narrow. They were covered by two lines of intrenchments. Half-a-league in advance of the village of Aboukir, where their camp was pitched, they had occupied two sand-banks, one flanked by the sea, the other by the lake of Maadieh, and thus forming their right and left. In the midst, between these two hills, was a village which they likewise guarded. They had two thousand men on the right hill, one thousand on the left, and three to four thousand in the village. This was their first line. The second was at the village of Aboukir itself. It was composed of the redoubt constructed by the French, and joined the sea by two branch trenches. There they had fixed their main encampment and the bulk of their forces.

Bonaparte made his dispositions with his usual promptitude and precision. He ordered General Destaing to march with some battalions against the left hill, where the thousand Turks stood; Lannes he directed to move on the right hill, where the other two thousand were; and Murat, who was in the centre, to defile with the cavalry to the rear of the two eminences. These operations were executed with perfect fidelity. Destaing advanced upon the left hill and valiantly scaled it, whilst Murat turned it with a squadron. Upon seeing this, the Turks abandoned their position, and were caught as they retreated by the cavalry, which cut them down and drove them into the sea, where they preferred to throw themselves rather than surrender. On the right the same result occurred. Lannes assailed the two thousand Turks and Murat turned them; they were likewise slaughtered and chased into the sea. Destaing and Lannes then diverged to the centre, which was defended, we have said, by a village, and attacked it in front. The Turks resisted with great bravery, relying on assistance from the second line. A column was, in fact, detached from Aboukir; but Murat, who had already defiled to the rear of the village, intercepted this column, and repulsed it into Aboukir. The infantry of Destaing and Lannes then charged impetuously into the village, expelling the Turks and scattering them in all directions, who, still obstinately refusing to surrender, plunged into the sea and were drowned.

Four or five thousand Turks had thus already perished. The first line was carried, and the object of Bonaparte accomplished; penning the Turks within the fold of Aboukir, he might bombard them at leisure, pending the arrival of Kleber and Regnier. But he was eager to profit by his success and consummate his victory on the instant. After allowing his troops to recover breath, he marched upon the second line. The division under Lanusse, remaining in reserve, supported Lannes and Destaing. The redoubt which covered Aboukir was difficult to storm; and it sheltered from nine to ten thousand Turks. On the right a trench connected it with the sea; on the left another trench prolonged it, but without absolutely joining Lake Maadieh. The open space was occupied by the enemy and swept by numerous gunboats. Accustomed to direct his soldiers against the most formidable obstacles, Bonaparte ordered them to assail the position. His infantry was to march on the front and right of the redoubt. The cavalry, concealed in a palm-grove, was to defile on the left, and cross, under the fire from the gunboats, the space left open between the redoubt and Lake Maadieh. The charge was thus executed. Lannes and Destaing urged their brave infantry forward; the 32d marched with arms fixed on the intrenchments, the 18th turned them on the extreme right. The Turks, without waiting for them, advanced to the encounter. They came in collision body to body. The Turkish soldiers, after firing their muskets and pistols, brandished their scymiters They attempted to wrench the bayonets with their hands; but their breasts were pierced before they could seize them. Thus the combatants mingled their blood on the intrenchments. The 18th was on the point of penetrating into the redoubt, when a terrific discharge of artillery arrested and repelled it to the foot of the works. The gallant Letureq fell gloriously in determining to retire last. Fugieres lost an arm. Meanwhile, Murat, on his side, had deployed with the cavalry to traverse the space between the redoubt and Lake Maadieh. Several times he had charged and repulsed the enemy; but, caught between the fires from the redoubt and the gun-boats, he had been obliged to recoil. Some of his troops had even pushed to the moat of the redoubt; but all the efforts of such intrepidity seemed vain. Bonaparte contemplated this carnage pondering the favourable moment to renew the assault. Fortunately the Turks, in accordance with their custom, poured from the intrenchments to decapitate the slain. Bonaparte seized the opportunity and darted forward two battalions, one from the 22d, the other from the 69th, which scaled the intrenchments and carried them. On the right, the 18th likewise profited by the occasion and entered the redoubt. Murat, on his part, sounded a fresh charge. One of his squadrons succeeded in clearing the formidable ground separating the intrenchments from the lake, and penetrated into the village of Aboukir. Thereupon the Turks fled in a panic on all sides, and the French had nothing to do but butcher them. They spitted them on their bayonets and hurled them into the sea. Murat, at the head of his cavalry, rushed onward to the very tent of Mustapha-Pacha. In a paroxysm of despair, the Turkish commander drew a pistol and fired it at Murat, whom he slightly wounded. Murat hacked off two of his fingers by a blow of his sword and sent him captive to Bonaparte. The Turks who were neither killed nor drowned retreated into the fort of Aboukir.

Upwards of twelve thousand corpses floated on these waters of Aboukir, which had been once covered with the bodies of French sailors; between two and three thousand strewed the field of battle. The residue of the Turkish forces, pent up in the fort, had no resource but in the clemency of the conqueror.

Such was this extraordinary battle, in which, for the first time perhaps in the annals of war, the hostile army was utterly extinguished. It was upon this occasion that Kleber, arriving at the close of day, hugged Bonaparte by the waist, and exclaimed: General, you are grand as the universe!

Thus, through the expedition to Syria and the battle of Aboukir, Egypt was delivered, at least for the time, from the forces of the Porte. The situation of the French army might be reckoned sufficiently satisfactory. After all the losses it had sustained, it still mustered twenty-five thousand men, the bravest and best commanded in the world. Every day must tend to bring it in closer harmony with the inhabitants and to consolidate its establishment. Bonaparte had now been a year in the country: arriving in summer before the inundation, he had employed his first moments in possessing himself of Alexandria and the capital Cairo, which he secured by the victory of the Pyramids. In the autumn and after the inundation, he had completed the subjugation of the Delta and intrusted to Desaix the conquest of Upper-Egypt. In the winter he had undertaken the expedition to Syria and destroyed the Turkish army under Djezzar at Mount Tabor. In the summer again, he had just exterminated the second army of the Porte at Aboukir. His time therefore had been fully and advantageously occupied; and whilst victory seemed to have utterly forsaken the banners of the republic in Europe, it had remained faithful to them at least in Asia and in Africa. The tri-coloured flag waved triumphantly upon the Nile and the Jordan, over the very region sanctified as the birth-place of the religion of Christ.

Regarding the affairs of France, Bonaparte was still in profound ignorance; none of the despatches from the Directory or his brothers had reached him, and he was tormented with anxiety. In the hope of picking up some news, he sent out brigs to cruise, with directions to stop merchantmen and interrogate them on events passing in Europe. He also sent an envoy on board the Turkish fleet, who, under pretence of negotiating an exchange of prisoners, was chiefly enjoined to extract intelligence. Sidney Smith accosted this envoy, entertained him civilly, and, finding that Bonaparte was unconscious of the disasters which had befallen France, took a malicious pleasure in giving him a file of newspapers. The envoy returned and placed the deposit in the hands of Bonaparte. The general consumed a whole night in devouring the contents of these prints, and in making himself acquainted with European transactions since his absence. His resolution was instantly formed; he determined to embark secretly for Europe and hazard the passage, at the risk of being taken on the voyage by the English fleet. He summoned Admiral Gantheaume, and instructed him to prepare the frigates La Muiron and La Carrère for immediate service. Without communicating his purpose to any one, he paid a hasty visit to Cairo to make his final dispositions, digested a long code of instructions for Kleber, in whom he designed to vest the command, and immediately returned to Alexandria.

On the 5th Fructidor (22d August), taking with him Berthier, Lannes, Murat, Andréossy, Marmont, Berthollet and Monge, and escorted by some of his guides, he repaired to a secluded part of the coast. Boats were in waiting; he and his companions put off and embarked on board the frigates La Muiron and La Carrère. They were followed by the corvettes La Revanche and La Fortune. The sails were instantly hoisted to get out of sight of the English cruisers by day-light. Unfortunately it fell calm; his companions were in dread of being surprised and urged returning to Alexandria, but Bonaparte would not hearken to them. "Be still," he said, "we shall cross." Like Cæsar he relied upon his fortune.

This was not, as has been said, a base desertion of his army; for he left it victorious to brave dangers of an indefinite and formidable character, and the most frightful of all, that of being carried in captivity to London. It was rather one of those acts of temerity with which the ambitious great tempt Providence, and to which they owe that overweening confidence which alternately exalts and crushes them.

Whilst this man, big with such important destinies, thus committed himself to the hazards of the sea and of a hostile encounter, victory returned to the French flag in Europe, and the republic emerged by a sublime effort from the perils that environed it. Massena was still upon the line of the Limmat, deferring the moment to resume the offensive. The army of Italy, after having lost the battle of Novi, had dispersed on the Apennines. Happily, Suwarrov used his victory at Novi to no better purpose than that he had gained upon the Trebbia, and wasted in Piedmont an interval diligently employed by France in preparations. At this period the Aulic Council, equally fickle in its plans as the Directory had been, hit upon one calculated materially to change the aspect of events. It was jealous of the authority Suwarrov had assumed in Italy, and viewed with anger the invitation addressed by that general to the king of Sardinia to return into his dominions. The Aulic Council had other views regarding Piedmont, and desired to remove the old marshal from its vicinity. Moreover, a want of concord existed between the Russians and Austrians, and these combined reasons decided the Aulic Council to change entirely the distribution of troops upon the lines of operation. The Russians were mingled with the Austrians on both the theatres of war. Korsakoff acted in Switzerland with the Archduke Charles, and Suwarrov in Italy with Melas. The Aulic Council proposed to transport the Archduke Charles upon the Rhine, and Suwarrov into Switzerland. In this manner the two Russian armies would both operate in Switzerland. The Austrians would act alone upon the Rhine, as likewise in Italy, where they were to be speedily reinforced by a new army, intended to supply the vacuum left by Suwarrov. As motives for this alteration the Aulic Council alleged, that it was more advisable to allow the troops of each nation to combat together, that the Russians would find the temperature in Switzerland more analogous to that of their own climate, and that the movement of the Archduke upon the Rhine would aid the expedition in Holland. England could not fail to approve this plan, for she anticipated great benefit to the progress of the expedition in Holland from the presence of the Archduke on the Rhine, and was not grieved to see the Russians, who had already landed in Corfu and entertained a design upon Malta, discarded from the neighbourhood of Genoa.

This displacement, to be executed in presence of Massena, was extremely dangerous; besides, it transferred the Russians to a field which was wholly unsuited to them. Those soldiers, accustomed to charge on the plain and at the point of the bayonet, were unacquainted with the use of the musket, and in mountain warfare the chief requisite is expert marksmen. However, the Aulic Council, actuated by the ruling principle of cabinets and viewing political reasons as paramount to military, strictly enjoined the Austrian generals to offer no objection, and ordered a rigorous execution of its new plan towards the close of August.

We have already described the configuration of the theatre of war and the disposition of the armies upon that theatre.* Bodies of water issuing from the Great-Alps, now flowing in streams, now stagnating in lakes, presented different lines one within the other, commencing on the right at the base of a lofty mountain-chain, and terminating on the left in the great river which separates Germany from France. The two principal were those of the Rhine and the Limmat. Massena, obliged to abandon that of the Rhine, had recoiled upon that of the Limmat. He had even been constrained to retire a little to the rear of the latter and rest upon the Albis. The line of the Limmat did not the less separate the two armies. This line was formed by the Lint, which derives its source from the Great-Alps in the canton of Glaris, and proceeds into Lake Zurich; by Lake Zurich itself, and by the Limmat, which issues from that Lake at Zurich and eventually falls into the Aar near Brück. The Archduke Charles was behind the Limmat, extending from Brück to Zurich. Korsakoff was behind the lake of Zurich, awaiting the assignment of a position. Hotze guarded the Lint.

According to the plan prescribed, the Archduke, appointed to diverge to the Rhine, was to be replaced behind the Limmat by Korsakoff. Hotze was to remain on the Lint with the Austrian corps of the Voralberg, in order to extend a hand to Suwarrov advancing from Italy. A question of paramount importance was what route Suwarrov ought to follow. He had to scale the mountains, and might take one or other of the avenues which intersect Switzerland. If he preferred to penetrate by the valley of the Rhine, he might, by traversing the Splugen, reach the Upper-Rhine by Coire, and so effect his junction with Hotze. It was calculated he might arrive about the 5th September (3d Vendémiaire year VIII.). This movement had the advantage of being executed at a distance from the French, out of their reach, and thus independent of any accident. Suwarrov might likewise take another route, and instead of following the line of the Rhine, enter by Saint-Gothard into the valley of the Reuss, and debouch by Schweitz behind the line of the Lint occupied by the French. This march had the advantage of carrying him to the rear of the hostile line; but he had to cross the Saint-Gothard occupied by Lecourbe; a preconcerted movement by Hotze across the Lint was necessary to aid the approach of the army in its advance from Saint-Gothard; to second this movement an attack on the Limmat was essential; in a word, a general operation along the whole line was required, one perfectly well-timed and combined, a precision difficult of attainment when troops act at great distances and in such numerous detachments. This plan, which the Russians charge upon the Austrians and the Austrians upon the Russians, was nevertheless preferred. In consequence, a general attack was ordered along the whole line to be made about the end of September. At the moment Suwarrov should debouch from Saint-Gothard into the valley of the Reuss, Korsakoff was to attack below Lake Zurich, that is to say, along the Limmat, and Hotze above the lake along the Lint. Two of Hotze's lieutenants, Linken and Jellachich, were to penetrate into the canton of Glaris as far as Schweitz, and extend a hand to Suwarrov. The general junction once operated, the allied troops in Switzerland would amount to 80,000 men. Suwarrov was approaching with 18,000; Hotze had 25,000, and Korsakoff 30,000. The latter had in reserve the corps of Condé, and some thousand Bavarians. But before the junction was accomplished, the 30,000 men under

* Whatever pains I may take to render myself intelligible, I cannot hope to make the events about to follow thoroughly understood, unless the reader keep before him a map, however imperfect it may be. But those events were so extraordinary, and wrought in a manner so decided the salvation of France, that I esteem them worthy to be well pondered, and therefore recommend the reader to consult a map. The worst map of Switzerland will still be sufficient to afford a general perception of the operations.

Korsakoff and the 25,000 under Hotze, making 55,000 together, were exposed to the attacks of Massena's entire army.

In fact, the moment the Archduke quitted the Limmat, and whilst Suwarrov had not yet passed the Alps, was too favourable for Massena not to sieze, and at length emerge from the inaction which had been so severely censured. His army had been augmented to about 75,000 men by the reinforcements it had received; but it had to cover the immense line extending from Saint-Gothard to Basle. Lecourbe, forming its right, and having Gudin and Molitor under his orders, guarded Saint-Gothard, and the valley of the Reuss, and the Upper-Lint, with twelve or thirteen thousand men. Soult, with ten thousand, occupied the Lint to its fall into the lake of Zurich. Massena, with the divisions of Mortier, Klein, Lorge, and Mesnard, forming a total of thirty-seven thousand men, was upon the Limmat from Zurich to Brück. Thureau's division nine thousand strong, and Chabran's division eight, guarded, the one the Valais, the other the environs of Basle.

Although inferior in the aggregate amount of forces, Massena had the advantage of being able to concentrate his principal mass upon the essential point. Thus he had 37,000 men before the Limmat, which he could throw upon Korsakoff. The latter had just weakened himself by a detachment of 4,000 men sent as a reinforcement to Hotze, behind the lake of Zurich, which reduced him to 26,000. Condé's corps and the Bavarians, which were to serve as his reserve, were still greatly in the rear at Schaffhausen. Massena was therefore in a position to attack 26,000 men with 37,000. If he defeated Korsakoff he might turn back on Hotze, and after having routed, perhaps destroyed, them both, overwhelm Suwarrov, who was pushing into Switzerland in the expectation of finding a defeated enemy, or at least one pent up within his defensive line.

Massena, apprized of the projects of the enemy, anticipated by a day his general attack, and fixed it for the 3d Vendémiaire (25th September). Since he had retired upon the chain of the Albis, a few paces behind the Limmat, the course of that river belonged to the enemy. It was necessary to take it from him by effecting a passage, which he accordingly proposed to attempt. Whilst he was operating below Lake Zurich, he directed Soult to operate above it, and to cross the Lint on the same day. Military authorities have here censured Massena: he ought, they say, rather to have tempted Suwarrov into Switzerland than deterred him; if, therefore, instead of leaving Lecourbe to contend uselessly upon Saint-Gothard with Suwarrov, Massena had united him with Soult, he would have been more sure of overwhelming Hotze, and forcing the line of the Lint. At the same time, as the result obtained was as great as could be wished, this criticism on Massena is based only on a very rigid regard to principles.

The Limmat issues from the lake of Zurich at Zurich itself, and flows through the town dividing it into two parts. Agreeably to the plan arranged with Hotze and Suwarrov, Korsakoff had prepared to attack Massena, and with this view had moved the bulk of his forces into the quarter of Zurich situated over the Limmat. He had left but three battalions at Kloster-Fahr, to guard a point where the Limmat is most accessible, and detached Durasof with a division near the embouchure of the Limmat into the Aar to watch on that side: but his main body, 18,000 men strong at least, was in front of the river in offensive attitude.

Massena grounded his plan on this disposition of the enemy. He resolved to mask rather than attack the position of Zurich, where Korsakoff had agglomerated his forces; and with a considerable portion of his troops to hazard the passage of the Limmat at Kloster-Fahr, a point weakly defended. The passage being effected, he designed that this detachment should ascend the Limmat upon the opposite bank, and advance to the rear of Zurich. He then proposed to attack Korsakoff upon both banks, and hold him entrapped in the town of Zurich. Vast consequences might result from this operation.

Mortier with his division, which was 8,000 men strong, and occupied the right of this field of battle, was directed on Zurich. He was first to check, then to attack the Russian mass. Klein with his division, which was 10,000 men strong, was to be stationed at Altstetten, between the point of Zurich and that of Kloster-Fahr, where the passage was to be attempted. He might thus either diverge before Zurich and aid Mortier against the Russian main body, or move rapidly to the point of passage if it proved necessary to support it. His division contained 4,000 grenadiers, and a reserve of superb cavalry. Lorge's division, with a part of Mesnard's, was to perform the passage at Kloster-Fahr. These formed a corps of nearly 15,000 men. The rest of Mesnard's division was to make a demonstration on the Lower-Limmat to baffle and retain Durasof.

These dispositions, which have commanded the admiration of all critics, were put in execution at five in the morning of the 3d Vendémiaire (25th September). The preparations for the passage had been made near the village of Dietikon, with extraordinary care and secrecy. Boats had been carried by hand, and concealed in the woods. By dawn they were afloat, and the troops ranged in silence upon the bank. General Foy, afterwards so distinguished as an orator, commanded the artillery on this eventful day. He planted several batteries in a manner to protect the passage. Six hundred men fearlessly embarked and landed on the opposite shore. They immediately charged the enemy's sharp-shooters and dispersed them. Korsakoff had stationed three battalions with cannon on the plateau of Kloster-Fahr. The French artillery, more efficiently directed, soon silenced the fire of the Russian guns, and protected the successive passage of the whole vanguard. When General Gazan had added a sufficient reinforcement to the 600 men who had first crossed, he marched against the three Russian battalions guarding Kloster-Fahr. These were planted in a wood, and defended themselves with great bravery. Gazan surrounded them, and was obliged to slay them almost to the last man to dislodge them. These three battalions cut to pieces, the bridge was thrown over. The remainder of Lorge's division and part of Mesnard's passed the Limmat: thus 15,000 men were transported beyond the river. Bontemp's brigade was stationed at Regensdorf to confront Durasof if he endeavoured to ascend from the Lower-Limmat. The bulk of the troops, directed by the chief of the staff Oudinot, skirted the Limmat to reach the rear of Zurich.

This portion of the movement accomplished, Massenna returned in person to the other bank of the Limmat to overlook the motions of his wings. Towards the Lower-Limmat, Mesnard had so completely deceived Durasof by his demonstrations, that the latter had hastened to the bank of the stream and there deployed all his strength. On the right, Mortier had advanced on Zurich by Wollishofen, but had there encountered Korsakoff's mainbody, posted, as we said, in front of the Limmat, and been compelled to fall back. Massena, arriving at this moment, brought up Klein's division from Altstetten. Humbert, at the head of 4,000 grenadiers, marched on Zurich and restored the combat. Mortier renewed his attack, and the French succeeded in driving the Russians into Zurich.

Meanwhile, Korsakoff, perplexed at hearing cannon on his rear, had retransported some battalions beyond the Limmat; but this feeble succour was unavailing; and Oudinot had continued to ascend the Limmat with his 15,000 men. He had stormed a small encampment at Hong, as also the heights to the rear of Zurich, and occupied the high road to Winterthur, which gives access into Germany, and was the only avenue by which the Russians could retire.

The day was now drawing to a close, and great results had been prepared for the morrow. The Russians were cooped up in Zurich; Massena had moved, by the passage at Kloster-Fahr, 15,000 men on their rear, and planted 18,000 in front of them. It was difficult for them to avert a disaster. Cavillers have contended that, instead of leaving Klein's division before Zurich, Massena ought to have carried it by Kloster-Fahr behind that town, so as wholly to bar the route of Winterthur. But he feared that Mortier remaining with 8,000 men only, Korsakoff might pass through him and throw himself on the Lint. True, Korsakoff in such case would have encountered Soult and Lecourbe; but he also might have fallen in with Suwarrov coming from Italy, and none can determine the possible consequences of so singular a combination.

Korsakoff had at length become conscious of his real position and moved his troops into the other quarter of Zurich behind the Limmat. Durasof, on the Lower-Limmat, having learnt the fact of the passage, had departed stealthily, and, avoiding Bontemps' brigade by a circuit, advanced to regain the Winterthur road. The combat of the following day, the 4th Vendémiaire (26th September), was necessarily to be of a desperate character, for the Russians would naturally attempt to break through, and the French to secure the greatest amount of success. The battle began at early dawn. The unfortunate town of Zurich, encumbered with artillery, baggage-waggons, and wounded soldiers, and cannonaded from all sides, was enveloped in flames. On this side the Limmat, Mortier and Klein had approached and were ready to enter it; on the other, Oudinot pressed on it from the rear, intent to debar Korsakoff from disentangling himself and attaining the route of Winterthur. This road was the scene of a sanguinary contest, being taken and re-taken several times. Determined at last to make a vigorous effort to extricate himself, Korsakoff placed his infantry in the van, his cavalry in the centre, his artillery and baggage in the rear, and thus advanced in form of a long column. His intrepid infantry charged the French with fury, overthrew all before them, and opened a passage; but when it had passed with part of the cavalry, the French returned to the charge, attacked the residue of the cavalry and the baggage, and drove them back to the gates of Zurich. At the same moment Klein and Mortier appeared on the opposite side. For some time an obstinate conflict was waged in the streets. The illustrious and unfortunate Lavater received a ball at the door of his dwelling, fired by a drunken Swiss soldier, who levelled his musket at him with a demand for money; he fell from a severe wound in the thigh, of which he died some months afterwards. Eventually, all the Russian force remaining in Zurich was compelled to surrender at discretion. One hundred pieces of cannon, all the baggage, the administrations, the army-chest, and five thousand prisoners, became the prey of the French. Korsakoff had lost eight thousand men besides, killed or wounded, in the engagement. Eight and five make thirteen, exactly half of his army. The glorious victories in Italy had not been attended by more substantial trophies. The effect, too, upon the remainder of the campaign was calculated to be equally great with the mere material acquisitions. Korsakoff with his remnant of 13,000 men sought in all haste to regain the Rhine.

In the meantime, Soult, directed to pass the Lint above Lake Zurich, executed his commission with not less success than the general-in-chief. He had effected the passage between Biltem and Richemburg. One hundred and fifty soldiers, bearing their pieces above their heads, had swam across the river, scaled the opposite bank, chased away the sharp-shooters, and protected the passage of the vanguard. Hotze, having hastened immediately to the point of danger, had been shot dead, which threw the Austrian ranks into great confusion. Petrasch, who succeeded Hotze, had in vain struggled to force back into the Lint the corps which had passed; he had been obliged to recoil, and retire precipitately on St. Gall and the Rhine, leaving 3,000 prisoners and several pieces of cannon. On their side also, Generals Jellachich and Linken, detached to advance by the Upper-Lint into the canton of Glaris to receive Suwarrov at the avenue of Saint-Gothard, had retreated on hearing of these misfortunes. Thus, nearly 60,000 men were already repulsed from the line of the Limmat beyond that of the Rhine with prodigious loss. Suwarrov, who expected to debouch into Switzerland on the flank of an enemy assailed on all sides and to decide his defeat by his arrival, was destined on the contrary to find all his lieutenants dispersed, and to be entangled amidst an army victorious in all directions.

Starting from Italy with 18,000 men, Suwarrov had reached the foot of Saint-Gothard on the fifth complementary day of the year VII. (21st September). He had been obliged to dismount his Cossacks to load his artillery on the backs of their horses. He dispatched Rosemberg with 6,000 men to turn Saint-Gothard by Disentis and the Crispalt. Arriving on the 1st Vendémiaire (23d September) at Airolo, at the mouth of the gorge of Saint-Gothard, he there encountered Gudin with a brigade of Lecourbe's division. He fought with his wonted obstinacy; but his soldiers, bad marksmen, capable only of advancing and meeting death, fell in whole platoons under balls and stones. He determined at length to threaten Gudin on his flanks, and thus compelled him to yield the gorge as far as the hospital. By his resistance, Gudin had given Lecourbe time to collect his troops. But having at command but 6,000 men, the latter was unable to resist Suwarrov who advanced with 12,000, whilst Rosemberg, already arrived at Urseren, had 6,000 on his rear. He threw his artillery into the Reuss, gained the opposite bank by scaling almost inaccessible rocks, and plunged into the valley. Arrived beyond Urseren, and having Rosemberg no longer in his rear, he broke down the Devil's Bridge and slew a multitude of Russians before they had cleared the precipice by descending into the bed of the Reuss and climbing the opposite bank. He thus retreated foot by foot, profiting by all obstacles to weary and destroy the soldiers of Suwarrov.

The Russian army thus arrived at Altorf, at the extremity of the valley of the Reuss, exhausted with fatigues, destitute of provisions, and greatly weakened by the losses it had sustained. At Altorf, the Reuss falls into Lake Lucerne. If, according to the preconcerted plan, Hotze had been enabled to push forward Jellachich and Linken beyond the Lint to Schweitz, he would have sent boats to receive Suwarrov at the mouth of the Reuss. But after the events which had occurred, Suwarrov found no means of embarking, and discovered himself shut up in a frightful valley. It was the 4th Vendémaire (the 26th September), the day of disaster along the whole Austro-Russian line. There remained to him no resource but throwing himself into the Schachenthal and passing over horrible mountains, where no beaten road existed, in order to penetrate into the valley of Müttenthal. He set out on the following day. Only one man at a time could advance along the path he had to follow. His army consumed two days in traversing this interval of a few leagues. The foremost soldier was already at Mütten before the last had started from Altorf. The precipices were strewed with carriages, horses and soldiers dying of hunger or fatigue. Arrived in the valley of Müttenthal, Suwarrov might debouch by Schweitz not far from Lake Zurich, or ascend the valley, and by Bragel make good his way to the Lint. But on the side of Schweitz, Massena approached with Mortier's division, and on the side of Bragel stood Molitor, occupying the defile of Klönthal towards the banks of the Lint. After giving his troops two days' rest, Suwarrov resolved to retrograde by Bragel. On the 8th Vendémiaire (30th September) he commenced his march. Massena attacked him in rear, whilst on the side of Bragel Molitor kept him at bay in the defile of Klönthal. Rosemberg valiantly resisted the attacks of Massena; but Bagration struggled in vain to pierce Molitor. He succeeded in opening the route of Glaris, but was unable to penetrate that of Wesen. After a series of obstinate and bloody conflicts, intercepted on all the avenues, and driven back on Glaris, Suwarrov had no alternative but to ascend the valley of Engi in order to attain that of the Rhine. But this route was even more fearful than the one he had previously traversed. He entered upon it nevertheless, and after four days of toil and hardships almost unprecedented, reached Coire and the Rhine. Of his eighteen thousand men, he had rescued scarcely ten. The corpses of his soldiers lined the chain of the Alps. This barbarian, asserted to be invincible, retreated covered with confusion and maddened with rage. In the course of a fortnight, upwards of twenty thousand Russians and from five to six thousand Austrians had perished or been made captive. The armies arrayed to invade France were hunted out of Switzerland and repulsed ignominiously into Germany. The coalition was dissolved, for Suwarrov, exasperated against the Austrians, refused to serve any longer with them. It may in truth be said that France was saved.

Eternal glory to Massena, who thus achieved one of the most memorable operations which the history of war records, and which saved France at a moment more perilous than that of Valmy or Fleurus! Great victories are to be admired from their conception or political results; but those are to be especially celebrated which conduce to deliverance. Applause is due to the first, gratitude to the latter. Zurich is Massena's brightest gem, and none exists of purer lustre in any military diadem.

Whilst these auspicious events were passing in Switzerland, victory also declared for France in Holland. Brune, feebly pressed by the enemy, had enjoyed leisure to concentrate his forces, and after having worsted the Anglo-Russians at Kastrikum, had chased them to Zyp, where he reduced them to capitulate. The conditions were the evacuation of Holland, the restitution of all that had been taken at the Helder, and the liberation, without exchange, of 8,000 prisoners. The restoration of the Dutch fleet was likewise desired, but the English refused it, and in sanctioning the capitulation, the evils they might inflict on the country were taken into consideration.

Thus terminated the memorable campaign of 1799. The French republic, entering too prematurely on action, and committing the error of assuming the offensive without having concentrated its forces, had been discomfited at Stockach and Magnano, and lost by those two defeats Germany and Italy. Massena, remaining alone in Switzerland, stood dangerously prominent between two victorious armies. He had recoiled on the Rhine, then on the Limmat, and eventually on the Albis. There he had continued invulnerable during a space of four months. In the interim, the army of Naples, endeavouring to unite with the army of Upper-Italy, had been beaten on the Trebbia. Subsequently combined with that army behind the Apennines, rallied and reinforced, it had lost its general at Novi, been defeated afresh, and definitively driven from Italy. The Apennines even were carried, and the Var menaced. But this had proved the limit of the French disasters. The coalition, displacing its forces, had moved the Archduke on the Rhine and Suwarrov into Switzerland. Massena, seizing this moment, had worsted Korsakoff deprived of the Archduke, and routed Suwarrov deprived of Korsakoff. He had thus retrieved the French misfortunes by an immortal victory. In the East, glorious triumphs had terminated the campaign. But, it must be confessed, if these great exploits had sustained the republic when ready to succumb, if they had restored some glory to it, they had restored neither its grandeur nor its power. France was saved, but only saved; she had not yet recovered her rank, and was even menaced with invasion from the banks of the Var.

CHAPTER LXIII.

RETURN OF BONAPARTE.—HIS DEBARKATION AT FREJUS.—EXCITEMENT AMONGST ALL PARTIES ON HIS RETURN.—HIS COALITION WITH SIEYES TO OVERTURN THE DIRECTORIAL CONSTITUTION.—PREPARATIONS FOR AND REVOLUTION OF THE 18TH BRUMAIRE.—INSTITUTION OF THE PROVISIONAL CONSULATE.—CONCLUSION OF THIS HISTORY.

THE tidings of the battle of Zurich, and the capitulation of the Anglo-Russians, arrived in quick succession, and revived public confidence. It was the first time the odious Russians had been defeated, and their complete overthrow was a source of the deepest satisfaction. But Italy was still forfeited, the Var menaced, the southern frontier in danger. The grandeur of Campo-Formio was far from being restored to France. Yet, in truth, the chief peril it incurred was not exterior, but internal. A disorganized government, refractory parties, spurning the yoke of authority, and yet not sufficiently powerful to usurp and exercise it; an universal derangement or social dissolution, with gangs of brigands, the symptom of that dissolution, infesting the highways, especially in the provinces formerly distracted by civil war:—such was the situation of the republic. A respite of some months being insured by the victory of Zurich, it was not so much a defender that was needed at the present moment as a chief who could grasp and wield the reins of government. The great mass of the population sighed, at any price, for tranquillity, for order, for the termination of dissensions, and the unity of purposes. It dreaded Jacobins, Chouans, Emigrants, all parties equally. The moment was one of marvellous aptitude for a man capable of uniting all suffrages and stilling all apprehensions.

The dispatches containing an account of the expedition to Syria, and of the battles of Mount Tabor and Aboukir, produced an extraordinary sensation, and confirmed the general belief that the hero of Castiglione and Rivoli must conquer wherever he appeared. His name was again immediately on all lips, and the question what is he doing? when will he come? renewed on all sides. If he would but return! was the universal exclamation. By a singular presentiment, a rumour that he had arrived prevailed twice or thrice. His brothers had written to him, and his wife likewise; but it was uncertain whether their letters had ever reached him. We know that they had not succeeded in escaping the English cruisers.

Meanwhile, the personage, the object of such constant speculation, was calmly treading the seas amidst the English fleets. His voyage had not been prosperous; contrary winds procrastinated it. Several times the English had been seen and fears suggested of falling into their power. He alone, pacing the deck of his vessel with a serene and placid countenance, confided in his fortune, and inspired others with a similar reliance, rebuking useless solicitude for predestined evils. He studied the pages of the Bible and the Koran, the sacred writings of the populations he had left behind him. Fearing, after late events, that the south of France might be invaded, he directed the vessels to be steered, not towards the coast of Provence, but towards those of Languedoc. He wished to disembark at Collioure. or Port-Vendres. A gust of wind had carried him to Corsica. The whole island had flocked to greet its renowned citizen. He then set sail for Toulon. That port was almost reached, when, suddenly, as the sun sank beneath the horizon, thirty hostile sail were descried on the larboard quarter of the vessel: they were seen flitting in the rays of the setting sun. It was proposed to hoist out a boat to land in secrecy. Still trusting to his destiny, Bonaparte preferred to wait. The enemy, in fact, shortly disappeared, and at break of day, on the 17th Vendémiaire year VIII. (9th October 1799), the frigates Le Muiron and La Carrère, with the corvettes La Revanche and La Fortune, cast anchor in the bay of Frejus.

The people of Provence had been tormented with dread, for three successive years, of the horrors of an invasion. Bonaparte had freed them from this woful apprehension in 1796; but it had recurred more keenly than ever since the battle of Novi. On learning that Bonaparte was moored off their coast, they hailed his arrival as that of their preserver. All the inhabitants of Frejus hurried to the beach, and in an instant the sea was covered with boats. Inflamed with enthusiasm and curiosity, they boarded the vessels, and in defiance of sanatory laws, held eager intercourse with the new-comers. All clamoured for Bonaparte, all demanded to see him. It was no longer time to enforce an observance of quarantine regulations. The board of health felt bound to relieve the general from their operation, for it might have condemned the whole population to undergo the ordeal, since the crews had been indiscriminately mingled with. Bonaparte immediately proceeded to shore, desirous of posting with all speed to Paris.

The telegraph, quick as the wind, had already communicated along the route from Frejus to Paris the great news of Bonaparte's landing. Everywhere the most tumultuous joy was expressed. The tidings, announced at all the theatres, elicited extraordinary raptures. Patriotic songs superseded dramatic representations. The deputy Baudin of the Ardennes, one of the authors of the constitution of the year III., a reflective and sincere republican, whose attachment to the republic amounted to a passion, and who foreboded its subversion unless a powerful arm appeared to sustain it, Baudin of the Ardennes, we say, expired with joy when he heard the intelligence.

Bonaparte started on the very day of his arrival for Paris. He passed through Aix, Avignon, Valence, and Lyons. In all these towns the enthusiasm was boundless. The bells pealed in every town and village, and during the night bonfires were lighted along the roads. At Lyons especially, the manifestations were even more energetic than elsewhere. In departing from that city, Bonaparte, who wished to enter Paris incognito, took a different route from that he had indicated to his couriers. His wife and brothers, deceived as to his direction, had hastened to meet him, whilst he arrived at Paris. On the 24th Vendémiaire (16th October), he had reached his house in the rue Chantereine without any one suspecting his arrival. Two hours afterwards he repaired to the Directory. The guard recognised him, and uttered on seeing him the cry of Bonaparte for ever! He hurried to the apartments of the president of the Directory, who happened to be Gohier. It was arranged that he should be presented on the following day to the Directory. On the morrow, accordingly, he appeared before that supreme body. He addressed it, saying that after having consolidated the establishment of his army in Egypt by the victories of Mount Tabor and Aboukir, and intrusted its fate to a general capable of insuring its prosperity, he had flown to the succour of the republic, which he deemed in imminent jeopardy. He found it saved by the exploits of his brethren in arms and rejoiced. "Never," he added, placing his hand on his sword, "would he draw it except for the defence of the republic." The president congratulated him on his triumphs and on his return, and extended to him the fraternal embrace. His reception was in appearance most cordial; but at heart jealousy and apprehension were too real, and too well justified by the situation of affairs, for his return to be a source of pleasure to the five republican magistrates.

When after an interval of listless indifference men awaken and interest themselves in an object, it is usually with impassioned ardour. In the state of prostration into which opinions, parties, and authorities had fallen, for some time nothing had existed to inspire sympathy or attachment. A feeling of unmitigated disgust with men and things pervaded the whole community. But at the appearance of the extraordinary individual, whom the East had in so unforeseen a manner returned to Europe, this apathy and aversion ceased. He arose as the star of hope, and fixed universal expectation and regard.

All the generals, employed or not employed, patriot or moderate, hastened to welcome Bonaparte. This was but natural, since he was the first member of their ambitious and discontented class. In him it seemed to have found an avenger against the government. All the ministers, and all the functionaries successively disgraced during the fluctuations of the Directory, likewise flocked to pay court to the new arrival. Ostensibly they attended to visit the illustrious warrior, but in reality to observe and offer homage to the potent personage who seemed to hold the future at his nod.

Bonaparte had brought with him Lannes, Murat, and Berthier, and they were in his train at all times. Shortly Jourdan, Augereau, Macdonald, Beurnonville, Leclerc, Lefebvre, and Marbot, despite their differences of opinion, mustered around him. Moreau himself after a brief delay formed part of this retinue. Bonaparte had met him at Gohier's. Feeling that his superiority permitted him to make the first advances, he accosted Moreau, testified his desire to form his acquaintance, and expressed for him an esteem which deeply moved the general. He subsequently presented to him a Damascus blade enriched with jewels, and succeeded in wholly gaining him. In a few days Moreau was enrolled of his court. He also harboured dissatisfaction, and resorted with his comrades to the presumed avenger. To these celebrated captains were added men of all professions. Amongst others were Bruix, ex-minister of the navy, who had recently scoured the Mediterranean at the head of the French and Spanish fleets, a man of subtle and acute intellect, equally capable of conducting a negotiation as of commanding a squadron, and M. de Talleyrand, who had reason to fear the displeasure of Bonaparte on account of his not having repaired to Constantinople. But M. de Talleyrand confided in his ability, his name, and his importance for a favourable reception, and he was not deceived. Their mutual predilection was too strong, and their reciprocal need of association too attractive, to remain estranged. Amongst the attendants in the rue Chantereine were likewise counted Rœderer, the old procurator of the Commune, a frank and intelligent personage, and Regnault de Saint-Jean-d'Angely, an ex-constituent to whom Bonaparte had been attached in Italy and whom he had employed at Malta, a brilliant and accomplished orator.

But they were not only the discarded and the malcontent who besieged Bonaparte. The chiefs of the government frequented his domicile with similar assiduity. The directors and ministers vied in entertaining him as on his return from Italy. A large proportion of the members of the two Councils sought to be presented to him. The ministers and directors rendered him a homage still more flattering; they came to consult him every instant on the business of the state. Dubois-Crancé, the minister at war, had in some sort transferred his portfolio to Bonaparte's residence. Moulins, who of the directors more peculiarly arrogated the war department, passed a part of each morning with him. Gohier and Roger-Ducos were equally constant in their attentions. Cambaceres, the minister of justice, an expert jurisconsult, who entertained for Bonaparte the reverence weak men yield to strength, and whom Bonaparte affected to caress as a proof he could appreciate civil attainments; Fouché, minister of police, who was not unwilling to exchange his old and emasculated patron, Barras, for a new and puissant protector; Réal, commissary in the department of the Seine, an ardent and ingenuous patriot, and one of the most intellectual men of the time, all diligently plied their court to Bonaparte, and craved deferentially his views of public policy. He had been scarcely a week in Paris, and already the government of affairs had devolved upon him almost involuntarily. In default of actual authority, of which he was as yet destitute, his advice was earnestly solicited. He, with his accustomed reserve, affected to shun the attentions bestowed on him. He refused to receive numbers of people, seldom showed himself, and crept abroad so to speak by stealth. His features had become harder, and his complexion darker in hue. He usually wore, since his return, a short grey riding-coat, and a Turkish scimitar slung upon a silken cord. To those who saw him thus attired, this latter appendage vividly recalled the East, the Pyramids, Mount Tabor, and Aboukir. The officers of the garrison, the forty adjutants of the national guard, the staff of the division, requested leave to wait upon him. He deferred their reception from day to day, and appeared to comply reluctantly with these exhibitions of homage. Meanwhile he listened, opened himself to no one, and scanned narrowly men and things. This conduct was sagacious and profound. When a man is necessary, he has nothing to dread by waiting. He but irritates impatience, induces applications, and enables himself to choose his part and dictate terms.

"What is Bonaparte going to do?" was the question canvassed on all sides. It proved that something inevitable was expected from him. Two principal parties, and a third, a subdivision of the two others, offered themselves to him and were disposed to serve him if he adopted their views: these were the patriots, the moderates or politicians, and the putrid, as they were called, the corrupt of all times and of all factions.

The patriots distrusted Bonaparte and his ambition; but with their taste for subverting and their improvidence for the morrow, they would have used him as an instrument to overturn the existing state of things, content to take on hazard a future reconstruction. At the same time, this course was advocated only by the more violent, who, always discontented with the actual condition, regarded the task of destroying as the most urgent of all. The rest of the patriots, those who may be styled republicans, were jealous of the fame of the general, and desired at the utmost that he should be elevated to the Directory, reflecting with pain that for this purpose a special dispensation must be granted to him on account of his age, but wished most of all that he should repair to the frontiers to restore the glory of the French arms and exalt the republic to its former grandeur.

The moderates or politicians, men dreading the fury of parties, and particularly that of the Jacobins, having no longer any faith in a violated and worn-out constitution, contemplated a change, and were anxious that it should be accomplished under the auspices of an influential personage. "Take the power, give us a wise and moderate constitution, and afford us security," was the secret language they addressed to Bonaparte. They composed the most numerous party in France, comprising even many compromised patriots, who, entertaining fears for the revolution, desired to intrust its safety to a powerful supporter. They had a majority in the Ancients, and a strong minority in the Five-Hundred. They had hitherto followed the chief civil celebrity of the day, Sieyes, and the more cordially that Sieyes had been grossly abused in the club of the Manege. At present they were necessarily inclined to adhere still more zealously to Bonaparte; for it was effective strength they mainly sought, and that was much greater in a victorious general than in a publicist, however renowned he might be.

Lastly, the putrid comprehended all the knaves and intriguers who strove to amass fortunes, and had disgraced themselves in such efforts, but who were prepared to reap further illicit gains at the same cost. They followed Barras and Fouché the minister of police. They were made up of all parties, Jacobins, moderates, and even royalists. They formed not a party so much as a numerous sect or coterie.

In the sequel of this enumeration, it is not necessary to mention the partisans of royalty. They were too completely crushed since the 18th Fructidor, and moreover Bonaparte inspired them with no hopes. Such a man as he could be none other than egotistical in his ambition, and must scorn to grasp power merely to surrender it into the hands of others. They contented themselves, therefore, with swelling the number of the enemies of the Directory, and with assailing it after the fashion of all parties.

Amongst these different parties, Bonaparte had but one choice to make. The patriots were wholly repugnant to him. Some of them, attached to the existing condition, suspected his ambition; others desired a physical-force overthrow, and then a revival of interminable agitation; with them nothing stable could be founded. Besides they were in opposition to the spirit of the times, and were in the last throes of their pristine ardour. The putrid were of no account; they had no influence except in the government into which they had naturally crept, for thither tended all their desires. For the rest, it was unnecessary to be concerned about them; they were sure to side with him who combined most chances in his favour, for their sole aspiration was to gain office and money. The only party on which Bonaparte could repose was that which, partaking the cravings of the whole population, aspired to place the republic beyond the prey of factions, by constituting it in a solid manner. Here a wide future was opened, and here it behoved him to take his position.

His determination could not be doubtful; mere instinct prompted to it by anticipation. Bonaparte had an abhorrence of turbulent men, and also of corrupt. He could relish only such as were content to be governed. In this category was involved almost the entire nation. Still his vocation was to temporize, suffer himself to be tempted by the offers of parties, and study their leaders, to ascertain with whom amongst them policy might advise an alliance.

The parties were all represented in the Directory. The patriots had, as we have seen, Moulins and Gohier. The putrid had Barras. The politicians or moderates had Sieyes and Roger-Ducos.

Gohier and Moulins, sincere and honest patriots, more moderate than their party since they were in the exercise of power, admired Bonaparte; but, averse to use his sword otherwise than for the glory of the constitution of the year III., they wished to send him to the armies. Bonaparte treated them with great consideration; he esteemed their honesty, a quality he always honoured in men (a disposition natural and interested in one born to govern). Furthermore, the regard he manifested towards them was a mode of demonstrating his respect for true republicans. His wife had formed a close intimacy with Madame Gohier. She calculated in this manner, and had said to Madame Gohier: "My intimacy with you will supply an answer to all these calumnies."

Barras, who felt his political end approaching, and saw in Bonaparte an inevitable successor, detested him most cordially. He would have stooped to flatter him as formerly, only he was conscious of being more thoroughly despised by him, and therefore held aloof. Bonaparte entertained for this ignorant, corrupt, and besotted debauchee, an aversion rendered every day more insurmountable. The epithet of putrid, which he had given to him and his kind, sufficiently marked his disgust and contempt. It was impossible he should consent to be allied with such a character.

Sieyes remained; a man veritably important in every essential respect, and dragging in his train Roger-Ducos. In raising Sieyes to the Directory immediately before the 30th Prairial, it seemed as if it were intended to constitute him the presiding genius of the republic. Bonaparte eyed him with a certain spleen for having occupied the first place in his absence, fixed for a moment general attention, and given birth to expectations. He harboured a resentment against him he disdained to explain. Although strongly opposed in genius and habits, they both enjoyed that degree of superiority which permitted them to treat and merge their differences, but each had too much pride to make concessions. Unfortunately they had never yet maintained any intercourse, and two lofty spirits that have not exchanged flatteries are natural enemies. They kept each other in observation, reciprocally waiting for the other to tender the first advances. They chanced to meet at a dinner-party given by Gohier. Bonaparte had felt sufficiently above Moreau to proffer the first overtures; he had a different impression with regard to Sieyes, and abstained from speaking to him. The latter maintained a like silence. They retired in mutual wrath. "Did you mark this little insolent?" said Sieyes; "he did not even salute the member of a government which ought to have him shot!" "What possessed you," said Bonaparte on his part, "to put this priest in the Directory? He is sold to Prussia, and if you don't take care he will deliver you to her." Thus, in men of the greatest superiority pride prevails even over policy. But, sooth to say, were it otherwise, they would lack that haughty assumption which fits them to domineer over mortals.

Accordingly, the individual whom it chiefly behoved Bonaparte to gain was precisely he for whom he felt an incorrigible repugnance. But their interests were so identical that, by their several partisans and in their own despite, they were to be rivetted in a common cause.

Whilst this alienation continued, and the concourse around Bonaparte grew daily larger, he, uncertain yet as to the part he ought to take, had sounded Gohier and Moulins to ascertain whether they would consent to his nomination as a director, notwithstanding his defect of age. It was in the place of Sieyes he would have designed to enter the government. By excluding Sieyes, he would become master of his colleagues, and be assured of governing under their name. This, doubtless, was but an imperfect success; nevertheless it afforded the means of arriving at power without actually perpetrating a revolution; and once in possession, he might await a further development. Whether he were really sincere, or merely meant to deceive them, as is possible, and persuade them that his ambition was confined to a seat in the Directory, it is certain he sounded them, and found them intractable upon the subject of age. A dispensation, albeit granted by the Councils, appeared to them an infraction of the constitution. So it became incumbent to relinquish this idea if ever veritably formed.

Gohier and Moulins, beginning to be alarmed at the impatience they conceived Bonaparte displayed to assume political functions, recommended his removal by giving him the command of an army. Sieyes demurred to this conclusion, remarking with bitterness that, so far from affording him an opportunity to gather fresh glory, it was advisable on the contrary to overlook him, and so cause him to be forgotten. As the suggestion of sending him into Italy was started, Barras observed that he had harvested sufficient plunder there to have no wish to return. In the end, it was resolved to request his attendance with the view of offering him a command, leaving to himself the choice of the army.

Bonaparte, being accordingly summoned, repaired to the Directory. He was cognizant of Barras' remark. Before the object for which he was called had been intimated to him, he addressed the Directory in a lofty and menacing tone, cited the observation of which he had to complain, and, fixing his eyes on Barras, said that if he had made his fortune in Italy, it was not, at least, at the expense of the republic. Barras was silent. The president Gohier replied to Bonaparte that the government was well convinced that his laurels constituted the only wealth he had amassed in Italy. He then proceeded to state that the Directory invited him to accept a command, and referred to himself the choice of his army. Bonaparte answered coldly, that he had not yet sufficiently recovered from his fatigues; that the transition from a dry to a humid climate had severely tried his constitution, and that he still required some time to retrieve his health. He withdrew without deigning further explanation. This occurrence was eminently calculated to warn the Directory of his views and to acquaint him also with their suspicions.

It furnished a motive to act with promptitude. His brothers, his habitual advisers, Rœderer, Réal, Regnault de Saint-Jean d'Angely, Bruix, and Talleyrand, brought to him every day members of the moderate and political party in the Councils. Amongst the principal of these were, in the Five-Hundred, Boulay de la Meurthe, Gaudin, Chazal, Cabanis, and Chenier; in the Ancients, Cornudet, Lemercier, Fargues, and Daunou. All concurred in opinion that an alliance with the genuine party, to wit, the reorganizing, was indispensable, and consequently a coalition with Sieyes, who had a constitution ready compiled, and a majority in the Council of Ancients. Bonaparte acquiesced in this opinion, sensible that he had really no alternative; but then there was the obstacle of an approximation with Sieyes. But the interests at stake were so great, and between his sensitive pride and that of Sieyes there were mediators so delicate and so adroit, that a pacification could not long be delayed. M. de Talleyrand was fitted to soothe more savage and indomitable antipathies than theirs. The negotiation was speedily opened and concluded. It was agreed that a stronger constitution should be given to France under the auspices of Sieyes and Bonaparte. Without entering into explanations touching the form and nature of this constitution, it was understood that it should be republican, whilst it delivered France from what both the one and the other called "brawlers," and that it should vest in the two high contracting personages the preponderance of authority.

A dogmatist intent on the long deferred accomplishment of his conceptions and an ambitious warrior aspiring to rule the world, were, in the prostration of all systems and all strength, signally fitted to coalesce. Their incompatibility of disposition was of little consequence. The address of mediators and the gravity of interests sufficed to alleviate this inconvenience, at least for the moment, and this moment was sufficient to work out a revolution.

Bonaparte, therefore, was persuaded to act with Sieyes and Roger-Ducos. He still evinced the same repugnance towards Barras, and the same consideration for Gohier and Moulins, but maintained an equal reserve with all three. Fouché, however, skilful in divining a rising fortune, viewed with the deepest regret the distaste of Bonaparte for his patron Barras, and was especially grieved to perceive that Barras took no pains to mitigate it. He himself was fully determined to pass into the camp of the new Cæsar; but hesitating, through a remnant of shame, to abandon his protector, he wished to carry him in his train. Assiduous in his attentions to Bonaparte, and sufficiently well received on account of his holding the portfolio of police, he strove to overcome his animosity against Barras. In this endeavour he was seconded by Réal, Bruix, and the other adherents of the general. Believing he had succeeded, he prompted Barras to invite Bonaparte to dinner. Barras sent him an invitation accordingly for the 8th Brumaire (30th October). Bonaparte accepted it and attended. After dinner a conversation on public affairs was commenced. Bonaparte and Barras discoursed apart. The latter first broke ground. He preluded by a tissue of generalities on his personal position. Anticipating doubtless that Bonaparte would contradict him, he affirmed that he was ill, worn-out, and condemned to relinquish office. Bonaparte preserving a solemn silence, Barras proceeded to remark that the republic was disorganized, and that to save it he deemed a concentration of power and the nomination of a president requisite; instancing General Hedouville as a fit person to fill that post. Hedouville was equally obscure and incompetent. Barras shrouded his real design, and designated Hedouville to avoid naming himself.—"As to you, general," he subjoined, "your purpose is to repair to the army; proceed thither to gain fresh glory and replace France in her proper rank. For myself, I propose to seek the retirement which I so much need."—Bonaparte threw on Barras a fixed gaze, answered not a word, and so allowed the conference to pause. Barras, disconcerted, added not another syllable. Bonaparte immediately withdrew, and before quitting the Luxembourg visited the apartments of Sieyes. He there declared to him emphatically that he would act with him alone, and that they had only to settle the means of execution. Their alliance was cemented at this interview, and it was agreed to make preparations for the 18th or 20th Brumaire.

On returning home, Bonaparte found Fouché, Réal, and the other friends of Barras.—"Well! your Barras," he exclaimed to them, "do you know what he has proposed to me? To make a president, who is to be Hedouville, that is to say, himself, and for me, I am to go to the wars! Nothing can be done with such a man."—The friends of Barras attempted to palliate this absurdity and to exculpate Barras. Bonaparte gave little heed to their remarks and changed the subject, for his determination was taken. Fouché immediately repaired to Barras to lecture him on his folly, and urged him to hasten and correct the effect of his stupidity. Early the following morning, in fact, Barras betook himself to Bonaparte's in order to excuse his words of the preceding evening; he tendered him his devotion and his co-operation in all he might contemplate. Bonaparte heard him with inattention, answered him by generalities, and in his turn spoke of his fatigues, his debilitated health, and his disgust at men and things.

Barras perceived he was lost, and his career about to terminate. It was full time he should reap the reward of his double intrigues and of his base treacheries. The ardent patriots repudiated him since his conduct towards the society of the Manege. The republicans, attached to the constitution of the year III., regarded him with suspicion and contempt. The reorganizers, the politicians, saw in him a man utterly discredited, and applied to him the epithet of "Putrid," invented by Bonaparte. He retained merely some relations with the royalists by means of certain emigrants concealed in his court. His intrigues with them were of ancient date; they had commenced from the 18th Fructidor. He had communicated them to the Directory, and obtained authority to continue them in order to detect the ramifications of the counter-revolution. He had thus contrived the means of betraying at will the republic or the pretender. At this moment there was a negotiation with the latter touching the payment of several millions to promote his return. It is possible, at the same time, that Barras was not sincere with the pretender, for all his predilections must have been for the republic. But to judge accurately the preferences of this veteran corruptionist would be difficult. Perhaps he was unconscious of them himself. Moreover, on this point of corruption, a little money would unhappily prevail over all the prepossessions of inclination or principle.

Fouché, appalled at the disgrace of his patron, and shocked more especially at finding himself involved in his fate, redoubled his court to Bonaparte. The latter, distrusting a person of his character, studiously kept from him his secrets; but Fouché, nothing daunted, for he was profoundly sensible of Bonaparte's inevitable success, resolved to overcome his prejudices by force of services. Holding the police department, which he managed with great skill, he knew that a conspiracy was on foot. Of this fact he abstained from apprizing the Directory, the majority of which, comprehending Moulins, Gohier, and Barras, might have drawn from his revelations a discovery fatal to its contrivers.

Bonaparte had been but a fortnight in Paris, and nearly all was prepared for the blow. Berthier, Lannes, and Murat daily added to his partisans amongst the generals and officers. Of these, Bernadotte from jealousy, Jourdan from attachment to the republic, and Augereau from pure jacobinism, held back and had inspired apprehensions in the patriots of the Five-Hundred; but the bulk of the military was gained. Moreau, a sincere republican, but suspected by the predominant patriots, and discontented with the Directory which had so unworthily rewarded his services, placed his sole reliance on Bonaparte. Wholly won by his blandishments, and yielding with contentment to a superior, he declared he would second all his projects. He desired only not to be in the secret, as he had a horror of political intrigues, but requested to be summoned at the moment of execution. There were stationed in Paris at this time the 8th and 9th regiments of dragoons, which had formerly served under Bonaparte in Italy, and were entirely devoted to him. The 21st Chasseurs, organized by him when he commanded the army of the interior, and which had once counted Murat in its ranks, equally adhered to him. These regiments often repeated a demand to be reviewed by him. The officers of the garrison and the adjutants of the National guard had likewise begged to be presented to him, but had not yet been gratified. He delayed, intending to make their reception instrumental to his designs. His two brothers Lucien and Joseph, and the deputies of his party, also continued to make fresh converts in the Councils.

An interview was fixed with Sieyes for the 15th Brumaire, to arrange the plan and the means of executing it. The same day had been appointed for a banquet given by the Councils to General Bonaparte, as on the return from Italy. On this occasion, however, the Councils did not give it officially as then. The subject had been proposed in secret committee; but the Five-Hundred, who, under the first impulse of the landing, had nominated Lucien president, with the view of honouring the general in the person of his brother, were now actuated by suspicions and refused to sanction a banquet. It was thereupon determined it should be given by subscription. The number of subscribers, after all, was between six and seven hundred. The dinner took place in the church of St. Sulpice. It proved chilly and lugubrious; every one eyed his neighbour furtively and maintained a gloomy reserve. It was visible some impending event was anticipated, to be the work of part of those present. Bonaparte was sombre and preoccupied; as he well might be, since upon leaving that scene he was to attend and assign the place and hour of a conspiracy. The moment the dinner was concluded, he arose, and making the circuit of the tables with Berthier, addressed a few words to the deputies and abruptly retired.

He repaired to the apartments of Sieyes to make with him his final arrangements. In the first place, the government to be substituted for the one existing was settled. It was agreed that the Councils should be suspended for three months, and the five directors superseded by three provisional consuls, who during those three months should exercise a species of dictatorship, and be commissioned to frame a constitution. Bonaparte, Sieyes, and Roger-Ducos were to be the three consuls. In the next place, the means of execution were canvassed. Sieyes had an assured majority in the Ancients. As incendiary projects attributed to the Jacobins were the daily topic of discourse, it was concluded to suppose an outrage contemplated by them against the national representation. The committee of inspectors of the Ancients, wholly at the disposition of Sieyes, was to recommend the translation of the legislative body to Saint-Cloud. The constitution, in fact, gave such a right to the Council of Ancients. The Council was to add to this measure another which was not authorized by the constitution; namely, to intrust the care of protecting the removal to a general of its selection, of course to Bonaparte. It was at the same time to vest in him the command of the 17th military division and of all the troops cantoned in Paris. With these forces Bonaparte was to escort the legislative body to Saint-Cloud. There it was intended to overawe the Five-Hundred and extort from them the decree for a provisional consulate. Sieyes and Roger-Ducos were on the same day to give in their resignations as directors. It was proposed to contrive the abdication of Barras, Gohier, or Moulins. Then the Directory would be disorganized by the dissolution of the majority; the Five-Hundred would be told there was no longer a government, and be obliged to nominate the three consuls. This plan was excellently conceived, for when a revolution is to be accomplished it is always essential to disguise the illegal as much as possible, and to use the forms of a constitution to destroy it and the members of a government to subvert it.

The 18th Brumaire was fixed for procuring the decree of translation, and the 19th for the decisive session at Saint-Cloud. The duty of the plot was divided. To Sieyes and his friends was apportioned the task of obtaining the decree of translation. To Bonaparte was assigned the muster of the armed force and the charge of conducting the troops to the Tuileries.

All being arranged they separated. Rumours prevailed on all sides of a great catastrophe on the point of occurring. It had always been so on similar occasions. There are no revolutions in truth which succeed but such as may be known beforehand. As it was, Fouché refrained from enlightening the three directors without the pale of the conspiracy. Dubois-Crancé, despite his deference for the military knowledge and fame of Bonaparte, was still a warm patriot; he had information of the project and hastened to denounce it to Gohier and Moulins, but his statement was not credited. They were ready to believe in Bonaparte an aspiring ambition, but not a conspiracy all ready hatched. Barras was more sensible of a great movement in progress; but he felt himself so completely ruined in every sense that he abandoned himself supinely to the course of events.

The committee of the Ancients, over which the deputy Cornet presided, undertook to make every preparation during the night of the 17th–18th Brumaire to procure the decree of translation. The shutters and curtains of the windows were closed to prevent the public being apprized, by the lights, of the nocturnal labours proceeding in the rooms of the committee. It took care to convoke the Council of Ancients for seven in the morning, and that of the Five-Hundred for eleven. In this manner the decree of translation might be passed before the sitting of the Five-Hundred; and as all deliberation was prohibited by the constitution immediately consequent upon the promulgation of the decree of translation, the tribune of the Five-Hundred would be at once closed, and all embarrassing discussion stopped. It adopted the further precaution of delaying the transmission of the letters of convocation to certain deputies. Thus it provided that those about whom there was any doubt should not arrive until after the decree was passed.

On his part, Bonaparte had made all necessary provisions. He had sent for Colonel Sebastiani, who commanded the 9th dragoons, to be assured of the dispositions of the regiment. This regiment was composed of 400 foot and 600 horse. It contained a considerable number of young soldiers; but the veterans of Arcole and Rivoli gave it its tone. The colonel answered for the regiment to Bonaparte. He was then directed, under a pretext of holding a review, to leave the barracks at five in the morning, to distribute his men, partly on the Place de la Revolution and partly in the garden of the Tuileries, and to occupy in person with two hundred cavalry the streets of Mont-Blanc and Chantereine. Bonaparte subsequently conveyed an intimation to the colonels of the other cavalry regiments that he would review them on the 18th. He likewise sent word to all the officers who desired to be presented to him that he would receive them on the same morning. As an excuse for the early hour appointed, he alleged the pretence of an intended journey. He besought Moreau and all the generals to be in the rue Chantereine at the same hour. At midnight he despatched an aide-de-camp to Lefebvre to beg attendance at six in the morning. Lefebvre was devoted to the Directory; but Bonaparte relied upon his not being able to resist his ascendency. He gave no notice to either Bernadotte or Augereau. He had taken the precaution, in order to deceive Gohier, to invite himself to dine with him on the 18th, with all his family, and at the same time, in the hope of inducing him to resign his office, he caused him to be solicited through his wife to come on the following morning at eight o'clock, and breakfast in the rue Chantereine.

Before dawn of the 18th, a movement, unexpected on the part of those even who concurred to produce it, was manifested in all quarters. A numerous cavalry traversed the boulevards; all the generals and officers in Paris proceeded in full uniform to the rue Chantereine, unconscious of the concourse they were there to find. The deputies of the Ancients hurried to their chamber, astonished at so sudden a convocation. The Five-Hundred were for the most part not cognisant of any unusual preparation. Gohier, Moulins, and Barras, remained in profound ignorance. But Sieyes, who had for some time past been taking lessons in horsemanship, and Roger-Ducos, were already mounted and on their way to the Tuileries.

So soon as the Ancients were constituted, the president of the committee of inspectors, Cornet, addressed them. He said that the committee charged to watch over the security of the legislative body had learnt that sinister projects were hatching, and that conspirators were flocking in crowds to Paris, there holding secret conclaves and compassing criminal designs against the liberty of the national representation. He added that the Council of Ancients had within itself the means of saving the republic and was bound to use them. These means consisted in transferring the legislative body to Saint-Cloud to shelter it from the attempts of the conspirators, in placing meanwhile the public tranquillity under the guardianship of a general able to secure it, and in nominating Bonaparte as that general. No sooner had this proposition and the decree which embodied it been read than a marked emotion was perceptible through the Council. Some members rose to oppose it; Cornudet, Lebrun, Fargues, and Regnier, supported it. The name of Bonaparte, which had been introduced to give weight to the motion, and whose aid it was well known might be relied upon, decided the majority. By eight o'clock the decree was passed. It transferred the Councils to Saint-Cloud and there convoked them for the following day at noon. Bonaparte was appointed general-in-chief of all the troops comprised in the 17th military division, of the guard of the legislative body, of the guard of the Directory, and of the national guards of Paris and the environs. Lefebvre, the actual commander of the 17th division, was placed under his orders. Bonaparte was enjoined to attend at the bar to receive the decree and to take an oath in the hands of the president. A messenger of state was deputed to bear with all speed the decree to the general.

The messenger of state, who was no other than the deputy Cornet himself, found the boulevards lined with a numerous cavalry, and the streets of Mont-Blanc and Chantereine filled with officers and generals in full uniform. All were hastening to obey the invitation of General Bonaparte. His rooms being too small to receive so great a crowd, he had thrown open the doors, advanced to the steps in front, and thence harangued the military. He said that France was in danger, and that he relied upon them to aid in saving her. Cornet at this moment presenting to him the decree, he snatched it from him, read it aloud, and asked them if he might count upon their support. All answered with their hands upon their swords that they were ready to second him. To Lefebvre he addressed himself particularly. That general, finding the troops in motion without his orders, had interrogated Colonel Sebastiani on the subject, who, without replying, had entreated him to enter Bonaparte's house. Lefebvre had accordingly done so in no pleasant mood.—"Ha! Lefebvre," said Bonaparte to him, "you, one of the props of the republic, will you allow it to perish in the hands of these lawyers? Unite with me and assist in saving it. Here," he added taking up a sword, "this is the sword I wore at the Pyramids; I present it to you as a token of my esteem and confidence." "Yes," answered Lefebvre much moved, "let us throw these lawyers into the river."—Joseph Bonaparte had brought Bernadotte to the scene; but he, perceiving what was intended, withdrew to go and apprize the patriots. Fouché was not in the secret; but, informed of the event, he had ordered the barriers to be shut and suspended the departure of couriers and public vehicles. He came in haste to acquaint Bonaparte with what he had done and to make protestations of his zeal. Bonaparte, who had hitherto passed him aside, did not now repel him, but told him that his precautions were useless, that there was no occasion to close the barriers or arrest the ordinary course of things, for he acted in concert with the nation and depended upon it. At this moment Bonaparte learnt that Gohier had refused to accept his invitation; he manifested some irritation, and sent a messenger to warn him he would fruitlessly compromise himself by resistance. He then mounted on horseback to proceed to the Tuileries and take the oath before the Council of Ancients. Almost all the generals of the republic were on horseback around him. Moreau, Macdonald, Berthier, Lannes, Murat, and Leclerc, were immediately behind him as his lieutenants. At the Tuileries he found the detachments of the 9th, whom he paused to harangue, and, after stirring them to a pitch of enthusiasm, entered the palace.

He presented himself before the Ancients accompanied by this brilliant staff. His appearance caused a strong emotion, and proved to the Ancients that they had invoked a man of might, who had all the means necessary to insure the success of a coup d'etat. He advanced to the bar: "Citizen representatives," he said, "the republic was about to perish, your decree has saved it! Woe to those who attempt to oppose its execution; aided by all my companions in arms, assembled here around me, I will know how to resist their efforts. Past examples are vainly cited to inspire apprehensions; nothing in history resembles the eighteenth century, and nothing in that century resembles its termination.—We will uphold the republic.—We will uphold it founded on true liberty and on the representative system.—We will so maintain it, I swear in my own name and in the name of my companions in arms."—"We all swear!" cried the generals and officers who crowded the bar. This mode of taking his oath was singularly adroit on Bonaparte's part, since he thus avoided swearing fidelity to the constitution. In fact a deputy rose to animadvert upon the omission; but the president silenced him on the plea that the decree of translation foreclosed all debate. The Council immediately broke up. Bonaparte returned to the garden, mounted his horse, and, attended by all the generals, passed in review the regiments of the garrison as they came in succession upon the ground. He delivered a short and energetic speech to the soldiers, telling them he was about to effect a revolution which would restore to them abundance and glory. Shouts of Long live Bonaparte! responded from the ranks. The weather was splendid, the concourse innumerable: all seemed to smile auspiciously on the catastrophe about to terminate confusion by absolute power.

By this time the Five-Hundred, warned of the revolution in progress, had resorted tumultuously to their hall of session. Upon assembling, they received a message from the Ancients embodying the decree of translation. Its annunciation provoked an outcry from numerous voices; but the president Lucien Bonaparte enforced silence by virtue of the constitution which prohibited discussion. The Five-Hundred forthwith separated; the more ardent, hastening to each other's domiciles, formed themselves into conclaves to reciprocate their indignation and devise means of resistance. The patriots of the faubourgs also rushed forth in great excitement and gathered uproariously around Santerre.

Meanwhile, Bonaparte, having finished the review of the troops, re-entered the Tuileries, and repaired to the Ancients' committee of inspectors. The like committee of the Five-Hundred had intimated its adhesion to the new revolution, and concurred in the arrangements for promoting it. Here the further steps were to be taken under pretext of executing the translation. Bonaparte established himself at the committee in permanence. The minister of justice, Cambaceres, had already presented himself before it. Fouché likewise soon appeared, and Sieyes and Roger-Ducos came to lodge their resignations. It was of importance to obtain a third, as then the directorial majority would be dissolved; in which event there being no longer an executive power, no act of energy on its part was to be dreaded. No hopes were entertained that Gohier or Moulins would voluntarily abdicate; so M. de Talleyrand and Admiral Bruix were dispatched to Barras to prevail on him to resign.

Bonaparte next distributed the command of the troops. He deputed Murat, with a numerous cavalry and a corps of grenadiers, to occupy Saint-Cloud. Serrurier was stationed at the Point-du-jour with a reserve. Lannes was appointed to command the troops guarding the Tuileries. To Moreau was assigned an invidious commission, and certainly the least honourable of all upon this great occasion. Bonaparte instructed him to proceed with five hundred men to guard the Luxembourg; enjoining him to blockade the directors under pretence of insuring their safety, and rigorously to prevent them from holding any communication beyond its precincts. At the same time Bonaparte sent word to the commander of the directorial guard to obey his orders, withdraw his corps from the Luxembourg, and repair to him at the Tuileries. An additional and important precaution was adopted with the aid of Fouché. The Directory had the power of suspending municipalities; therefore Fouché, acting in his capacity of minister of police as if he had been empowered by the Directory, suspended the twelve municipalities of Paris, and abrogated their authority. By these means no rallying point remained to the patriots either in the Directory or in the twelve communes which had succeeded to the great commune of former times. Fouché subsequently caused placards to be affixed exhorting the citizens to order and tranquillity, and assuring them that exertions to rescue the republic from its perils were at that moment in active progress.

These measures completely succeeded. The authority of General Bonaparte was everywhere recognised, although the Council of Ancients had not acted constitutionally in delegating it to him. For if that Council could ordain the translation, it had no jurisdiction to nominate a supreme chief of the armed force. Moreau proceeded to the Luxembourg and blockaded it with five hundred men. Jubé, the commander of the directorial guard, paying prompt obedience to the orders he had received, mounted his troops and quitted the Luxembourg for the Tuileries. During this interval, the three remaining directors, Moulins, Gohier, and Barras, were thrown into grievous perplexity. The two former, at length painfully aware of the conspiracy that had eluded their notice, had resorted to Barras' apartments to ascertain from him whether he would abide firmly by them and continue the majority. They found that voluptuous personage in the bath, and shortly informed him of Bonaparte's proceedings. "That man," he exclaimed with a gross expression, "has outwitted us all!" He pledged himself to remain steadfastly by his colleagues, for he never failed to give promises, and sent his secretary Bottot to the Tuileries upon a mission of discovery. But Gohier and Moulins had scarcely quitted him ere he fell into the hands of Bruix and Talleyrand. They had little difficulty in convincing him of the impotency to which he was reduced, and equally slender cause to apprehend an heroic struggle on his part in defence of the directorial constitution. They promised him immunity and fortune, and he consented to abdicate. A letter had been already framed which he signed, and Talleyrand and Bruix hastened therewith to Bonaparte. After that, the efforts of Gohier and Moulins to gain access to him proved abortive, and they eventually learnt the fact of his resignation. Standing alone, and incompetent to deliberate officially, they knew not what course to follow, and yet were resolute to fulfil honestly their duties towards the constitution of the year III. They determined at length to repair to the committee of inspectors, for the purpose of appealing to their two colleagues, Sieyes and Ducos, to join them in reconstituting the majority, and promulgating at least the decree of translation. This offered but a sad resource. It was impossible to collect an armed force, and raise a standard in opposition to that of Bonaparte; hence, it was wholly useless to visit the Tuileries and affront Bonaparte in his very camp, and in the centre of all his forces.

They persisted in the design, however, and were allowed to execute it. They found Bonaparte surrounded by Sieyes, Ducos, a crowd of deputies, and a numerous staff. Bottot, Barras' secretary, had just been dismissed with a severe rebuff. Bonaparte, raising his voice, had said to him: "What have you made of that France I left so brilliant? I left peace, and I find war; I left victories, and I find defeats; I left the millions of Italy, and I find despoiling laws and penury. What has become of the hundred thousand Frenchmen whom I knew, all my comrades in glory? They are dead!" Bottot had retreated in trepidation; but immediately afterwards Barras' resignation was brought which tended to calm the general. He told Gohier and Moulins he was rejoiced to see them, and that he relied upon their abdication since he believed them too good citizens to oppose an inevitable and salutary revolution. Gohier replied with energy that he had come with his colleague Moulins merely to endeavour to save the republic. "Yes," retorted Bonaparte, "to save it, and with what? with the appliances of a constitution which is shivered to atoms?" "Who has told you that?" interrupted Gohier: "people who have neither the courage nor the will to adhere to it." A warm altercation ensued between Gohier and Bonaparte. At this moment a note was placed in the hands of the general. It gave advice of a considerable ferment in the Faubourg Saint-Antoine. "General Moulins," said Bonaparte, "you are a relative of Santerre's?" "No," answered Moulins, "I am not his relative but his friend." "I learn," rejoined Bonaparte, "that he is creating a disturbance in the faubourgs; tell him that at the first movement I cause him to be shot." Moulins replied with acrimony to Bonaparte, who repeated he would cause Santerre to be shot. The altercation with Gohier was then resumed. Bonaparte concluded it by exclaiming: "The republic is in danger, it must be saved—I will it so! Sieyes and Ducos have tendered their resignations, and Barras has just sent his. You are but two, isolated, powerless, and can do nothing; I advise you not to resist." Gohier and Moulins replied that they would not desert their post. They returned to the Luxembourg, where they were from that moment confined, separated from each other, and debarred from all communication by the express orders of Bonaparte transmitted to Moreau. Barras had already taken his departure for his estate of Gros-Bois, escorted by a detachment of dragoons.

Hence, there was no longer an executive power. Bonaparte alone had any force at disposal. The whole of the ministers had resorted to him at the committee of inspectors. All orders emanated from there, as from the sole point where an organized authority existed. The day finally closed in comparative stillness. The patriots congregated in numerous conclaves, and canvassed desperate propositions, but with no faith in the possibility of their execution, so paramount was deemed the ascendency of Bonaparte over the troops.

In the evening a council was held at the committee of inspectors. The object of this council was to arrange, with the principal deputies of the Ancients, the proceedings of the morrow at Saint-Cloud. The plan settled with Sieyes was to enforce the adjournment of the Councils and the appointment of a provisional consulate. This scheme was attended with certain difficulties. Many members of the Ancients, who had concurred in passing the decree of translation, began to be alarmed at the idea of a military domination. They had not suspected the design of creating a dictatorship for the advantage of Bonaparte and his two associates; they had contemplated merely a different composition of the Directory, and, despite the age of Bonaparte, were willing to nominate him a director. They submitted a formal proposition to this effect. But Bonaparte replied, in a determined tone, that the constitution could no longer subsist; that a more concentrated authority was requisite, and particularly a temporary cessation of the political debates which agitated the republic. The appointment of three consuls, and the suspension of the Councils until the First Ventose, were therefore moved. After a somewhat prolonged discussion, these measures were finally adopted. Bonaparte, Sieyes, and Ducos, were fixed upon for consuls. The motion was reduced to form, and agreed to be submitted the following morning at Saint-Cloud. Sieyes, thoroughly conversant with revolutionary movements, recommended that forty of the leaders in the Five-Hundred should be arrested during the night. Bonaparte repudiated the suggestion, and had occasion to repent his exuberant confidence.

The night elapsed free from any violent demonstrations. The next morning, the 19th Brumaire (10th November), the road to Saint-Cloud was thronged with troops, carriages, horsemen, pedestrians. Three chambers had been prepared at the palace: one for the Ancients, another for the Five-Hundred, and a third for the committee of inspectors and Bonaparte. The preparations were to be made by mid-day, but could not be completed before two o'clock. This delay almost proved fatal to the instigators of the revolution. The members of the two Councils promenaded during the interval through the gardens of Saint-Cloud, and conversed together with extreme vivacity. Those of the Five-Hundred, irritated at being exiled, as it were, by their colleagues of the Ancients, before they had been permitted to utter a remonstrance, naturally demanded of the latter what their views were, what they purposed doing that day.—"The government is decomposed," they said to them; "granted, we allow it must be reconstructed, and stands in good need thereof. Do you wish, instead of men incompetent and without renown, to substitute commanding, influential persons? Do you wish to raise Bonaparte to the Directory? Although he is not of the age required, we will nevertheless consent to his elevation."—These pressing questions perplexed the Ancients. They were loath to confess that totally different designs were formed, and that the overthrow of the constitution was projected. Some amongst them dropped insinuations to that effect, which were repelled with unequivocal disapprobation. Already predisposed to alarm from what had passed on the previous evening at the committee of inspectors, the Ancients were effectually staggered on witnessing the spirit of resistance manifested amongst the Five-Hundred. From this moment, the dispositions of the legislative body began to wear a dubious aspect, and the revolutionary project to be seriously compromised. Bonaparte had mounted his horse and was at the head of his troops. Sieyes and Ducos had a post-chariot and six in waiting at the gate of Saint-Cloud. Several others had similar equipages in readiness, prepared, in case of discomfiture, to take to flight. Nevertheless Sieyes displayed throughout the whole scene an admirable coolness and self-possession. Fears were entertained lest Jourdan, Augereau, and Bernadotte should appear to address the troops. Orders were given to cut down the first individual who should present himself with an intention to harangue, were he representative or general, no matter which.

The diet of the two Councils opened at two in the afternoon. In the Ancients, reclamations were offered on the part of the members who had not been summoned the day before to attend the debate on the decree of translation. These remonstrances were disregarded, and a motion submitted to notify to the Five-Hundred that a majority of the Council was in session, and ready to deliberate. In the Five-Hundred the proceedings commenced differently. The deputy Gaudin, who was commissioned by Sieyes and Bonaparte to open the discussion, appeared in the tribune, and after dilating upon the dangers which beset the republic, proposed two measures: first, a vote of thanks to the Ancients for having transferred the Council to Saint-Cloud, and secondly, the appointment of a committee to present a report on the dangers of the republic, and the means of obviating those dangers. If this motion had been carried a report was already compiled, and the provisional consulate and the adjournment would have been recommended. But Gaudin had scarcely ceased to speak ere a fearful tumult broke out in the assembly. Violent exclamations resounded: on all sides were heard,—Down with the dictators! No dictatorship! Long live the constitution! The voice of Delbrel articulated above the storm: The Constitution or death! Bayonets appal us not; we are free! These words stimulated fresh outcries. Several enraged deputies, turning towards the president, Lucien Bonaparte, vociferated: No dictatorship! Down with dictators! Upon these insulting shouts and gestures, Lucien arose. "I am too sensible," he said, "of the presidential dignity to suffer longer the insolent menaces of certain orators; I call them to order!" This injunction failed to calm them, but tended rather to render them more furious. After a prolonged scene of agitation, the deputy Grand-Maison moved that an oath be taken to the constitution of the year III. The proposition was hailed with rapture. A call of the Council was moreover demanded, and adopted with the like transports. Each deputy mounted the tribune in his turn to swear, amidst the clamour and cheers of all the members. Lucien himself was obliged to quit the chair, in order to take the oath which levelled in the dust the ambitious designs of his brother.

Events were assuming a portentous aspect. Instead of nominating a committee to detail schemes of reconstruction, the Five-Hundred swore to maintain the state of things in existence, whilst the Ancients faltered, and were ready to retrace their steps. The revolution seemed foiled and abortive. The danger was most critical. Augereau, Jourdan, and other influential patriots, were at Saint-Cloud, awaiting the favourable moment to rally the troops to their side. Bonaparte and Sieyes agreed it was necessary to act with promptitude and invigorate their wavering partisans. Bonaparte determined to present himself before the two Councils at the head of his staff. On his way he met Augereau, who in a tone of mockery cried to him: "You appear in a very pleasant predicament!" "Affairs were in a far worse state at Arcole!" Bonaparte retorted, and advanced to the bar of the Ancients. He was wholly unused to large assemblies. To speak for the first time in public is embarrassing, intimidating even, to the strongest minds, under circumstances the most ordinary. In the excitement of present events, and to one who had never appeared in a rostrum, it was necessarily still more trying. Bonaparte, labouring under great emotion, and speaking in a broken, yet sonorous voice, essayed to address the Ancients:—"Citizen representatives," he said, "you are not in an ordinary position, but upon a volcano. Allow me a few explanations. You believed the republic in danger; you transferred the legislative body to Saint-Cloud; you invoked me to secure the execution of your decrees. I left my home to obey you, and now we are assailed with calumnies, myself and my companions in arms; we are told of a new Cromwell, a new Cæsar. Citizens, if I had aspired to such a part it would have been easy for me to arrogate it on my return from Italy, at a period of glorious triumph, and when the army and all parties invited me to do so. I did not then desire it, nor do I now. The dangers of the country have alone aroused my zeal and yours."

Bonaparte then proceeded, still in accents tremulous with emotion, to depict the dangerous situation of the republic, torn by intestine factions, and threatened with another civil war in the West, and an invasion on the South. "Let us prevent," he added, "so many evils; let us save the two objects for which we have made so many sacrifices, liberty and equality." "Speak also of the constitution!" exclaimed the deputy Linglet. This interruption somewhat disconcerted the general; but he soon recovered, and replied in the same agitated tone: "Of the constitution! You have no longer one! It is you who have destroyed it, by outraging, on the 18th Fructidor, the national representation, by annulling, on the 22d Floreal, the popular elections, and by subverting, on the 30th Prairial, the independence of the government. That constitution of which you prate, all parties concur to annihilate! They have all come to me to confide their projects and solicit me to second them. I have declined; but if it were necessary I can mention the parties and the individuals." "Name!" shouted his opponents, "name them! demand a secret committee!" It was long before the turmoil occasioned by this interpellation subsided. At length Bonaparte resumed, and, adverting again to the condition in which France was involved, urged the Ancients to adopt measures calculated to save it. "Surrounded," he concluded, "by my brethren in arms, I shall be able to support you. I obtest those brave grenadiers whose bayonets I perceive, and whom I have so often led against the enemy; I obtest their courage to aid you in saving the country. And if any orator," Bonaparte added with a menacing gesture, "if any orator, suborned by the foreigner, spoke of placing me under the ban of outlawry, I would appeal to my companions in arms. Reflect that my steps are attended by the god of fortune and the god of war!"

These audacious expressions were intended as a warning to the Five-Hundred. The Ancients hailed them with satisfaction, and appeared signally reanimated by the presence of the general. They awarded him the honours of the sitting.

After having thus revived the drooping courage of the Ancients, Bonaparte resolved to visit the Five-Hundred, in the hope of overawing them. He entered their hall followed by some grenadiers; on advancing he left them behind him at the end of the chamber. He had to traverse half the arena to reach the bar. On attaining midway he was saluted by furious outcries. —"What!" shouted numerous voices, "soldiers here, and arms! What is intended? —Down with the dictator! down with the tyrant!" Several deputies rushed into the centre of the hall, surrounded the general, and apostrophized him with passionate energy. "What!" they vociferated, "is it for this you have conquered?—All your laurels are tarnished! your glory is converted to infamy! Respect the temple of the laws.—Begone! begone!" Bonaparte was confounded in the crowd swarming around him. The grenadiers whom he had left at the door hastened to his rescue, repulsed the deputies, and grasped him round the body. It is said that amid this tumult, grenadiers received the points of daggers destined for him. Thomé, a grenadier, it is certain, had his clothes torn. It is quite possible that in such a scuffle clothes might be torn without the use of poniards. It is equally possible that poniards were in more hands than one. Republicans who deemed they saw another Cæsar in the senate, might arm themselves with the weapon of Brutus without being assassins. It would be weakness to justify them from the charge. But, be it as it may, Bonaparte was borne by his soldiers out of the hall. He is stated to have been much confused, which is not more surprising than the supposition of daggers. He remounted on horseback, rode back to the troops, told them that his life had been attempted by assassins and placed in great danger, and was everywhere enthusiastically greeted by cries of Long live Bonaparte!

Meanwhile the storm raged more violently than ever in the assembly, expending its fury against Lucien. He evinced in the crisis an indomitable firmness and courage.—"Your brother is a tyrant," shouted the infuriated deputies; "in one day he has forfeited all his glory!"—Lucien in vain strove to justify him.—"You have refused to hear him," he said, "he came to explain to you his conduct, to make known to you h's mission, to answer all the questions you have not ceased to ask since you assembled. His services merited at least that he should be allowed time to exculpate himself."—"No, no! down with the tyrant!" roared the patriots.—"Put him to the ban!" they added with increasing rage, "to outlawry!" This was a terrible word; it had sufficed to insure the downfall of Robespierre. Pronounced against Bonaparte, it might perhaps have caused the troops to fluctuate, eventually to desert him. Lucien intrepidly opposed the motion of outlawry, and insisted that his brother should be first heard. He long contended with unshaken fortitude amidst a tempestuous uproar. At length, divesting himself of his cap and gown, he cried: "Wretches! would you have me outlaw my own brother? I relinquish the chair and proceed to the bar to defend him you accuse!"

At this moment Bonaparte was informed of the scene enacting in the Council. Fearing for his brother's safety, he dispatched ten grenadiers to bear him from the hall. The grenadiers entered, found Lucien amidst an incensed concourse, seized him by the arms alleging the orders of his brother, and conveyed him outside the building. The decisive crisis had now arrived. All was lost if any vacillation were shown. Oratorical means of reclaiming the assembly had proved inoperative, and force alone remained; it had become necessary to hazard one of those daring acts before which usurpers always pause. Cæsar hesitated ere passing the Rubicon, Cromwell in discarding the parliament. Bonaparte finally resolved to march his grenadiers on the Council. Directing Lucien to accompany him on horseback, he rode in front of the troops. Lucien addressed them.—"The Council of Five-Hundred is dissolved," he said to them; "it is I who announce it to you! Assassins have invaded the hall of session and done violence to the majority; I summon you to march for the purpose of delivering it."—Lucien afterwards obtested that he and his brother would be the faithful defenders of liberty. Murat and Leclerc then put in motion a battalion of grenadiers and led it towards the Council of Five-Hundred. They advanced to the door of the hall. At sight of the bayonets, the deputies uttered terrific cries, as they had done on the appearance of Bonaparte. But the rolling of drums drowned their shouts.—Forward, grenadiers! exclaimed the officers. The grenadiers poured into the hall and dispersed the deputies, who fled in precipitation, some by the corridors, others by the windows. In an instant the hall was evacuated, and Bonaparte stood master of this deplorable field of battle.

Intelligence of this event was communicated to the Ancients, who were filled with anxiety and compunction. They had not anticipated such an outrage. Lucien presented himself at their bar and essayed to justify his conduct with regard to the Five-Hundred. His reasons were held to be satisfactory, for what could be done under the pressure of the situation? It remained to conclude the business and realize the object originally contemplated. The Council of Ancients could not alone decree the adjournment of the legislative body and the institution of the consulate. The Council of Five-Hundred was dissolved; but there survived about fifty deputies partisans of the coup d'etat. These were assembled and used to pass the decree, the aim of the revolution now effected. The decree was afterwards carried to the Ancients, who adopted it towards midnight. Bonaparte, Roger-Ducos, and Sieyes, were nominated provisional consuls and invested with the whole executive power. The Councils were prorogued to the 1st of next Ventôse. They were replaced by two commissions of twenty-five members each, selected from the Councils, and empowered to sanction the legislative measures which the three consuls, in the course of their functions, might require. The consuls and commissions were charged to compile a new constitution.

Such was the revolution of the 18th Brumaire, so variously judged by men, regarded by some as the heinous crime which nipped the bud of liberty, by others as a bold but necessary blow which terminated anarchy. What may in truth be said is, that the revolution, after having worn all characters, monarchical, republican, democratic, assumed at last the military guise, because, in the continual struggle with Europe, it required to be constituted in a strong and solid manner. Republicans deplore so many fruitless efforts, such torrents of blood uselessly shed to establish liberty in France, and sigh to witness it sacrificed by one of the heroes it had generated. In this, a sentiment more noble than reflective misleads them. The revolution, intended doubtless to confer liberty on France and a preparative to her full enjoyment of it some day, was not nor could be itself liberty. It was rather a convulsive struggle against the ancient order of things. And after having vanquished this order in France, it had to overcome it in Europe. A contest so violent admitted not the forms or even the spirit of liberty. An interval of liberty existed under the Constituent Assembly, and of very short duration; but when the popular party became so violent as to cause general intimidation; when it invaded the Tuileries on the 10th August; when it immolated all who gave it umbrage on the 2d September; when on the 21st January it provoked universal complicity by the sacrifice of a regal victim; when in August 1793 it compelled every citizen to repair to the frontiers or surrender his property; when, in fine, it abdicated its own power and delegated it to that great committee of public welfare composed of twelve individuals,—was there or could there be liberty? No; there was the strenuous effort of passion and of heroism, the muscular tension of a wrestler contending against a powerful adversary. After the first period of danger, after the victories of the French arms, there was a moment of reprieve. The end of the Convention and the Directory presented degrees of liberty. But the conflict with Europe could only be for a while suspended. It soon recommenced; and at the first reverse, all parties arose against a too moderate government and invoked some potent arm. Bonaparte, returning with the halo of glory from the East, was hailed as the desired chief and installed in power. It is in vain to allege that Zurich had saved France. Zurich was an isolated accident, a mere respite; Marengo and Hohenlinden were still needed for her salvation. And more than military successes were required; a powerful internal reorganization of all the departments of government had become essential, and a political rather than a military chief was the main exigency of France. The 18th and 19th Brumaire were therefore necessary. It may be affirmed only that the 20th was condemnable, and that the hero abused the service he had just rendered. But it will be answered that he acted under a mysterious mission which he held, unknown to himself, from destiny, and which he fulfilled as an instrument. It was not liberty he came to uphold, for it could not yet exist; he came to continue under monarchical forms the revolution in the world; to continue it by placing himself, a plebeian, on the throne; by conducting the Pontiff to Paris to pour the sacred oil on a plebeian forehead; by creating an aristocracy with plebeians; by compelling the old aristocracies to associate with his plebeian aristocracy; by making kings of plebeians; by receiving into his bed a daughter of the Cæsars and mingling a plebeian blood with one of the most ancient royal bloods in Europe; by intermixing nations and spreading French laws through Germany, Italy, and Spain; by refuting, in fine, all established prejudices, by stirring and confounding all elements. Such the inscrutable mission he was to accomplish: and in the interim, the new society was to be consolidated under the ægis of his sword, and liberty to follow at the appointed time. It has not yet arrived, but it will come.

I have described the first crisis which prepared the elements of this liberty in Europe. I have done so without animosity, lamenting error, revering virtue, admiring greatness, seeking to discern the profound designs of Providence in these wondrous events, and reverencing them when, as I have deemed, revealed.

END OF THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.

FULLARTON AND CO., PRINTERS, STEAD'S PLACE, EDINBURGH.